PREFACE

United States responsibilities in world affairs continue to demand specialists trained to deal with foreign areas and cultures. Increasingly, the specialist, whether engaged in government, business, or education, has had to demonstrate a command of languages and knowledge of civilizations not traditionally offered in American universities. The continued development of centers capable of offering such training has necessitated another edition of this directory, published in 1954, 1956, and 1959 as Area Study Programs in American Universities, and in 1962 under the present title, Language and Area Study Programs in American Universities.

This edition describes 153 programs leading to graduate degrees, 17 more than were covered in the 1962 edition. For the first time, names of faculty members are included in the descriptions. A Language Index has also been added.

At the undergraduate level, the proliferation of programs has been so marked that it is impossible to include all of them here; instead a representative sampling is appended that indicates the variety of these programs in four year schools. (For a somewhat different sampling of undergraduate programs see Non-Western Studies in the Liberal Arts College, a forthcoming study by the Association of American Colleges.)

Language and Area Study Programs in American Universities is compiled and published by our External Research Staff. It was prepared with the cooperation of the Language Development Branch of the Office of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Special acknowledgment is due the Office of Education for its assistance, although it is in no way responsible for the selection and description of the programs listed.

Program descriptions are derived from published sources and from information supplied by the directors of language and area centers. The directory does not attempt to evaluate the programs listed; omission of a program is not meant to suggest that it has less merit than those included. The External Research Staff welcomes corrections and information about new programs for use in preparation of the next edition.

Please address comments and corrections to William J. Nagle, Director, External Research Staff, Room 8840, Department of State, Washington, D.C., 20520.

INTRODUCTION

The concept behind language and area study programs, originally known simply as area studies, has undergone considerable change since this directory was first published in 1954. No single definition of such programs is universally applicable in views of their rapid growth and the variety of goals. In 10 years the number of programs has more than doubled and today each one represents to some degree the peculiar and sometimes unique conditions prevailing on its own campus. The widely differing names given to the programs reflect the differences of emphasis which the universities place upon them. Where once many programs gave virtually no attention to language study, today most, including all those receiving support under Title VI of The National Defense Education Act of 1958, make such study a basic requirement.

Scholars now concerned with what has been called the "center concept" (a term which provides a definition suitable to the greatest number of these programs) envisage language and area competence as basic to the systematic study of a foreign society. Instead of being limited by historical periods or by disciplinary boundaries, these teachers are concerned with the unique social, economic, political, and cultural aspects of particular regions. This approach, needless to say, does not invalidate the need to offer "regular" course work, nor does it challenge the established academic disciplines. Rather, a language and area study program -- regardless of the name given to it -- draws together scholars from various university departments in order that each can apply to the problems of a specific world region insights derived from his particular discipline. They constitute a team of specialists comprising the linguists and the language teachers, the social and behavioral scientists, the historians and humanists, as well as others. These specialists should have a broad, general knowledge of the area, a high level of scholarly ability in their own disciplines, and considerable field experience in the area as well as competence in the languages of the region.

RAPID GROWTH

The need for interdisciplinary language and area programs was fully recognized during the Second World War, when the sudden demand for professional area specialists revealed the great scarcity of adequate training facilities for foreign area studies. During the immediate postwar years a few American universities made a considerable effort to provide such training on a continuing basis. These efforts were aided by substantial financial support from the major foundations. In many cases they not only provided the financial backing but also stimulated interest in the initiation of new university programs. The Ford and Rockefeller Foundations and the Carnegie Corporation of New York have been especially active in encouraging the expansion of language and area studies. They have continued to make available sizeable funds for training and research programs, particularly those concerned with non-Western cultures. This directory lists major foundation grants awarded to language and area centers in the years 1957 to 1964.

The growth of language and area programs has continued in the 1960's. Although these programs were sometimes initiated by university language departments, instruction in essential foreign languages generally lagged behind developments in the social sciences and humanities. The national need for greater linguistic competence was recognized by the Congress in the National Defense Education Act (PL 85-864) of 1958. Title VI of the NDEA provided for the support of centers for instruction in critical languages coupled with instruction in related area studies. Federal funds authorized by the 1958 legislation have, through matching grants, materially assisted the rapid growth of language and area study programs.

