The Little Herder Reading Series is comprised of 4 volumes based on the life of a Navajo Indian girl. The books are written in English blank verse and describe many facets of Indian life. The volumes contain illustrations by Hoke Denetsosie which give a pictorial representation of the printed verse. The reading level is for the middle and upper elementary grades. (DK)

MORNING

This morning,
when I crawled
from under my blanket, when I stood
before my mother’s hogan door, outside looked
as if it had been crying.

The sky was hanging heavy with gray tears.

I stood at the door
of my mother’s hogan
and looked out
at the gray, sad morning.

My father came.
He stood beside us.

He spoke in a happy way
to me
and to my mother.

Then the gray tears
on the sky’s face
melted.

The clouds pushed away
and the sun smiled through them.

Now it is gray again,
but I cannot forget that when my father spoke the sun came and looked down upon us.
THE HOGAN

My mother’s hogan is dry against the gray mists of morning.

My mother’s hogan is warm against the gray cold
of morning.

I sit in the middle of its rounded walls,
walls that my father built
of juniper and good earth.

Walls that my father blessed with song and corn pollen.

Here in the middle
of my mother’s hogan
I sit
because I am happy.
BREAKFAST

On the fire
in the middle of her hogan,
my mother cooks food.

My mother
makes fried bread
and coffee,
and she cooks mutton ribs
over the coals.

My father
and I
and my mother,
we sit on the floor
together,
and we eat
the good food
that my mother
has cooked for us.
We have many things.

My mother
  has many sheep
  and goats
  and her hogan
  and the things
  of the hogan
  and me.

My father
  has many horses.

On his land
  he has many horses.

He has a wagon
  near the horse corral.

Inside my mother's hogan
  my father keeps his gun,
  and outside
  he hangs his sheepskin
  and his saddle
  and his blanket.

And I have my mother
  and my father,
  three baby lambs
  and a cat
  with a long tail.
I have a tree
that I know.
It is a little tree.
It is a crooked tree
on the top of a hill.
It knows me, too,
I think,
because it bends down low
to let me climb it
to hide away.
Behind my mother’s hogan
is Beautiful Mountain.

It is mine,
I know,
because always
it is looking at me
to make me happy.
We have many things.
All of us
have many things.
One day
my father told me
that all The People
had possessions.
He said,
"Sheep and horses
for the men and the women
and land for all.
That is enough."
My father said this.

But I think
there should be more than sheep and horses
and land for all.
There should be little girls
for little girls to play with.
That would be enough,
I think.
Near my mother's hogan
is the sheep corral,
a hard-packed place
fenced with poles.

There is a tree
for shade.

There is a shelter
for lambs
in the sheep corral.

The sheep stand together
in their corral.

They stand close to each other.

I think
sheep like to know that they are many.

Sometimes
I think that way.

I think
that there are many children
all around me,
all about me.

When I am herding
and I cannot see my mother,
it is good
to play
that many children
stand together with me,
and that all outside
is my corral.
Far from the hogan
in a dry sand wash
I found the gray dog
and a new baby puppy
gray with black spots.

Poor little puppy,
it crawled to me
crying.

Thin little baby,
it's pink cold nose
found my hand.

Soft baby puppy,
it was so little
it made me feel gentle
and strong
like my mother.

When I picked it up,
the gray mother dog
did not growl.

She was glad for me
to want her puppy.

She thumped her tail.

Listen,
you gray pup with black spots,
I will teach you
to watch the sheep
so that always
there will be a place for you
in our hogan.
THE WATERHOLE

The waterhole hides away behind the red rocks, but my sheep know where to find it.
Their little feet have made a deep trail from the corral to the waterhole.
In a little delta
of seepage water
near the waterhole
is a small place
that my father has fenced
to make a home
for the corn,
for the squash
and the melons.

It is too cold now,
but soon,
when the snow melts
and hides away in the warm sand,
my father will go to his field.

There he will make the soil ready for planting.

He will break through the hard crust of winter
and turn up toward the sun little lumps of fresh earth.

I like to go with my father to his field
because
I like the feel and the smell of new earth
when it first sees the sun.

I want my father to take me
with him
when he goes to plant the corn
because I forget
how he does it.
LITTLE LAMBS

The little lambs are born.
Near the waterhole
  my mother makes shelters of green boughs
  for the mother sheep.

There
  in the shelters
the little lambs are born.

The green boughs
  stand close together,
  they do not let the snow
  nor the wind
  nor the sand come in to hurt the lambs.

Soon the lambs
  will be big enough
  to play with me.
All day I herd
my mother's sheep.
The sheep and I,
we have a way of going
that is always the same.
From the corral we go to the waterhole
and through the arroyo
to the sagebrush
then back again.

Outside is round
like the sheep corral.
Outside is round
like my mother's hogan,
but it is bigger.
Outside is big,
big,
so big.
Sometimes
when I am alone
with my mother's sheep,
I am afraid.
I cannot say with words the things that make me afraid because I do not know what they are. But sometimes outside is so still and big and empty and I am so little.

The red rocks are so high and Beautiful Mountain behind my mother's hogan seems far away. Nothing walks with me, but the sheep, just the sheep, and I am so little walking along in the big outside.
I am little,
I ain't afraid.

And then near by I see my mother
at her hogan door.

The red rocks
seem to bend down
to look at me
in a good way
and Beautiful Mountain comes closer.

All things are good again
because
my mother is near me.

I am not afraid.

Today is cold.

There is wind
and snow
and sand
and always wind.

I take the sheep
to the waterhole
and the wind goes with us.
LITTLE BELL

I have little bells
on my belt fringe.
Little bells,
silver bells,
hanging on my belt fringe.
My mother has a tin can filled with stones.
She rattles it
to tell the sheep
to hurry.

But I have little bells
tied to my belt fringe.
When I run
the little bells laugh
and say to the sheep,
"Hurry,
hurry."
LAMBS IN THE SNOW

Today
the cold comes in gray clouds
of blowing snow.

Yesterday the sky was blue and the sun warmed the land.

The little lambs
stand close to their mothers.

The lambs do not know that sometimes cold days make mistakes
and come again
after they should have gone away.

They think
the cold has come to stay.

They do not know
that tomorrow will be warm again.
They have not been here long enough to know these things and their mothers have not told them.

My mother is watching the lambs. She will not let them get too cold.

My father says, "Next year I will try the white man's way of breeding the sheep. Then the lambs will be born later, when summer has come to stay."

My mother says, "Yes, next year we will try that way."
There are many things about the wind that I do not know.
I have not seen the wind, and no one has told me where the wind lives, or where it is going when I hear it and when I feel it rushing by.
And something more I do not know about the wind.

