ABSTRACT

This annotated research, bibliographic and resource guide to current literature on the Hispanic elderly is divided into six major sections. The first section contains a bibliography of bibliographies, books and book chapters, conference papers, journal articles, dissertations, theses, and program descriptions. Part two contains a directory of general information sources on gerontology and aging and a listing of government documents pertinent to the field. Sections three and four include a list of gerontology centers and national gerontology service organizations respectively. Section five includes a list of newsletters and periodicals relating to research, practice, services and training, and popular and consumer issues. The final section represents a selected bibliography on general gerontology as well as on Hispanic aging. Included are publications on physical and mental health, housing, employment, education, crime, legal issues, nutrition, retirement, social services, transportation, and other topics as they relate to aging. Introduction to the Bibliographic Guide

Gerontology is a relatively new field. The study of minority older persons is even newer. Serious research on the needs and status of the minority elderly, and programs to meet those unique needs, have begun only in the past ten years or so. During that time, studies about the Hispanic elderly have started to remedy the lack of knowledge about this group. Studies dealing with Hispanics and using empirical methods of the social and behavioral sciences have increased in number throughout the past decade. In most cases, this has been the result of greater numbers of Hispanics entering the field of gerontology and concentrating on their own kind. But interest in research on Hispanics is still peripheral in the general gerontological community. The rapid growth of the Hispanic population means that more research on this group must and will be done.

The data base on older Hispanics is not yet extensive. Nor has this data been systematized. Summarizing and categorizing the data base are important steps in deciding the direction of future research about the Hispanic elderly.

This research, bibliographic, and resource guide is the first publication to take these steps. It unites in one place a comprehensive annotated listing of available contemporary literature on the Hispanic elderly. The guide is meant to help researchers, service deliverers, and policymakers to formulate relevant studies and policies concerning Hispanic elders.

The guide was made possible by a grant from the Administration on Aging, of the Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, D.C. It was compiled by extensive computerized and manual searches in university and professional libraries and holdings on gerontology. It covers the period from 1970-1980, and thus includes most of the literature on the Hispanic elderly. The guide lists books, chapters in books, articles in journals and other periodicals, theses and dissertations, government documents and reports, study findings, proceedings of meetings and conferences held in the past decade, and other bibliographies that will guide the user to more sources.

Also included are a listing of pertinent programs and studies in progress or recently completed in the field of Hispanic gerontology and data bases and publications in the field.

The data bases searched included: Service Center for Aging Information (SCAN), Andrus Gerontology Exchange (AGEX), National Archive of Computerized Data on Aging (NACDA), National Clearing House on Mental Aging (NCMH), Med-Line (MESH), National Technical Information (NTIS), Psychological Abstracts (Psyc), Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC), Social Science Citation Index (SSCI), Public Affairs Information Guide (PAIS), Dissertation Abstracts (DISS). Several libraries in the Los Angeles area were also extremely useful in the manual searches.

The Asociacion Nacional Pro Personas Mayores (National Association for Hispanic Elderly) is pleased to publish this research, bibliographic, and resource guide to the Hispanic elderly. The guide represents a significant contribution to the state of the art on older Hispanics and to the Asociacion's goal of articulating and responding to the needs of the Hispanic elderly in the U.S. The guide's comprehensiveness reflects the Asociacion's unique commitment as the only national organization serving all segments of the older Hispanic population: Cubans, Mexican Americans, Puerto Ricans, Central and South Americans, and others.

We wish to thank the project's principal investigator, Dr. Carlos Vasquez, for his excellent work in compiling the guide. We also acknowledge the fine research assistance of Antonio Rios and Maria Ortiz. Mr. Stewart Greathouse and Ms. Margaret Kronauer of the Ethel Percy Andrus Gerontology Center helped very much with the data searches. Special appreciation is due Mr. Henry Rodriguez, the Asociacion's Research Manager, for coordinating the project.

The Asociacion Nacional hopes that this guide generates further knowledge and programs that will improve the well-being of the Hispanic elderly throughout the U.S. In this way, the guide can help assure that Hispanics will achieve a dignified and comfortable old age.

1. ANNOTATED BIBLIOGRAPHY ON THE HISPANIC ELDERLY

The following annotated bibliography encompasses a wide variety of sources of information on older Hispanics: bibliographies, books, journal articles, conference proceedings, dissertations, aging-related projects, and other sources. The Asociacion has included many kinds of information resources in order to make this bibliography thorough. A desire to provide information on all segments of the older Hispanic population -- Mexican-Americans, Cubans, Puerto Ricans, Central and South Americans, and others -- guided the compilation of the annotated bibliography.

