The Human Connection

By Bill Martin, Jr., with drawings by Kelly Oechsl
Department of Elementary-Kindergarten-Nursery Education,

Published by
The Human Connection

By Bill Martin, Jr. with drawings by Kelly Oechsli

National Education Association of the United States, Washington, D.C.
Foreword

Everything in this bulletin is a message on language:

the content,
the way the type is set,
the teacher’s introspection,
the confrontation between the teacher and the children,
the face-to-face discussion, the faculty meeting,
the teacher’s wrestle with behavioral change,
and the language activities in kindergarten.

The message is both literal and symbolic.
You are free to glean from it whatever involves you in dialogue about the nature of language and related classroom practices.

As you read, you may wonder why a bulletin on language and literature that spans the years from nursery school through elementary school has a narrative setting in kindergarten.
A survey of existing materials and beliefs about the teaching of language and literature in the elementary grades indicated that our minds are more open to curriculum explorations before the onus of pupil achievement is upon us.

You also may wonder why there is no bibliography of books for professional growth and books for classroom use.
It was omitted so that there would be no detraction from the invitation to dialogue, which is the purpose of this pamphlet.

Bill Martin}
The Disconnection

Suddenly, there he stood, glaring at me. I was not unaccustomed to children's display of emotion on the first day of kindergarten, but this youngster was so obviously hostile that I was alarmed. “Hello,” I said. “What's your name? I am Mrs. Hoxie.”

“I know your name,” he said. “Everybody knows your name.”

I wasn't sure whether this was good or bad, but I pursued, “And what is your name?”

He responded with silence, looking me directly in the eye. I wasn't sure whether he was contemplating the joy of anonymity or whether he was looking for a crack in my insistence to learn his name.

“If you don't tell me,” I said feebly, “I won't know who you are.”

He gave me a look that said I had just uttered a stupid statement. Then he bit his lip thoughtfully and announced as if it were an event of great importance, “My name is John.”

“John what?” I persisted.

“John Fulston.” Then he added, with a twist of his shoulders that resembled a smirk, “My father is the new superintendent.”
Obviously, this last pronouncement called for a response, but what does one say when cornered by a five-year-old? "Oh," I said guardedly. "Please come in, John. Some of the other children are already here."

It crossed my mind that John had been assigned to Miss Christy's kindergarten, but there is so much indefiniteness on the first day of school that I chose to let John remain with me that morning rather than to risk further conflict with him by moving him immediately across the hall.

By now John had taken charge of the room. He was guiding the other children around, explaining every piece of equipment and acting as if he were personally responsible for its being. I plainly saw that he was going to join a fraternity of outcasts. I determined then and there before the pattern was imposed on the class.

That first morning was a tug-of-war between John and me. He rebutted everything I said until my composure was undermined and the least further provocation would have triggered an overly defensive action that I might regret.
I mustn't let this happen, I kept telling myself, or I'll lose rapport with the rest of the children. I knew from experience the difficulty of restoring a constructive atmosphere after the class has seen a teacher "fall apart."

At noon, Mrs. Fulston appeared at the door to collect John. She introduced herself in a direct, neighborly way that one could expect of a woman who had grown up in a small New Hampshire village. I liked her immediately.

"I suppose I should say I'm sorry for you," she said honestly. "John has always been difficult to handle, so we, Mr. Fulston and I, requested that John be put in your room, not Miss Christy's, since you've had more experience."

It's not an easy role, I thought, being the superintendent's wife and having a child like John enrolled in the same school system, but Mrs. Fulston handles it well.
“Oh, John and I will get along,” I said warmly. “Won’t we, John?”
The moment I drew John into the conversation, I realized that I had made a mistake. It gave him another chance to challenge me, which he promptly did with a skeptical shrug of his shoulders.

“Come on, Mom,” he said. “Let’s get going.”

If I had known then what I know now, I would have made different plans as I thought over the day’s events and projected what I would do about John on the morrow. Even though I had taught for fourteen years, I felt thoroughly threatened by this kind of child. I couldn’t dismiss him from my mind. Off and on through the night, I found myself thinking of ways that I could bend John to school routine without incurring his anger.

My internal dialogue was so nagging that I had to admit John worried me, but I was nonetheless determined that he would not get the upper hand a second day.