I do not know if it is angry or if it is playing and just doing the things it does for fun.

Sometimes the wind gathers the sand into whirlwinds and makes them dance over the flat lands until they are tired and lie down to get their breath.
Sometimes
the wind bends the wild grass
down to the ground,
and makes the sagebrush
bow its head
as if a giant moccasin had stepped on them
in passing.

Today the wind makes the tumbleweeds
look like sheep
jumping off high banks and racing up arroyos
with no dog to guard them,
with no herder to guide them.

Poor tumbleweeds are frightened
because they do not know where to go.

When the wind blows
my long skirts,
my many skirts
are in a hurry
to get to the hogan
where the wind
cannot push them.
They pull me along when I am walking and my feet
have a hard time
to keep up
with my skirts.
I want someone to tell me
if the wind is angry
or if it is playing with me
and racing with me
and my many skirts
across the sand.
Now it is middle-time of day.
The sheep stand still.
The shadows sit under the trees.
Everything is resting,
   the sun
   and the sheep
   and the shadows.
I, too, rest.
And I look at Beautiful Mountain
    behind my mother's hogan.
I am thinking about something.
Earth,
they are saying
that you are tired.

They are saying
that for too long
you have given life
to the sheep
and The People.

They are saying that the arroyos
are the hurts we have made across your face,
that the moccasin track
and the sheep trail
are the cuts we have given you.
Earth, my mother,
believe me when I tell you
we are your children,
we would not want to hurt you.

I am only little.
I cannot do big things,
but I can do this for you.

I can take my sheep to new pastures.
I can take them the long way around the arroyos, not through them, when we go to the waterhole.
This way
their little feet,
their sharp pointed feet,
will not make the cuts
across your face
grow deeper.

This way
the worn pastures can sleep a little and grow new grass again.

I can do this
to heal your cuts,
to make you
not so tired.

Earth, my mother,
do you understand?
OLD GRANDFATHER GOAT

Grandfather Goat
stands on the hilltop,
shaking his whiskers,
chewing something
and looking wise.

Sometimes
when I ask him things
he looks at me
as if he knew.

Perhaps he does.
BABY GOATS

Baby goats
always are playing,
climbing up
and jumping down.

This small one always stands
on the top of the storehouse.

He knows
there are things to eat inside,
I think.
Afternoon is long.
The sun goes slowly across the sky.
The sheep walk slowly, feeding.
I see them against the sky in a long, slow line.

I whisper to the wind to blow the sun and the sheep a little to make them hurry.
But it blows only the clouds and the sand and me.
Just now
I watched the sun going.

It took a long time
to say goodbye.

I think it knew that the land
and the things
of the land
were sorry
it had to go.

It said goodbye
in such a good way.

Just for a little time
it made the sky
and the rocks
and the sand
like itself
to let them know how it feels to be sun.

Then it went away
and all things were still
because the sun had gone.
GREEDY GOAT

The sheep know that the day is over,
but Grandfather Goat stays behind
to push his whiskers
high up in a tree
for one last bite.

Old Greedy Grandfather Goat.
BEAUTIFUL MOUNTAIN

Beautiful Mountain
looks so blue
and so cold
and so lonely
now that the sun
and the sheep
and I
are going.

If it were nearer to me
and small,
I could bring it into my mother's hogan
under my blanket.

Then I need not leave Beautiful Mountain
out there by itself
in the night.
MEETINGS

For a long time
    there have been meetings of many men
    for many days.

At the meetings
    there is talking,
    talking,
    talking.

Some this way.
Some that way.

In the morning
    when my father
    leaves for meeting
    he says to us,
    ”When I come here again
    then I will know
    if it is best to have many sheep
    or few sheep,
    to use the land
    or let it sleep.”
But when my father comes home from meeting he does not know which talking-way to follow.

Tonight when my father came home from meeting he just sat, looking and looking.

My mother gave him coffee and bread and mutton, but my father just sat, looking.

Then my mother spoke to me.

She said, "A meeting is like rain. When there is little talk, now and then, here and there, it is good. It makes thoughts grow as little rains make corn grow. But big talk, too much, is like a flood taking things of long standing before it."

My mother said this to me, but I think she wanted my father to hear it.
GOING HOME

After the sun has gone,
  my mother’s sheep
and I,
  we walk together, slowly,
  to my mother’s hogan
and the corral.
Most all the day
  my mother
from her hogan door
  has watched me
and the sheep
  to see that no harm came to us.
And now
  my mother comes to meet us.
She comes to welcome us
  as if we had been gone
a long way,
a long time.
Sometimes
my father’s singing
comes to meet us
across the sandwash.

It comes to meet us
to sing us home.

Sometimes
the smoke
from the supper fire
comes to meet us
across the dark blue
of the night sky.

For me the hogan is waiting
and the corral
waits for the sheep.
Night is outside
    in his black blanket.
I hear him
    talking with the wind.
I do not know him.
He is outside.
I am here
   in my mother’s hogan
   warm in my sheepskin
   close to my mother.

The things I know
   are around me
   like a blanket,
   keeping me safe
   from those things
   which are strange.

Keeping me safe.

Today
we leave my mother's hogan,
my mother's winter hogan.
We leave the shelter of its rounded walls.
We leave its friendly center fire.
We drive our sheep to the mountains.

For the sheep,
there is grass and shade
and water, flowing water
and water standing still,
in the mountains.
There is no wind.
There is no sand
up there.
My mother's possessions
we tie on the pack horses,
her loom parts
and her wool yarns,
her cooking pots,
her blanket

PACKING

and my blanket
and the water jug,
white sacks filled with food,
cans of food,
cornmeal and wheat flour,
coffee and sugar.
My mother’s possessions, we tie them all on the pack horses.
The packs must be steady.
The ropes must be tight.

The knots must be tight.

I cannot pack the horses, I am too little,
but I can bring the possessions to my father and my uncle.

I am big enough for that.
GOODBYE TO MY HOGAN

My mother's hogan,
I feel safe
with your rounded walls
about me.
But now I must leave you.
I must leave your fire
and your door.
The sheep need me.

I must go with them
to a place they know,
but that is strange to me.
I put my moccasins,
my precious moccasins,
by your fireplace, my hogan,
so you will not be lonely
while I am gone.
GOODBYE

Land
around my mother's hogan
and sheep trail
and arroyo
and waterhole,
sleep in the sun
this summer.

Rest well
for my sheep
will not be here
to deepen the trail and arroyo
with their little sharp feet.

They will not be here
to eat the short grass,
to drink the stored water.