ANNOTATION:

Covers Jews, Asians, Indians, Blacks, and Spanish-speaking groups treated in books, journal articles, agency reports, and conference proceedings. Material treats work done in late 1960 and 1970 and, while there are key items in each section, the bibliography itself is limited in both number of citations and coverage of any one topic or group. Topics include employment, health, income, housing, and family life (annotated).

A relatively comprehensive bibliography on U.S. minority aged, considering its publication date (1975). Assesses the literature and suggests the need to study such important matters as the extended family, folk culture, Catholicism among Mexicans; raises the issues of whether the barrio is a better environment than institutional settings, and how indigenous cooperation in agencies that help the elderly can be generated.

ANNOTATION:

A study of aged Mexican-Americans' participation in an East Los Angeles voluntary association. By putting his subject in the historical and socioeconomic context of Mexican-Americans in this country, the author is able to offer convincing explanations for both the relatively low number of elderly involved in this kind of association and the type of behavior observed in the study. Looking at voluntary association as groupings of two kinds -- the "network constructor" and the "companion seeker" -- the author studies deference patterns, conflict, and accommodation in a particular case study.

ANNOTATION:

Citing lack of adequate sociological theory to explain Chicano problems in U.S. society, the author examines factors that separate the Mexican-American elderly from their majority counterparts. The extended family, and its changing structure, the attachment to the land (rural or urban), and social mobility are examined to explain the relative lack of attention Hispanic gerontology problems have received. ANNOTATION:

Focuses on the health care experiences of older Blacks and Mexican-Americans and presents information drawn from two surveys taken in 1974. One involved interviews with 1269 Black, Mexican-American, and White Los Angeles County residents. The second elicited opinions of 316 decision-makers who influence, formulate, or implement policies affecting Los Angeles County residents. Analyzes and examines the availability, accessibility, and appropriateness in meeting needs of older Mexican-Americans and Blacks, and is designed for use by policy-makers, planners, advocates, and service providers.

ANNOTATION:

A needs assessment based on a 1977 survey conducted in Austin to determine the effectiveness of the Texas Department of Human Resources' delivery and to obtain data on the social and cultural characteristics of urban Mexican-American elderly. The data were based on interviews with 163 SSI income recipients, 65 or older. The study found that 63% believed that governmental agencies exchanged information on clients, which was seen as some indication of why some are reluctant to request social services; that isolation is one of the major problems facing the elderly; and that half were dissatisfied with their assigned case worker.

Argues that present health services for Chicanos are a "mockery of quality" care, and that referrals to supplement these services increase the credibility gap that now exists between health professionals and the Chicano community. ANNOTATION:

Examines the cultural discontinuities among elder Anglos and Mexican-Americans that produce low self-esteem when they must adopt to the expectations of others in their age group. Concludes that there is a tendency in Western cultures to reward one group of people at the expense of another. In the case study presented, a Mexican matriarch's sense of pride, power, and freedom are won only at psychological cost to her children. To insure the mother's self-esteem they must remain dependent children -- even into middle age.

Data were gathered through interviews in the homes of respondents, all of whom were interviewed in Spanish by Mexican-Americans to increase cultural and language rapport. Old age was viewed negatively, and respondents reported less help from family than from Church or government. The position that minority aged suffer from "double jeopardy" in society because of their ethnicity plus their age may be seriously qualified by the other positions that the gap between minority and Anglo closes as both advance in age. Underutilization of nursing homes by Mexican-Americans in the Phoenix, Arizona, area was studied from three data sources: 1970 Census Information; statewide vital statistics; and a mail-back questionnaire of state licensed nursing homes. In the final analysis, the study showed that underutilization occurs because Mexican-Americans do not view nursing homes as a culturally viable alternative, but only as a last resort.

ANNOTATION:

Indicators of housing quality from the 1973 Annual Housing Survey are examined for U.S. households headed by Black, Spanish-speaking and White elderly, aged 65 and over. Findings show that 1 million Black and a quarter of a million Spanish-speaking homes were consistently less desirable than White homes, based on such criteria as vermin, disrepair, high crime rate, and others. Findings indicate many minority elderly are living among conditions unsuitable or even hazardous for any age group, but especially for older persons.