I resolved that nothing he said or did would unnerve me and that I would proceed quietly but firmly to divest his pronouncements of any effect on me or the children. I would establish myself as the authority, once and for all.
By morning I was prepared for John's entry. I found myself eager for the day's encounter when the first children appeared, some with mothers, some alone.

I enjoyed looking earnestly into each child's face, associating his first and last name. This was one of my strengths. I never had to ask a child his name a second time. I had intentionally perfected this skill after reading in Walt Whitman that a child's name is his most precious possession.

“Hello, Juanita! My, what a pretty dress!”
“Oh, hello, Roger! What's that in your hand? A surprise?”
“And here comes Ginger! Is this your mother? Hello, Mrs. Grabowski.”

All at once I realized that the day had begun—without John. This was a real disappointment to me because my plans for dealing with him had been so well laid.
As I talked and sang and arranged with the children
in the course of the morning,
I, at the same time, was thinking about John.
Where was he? Why hadn't he come today?
Had he gone to Miss Christy's class, after all?
What do you suppose he had told his parents about me?

We were in the middle of having juice—with its possibilities for catastrophe—when John sauntered in.
Without an acknowledgment of any kind,
he got a paper cup from the dispenser and came quickly to his table
just in time to be served.
“Good morning, John,” I said reservedly,
“And where have you been?
You know
you're late,
don't you?”

“Oh, I'm always late,”
he answered casually.
“We always have a late breakfast at our house.”

My anger flared. I wanted to shake him!
Here was this whippersnapper, John Fulston, upstaging me already!
Just then, Angela spilled her juice in her lap and burst into tears. Perhaps that was fortunate.
At least it gave me a chance to retreat without saying anything to John that I might have regretted later.
I waited until noon to make my move.
As John prepared to leave, I called him aside.

“John, you were an hour and a half late this morning.
Tomorrow when you come to school,
I want you to bring your father with you.
He and you and I will have a talk.”

So that he wouldn't forget,
I pinned a note in an envelope to his jacket.
John seemed totally unconcerned.
He solemnly unpinned the note,
put it in his pocket and went on his way.

We were headed for a showdown—John and I.
What I didn't know was that the showdown would prove to be a turning point in my life.
Fifteen minutes before classtime the next morning, John and his father appeared for the conference. I asked the other children who were already present to play quietly in the far part of the room, and then I beckoned John and Mr. Fulston to join me at my desk. Although I had heard Mr. Fulston speak just a week before at our opening faculty meeting, I did not, until now, perceive his personal warmth.

His eyes, metallic gray and penetrating, were nonetheless gentle, and his entire face lifted easily into a smile. His posture immediately assured me that he was non-partisan on this occasion, and I was grateful.

“John and I are having some problems,” I said straightforwardly, “which must be resolved now lest we start the year with a handicap.”

Mr. Fulston nodded agreement and asked if he might sit down. “Oh, yes, please do,” I said apologetically. “And John, won’t you sit here?” I got John a small seat and then drew my chair around to face him and his father.
It was then that I noticed the change that had occurred in John since yesterday. He sat there, terribly alone. He was huddled down within himself, his hands clasped tightly in his lap, his head lowered to avoid looking at us. His whole being was withdrawn, the antithesis of that proud confident boy I had been struggling with.

My impulse now, in view of his contrition, was to gloss over our difficulties. But, no! I thought. Now is the time to reach an understanding with John.

“As my note indicated, Mr. Fulston,” I began, “John was an hour and a half late to school yesterday morning. When I inquired why, he answered offhandedly, ‘Oh, I’m always late! We have a late breakfast every day.’ Nor is this the only occasion that he has been smarty with me. His attitude from the beginning has been uncooperative and sometimes arrogant.”
“Yes,” said Mr. Fulston, “John sometimes tends to be assertive. He’s our third child, much much younger than his brother and sister who now are in college. Undoubtedly we have enjoyed him so much as he is, that we haven’t tried to change him. But that doesn’t excuse his being evasive and flippant.”

Although Mr. Fulston’s words seemed to condemn John’s behavior, there was no feeling of condemnation in his voice. He simply was explaining the situation. I admired him for that. Then turning to John, whose head was still bowed, he asked for an explanation of his tardiness.