Sleep,
rest well,
and be ready for our return.
READY TO GO

My mother scatters the ashes from her cooking fire.
She sweeps the hogan floor with her rabbit-brush broom.
My father lays the bough across the door to show that we have gone.
The dogs bark.
They run around the sheep corral telling the sheep we are ready to go.

The young corn in the field hang their tasseled heads.
Young corn, my grandmother is staying at home.
She will take care of you.
My father mounts his horse.
He drives the pack horses before him.
My uncle mounts his horse.
They ride away together, singing, across the empty sand.
GOODBYE GRAY CAT

Gray Cat,
I am telling you goodbye.
Today I go to the mountains.
I take my sheep to summer range,
but you, Gray Cat,
you have no sheep
so you must stay at home.
Stay here with my grandmother,
Gray Cat.
She will feed you.
Goodbye, Goodbye.
ACROSS THE SAND

My mother lets down the bars
of the sheep corral.
The flock crowds around her.
The goats look at me.
I think they are saying,
"We know where we are going."
The little lambs
walk close by their mothers.

They are like me,
they do not know
if they will like this place
where we are going.
My mother and I,
we drive our sheep
across the sand.
My grandmother
stands at her door
looking after us.
GOODBYE TO GRANDMOTHER

My grandmother,
    my little grandmother,
    now I am leaving you.

Last year I was too small to go to the mountains.

I stayed with you,
    but this year I am big,
    I am almost tall
    so I must help drive the sheep
    to summer range.

My grandmother,
    my little grandmother,
    do not be lonely.

I will come back again.
Riding,
riding,
riding on my horse
to herd the sheep
across the yellow sand.

Yellow sand is around me.
Yellow sun is above me.
I ride in the middle of a sand and sun-filled world.
Riding,
riding,
riding on my horse
to herd the sheep
across the yellow sand.

Sun heat and sheep smell
and sand dust
wrap around me
like a blanket
as I ride through the sand
with my sheep.
NOON IN THE SAGEBRUSH

At noon
we reach the sagebrush flats.
Gray-green sagebrush scents the air.
Gray-green sagebrush softens
the yellows of the land.
My mother makes a little fire
no bigger than her coffee pot.
Food is good and rest is good
at noon
in the sagebrush.
NIGHT CAMP

At night we make camp
   in the juniper-covered hills.
My father is waiting for us there.
The moon looks down
   on the restless sheep
   on the hobbled horses.
The moon looks down
   on a shooting star.
But I am too tired
   to look at anything.
I sleep.
UP THE TRAIL

Morning sunrise sees us climbing
up and up on the mountain trail.

There are pine trees
standing straight and tall.

Brown pine needles
and green grass
cover the ground.

Shadows play with the sunlight.
There is no yellow sand.

The sheep hurry upward, climbing and pushing
in the narrow trail.

I ride after the sheep.

My horse breathes fast.
His feet stumble
in the narrow trail.

All day long
the sheep climb upward.

They want to eat
and I am hungry, too,
but my mother says,
"No."

All day long we ride
to herd the sheep.

Night is almost with us
when we reach the top.
SUMMER RANGE

Summer range in the mountains
is on a high mesa,
a steep, high mesa,
a flat-topped mesa,
with tall-growing pine trees,
with short-growing green grass,
with little, winding rivers
and rain-filled lakes.

This is summer range for our sheep.
THE LAKE

Between the trees
I see water standing in a bowl of green rushes.
The water is quiet.
It is still
and blue
and cold.
It is a lake
with land all around it.
It is a lake.

I see colored fish
beneath the water
swimming in a rainbow line.
I throw stones into the lake.
The water pushes back in circles
to take the stones.
The dogs swim far out into the cold waters.
They are thirsty and hot.
The sheep drink long and steadily. They stand in the shallow water at the edges of the lake. Their little pointed feet dig deep into the mud of the lake banks.

I have never seen a la' before. Gentle rain pools I have seen and angry flood waters, but never before a still, blue lake. It is beautiful. A lake is beautiful.
SHELTER

Beneath the trees
I see our summer shelter.

My father and my uncle
have made a shade
to shelter us from night rains
and from the cold
of near by snow peaks.

They have made us a shade
of cottonwood boughs
and juniper bark.

It has the clean smell
that trees give.
THE SHEEP CORRAL

My father and my uncle
made a sheep corral
while they were waiting for the sheep and for us to come up the trail.

They made the sheep corral
of branches,
a circle of branches,
a circle of dark-colored boughs.

The sheep stay safe
in their corral tonight and I sleep
beneath the cottonwood shade.
DAWN

This morning
when I opened my eyes from sleeping I could not remember what place this is.

I thought I was in my mother’s winter hogan.

Now I remember.

This is summer camp.

Tall trees stretch above me.

In the darkness
they look blacker than the night.

As I lie here,
safe and warm beneath
my blanket,
all around me turns to gray mist,
al around me turns to silver.

Darkness is gone,
but it made no sound.

The world is still asleep.

Through the pine trees
day comes up
light comes up.

Coyotes howl in the dawn.
In the pine trees
   bird wings are stirring,
   birds songs are stirring.
I hear them.
I hear them.
The grass beside my blanket
   is wet with night rain.
Morning mist is on the leaves
   and in my hair.
I put one toe out,
   one brown toe out.

It is hard to get up
   when it is cold.
Blue smoke from my mother’s fire
   curls upward in a thin blue line.
The sheep move inside their corral.
I come out from under my blanket,
   from under my warm blanket.
Like the other things around me,
   I come out
   to greet the day.
MORNING PRAYER

Silent and still
my father stands
before our summer shelter.

He is thinking a prayer
to the Holy Ones,
asking them
this day
to keep our feet
on the trail of beauty.

Filling the silence
of my father's prayer
I hear the bluebird's song.
The poor sheep are cold.
Their winter wool was cut off
last week
at shearing time.
When early summer painted flowers on the desert
with bunches of new grass,
when snow water melted
and softened the hard earth,
when the Sun-Bearer smiled
on the sheep and The People.
Then my mother said,
"Now,
it is shearing time."

My mother said that last week.
Last week it was shearing time.
Last week
at shearing time,
my mother caught her sheep.
One by one she caught them.
She tied their feet together
and with her shears
she clipped their wool.
My mother's hands were sure.
She cut the wool but once
from underneath.
She did not fumble,
cutting it here and there
into short pieces.
She cut the wool but once.
Her hands were sure.
My mother's hands were strong.
She pulled the wool back.
She folded it back
to come off in one piece.
My mother's hands were strong.

The sheep lay still
beneath her gentle fingers.
Trusting my mother's hands,
the sheep lay still.
But now
the poor sheep are cold.
They stand in their corral
this morning
and shiver
and bleat
and call loudly
for the sun
and for me
to come.
THE GOATS

Goats lead the sheep.
They go first into everything.
That is their way.