Reports on a study of Cubans to test for cognition abilities. In 31 immigrant Cuban elderly men and women who received their education in Cuba, the number of years of formal education was significantly related to performance on measures of classification, combinational analysis, hypothesis-testing and matrices. ANNOTATION:

Reports a study of Blacks', Mexican-Americans', and Anglos' concepts of mental health and their willingness to pursue action to insure it. Using both "Angst" and "joy" scores in the analysis, tentative conclusions indicated that Mexican-Americans and Blacks seem to have as good mental health as Anglos. Concludes that age and ethnic differences relate not only to treatment but to the physician's evaluation of patients. Also, outreach programs are more likely to succeed if they have support and cooperation of the community.

Investigates psychological distress in a sample of elderly Mexican-Americans and Anglos residing in a four-census tract area, in the southwest area of San Antonio, Texas. This early study of family roles among Mexican-American families finds: the wife subordinate to husband; female siblings subordinate to male siblings; father-son relationships, distant and severe; father-daughter relationships, conflict-free; mother-son relationship, a preparation for dominance, etc. While urbanization and assimilation have begun to alter these roles, they still represent the dominant patterns. The value of this study lies in its almost classic statement of the traditional family roles Mexican-American elderly are most familiar with, and should, therefore, help create understanding of the present intergenerational conflict.

SALCIDO, RAMON M. "Problems of the Mexican-American Elderly in an Urban Setting," Social Casework, Vol. 60, No. 10, 1979, pp. 609-615.

ANNOTATION:

Studies perceptions of the Mexican-American elderly in urban areas with respect to their age-related difficulties and available resources. Concludes that this group faces the problems of language and immigration status in addition to those of poverty and racism -- which they share with other minority groups -- and those of ill health, isolation, loneliness, and agism.

ANNOTATION:

Reports on a project in Florida investigating the effectiveness of two outreach/education modes established to increase the utilization of mental health services by Hispanic elders. These involved: (1) contacting possible sources of referrals, such as aging and social-service agencies, physicians, and priests, and (2) conducting a mass media campaign aimed at elderly clients needing mental health services. It was found that Hispanic elders can be identified and reached through sufficient outreach.

ANNOTATION:

Studies political behavior among two samples of Mexican-American elderly in San Jose and Los Angeles, California. The findings show that the Mexican-American elderly have a relatively low rate of political activity and a diminished sense of efficacy. The authors discuss factors leading to this political behavior -- fear, lack of communication, socio-economic status --, and posit that increased participation by Mexican-American elderly in social and political activity would mean increased potential for organizing around relevant issues to gain a greater influence on decisions, policies, and events affecting their lives.

Addresses the "integration" (consolidation) of health and social services in California to make the systems more efficient. Argues that meeting local needs through creating flexible service delivery systems with insured accountability and linking service providers in a community to meet the individual's needs can better provide an array of services to groups presently overlooked and underserved. More than an effort to "solve" the problem, this paper attempts to "define" its boundaries.

ANNOTATION:

An exploratory field study of the status and role perceptions of 38 Chicano grandparents, mostly female living in Denver during 1973. Selected subjects from Old Age Assistance lists and from personal referrals. Explores five propositions about the perceptions of grandparents: (1) they perceive themselves as important in raising grandchilken; (2) they feel a sense responsibility when crisis hits the family; (3) they see themselves as having credible authority in the family; (4) they perceive grandmothers as responsible for the grandchildren's religious training; and (5) they see themselves as responsible for cultural transmission. The first three propositions appear strongly supported by evidence; the last two considerably less supported.

STEWART, ARLEEN. Las Mujeres de Aztlan: A Consultation with Elderly Mexican-American Women in Socio-historical Perspective, Ph.D. dissertation, California School of Professional Psychology, 1973.

ANNOTATION:

The research developed out of consultations with elderly Mexican and Mexican-American women 60 years of age throughout urban centers of the Southwest. It is an exploratory and interpretative study of the role of the woman in la cultura chicana. Twenty-six women were individually interviewed in focused but open-ended sessions. Results highlighted the heterogeneity among Chicanas and contradict the myth of the submissive, passive, and dependent woman.

An extensive review of the available literature on the Latino aged covering a six-year period, which found fewer than 30 published and unpublished articles. Most of the articles dealt with housing and with communication or transportation as related issues. "Reaching Out to Hispanic Elders in Need of Mental Health Services," University of Miami for the Study of Aging.