John took some time to begin: “Well, I was — uh — I took a shortcut — (his voice quivered) I took a shortcut — through Kathy’s yard — and right near the parking — I found — uh — I found — (suddenly he burst into sobbing) — uh — uh — I found — I found — uh — an — an ant — an ant hill — (his voice rose higher and higher) — I found — uh — an ant hill — and — and — I — I stopped — to watch the ants.”
I was embarrassed to witness John’s desolation. His humility, which I had wished for and which now was reality, was not in any way a satisfaction to me. John’s sobbing attracted the children from their play. They gathered around curiously and uncomfortably, staring first at John, then at us.

“Oh, children, do go on with your playing,” I implored. “John doesn’t feel well, but he’ll be better in a few minutes.”

I also noticed that two mothers were standing at the doorway, watching. I quickly waved them good-by, which sent them on their way.
When John’s crying subsided, I asked if he understood the need for being to school on time. He nodded his head yes, without looking up.

“And do you understand that, hereafter, when I speak to you, you are to answer politely?”

Again John nodded.

“Then, I think our talk is over, John. Your father can go on to his work, and we can get to ours. Would you like to go to the bathroom to wash your face? That will help you feel better.”

John departed, his face buried in his arm crook.

Mr. Fulston, however, rose slowly, obviously piecing together what he wanted to say. “I am speaking now as John’s father,” he began, “not as your superintendent. I am aware that John sometimes can be difficult, but, Mrs. Hoxie, he also has an amazing capacity for involvements. Perhaps you have not sensed this in him as yet, but knowing him as I do, I could have predicted that an ant hill would be just as provocative to John, as a morning in kindergarten.”
The implications of the conference left me so shaken that, although my teaching obligations kept me going, the time passed without a mark. Certain questions kept gnawing at my awareness:

Why hadn't John felt free to tell me that he had found an ant hill?

Had I really turned this competent boy into the defeated figure that now slumped silently in his chair?

What was Mr. Fulston trying to tell me about the importance of involvement?

How, now, can I bridge back into John's confidence after this serious breach in our communication?

Nor was I the only one asking questions. The children, too, were expressing their concerns:

*"What did she do to you, John?"
"Are you really sick?"
"Will your father spank you, John?"
"Here, John. Have some of my juice."

If John was aware that he commanded the children's sympathy, he didn't reveal it. He remained withdrawn and somber all morning. The incident had dulled the day — for him and me and all the children.
At noon, after the children had been dismissed, I went directly to see Gloria Waterman, our principal.

"I have a problem, Gloria," I said flatly. "If you have no other plans for lunch, can we eat in and talk?"

I dislike sack lunches, but on coming to Jefferson School where every teacher carries his lunch (there being no cafeteria in our building), I learned to covet the noontime peace that "eating in," as we called it, provided.

Gloria was available, so I poured out my story. She was the one person in the building that I always could count on.

She could strip a problem to its kernel, and then view it with calmness and common sense.

That was the kind of support I needed right now.

"There’s no use going to books for answers to your human problems, folks," she always said.

"Reach into your heart and you’ll know what to do."

Sometimes she varied that statement by suggesting that we "look earnestly into children’s faces" for solutions.

"You have a whole storehouse of insights to fall back on, if you only trust what you know."

Introspection
Gloria was a big woman. “No, I’m fat!” she quipped. “I save up all this energy to help us get through the trouble spots of the school year, so be sure you call me when you need support.” Then she would laugh a deep rolling laugh that allayed our doubts and anxieties.

As we ate our sandwiches that noon, I poured out my story from beginning to end.

“Well, he sounds like a fine boy, Clara,” she said heartily. “Imagine a five-year-old concentrating on an ant hill for an hour and a half.”

Wasn’t it strange that I hadn’t even thought of this? I was so preoccupied with the struggle between John and me that I completely missed the unusual quality of his performance.

Perhaps this is what Mr. Fulston meant when he described John capable of deep involvements.
“When did things between you and John first go wrong?” Gloria wanted to know.

That was the question I had been asking myself.

When had they gone wrong?

Was it when John arrived an hour and a half late, or had the possibility for conflict snapped up the first morning John came to kindergarten?

Ah, that's it! I disliked that boy's attitude from the moment I first laid eyes on him.

He was so cocksure, so positive of himself.

“But, Clara, is there anything wrong in John’s being verbal?