My uncle says in the English,
They are not afraid.
"Goats are tough."
Goats eat the grass too far down.
They eat the trees too far up.
That is their way.
They do not care.
My uncle says in the English,
"Goats are tough."

Goats, more than shee
get into my mother's stew pot.
Their meat is good,
but it takes chewing,
too much chewing.
I say with my uncle,
"Goats are tough."
After we have eaten our morning food, my father and my uncle ride down the steep trail to the trading post.

My mother kneels beside her loom before the cottonwood shade.

I see the sun on my mother’s brown hands.

I see the sun on my mother’s black hair.

I give my mother a long look, then I turn my back.

I walk to the sheep corral.

My feet are brown.

My feet are bare.

The wet grass parts to make a way to let me pass.

I walk to the sheep corral.

My skirts are long.

My skirts are many.

The flowers move back to make a way to let me pass.

I walk to the sheep corral.
I let down the bars.
The sheep go first
and I follow.
The sheep walk slowly
for they like to eat
the short sweet grass
under the trees.
I walk slowly
for I am lonely.
Things here are strange.
I am afraid.
I know that my mother sits before our shelter
weaving a blanket at her loom.

I know she is near me,
but I cannot see her.
I can see only tall trees
and bits of sky.
I am a child of the yellow sand.
Mesa top and pine trees,
green grass and colored flowers
are strange to me.
Unknown things live here.
I am afraid.
I creep to the edge of the mesa
while my sheep are feeding.
Far, far below me
is the world I know,
the yellow world
of sand and wind
and sand.

Far below
I see sheep walking,
someone's sheep walking,
in a dust cloud
of their own making.

Far below
I see a sand whirl
made by an angry wind
fighting the land.

Far below
I see the heat haze, colored heat haze
blanketing the desert.

I see these things
through tears
I know.

I am lonely without them.

Here on top of the mesa
is a strange world
of shadows and water
and grass for the sheep.
Grass for the sheep,
    I had forgotten that.
Grass for the sheep
    to give them life,
    to make them strong.
Here on top of the mesa
    there is grass for our sheep.
Surely the gods are good
    who live here.
The sheep drink slowly.
    Shadows sleep.

The quiet of the mes
    pushes against me.
I can feel it, heavy, heavy,
    it pushes against me.
Surely, the gods who live here
    are known to me.
The words of the Holy Song
    are known to me.
"On top of the mountain
    are found the gods."
These are the words
    of the Holy Song.
Day grows long
and bright with sunlight.
The sheep eat their way to the rain lakes
under the willows.
Little rivers run through the tall grass
and hide away in the rushes.
I see a line of scattered clouds
across the sky.
Sun-Bearer rests
on his way to the House of Turquoise Woman in the Western Waters.
It is middle-time of day.
Lying on my back
under the willows
I can see an eagle flying far above
in great circles
against the blue.

I feel
and see and listen,
but I do not talk.

There is no one to hear me.
There is no one to play with me,
only the lambs and the baby goats
and they like each other better than me,
I think.

I am alone.

AFTERNOON
But look!!
There are butterflies,
small white butterflies
above the flower plants
of purple iris.
I sit among the iris.
I hear the whispering
of white wings flying.

I think they like my velvet blouse.
I think they like my long black hair
because they come to me
and to the purple iris,
those small white butterflies.
A little fat chipmunk
on a brown-striped blanket comes close to me.

He sits on his feet.
He holds his hands out.
He wrinkles his nose and looks at me.
I give him bread.

He holds it in his hands
and with little quick bites stores it away
in his fat brown cheeks.

Funny little chipmunk
in his brown-striped blanket
with storerooms in his face!
Gray squirrels with bushy tails run up and down the trees.
They chatter to me.
They make me laugh.
I pull my skirts around me and follow the squirrels.
Now I know where they live.
Now I know where I can find piñon nuts this autumn.
I feel the warmth of Sun-Bearer's shield against my back.
And on my face I feel cool fingers of rain-cloud shadows.
With my hands on the warm earth beside me, almost, I can feel things growing.
Why did I think I was alone?
POSSESSIONS

I am making a song
to sing to myself.
It is about my possessions.
I have a woven hair tie.
I have a woven belt.
My mother made them for me.
My mother gave them to me.
They are my possessions.
I have silver rings on my fingers.
I have silver bracelets on my arms.
My father made them for me.
My father gave them to me.
They are my possessions.

Soft things
and hard things
I have for my possessions.

A song,
a song,
I am singing a song about them.
STORM

A storm wind comes to stop my song.
It comes through the trees
   with the strength of anger.
It sways me forward.
It sways me backward.
It turns me when I am walking.
Black clouds gather to blanket the thunder.

Zig-zag lightning
   cuts the clouds in two.
My sheep crowd near me.
With soft words I speak to them.
I tell them
   not to be afraid
for I am here.
Lightning darts
like an arrow,
an arrow of fire,
from an unseen bow.

It darts in flame
from the gray sky
to the gray earth.

It strikes a tree.

Lightning strikes a tree.

My sheep,
my sheep,
I must save my sheep
from this evil around them.

I must save them,
my sheep,
my poor frightened sheep.
Fire runs up the tall tree trunk
and into the branches.
The tree is on fire.
The tree is aflame.
It blazes.
It crackles.
It burns.
The sheep look to me to protect them.
My poor frightened sheep,
I do not know which way
to take them.
But wait!
The sky is opening.
Rain comes through.
Male rain comes through,
comes down in sheets of water,
pours down in sheets of water
drenching the flames
of the burning tree.
My mother comes running
between the trees.
She is frightened for the sheep
and for me.
I tell her
all things are good.

Lightning did not touch the sheep.
Male rain saved the trees from fire.
Male rain saved us from forest fire.
Now male rain has gone down into the valley.
Female rain follows
with soft footsteps.
Flowers turn upward
Leaves turn upward lifting their hands
to catch the gentle rain.
It is good.
The rain is good.
I open my hands
to catch the gentle rain.
EVENING

Sun-Bearer parts the clouds
and looks down on the rain.
He turns each raindrop
into a silver bead.
He turns each rainstreak
into a silver necklace.
He makes a rainbow path
for the gods
across the sky.
I go among the sheep,
the huddled, wet sheep.
I sing to them.

I sing to the sheep,
a song, a song,
a song about my possessions,
my ceremonial goods.
I have a little buckskin bag
filled with things,
with things.
My grandfather filled it for me.
My grandfather gave it to me.
Wherever I go
I carry my little buckskin bag
to keep me safe,
to keep my feet
on the trail of beauty.
A song,
a song,
I am singing a song
to my sheep.