PREVIOUS DIRECTORIES

Research and reporting on so-called "area studies" began during World War II. The two basic reports on these early programs were written in 1946 and were published the following year: Robert B. Hall, Area Studies (Social Science Research Council, 1947) and William Nelson Fenton, Area Studies in American Universities (American Council on Education, 1947). Both include the bibliography essential to the early history of the language and area center concept. The most recent publication on the subject is a report written by Donald N. Bigelow and Lyman H. Legters entitled NDEA Language and Area Centers (U.S. Office of Education, 1964). The history of the language and area program has been fully described in the first chapter of a report written by Joseph Axelrod and Donald N. Bigelow entitled Resources for Language

Wendell C. Bennett made a general inventory of area study centers in 1951 in his Area Studies in American Universities (Social Science Research Council, 1951). By his criteria, at that time 29 programs (which he called "Integrated Area Programs") were distributed among 19 universities. This, he found, was more than double the number of programs identified in Robert B. Hall's 1947 publication, the first survey of this kind. Both Bennett and Hall defined area studies and discussed the significance of these programs.

In 1954, when the Department of State published its first directory of area studies, some 62 language and area study programs were listed. Employing essentially the same criteria used by Professor Bennett, the compilers of the 1954 directory found that most of his 22 "Potential Area Programs" qualified for inclusion and that some new programs had been developed. The 1956 directory listed 81 programs, the 1959 edition identified 96, the 1962 dition described 136 programs, and the present volume profiles 154 -- more than a fivefold increase since 1951.
CRITERIA FOR PROGRAM SELECTION

Selection of programs for inclusion in this directory has followed the same criteria used in the previous editions. All programs listed offer graduate degrees, either in interdisciplinary language and area study or in academic disciplines with a relevant specialization or minor. University recognition is another common characteristic, usually indicated by the organization of an institute, center, or committee to provide leadership, administration, and guidance in training and research. Essential language or linguistics study is often requisite, with the exception of those programs which require language competence for admission, as in the case of some Western European area centers. Equally necessary are graduate course offerings in the social sciences and humanities focused on clearly defined geographic areas. Outside financial support, such as foundation, federal, or corporation grants, is desirable both to preserve the identity of the program and to provide assistance to students and faculty. Finally, the university should maintain specialized library collections and other facilities sufficient to permit research.

The 153 programs described have been entered under one or another of the following sections: Africa, Asia General, East Asia, South and Southeast Asia, Latin America, Near East, Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, and Western Europe.

There are more programs for Asia than for any other geographic area. For purposes of this directory, the Asian programs have been divided into three groups: Asia General, East Asia, and South and Southeast Asia. Some programs, such as those at Indiana University, the University of California (Berkeley), and the University of Pennsylvania, offer language and area studies on the Near and Middle East as well as other parts of Asia. In these cases, the program is listed under both geographic areas. Chinese and Japanese remain the most frequently taught Asian languages; Hindi is next but is taught less frequently. An increasing number of universities now offer some instruction in the languages of Southeast Asia.

Growth in the number of African area programs has slowed since the 1959 edition. The course emphasis in these programs is usually heavily oriented toward sociology and anthropology. Training may be provided in linguistic analysis rather than in specific area languages, partly as a result of a shortage of language instructors and adequate teaching materials, and partly because such analytical training is sometimes more useful in coping with the language problems in this multilingual area.

More than other language and area programs, those on the Near and Middle East frequently are oriented toward history and archaeology and also stress the fine arts and humanities. Brandeis University, Dropsie College, and Columbia University have programs which focus on the historical and contemporary role of Israel.
Reflecting the continuing United States interest in the other American republics, the most pronounced growth is in Latin American programs. Many universities not here listed also provide substantial course offerings on Latin America but have not formally integrated them into a specific graduate language and area program.

PROGRAM DESCRIPTION FORMAT

The data listed in the directory contain the information obtained from published sources and, especially, from replies by program directors to the Department's inquiries. The responses to these inquiries varied greatly in the amount of information they contained; hence not all descriptions are comparable and programs cannot be compared in purely statistical terms.

TITLE: The official university designation of the language and area program. Other centers, institutes, or departments within the university which contribute to, or supplement, the program are cited under the heading UNIQUE FEATURES.

DIRECTOR: Name and academic title of the Director or committee chairman responsible for the program in the 1963-64 academic year.

ASSOCIATED FACULTY: The names and specialties of university faculty members contributing to the program. Most programs draw on the resources of many departments and have few, if any, separate staff members.

DEGREE: Graduate degrees awarded, whether in the various disciplines or in a language or area program, with a specialization or minor in area studies. Also included are CERTIFICATES for the successful completion of certain programs. Most of the programs listed also offer a certificate at the bachelor's degree level for completion of work in language and area studies.

LANGUAGE COURSES: The number of language courses by semester offered at the graduate level in the 1963-64 academic year. Additional courses not for graduate credit may be available in the university. Where known to be available, intensive language instruction is listed separately and requirements for entry into the program and for the degree are given.