I would hope — no I would covet the opportunity to help every child to latch onto language just as John has.

If children are to claim their humanity, it must be with language, for without language, they vegetate.”

Yes, I had to admit that this was true!

Today I had seen John reduced to speechlessness, drawn back into his inner self without an apparent contact with the outside world, with a mere nod of the head substituting for one of his characteristically colorful statements, and the remembrance of it drowned my victory.

“Clara, I once had a professor tell me that if we are going to teach children to read, we must begin by respecting the words in their mouths. I've come to believe that is true of all teaching. It must begin with respect for each child’s language.”

But how can I respect his words when his attitude rankles me?

Imagine his telling me in our first encounter that “everyone” knows my name!
"But isn't it interesting, Clara, that you remember his exact words? Even in your anger, you accorded him the right to be an individual because of his language. Chances are, you don't remember any other child's comments as clearly as you remember John's. This is the beginning of communication between you and John, Clara. Your next step is to turn it into something positive."

Gloria was my polestar. I came from her office that noon with a fresh grip on myself. It wasn't that I had lost my uneasy feelings about John; it was that I had new insights for interpreting his language — his whole linguistic behavior. I sensed that this new awareness was going to make me a better teacher.
When the children came flocking in the next morning, I was able to engage them in easy communication, surprisingly unthreatened by either their language or their honesties.

"Hi, Mrs. Hoxie!"

Yesterday I would have stopped Ken and asked him to say good morning rather than hi, this being one of my fetishes, but today, I was able to intake the cheerfulness of his greeting without allowing my bias to tarnish it.

"Am I late? Tell me. I don't want to be late."

Shy little Angela! She also was caught up in my problem with John. Isn't it alarming, I asked myself, that classroom altercations are so contagious?

"Oh, good morning, Kelly. Aren't you going to say good morning to me?"

Now why did I force that child to speak when he obviously was deep in his own thoughts? How long must I continue trying to bend every child to my will?

"Mrs. Hoxie, why were you mean to John yesterday?"

I was proud of myself. I accepted Marta's question as part of her curiosity, without feeling that I had been put on the spot. I answered her person to person, not as teacher to child.
And here came John.

"Good morning, John. I am so glad to see you."

"Well, I'm here on time," he said loudly,

"but it's not very stimulating."

"Maybe we can do something about that," I said, turning to the entire class.

"Children, what can we do to make our room more stimulating?"

"I can hammer," said Homer.

"I like to hammer."

"Read to us, Mrs. Hoxie," said Patricia.

"Oh, please, read to us."

"I like to cook in the kitchen," said Molly Ann.

"I wish we could go to John's ant hill," said Seth.

A cry of approval came from the children.

"Let's go to John's ant hill!" they begged.

"I like ants," said Chyrul.

"Not me. I hate ants," said Hiles.

"We have ants in our kitchen," said Bobby.

"How big is an ant?" I asked, taking my cue from the children's interest in the subject.

"About this big," said Eddie, marking off a large segment of space with his hands.

"You're crazy," said Seth. "There are big ants and little ants, but no ant is that big. They are about an inch long."

"Black ants are bigger than red ants," John said.
"How big is an inch," I asked. "Who can show me?"

"I can," said John. "An inch is this long."

He showed me on his finger an approximation of an inch. Then he added thoughtfully,

"If you have a ruler like my brother's, I can show you exactly."

Mary and Bubber, having lost interest in the group discussion, wandered off to the costume box to play. Several other children followed them. My inclination was to call them back, but I told myself to keep calm and observe the children. My encounter with John had made clear to me my narrow bias in judging children's behavior. "How do ants dig a hole in the ground?" Eddie was asking.

"How do you think they do it?" I countered.

"Well, they don't have shovels," Eddie said.

"They do it with their arms," John shouted. "They carry the dirt out with their arms."

Isn't John an amazing child, I thought. Here he is, wholeheartedly engaged in our classroom activities without any negative reactions to yesterday. What inner strength this child must have!

As the pooling of information about ants continued, I listened and reacted and injected helpful questions to release the children to more of what they already knew, but I also was thinking of the children in the other part of the room.
Even in their play at the woodworking table, at the easel and at the costume box, they had little to say.

Were these children non-verbal, or was there an abundance of unuttered language bouncing around in their heads, just as there was, this moment, in mine?