Just now on the home trail,
a young deer,
a beautiful young deer,
stood in the bushes
and looked at me.

His eyes were big and dark and full of questions.

A song,
a song,
I am singing a song
on the home trail.

I have a necklace of turquoise and coral.

I have a necklace of
white shell and coral.

My grandmother traded for them.

My grandmother gave them to me.

They are my possessions.

I have turquoise in my ears,
silver bells on my belt fringe.

My uncle made them for me.

My uncle gave them to me.

They are my possessions.
A song, a song,
I am singing a song
to my sheep.

My father has five kinds of possessions.
He has hard goods
and soft goods,
ceremonial goods
and land
and game.

But I am little.
I do not have five kinds.
I have three.

I made a song about them
to sing the sheep home.
At last we reach the home camp.
The sheep are safe in their corral.
I am safe with my mother.
Summer shade is at my back.
In front of me is my mother’s fire.
I am dry and warm.
Good food is cooking.
My mother sings,
and all around me
there is beauty.
My father and my uncle
ride up from the trading post,
the Red Rock Trading Post down near the winter hogan.

Long before I heard them
I could feel them coming.

Long before I saw them
I could hear them singing.

Now they ride into the firelight,
my father and my uncle.

My father brought salt
and baking powder

and lard
for my mother
from the trading post.

He brought candy
for me.

My father brought news,
much news.

Things he had seen,
things that were told to him
at the trading post.

He brought them back
for us to hear.
Then we washed our hands.
We sat away from the fire.
My mother placed the evening food before us.
When we had eaten
   my father gave thanks
   to the Holy Ones.
   We washed our hands again.
My uncle put new wood upon the fire.
Then the best part of the day began.
My father and my uncle talked.
My father said in ten days would be the time for dipping the sheep. He and my uncle would help my mother and me drive the sheep to the dipping. Sheep must be dipped in medicine-water.

There is no pollen. There is no Holy Song. There is no trail of beauty in this medicine-water. But my father says it is good for the sheep.
Sheep get lice
    hidden in their thick wool.
Lice make the sheep unhappy.
Lice make the sheep bite their wool.
Lice are bad for sheep.

Dipping the sheep
    in medicine-water
kills the lice.
Ticks are bad for sheep.
Ticks live
    on the sheep’s good blood.
Ticks make the sheep thin and weak.
If the sheep are robbed of their good blood they cannot stand the cold of winter.
They cannot stand the heat of summer.
They sicken.
Their wool is not good.
Dipping the sheep in medicine-water kills the lice and the ticks.

It is good for the sheep.
My mother does not like dipping because she does not understand why the sheep are dipped.
But my father talks to her.
He tells her about lice and ticks.
He tells her too that she is quickest and best of all the women at dipping her sheep in the medicine-water.
SHEEP DIPPING

All the people
with their sheep and goats
and horses and wagons
and children and dogs
go to the dipping.

There is much dust and work
and singing and eating at dipping time.

I like it.

Sheep do not like dipping.

They do not like to take a bath
in the medicine-water
even though it is good for them.

When grandfather goat gets dipped
he is angry, very angry.

He does not like to get his whiskers wet.

Tomorrow, first thing,
I will tell old goat, old goat,
that in ten days
Washington will wash his whiskers.

My father talks of other things
besides the dipping.

His voice goes on and on like wind in trees,
like water running,
like soft rain falling,
like drum beats pounding,
talk,
talk,
talking.
BEDTIME

After a time
my mother and I
unroll our blankets.

We go to bed
beneath the cottonwood shade.

I have my own prayer
to the night.

I whisper it,
whisper it,
but only the night wind hears.

The horses move
within the shadows.

My father sings.
It is night.

The sheep move
within the circle of branches.

My mother sleeps.
It is night.
THE STAR SONG

Softly my father sings
the Star Song
to the stars and me.

"When the world was being made,
being made,
when the gods were placing stars,
the stars,
the stars in patterns
in the sky,
coyote stole the star bag,
coyote spilled the stars out
in the sky,
helter skelter in the sky,
when the world
was being made."

Softly my father sings it,
the Star Song,
to the stars and me.

Darkness covers me.

Beauty covers me.

My mother is near.

My father is near,
The sheep are safe.
The words of the Holy Song
come to me,
"On top of the mountain
I found the gods."

It is night.

It is night.

Happiness comes to me.

I sleep.
HOME LAND

The land
around my mother's hogan
is big.
It is still.
It has walls of red rocks.
And way, far off
the sky comes down
to touch the sands.
Blue sky is above me.
Yellow sand is beneath me.
The sheep are around me.
My mother's hogan is near.
THE HOGAN

My mother's hogan is round and earth-color.
Its floor is smooth and hard.
It has a friendly fire
and an open door.
It is my home.
I live happily
in my mother's hogan.
NIGHT CORRAL

The night corral is fenced with poles.
It is the home for the sheep and the goats when darkness comes to my mother's land.
THE CORNFIELD

The cornfield is fenced with poles.
My mother works in the cornfield.
My father works in the cornfield.
While they are working
   I walk among the corn plants.
I sing to the tall tasseled corn.
In the middle of all these known things
   stands my mother's hogan
   with its open door.
MY MOTHER

My mother is sun-browned color.
Her eyes are dark.
Her hair shines black.
My mother is good to look at,
    but I like her hands the best.
They are beautiful.
They are strong and quick
    at working,
    but when they touch my hands
    they are slow moving and gentle.
My father is tall.
He is strong.
He is brave.
He hunts
and he rides
and he sings.
He coaxes the corn
and the squash plants
to grow
out of the sand-dry earth.

My father has magic
in his finger tips.
He can turn
flat pieces of silver
into things of beauty.
Sometimes
I hide in the wide folds of my mother’s skirts
and look out at my father.
POSSESSIONS

I have black hair.
I have white teeth.
My hands are brown
    with many fingers.
My feet are brown
    with many toes.
My arms are brown
    and strong.
My legs are brown
    and swift.
I have two eyes.
They show me how things look.
I have two ears.
They bring sounds
to stay with me
for a little while.

I have two names,
a War Name
for just me to know
but not to use,
and a nickname
for everyone to use for everyday.

But with all these things
I still am only one little girl.

Isn't it strange?
I see my father’s horses running in the wind.