ANNOTATION:

This project was established to develop and evaluate the effectiveness of two outreach/education campaigns in increasing the utilization by Hispanic elders of mental health treatment at Douglas Gardens Outpatient Mental Health Center, Dade County, Florida. The first campaign aimed primarily at providers of services to Hispanic elders; the second, a mass media outreach/education campaign, aimed directly at the public. These outreach efforts attempted to overcome those cultural mechanisms that obstruct effective Hispanic utilization of the available mental health services.

Interstate Research Corporation. "A Community-centered Program for the Chicano Aged: A Plan for Model Development and Replication, Fiscal Year 1973-1974."

ANNOTATION:

The purpose of this project was to conduct research on the need of "viejitos" to develop program models that could demonstrate and refine programmatic approaches for meeting the needs of Chicano elderly. It also aimed at preparing those presently being served to become involved in policy-making, administration, and delivery of services.

The program has four phases: (1) to expand the presently inadequate body of knowledge on the needs of the Chicano elderly -- for example, changing demographics, economic, and social characteristics of the older Chicano; (2) to utilize research findings for developing new programmatic strategies; (3) to demonstrate and refine new programmatic approaches, to implement model program developed in Step 2; and (4) to make data available to other organizations working on the problems of the aging.

Health and Social Services, State of New Mexico. "State and Local Aging Project for Comprehensive Services in Las Cruces, New Mexico."

ANNOTATION:

The hypothesis to be proved by this project was as follows: if a departure can be made from the usual state agency approach; and if a task force method can be employed at the local, community level for determining needs, priorities and recommendations; and if, through direct communication between state and local levels, action can be generated toward meeting needs; then more adequate and realistic services will be provided at both community and state levels. The project continued for only two out of the projected three years -- not enough time for the efforts of the project to bear fruit. It appears nonetheless that the hypotheses of the project were not disproved by the results, if they were not proved either.

A Prototype for Area Agencies on Aging."

ANNOTATION:

The general purpose of this project was to discover and explain the needs of minority elders relative to the receipt of public benefits and services in San Diego, California. The San Diego Area Agency on Aging's commitment to implement the findings of this project makes the project applied rather than basic research. Thus, attention is focused on methodological and policy issues rather than on theoretical questions. Issue areas and findings range across wide gamut of the social and health concerns of the minority elderly in San Diego.

II. DATA AND INFORMATION BASES

The Asociacion Nacional searched the following data bases in compiling this section of the Guide:

Service Center for Aging Information (SCAN), Andrus Gerontology Exchange (AGEX), National Archive of Computerized Data on Aging (NACDA), National Clearing-House on Mental Aging (NCMH), Med-Line (MESH), National Technical Information (NTIS), Psychological Abstracts (Psyc), Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC), Social Science Citation Index (SSCI), Public Affairs Information Guide (PAIS), and Dissertation Abstracts (DISS). In addition, several libraries in the Los Angeles area were extremely helpful in our manual searches.

These data bases are useful sources for information about aging in general, as well as Hispanic gerontology. Government organizations that deal with aging are included in this section.

We attempted to be as comprehensive as possible in the data base search; nevertheless, we recognize that the above list does not contain all sources of data on the Hispanic elderly.

ANNOTATION:

Established in 1946 and becoming a clearinghouse in 1964, NTIS offers public access to government publications and data files. The data base consists of government-sponsored research, development and engineering reports plus analysis, journal articles, and translations prepared by federal agencies, their contractors, or grantees. Also includes approximately 560,000 items in the areas of sciences, technology, economics, business, health planning, urban and regional development and planning, energy conservation, and social problems. Over 300 federal government agencies are represented by NTIS. An advantage of NTIS is that it provides, in most cases, a document delivery service for a small fee. Searching is done manually or on-line. A fee is charged for services rendered.

ANNOTATION:

The Service Center for Aging Information (SCAN) is a national information system for the field of aging in the form of a machine-readable bibliographic data base. SCAN provides referral service to other clearinghouses, data bases, and information services and technical assistance for both information systems and discipline focus. Documents are available in microfiche and photocopy.

The National Clearinghouse on Aging has recently taken over the activities of the KWTC/ASTRA Training and Educational Resources program, formerly at Duke University's Center for the Study of Aging and Human Development. Key Word Indexed Collection (KWIC) is designed to assist trainees and educators in the identification of resources for training. Analysis and Selection of Training Resources in Aging (ASTRA) maintains a network of experts who review the training and educational material received at KWIC.