If so, then what should I be doing to release that language into speech?

Fortunately, Gloria had planned an unstructured session for our first faculty meeting of the new year. We met in the library after school, and Dorothy had a plate of homemade cookies to “sweeten the affair,” as she put it.
“Well, what’s going on these opening days,” Gloria asked. “School has started and there’s scarcely been a peep!”

“It’s what’s not going on that bothers me,” said Dorothy. “I’ve been waiting five years to get a new cupboard for my art supplies, and I’m still waiting. I suppose I’m in for another year of climbing up to my cloak-room cubbies to store my large-size paper.”

“That’s what keeps you slim, Dorothy,” said Lindle. “Don’t complain or Gloria will charge you for health service.”

Everyone laughed, even George Helpern, our elementary school psychologist, who was usually quiet.

“Well, since George is visiting with us today,” I said, “I’d like some information from him about something new I’m trying this year, but it’s posing problems.”

“What kind of problems?” George asked.

“I’m trying to give my children more freedom—more room to do their own thinking. It’s more difficult than it sounds.”

George frowned. “You must be more explicit, Clara.”

“Well, this is what I have in mind,” I began again.

Recalling yesterday’s situation stirred up the anxiety I felt at the time.

“Yesterday half of my class was deeply involved in a discussion about ants. The other half wasn’t, so I permitted those children to drift off to other activities.

Oh, they didn't disturb the ant group.

They were quiet enough,

but I do wonder, since they are children who should be learning to talk more,

whether I did the right thing.

"Well, Clara, we could spend the year discussing that question,"

George said, "but in the first place,

it's not easy to separate verbal and non-verbal behavior.

How closely did you observe the children in their play?

Wasn't there quite a bit of talking going on?"

"That's a good point, George," said Gloria.

"It's possible that even the child who sits looking out a window may be telling himself what he is seeing."

"But I'm concerned about helping children use words to express a point of view," I said.

"We have an obligation to help children use language well.

If I relinquish some of my teaching time to let children operate on their own, as I did yesterday, am I being fair to the children?"

George hesitated, thinking how to say what he wanted to say.

“What is teaching, Clara?
I'm not sure that I know the difference between teaching and learning,” he said.

“There are only human beings in a classroom, all strung out on a long range of becoming, all headed the same direction, each wanting to become something more, something better than he is.”

“What we really need in the classroom,” said Gloria, “is more honest-to-goodness dialogue between people. That's the way children learn language.”

“But that's a risk,” I said. “How do you know that any language learning is going on?”

“Oh, Clara, you're being naive,” said Dorothy. “You knew something valuable was happening to those children who left your discussion group, or you would have called them back.”

“As I understand it, Clara,” said George, “you're trying to release children to talking, to language. You’re trying to develop language ways in your classroom that have some sort of human thrust. Well, if that is so, you have no choice but to trust your intuitive judgments, because this creative kind of teaching has never been fully spelled out on paper. It can only emerge, blossom in the response of a sensitive teacher to the questings of children.”
"But what about my limited talkers?" I persisted.

"Involve them," said George. "Involve them in living, in doing, in perceiving. Involve them in feeling good about themselves. Let them explore, react, reconnoiter, even fail, but just manage it so they are eager to try again."

"That's easier said than done," I said.

"You're forgetting that you're a teacher," said George, "and that's what teaching is all about. You, the teacher—every teacher—creates the safeguard when you create an environment in which children are free to discover themselves, in which they establish rapport with their dreams, in which they perfect skill in becoming what they find they can do successfully.

All else in a classroom day is naught if a child goes home at night feeling negative about himself with no dream of becoming successful."

"And that's why teaching is so rewarding," said Gloria. "A teacher by her faith in children, by her continuous search for language ways and curriculum ways that release children rather than hinder them performs the miracle of human connection."
For a moment the group was thoughtfully silent.

"Well, please pass the cookies again. I need a solvent to get all this philosophy down," sniffed Dorothy.

"Yes, eat up, girls," said Lenore, "—oh, excuse me—and gentlemen. If I understand George correctly, he's prescribing a curriculum that's calorie free."

George smiled.

"George, I'm getting the feeling of what you're saying," I said cautiously, "but let's translate it into classroom techniques. Bear with me now if this sounds stupid, but I'm trying to understand."