I feel little standing here when the wind and the horses run by.
THE SHEEP

Of all the kinds of sheep, Navaho sheep give the best wool for weaving. My mother says that is why they are Navaho sheep, because they know best the needs of The People.
THE GOATS

Goats have long whiskers.
They have long faces.
They have long legs.
Goats are funny, I think.
THE LAMBS

Now that it is autumn,
the lambs
that were babies in the spring,
have grown.
They are almost as tall
as their mothers.
My father takes the lambs
in his wagon
to the trading post.
He takes them to sell
to the trader.
THE TRADING POST

Hosteen White Man
has the trading post.
He has hard things on the shelf.
He has soft things on the wall.
And in a jar
  he has red stick candy
  that he keeps just for me.

Hosteen White Man
at the trading post
is such a good man.

Sometimes, I forget he is not one of The People.
SELLING

In his wagon
  my father drives
  to the trading post.
He takes the lambs
  and he takes me, too.
He wants me to know
  about selling.
He tells me that sometimes
  he trades the lambs,
  and sometimes
  he gives them in payment
  for a debt.
This time
he will sell them
to the trader.

When we get to the trading post
the trader looks at the lambs.

Then he tells my father
how much he will pay.

I wonder if the lambs
like to have my father
sell them to the trader.

My father sells the lambs
for hard round money to Hosteen White Man
at the trading post.
Then he chooses cans of food to put into his wagon, and he gives Hosteen White Man some of the round hard money back again.

My father calls this selling,
but I think it is a game
they play together, Hosteen White Man and my father at the trading post.

My father likes this game of selling.

He did not tell me,
but, someway,
I know that he likes it.
THE SILVERSMITH

My father sits before his forge melting bars of silver and turning them
into silver raindrops
and silver cloud designs.

Somehow,
my father has caught the wind within his bellows
and when he lets it go
its breath
turns the silver
to red earth color.
Its breath
cools the silver until it is hard like something made of gray water
and then turned to stone.

Today
my father sang
as he worked at making a bracelet
for my arm.

His song
flowed into the silver circle making it a circle of song.
Turquoise is sky.
Turquoise is still water.
Turquoise is color-blue and color-green that someone somewhere has caught and turned to stone.

Sometimes, turquoise is trapped in silver, and sometimes, in small beads running along a white string like beauty following a straight trail.
IT IS DRY

My father says over and over, "It is dry. It is too dry."

My father means there has been no rain to fill the rain pools for the thirsty sheep.
I am helping my mother sort the wool.
This pile we will keep to spin into yarn for weaving because its strands are long and unbroken.
This pile we will sell to the trader.
Its strands are broken and short.

The trader will buy it, but he will not pay as much as if it were all long.
I wish that all our wool was of long, unbroken strands.
I like to sort the wool.
It is good to feel its softness, like making words for something my heart has always known.
CLEANING THE WOOL

I go with my mother to beat the wool.
We get the little sticks and burrs out of it.
We put the wool on a flat rock.
We beat the wool with yucca sticks.
I have a little yucca stick like my mother’s big one.
It takes my mother and me a long time to clean the wool.
I sit with my mother under the juniper tree.
I watch her card wool with her towcards.
My mother's towcards are flat pieces of wood with strong handles and with wire teeth.
My mother buys her towcards from the trader at the trading post.
With her towcards she pulls the wool thin.

She stretches it in white sheets like snow mist in winter.
She bunches it in soft rolls like white clouds in summer.
Under my mother's towcards the gray wool turns white.
The matted wool turns fluffy and soft, and light as baby eagle down.
I like to sit with my mother under the juniper tree.
I like to watch her card the wool with her towcards.
My mother's spindle
is a slender stick
on a hardwood whorl.

Under her fingers
it spins like a dancer, wrapping itself
in twisted yarn.

Under her fingers
it twists the wool
into straight beauty
like a trail of pollen,
like a trail of song.

My hands are not strong enough to card, very well.

My fingers are not swift enough to spin, very well.

But my heart knows perfectly
how it is done.
AUTUMN

Now that autumn is here,
the flowers and the plants
give themselves to us
for winter will not need them.

The pumpkins are rusty color
with brown and green patches.

They are ripe.
Ripe is such a good word.
I like to say it.
All the plants are ripe
and beautiful with color
now that autumn is here.

Soon my mother will go to the mountains
to gather plants for dyes,
and plants for food,
and plants for medicine.

If I were bigger
she would take me with her.

She does take me
when we go
to places near the hogan.
After heavy frost
my father will go
to the mountains
to gather the pinyons.

This year he will go without us.
He will go with some other men
in a truck
that belongs to the trader.

My mother does not like this.
She thinks
my father should take us
with him
when he goes for pinyons.
DYEING

With flower plants
and bark and roots
and minerals and water
and fire,
my mother changes
the colors of her yarns.

My mother puts the dye plants
into the dye kettle
over the fire.

Slowly the water in the kettle
changes its color.
My mother puts white yarn into this dye water.
She boils it over the fire.
She stirs it with a stick.
It bubbles and bubbles.
It gives a good smell like plants after rain.
For a little time my mother boils the yarn in the dye water, and then she takes it out again.
It is no longer white.
It has changed to color.

In this way my mother changes the colors of her yarns to look like brown earth in morning or yellow sand at mid-day. She changes the colors of her yarns to look like black cliffs at sunset, or black like the night, and black like the dark clouds of male rain.
I help gather the flowers and the bark and the roots and the minerals.

I help to carry the water
from the rain pool
by the red rocks.

I help to make the fire
with little twigs.

I look and look.

I see the water and the plants.

I see the yarn in the water
but I do not see the magic
that I think

my mother must use
to change her yarns
to colors.

When I tell this
to my mother,
she laughs at me.

She says she has no magic
in her dye kettle.

She says the plants
in her dye kettle
are the things which give colors
to her yarns.

So now,
I have learned a new thing.
When my mother sits
on her sheepskin,
weaving a blanket on her loom
I think it is like a song.

The warp threads
are the drum beats,
strong sounds
underneath.

The colored yarns
are the singing words weaving through the drum beats.

When the blanket is finished
it is like a finished song.

The warp
and the drum beats,
the colored wool
and the singing words
are forgotten.

Only
the pattern of color
and of sound
is left.
LEARNING TO WEAVE

My mother took me in her arms.
We sat together at her loom.
She took my hands
to guide them
along the weaving way.
She showed them how to weave.
We did not weave
straight across the loom.
That is not our way.
We wove with one color
for a little way up.
And then with another color
for a little way up.
We kept the edges straight.

We wove not too tight
and not too loose
and pounded it down,
pounded it down,
pounded it.

But when I told my father,
"See, I wove this blanket,"
my mother spoke sharply.

"We do not say things that are not true,"
she told me.

I hid my face away
from the sharp words of
my mother,
but soon my mother's hand
came gently
to touch my hair.
FLOOD

Rain comes hard and black.