The LANGUAGE heading also includes relevant linguistics courses. In some programs dealing with African area studies, general linguistics courses are offered instead of instruction in area language. Programs concerned with Western European and Latin American studies usually require a high standard of language competence for graduate study. In such programs, comparatively few language courses are offered on a graduate level, although advanced language study usually may be undertaken in other university departments. An effort has been made to separate literature and civilization courses from those designed to develop mastery of basic language skills. Accordingly, the former are entered under the heading LIT. COURSES.
AREA COURSES: The number of courses relevant to area study offered for graduate credit in each department in an academic year. Additional courses not for graduate credit may be available in the university.

Most area study is taken within the social science disciplines, but pertinent courses in the humanities departments are included here as well. Inter-departmental seminars and survey courses are also listed.

LIBRARY FACILITIES: Research materials relevant to the program, including data as to the total number of volumes and serial publications, acquisition projects, and special collections. Nearby facilities are listed when of particular importance. With some exceptions, the information given pertains to special materials contributing to language and area study, rather than to overall university holdings.

OUTSIDE SUPPORT: Where known, the amount of Federal, foundation and corporation support for each program, including the amount, purpose, and duration. National Defense Education Act (NDEA) support is noted; major foundation grants awarded during the five year period, 1960-1964, are listed. In most cases only a part of large foundation grants is applicable to direct support of a single program.

NATIONAL FELLOWSHIPS: The number of national fellowship holders currently enrolled in each program. The listing includes NDEA Title IV and Title VI fellows. Title VI fellowships are awarded to students enrolled in language and area studies. Title IV fellowships are granted by institutions which may or may not require foreign language training.

Foreign Area Training Fellowships, Woodrow Wilson National Fellowships, and other private foundation fellowships are included here. Only awards obtained in national competition are listed under this heading. Most language and area programs offer university fellowships not entered in this directory.

UNIQUE FEATURES: University centers, institutes, and departments offering related courses and degrees; major publication series; field research or overseas training opportunities; established student or faculty international exchanges; and relevant symposia, conferences, special events, lecture series, summer programs, and special research projects.

1These fellowships, once under the auspices of the Ford Foundation, are now administered by a Joint Committee of the American Council of Learned Societies and the Social Science Research Council.
AMERICAN UNIVERSITY

School of International Service

DIRECTOR: Ernest S. Griffith, Dean, School of International Service

ASSOCIATED FACULTY:
Richard Geisler, African Studies
Lorna Hahn, Government
William Lewis, Government and Public Administration
Emmet V. Mittlebeeler, Government and Politics
Harvey C. Moore, Anthropology
Oliver A. Peterson, Labor Relations
Darrell D. Randall, African Studies

DEGREES: M.A. in African Area Studies; Ph.D. in departments, with a major emphasis and dissertation on Africa.

REGIONAL FOCUS: Africa—south of the Sahara

LANGUAGE COURSES: No courses offered; certain languages are available by arrangement with other universities in the Washington area.

AREA COURSES: Interdisciplinary (6); government and politics (2); labor (1).

LIBRARY FACILITIES: In addition to the University library, the research aids in Washington, notably at the Library of Congress, are available.

UNIQUE FEATURES: A distinctive feature of the program is an integrated interdisciplinary seminar (2 semesters, 6 hours each) on Africa which considers the geography, population, social structure, history, religion, philosophy, culture, government and foreign relations of the area. A new feature allows graduate students, who wish to, to spend at least six months at approved African universities for a component toward their graduate degree.

Creighton Gabel, Anthropology
Adelaide C. Hill, Sociology
Mark Karp, Economics

Daniel F. McCall, Anthropology

DEGREES: M.A. or Ph.D. in departments, with specialization in Africa

REGIONAL FOCUS: African Continent, with emphasis on Africa south of the Sahara

LANGUAGE COURSES: No offering in African languages

AREA COURSES: Economics (4); geography (3); government (10); history (20); sociology and anthropology (7).

LIBRARY FACILITIES: Several thousand volumes on African subjects

OUTSIDE SUPPORT: Ford Foundation: $600,000 grant (1957-63); $500,000 grant (1964-69)

NATIONAL FELLOWSHIPS: NDEA: Title IV (6), Woodrow Wilson (2).

SPECIAL FEATURES: Development Research Center, supported by contracts from the Agency for International Development, primarily involving orientation and short course work for officers of the Agency assigned to African countries, and research relating to problems of operation and policy. Occasionally consultation work is done for government and private agencies concerned with African affairs, usually on an individual basis; cross-registration arrangements with Harvard and MIT; special emphasis on research; visiting lecture series; faculty seminars on African History and African Politics.