I thought back to John's ant hill.

"Suppose I took my children on a field trip to see an ant hill . . ."

"Oh, Clara! Field trips are passé. Even in kindergarten," said Lenore.

"Not at all," said Clara. "There may be some doubt about a field trip that is teacher dominated, but there are valid reasons for a field trip that grows out of interests and questions of the children."
“A field trip can be many things,” George agreed.
“But, whatever else, it is a language laboratory.
Look what happens when the children have their ‘daily field trip’
with Lindle on the playground.”

“Now we know what’s going on during your phys ed periods, Lindle,” said Dorothy.
“You’re teaching grammar.”

“Well, you may call it grammar,”
Lindle said in his Kentucky drawl,
“but it sounds like good child talk to me.
I wonder if you’re aware of the language skill kids develop on the playground.”

“How could we miss it!” said Lenore.
“We have to drill it out of them when t’ey return to class.”

“It would do us all good,” said George,
“to get out on the playground more often.
This is one place where we can truly see children
as users of language.
There they are free to retain all of the color and zest of their home-instilled language, at the same time amalgamating it with all of the new expressions and structures that they are encountering in the classroom.”

“And in their associations with other children,” said Dorothy.
“This is what I’m sensing about a field trip to the ant hill,” I said.
“It’s true that my annual field trip to the corner mail box
suddenly seems obsolete,
but I’m really challenged
by the language dimensions of a trip to the ant hill.”

“It occurs to me, Clara,” said George,
“that the highly conceptual nature of classroom discussions forces some children into a non-verbal posture.
Maybe some of the children in your class, Clara, who appeared to be non-verbal when the group was abstracting its ant experiences would be more verbal in another language situation.”

“Yes,” said Gloria. “It will be interesting to hear how some of your seemingly non-verbal children respond when they are actually seeing the ants and when they’re engaged in informal conversation around the ant hill.”

“In our concern for non-verbal children,” said George, “let’s not overlook the learnings that are offered to verbal children
by a field trip of this kind.
They, too, need firsthand experience,
but for a different reason.
Children who use language so easily often need experience to validate their concepts.”

“I’m not following you, George,” said Helen.
“Are you saying their language doesn’t grow out of experience?”
“Precisely. Very often it doesn’t. Television has given us a new kind of child to work with, one who picks up language patterns easily and seems to handle concepts whether or not he has had background experience to support them. His language, therefore, can actually become a trap. To others he always seems to know so much more than he himself knows that he knows. If we permit him to persist in substituting language for experience, he may never learn to ground his seeming academic success in reality. It's the connection between language and experience that offers children human wholeness.”

“Yes, that’s so,” said Rowena. “Every summer at camp I see some children fall apart at a square dance or on the archery range or someplace else where language abstraction does not insure their success.”

“That reminds me of a child in third grade last year,” said Florence. “He became a troublemaker whenever he didn’t have an audience. He’d hit, push, pinch, anything to make people talk to him.”
"Have we been saying, George, that I don't have to hold my children to a discussion when we return from our trip to the ant hill?" I asked.

"Well, Clara, you don't have to do everything at once," George suggested.

"At some time you will want to help your children verbalize those things that were important to them. But it need not always be in discussion. Don't you have a poem or a song about ants that would give them language to experiment with?"

"I'm sure that I do," I said.

"One of your children playing dress-up might sing a doll to sleep, using lines from an ant poem. This, too, is a form of verbalizing."

"And, of course, you could read them a story like 'The Ant, the Lamb, the Cricket and the Mouse,'" said Gloria.

"A fantasy like this gives children another way for thinking and talking about ants."

"Isn't it interesting," said Celia, "that we're talking of feeding language into the children rather than expecting to pull it out of them?"

"Clara, are you primarily concerned in helping the children learn about ants? Or do you have some other purpose in mind?"
"Well, I have two purposes, I think. First, the children are genuinely interested in learning about John's ant hill, and I want them to have both the experience and the language that go with this interest. Second—now let me think how to say this—second, the children asked to see the ant hill, and I want to experiment this year by letting the curriculum partly grow out of their yearnings."

"You don't sound like you, Clara," said Dorothy. "Well, Dorothy, I'm sure I don't."

"Why don't you go back to teaching phonics in kindergarten, Clara?" Ruby said.
"I always liked getting your children in first grade. They had such a good start in reading."