It fills the arroyos

with yellow water

running in anger.

Great pieces of sand bank

on the sides of the arroyos

slide into the water

with little tired noises

and are lost for always.

The rain pools fill with water,

rain water,

fresh and clean and cold.
Sun comes now
to comfort the land
that the rain has frightened.

My father says,
"Sun takes the rain water from the thirsty land back to the sky too soon."

But my mother and I,
we are glad the sun comes soon.

Sun does not mean
to rob the land of water.

Sun means only to warm it again.
HERDING

Today I go with my mother.
I go with her to drive the sheep
for I must learn to tend the flock.
It is my work.
The way is long.
The sand is hot.
The arroyos are deep.
It takes many steps
to keep up with my mother.
It takes many steps
to keep up with the sheep.

My mother waits for me.
My mother takes my hand.
She calls me
Little Herder of the Sheep.
And so we walk
across the sand.
We walk
till the day is done,
till the sun goes
and the stars
are almost ready
to come.
We walk across the sand.

We walk to the water hole when day is at the middle.

We walk to the night corral when day is at the close, the sheep, my mother and my mother’s Little Herder.

Before the hogan fi...
when night has come, my father sings, my mother whispers, “Come sit beside me Little Herder.”

I like that name.

From now till always I want to be my mother’s Little Herder.

SNOW

My mother's land is white with snow.
The sandwash and the waterhole,
the dry grass patches and the cornfield hide away
under the white blanket,
der the snow blanket
that covers the land.
The air is filled
with falling snow,
thick snow,
soft snow
falling,
falling.
Beautiful Mountain
and the red rock canyons
hide their faces
in snow clouds.

The wind cries.
It piles the snow
in drift banks
against the poles
of the sheep corral.

It pushes against the door
of my mother’s hogan,
and it cries.

The wind cries out there in the snow and the cold.
My mother's hogan is cold.
Snow blows down the smoke hole.
Water drops on the fire.
The wet wood smokes and keeps its flames to itself.
The sun has not shown his face to tell us what time of day it is.
I do not like to ask my mother, "Is it noon now?" or "Is it almost night?" because she might think I wanted it to be time to eat.
She might think I wanted food.
THERE IS NO FOOD

There is no food.
There is no flour nor cornmeal
to make into bread.
There is no coffee
that my mother could boil
for us to drink.
There is no food.
The corn my father planted
in his field
is gone.
We ate it.
There was so little.
The corn pile in the storehouse
    was not high enough
    to last for long.
It is gone.
Now all of it is gone.
There is no food.
There is food
    at the trading post
    in sacks and in boxes,
    in bins and in cans
    on the shelf.
There is food at the trading post,
    but the trading post
is far away
    and snowdrifts
    and snow clouds
are heavy between.
There is food at the trading post but my father has nothing left of the hard, round money that he must give to the trader for the food.

There is no food here in my mother's hogan.

When it is time to eat, we talk of other things, but not of hunger.

This thing called hunger is a pain that sits inside me.

At first it was little, but now it grows bigger and bigger.

It hurts me to be hungry.
THE DOGS ARE HUNGRY

The dogs are hungry, too.
They crowd in the hogan.
The black one
is not sleeping now.
He lies with his head
on his paws
and looks at nothing.
The yellow one whimpers.

He has worked hard,
but there is no food.
The gray shadow dog stays outside
close to the tree trunk making no sound
asking for nothing.
I think
she knows
nobody wants her.
THE SHEEP

The sheep are wet and cold.
They are hungry, too.
If the snow keeps falling,
it will be bad for the sheep.
Perhaps
that is why the wind cries.
Perhaps
the wind is sorry
for the sheep.
That is what I think.
MELTING SNOW WATER

My mother talks
   to my father.
Together
   they go out to shovel snow.
The ruffles on my mother's skirts
   make pretty marks
   on the top of the snow whiteness.
My mother and my father
   shovel a round place
   clean of snow
   out near the sheep corral.

They will build a fire
   to melt snow into water
   to give to the sheep.
It takes much wood
   to make a fire
   to melt snow into water,
   but if the sheep have water
   to drink
   they do not hunger so much.
When the round place
   is clear of snow,
   my mother comes into the hogan
   for dry wood
   to make the outdoor fire.
She picks a stick
from our small pile
beside the fire.

She picks another and another
until she has a little armful.

My mother picks them up slowly
for our pile is so small.

My father comes into the hogan.
He stamps his feet.

Little hills of dirty snow melt slowly by them
on the hogan floor.

My father blows on his hands
to warm them.

His breath looks like smoke.

My father shreds juniper bark
to start the outdoor fire.

He takes a lighted stick
from our fire.

He takes it outside.

He puts it
under the bark and the dry wood,
and kneeling down
he blows on it.

Soon
a small flame comes.
It takes a lot of snow
in my mother’s washtub
to melt enough water
for the sheep.

When my mother comes again
into the hogar
she is tired.

Her poor face
is dark with cold.

I put my arms
around my mother’s knees.

It is the only way I know
to show her
that I am sorry she is cold.
NIGHT

Night is slow in coming,
but at last it comes moving through the snowstorm.
Coyotes howl, far away.
Nearby the wind cries.
The wet wood smokes.
Snow water drips down
through the smoke hole.
Then
my father tells us stories.
Long stories
made up of many words.
His words have power.
They have strength.
They seem to hold me.
They seem to warm me.
They seem to feed me.
My father's words,
they comfort me.
His words have power.

My father tells
The Star Story.
"When the world was being made,
being made."
My father tells us,
"When the Gods were
placing stars,
the stars,
the stars in patterns
in the sky,
coyote stole the star bag."
“Coyote spilled the stars out
  in the sky,
  helter skelter in the sky,
  when the world was being made.”

Softly
  my father tells it,
  the story of the stars.

Outside,
  the wind
  and the night push against
  my mother’s hogan door.
Outside,
big flakes of snow
fall thickly,
fall softly,
fall steadily.

Inside,
snow water drips
down the smoke hole
and the words of my father’s voice
drop softly
into the quiet
of my mother’s hogan.
"IT-IS-TWISTED"

The Star Story
made my mother think of the string game,
"It-Is-Twisted."

She said that the Spider People gave it to us
to use in winter evenings.

My mother showed us
how to make the game.

She made
Twin-Stars and Many-Stars, Big-Star and Horned-Star
with pieces of string.
Just now,
    I heard myself saying,
    "I want some bread."
My father is not talking now.
He is looking at me.
My mother is looking at me.
They do not know it was not I,
    but this hunger pain inside me
    that said those words,
    "I want some bread."
They do not know that,
    and I do not know how to tell them.