DEGREES: M.A. in Latin American Studies (interdisciplinary); M.A. and Ph.D. in specific departmental disciplines, with specialization on Latin America.

REGIONAL FOCUS: Latin America

AREA COURSES: Anthropology (5); Art (1); Geography (4); History (10); Interdisciplinary Seminar in Latin American Studies (1); Law (1); Music (1); Political Science (5); Brazilian Literature (4); Latin American Literature (23).

LANGUAGE COURSES: Nahuatl (1); Portuguese (3); Quechua (1); Spanish (18).

LIBRARY FACILITIES: The Latin American collection of the University of California, Los Angeles, contains approximately 50,000 volumes, and is rich in the subject fields of history, literature, political science, and geography. Areas covered most thoroughly include Mexico, the Caribbean, Peru, and Chile. The Brazilian materials are being strengthened through the Sister Cities Project, in connection with Salvador, Brazil. Of special interest is the recently obtained Jimenez-Quesada collection of 700 books, pamphlets and manuscripts on Costa Rica. A more detailed account of special Latin American holdings at the University of California, Los Angeles, may be found in Ronald Hilton (ed.), Handbook of Hispanic Source Materials and Research Organizations in the United States (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1956).
OUTSIDE SUPPORT: NDEA Language and Area Center, $143,127 (1961-65); Foreign Area Fellowship Program, $60,000 (1-1-1963 -- 6-30-1964).

NATIONAL FELLOWSHIPS: NDEA: Title VI, (7, for 1963-64); Ford Foundation Fellowships (6, 1964-65).

UNIQUE FEATURES: Publication program comprises annual Statistical Abstract of Latin America and contributions of the Latin American Center; Regional Centers of Latin American Studies will be organized throughout Latin America; the first has been operating since June 1963 in Caracas. These Centers are research and training institutions on a multi-disciplinary basis. The various schools and colleges of the campus have Deans' Advisory Committees of Latin American Studies to stimulate and carry out Latin American Studies in their discipline. The Center is closely co-operating with the University's ethnic collections and with the Los Angeles County Museum. In collaboration with the latter exhibits are organized on Latin American topics, i.e., Gold before Columbus. Individual schools, i.e., Law, Education and others organize annual conferences.

UNDERGRADUATE SUMMARY

Introduction

In the years since the passage of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, American institutions of higher education have considerably expanded their offerings of non-Western language and area studies. To determine the extent of non-Western courses and organized programs at the undergraduate level, a survey was made under contract to the Office of Education in conjunction with a report to be issued by The Association of American Colleges on Non-Western Studies in the Liberal Arts College (Washington, 1964). Undertaken in the spring of 1964, the survey included those colleges not part of the Association and also university programs. Over 250 formal non-Western programs are reported at the baccalaureate level. Almost 150 of them are at the small liberal arts colleges -- those primarily interested in four-year undergraduate education.

A representative sampling of 23 undergraduate programs, drawn from the survey, is presented here in profile form in order to illustrate the scope of what might be called the typical undergraduate non-Western language and area program. An attempt has been made to provide profiles which would represent all known types of non-Western programs from colleges and universities throughout the United States. No attempt was made to evaluate any of them and omission from the list, of course, carries no qualitative implication. In order to avoid duplication, this summary contains no undergraduate programs at any of the universities offering a graduate degree or substantial work in a formal language program. Most universities language and area program usually offer programs at the undergraduate level; they differ only in scope and degree of specialization.

Language Programs

A most striking result of the survey is the information that over one-third of the 1500 responding institutions of higher learning offer at least one academic year of Russian. It is by far the most commonly taught non-Western language at the undergraduate level. The next most commonly taught is Chinese, which is offered by fewer than 150 of those responding. Among the 32 other non-Western languages which were listed, only Japanese is offered by a significant number of undergraduate institutions. Few four-year colleges offer more than two years of any language other than Russian, Spanish, French, and German.

Area Programs

Growth in disciplinary or area studies focusing on non-Western regions has paralleled that in language studies. The Soviet or Slavic world is by far the most popular field of area study in the liberal arts college. The next largest number of area programs are devoted to East Asian studies. The once most popular Latin American study programs are third, followed by African and Middle Eastern programs.

Other Developments

Because of the shortage of trained faculty members, many of the liberal arts colleges have attempted to offer substantive non-Western programs through shared or cooperative efforts. The Salem–Wake Forest–Winston Salem Teachers College and the Earlham–Antioch Asian Study Programs are illustrative of cooperative programs which provide for interchange of faculty and library facilities. A few small colleges support a special program at Princeton University for the teaching of certain non-western languages, where their students may study.