"Now, Ruby, let's not go into that again," said Gloria. "We did research on phonics in kindergarten for five years, and all of our tests showed that you couldn't tell the difference in third grade between the child who had phonics in kindergarten and the one who didn't. Language instruction in kindergarten must tune the children's ears to sentence structure, to language flexibility, to widening vocabulary, to beauty and hope, not to the mechanics of word analysis."

"No, Ruby," I said, "I'm through with phonics in kindergarten. It was putting the cart before the horse."
"I think Clara has raised some interesting points today that we might keep as a continuing theme of study," said George.

"How can we help children—and ourselves—connect language and experience so they are mutually supporting? Contrary to our notion that experience must always precede language and that language is always the culminating activity, we now see this never-ending play between the two. At one moment language may validate experience, while at another moment, experience may be needed to validate language. It is a continuing interchange that lasts the course of a lifetime.

... And a person’s learning is whole to the degree that these interchanges are provided for."

There was a bounce in my step as I returned to my room that afternoon. Just having made the decision to attempt a human-centered curriculum made me feel prouder to be a teacher than I had ever felt before.

Connection
Now let me see.

What are the basic premises?

1) Children's comfortable language is the starting point in a school language program.

2) New language patterns must first be anchored in children's ears with abundant oral activity so that children can later transpose those patterns into their own thinking, speaking, reading and writing.

3) Poems and stories are a prime source of speech models that children can imitate in exploring new patterns of language and in discovering more about the structure of our language.

4) Firsthand experiences, like a field trip, will be for some children a validation of concepts they already are verbalizing; for other children, the experiences will be events that lead to language.

5) Group discussion, long overused as the only means of developing conceptual language, must be balanced by experiences in creative dramatics, creative writing, choral reading, storytelling, independent research, and other uses of language which also enhance the development and expression of concepts.

6) Pure verbal experiences must be balanced with less verbal experiences such as painting, dancing, pantomine, sculpting, music, rhythms, and play without talk which evoke thoughts and feelings that strongly influence the mainstream of language development.

7) The goal of language instruction is not to develop language skill in and of itself, but to help children claim their humanity through the use of language.
I remember how pleased I was taking the children to the ant hill.
The day had favored us with warm sunshine and enough helping mothers to make the trip comfortable.
The children were fascinated by the ants.
They watched them, prodded them, talked to them and finally took turns blocking their trailways with sticks and pebbles
to see how they would cope.

"Go around it! Go around it!" Little Burt urged a large black ant.
"Your babies need you at home."

John was fully in charge,
cautioning everyone to look where he stepped,
for he might, in John's words,
"squash the queen ant."

"Ants can't be a queen," said Mary.
"A queen is a lady with a long dress."

Yes, I told myself,
*Mary w'zio loves to dress up
would know that.
Isn't it interesting that the word queen triggered her into a response that clearly reveals
one of her strong interests?"

"You're crazy, Mary," said Seth.
"Ants have a queen
and so do bees.
The queen bee is the largest."
Yes, I told myself, I need but listen to Seth and I'll discover his scientific bent.
His language, is the mirror of his being.

I felt a tug at my skirt and leaned down to Angela.
"Why for the ants have a queen?" she asked softly.

Yes, quiet little Angela, with her home-rooted language, could also frame a question of scientific inquiry.

"Stand back, everybody," John commanded.
"Stand back and let Mrs. Hoxie have a look."
Then he added confidentially,
"Shall I tell you about them, Mrs. Hoxie?"

As I stood watching the ants scurrying back and forth,
John gave an amazing description of what was happening.
It suddenly occurred to me that I had just discovered the source of John's great strength as a human being.
He has a wonderful capacity for connecting language and experience.
What was it that George said in our faculty meeting?
Oh, yes! "It's the connection between language and experience that offers children human wholeness."
Isn't it interesting that this child who started out as a problem to me is now my teacher?
He is helping me connect my language with experience.
When we returned to the classroom, “ant hill” conversations sprang up voluntarily, sometimes within small groups, sometimes within large groups, sometimes as a bona fide science discussion, sometimes as dramatic play, sometimes to re-establish the memory of the field trip. Sometimes I provided leadership for the discussions, sometimes they were child directed. I only had to listen to know that all of the children, even the quiet ones, were taking on new vocabulary and sentence patterns and that each conversation tended to cross-pollinate another.

On the second day after the excursion, the time seemed right to read a poem about ants. “Here is a poem,” I said, “that John and Seth and Angela—oh, yes, and you too, Eddie—will particularly enjoy. It’s about ants.”
“I want to hear it, too,” said Helsabeth. A group of children gathered on the rug around me. As I began reading, I observed that many children elsewhere in the room were listening intently while seeming to continue their other activities.

_Ants_

One day I found
Upon the ground
A little mound
With ants around,
Running and hurrying,
Busy and scurrying.
I watched them come;
I watched them go;
I laughed as some
Ran to and fro
With a crumb of cake
I gave them to take
Into their mound
Upon the ground.

—Zhenya Gay

Poetry had always been a natural part of my kindergarten curriculum. This was not the first poem the children had heard, but this was the first poem that I had chosen because it provided language patterns and vocabulary about a subject that the children were interested in.
Their response was immediate.
“Read it again,” they said. “Read it again.”
Whatever pleasure I derived from reading the poem could not compare with the pleasure the children got from hearing it and saying it along with me.

Each day thereafter some child would ask for “the ant poem,” and everyone would chime in as I read it. They especially liked

... Running and hurrying,
   Busy and scurrying . . .

although they had some difficulty pronouncing the strange sequence of sounds in hurrying and scurrying.
But from the outset, they claimed as their own

One day I found
Upon the ground
A little mound . . .

to which they added

“Of ants!”

Understandably, this became our accepted way of saying the poem because with ants around did not sound right to the children.

Their change of that line, I reasoned, is a sound linguistic activity. When a language pattern is apparent and pleasing to children's ears, they have no difficulty making it their own. But, if it isn't, they either ignore it or change it.
Then I experienced another revelation:
the children were naturally analyzing both the poem's structure and its meanings.

"One day I found
Upon the ground
A little mound
Of ants,"
Rose said rhythmically
to her tippy-toe dancing.

"It wasn't a little mound," said Kenneth.
"It was a big old mound."
"Yes," said Rose, "it was a big old mound."
Then she went right back to saying the poem
the way that she had learned it.

"It was a big old mound, wasn't it, Mrs. Hoxie?" Ken asked.

"Do you mean the mound in the poem or the mound in Kathy's yard?"

Ken had some difficulty differentiating the two,
but at last it became clear to me that the mound in the yard was his reality.

Aha! Ken has a preference for visualizing.
I wonder if he will be one of those children who does better in geometry than in algebra.
Rose's reality is obviously the language of the poem.
Will her preference for conceptualizing also influence her math performance?
Will she do better in algebra than in geometry?
Then one day I came upon a group of crayons that had been left on the floor. Instinctively I said,

"Today I found
Upon the ground
A little mound
Of crayons.
Won't someone please
pick them up?"

The children's joy in associating the poetic experience with a new context that I instinctively found was so evident other occasions to transform parts of poems and stories and songs to fit into conversational situations in the classroom. The children loved this kind of playing with language and the good fellowship that it engendered, and they, too, began changing poems and story lines to fit their purposes. One day near the end of the school year, Gloria came in to hear the children do some choral reading. Her delight was so evident to them that they wanted to go on and on—which they did.

Later, after the children had left, Gloria said to me, "It doesn't seem very long ago that you were in my office, Clara, overwhelmed by the thought of having to deal with a linguistically gifted child. Now I'm facing a linguistically gifted teacher who has made language in the classroom relate intimately to children's lives."

"Yes," I said, "I sense the change that has occurred in me. I'll never go back to my old ways of teaching."
“You lived through the risk,” Gloria went on,
“of putting some of your strongly held values out on the table for examination only to discover that they didn’t suffice.
It was a painful experience, but it got you in touch with children as they really are.
My hat, if I had one, would be off to you!”

I appreciated what Gloria had to say, but the full impact of the change that had occurred in me was brought home when John announced one day, “I’m not sure that I’ll like first grade next year.
The kids say it’s not very stimulating.”
He fussed around for several days about having to leave kindergarten, but finally he accepted the move with just one regret.
“I really hate to leave you, Mrs. Hoxie,” he said.
“I was just beginning to know what you look like.”