My father sits still.
He sits quietly.
He is thinking.
My mother looks down
    at her hands
    where they are resting
in the folds of her skirt.
Outside,
    the wind cries
    the wind cries
to my thinking.
Slowly
  my father takes his concho belt
  from about his waist.

Slowly
  his fingers touch the belt,
  counting,
  counting, counting the conchos.

Slowly
  my mother takes her coral string
  from about her neck.

She looks at it.

Then
  my mother
takes from her finger
her largest turquoise ring.

My father puts his concho belt
upon the floor.

My mother puts her turquoise ring
upon the floor.

The concho belt
and the turquoise ring
make a splash of color
in the gray-lighted hogan.

Slowly
  she puts it back again
  around her neck.
He will own them
because our food
is getting low.
The concho belt
and the turquoise ring
are for pawn.
They are for pawn.
Pawn to the trader
for food.
Pawn to the trader
that we may eat.
Our hard goods,
our possessions
we give them
for salt
and for flour.
They are for pawn.
Who knows
when we can buy them back.
The snow water drops
from the smoke hole
like tears.
The wind cries.
Quickly
my father sings
a funny song
to make laughter come
to my mother
and me.
The wind lies still.
It has not gone away
I know,
for I can feel it lying there outside hiding in the snow.

The wind lies still
behind the snowdrifts,
but sometimes
it starts up
with a low cry,
then falls again
to hide.

Cold bends over the land.
The white feathers of snow fall slower and slower.

My mother and my father
get up early.
My mother will kill a sheep
so my father can eat something before he starts
for the trading post.
My father waits
for my mother
to butcher the sheep
and to cook a piece
for his breakfast.
Then my father finds his horse.
He ties an empty flour sack
behind his saddle.
He wraps his blanket about him
and leaning his body
against the storm
he rides to the trading post.

My father rides
into the snow-filled world.
His blanket and his horse
are the only colors moving through the white.
Snow comes into my heart filling it with cold
when I see
my father ride away.
SHOVELING SNOW

For a little while
I sit in the hogan
thinking of my father
riding along the snowy trail
to the trading post.

Snow stops falling.
Cold blows its blue breath
across the white.

I help my mother shovel snow.
We make a path to the sheep corral
and to my grandmother’s hogan.

The snow, so soft to feel,
is hard to shovel.

The cold slaps at my face.
It traps my hands and my feet
in icy feeling.
My mother takes me
into the hogan.
She rubs my face and hands
and my feet with snow.

Soon
little hot pains
come to play
with my cold fingers
and my cold toes.

Soon
the icy feeling goes away.
CAT'S-CRADLES

The day moves slowly.
My father does not come back along the trail.
It is far to the trading post.
The snow is deep.
I think of my father
and his concho belt.
I look at my mother's finger.
One finger looks bare without its turquoise ring.
I pull my sleeve down
over by bracelet.
Perhaps
I should have given it
to my father.

My grandmother comes to see us.
She brings a piece of bread
for me
and for my mother
to eat with our meat.
She brings a piece of string.
She shows me how
to make Cat's-Cradles.
She shows me how
to make "It-Is-Twisted."
We make Bird's-Nest and Butterflies and Coyotes-Running-Apart
with the piece of string.
FATHER COMES BACK

We hear my father singing as he rides along the snowy trail.

My grandmother goes to her hogan and my mother and I, we stand together, laughing.

We stand together outside our door, happy because my father comes back again.

Behind my father's saddle is tied the flour sack filled with food.

It is not empty now, but a sack of bumps and bumps, and heavy looking.

In front of him my father carries a dry wood box that the trader gave him.
My mother takes the sack of food.
I take the dry wood box.
My father takes the saddle from his horse.
We go into the hogan with our bundles in our arms.
My mother breaks the box with her foot.
She breaks the pieces across her knee.
She feeds them to the fire.

The dry wood box makes the fire flame dance in the hogan fire.
My mother puts meat to cook.
She mixes flour and water, a little ball of lard, a little pinch of salt, in our round tin bowl.
She takes some out and pats it flat, and pats it round, and pats it thin, and throws it in a kettle full of boiling fat.
This hunger pain inside me
is bigger now than I am.
It is the smell of cooking food that makes it grow, I think.
Soon the fried bread
in the hot fat
swells big and brown.

Soon the meat
in the stew pot
makes bubbling noises.
Coffee boils
smelling strong and good.
The hunger pain
is now so big
I cannot understand Why I do not see it.
Supper

Now we are eating
the good food.
We eat slowly.
We eat a long time.
The hunger pain is gone.
It went somewhere,
but I do not know when,
it left so quickly.
My father tells us
that the wife of Tall-Man’s brother suffers from something.

She is sick.
My father tells us
that tomorrow
there will be a Sing
for this woman
who has sickness.
We will go,
he says,
if the sun shines tomorrow.
We will go to the hogan
of the wife of Tall-Man’s brother.
Now that I am warm
and have no pain
and feel well fed
with my mother's good cooking,
I feel sleepy
and glad.

Lying on my blanket bed
on the floor of the hogan,
I say to myself
over and over,
"If the sun shines tomorrow
we will go to the Sing."
Last night went quickly with sleeping.

It is tomorrow now.

I open my eyes to a beautiful world of sun and snow.

Everywhere I look the snow shines as if someone had sprinkled it with broken bits of stars.

My father says, “Snow is good for the land. When the sun melts it, the thirsty sand drinks in the snow water.”

Grass patches show again. They look fresh and clean. The goats hurry about eating all they can.

Even the sheep move more quickly, eating.
GOING TO THE SING

My father goes for dry wood.
He has to go to the foothills to get it.
My mother cooks bread and meat.
I sit by the door in the sunshine and think about the Sing.
My grandmother comes to my mother's hogan.
She will look after the sheep while we are gone to the Sing.
The sun shines.
The sun shines.

Soon we will go to the Sing, the Sing.
After awhile my father comes back with the wagon.
He piles the wood near the hogan.
He says he is ready to go to the Sing and we are ready, too.
It is not far.

Not long after the sun has finished with the day
we will get there.

We will get to the hogan
of the wife of Tall-Man's brother.

We will be at the Sing,
the Sing,
the Sing.

The ruts in the road
are deep and frozen.

The wheels of the wagon
have a song of their own.

I sit in the back of the wagon
in a nest made of blankets.

I listen to the song
of the rolling wagon wheels.

My father sits on the wagon seat.

He is driving his horses.

My mother sits beside him.

Straight and tall
my mother sits on the wagon seat
beside my father.
My father sings as he drives along.
He is happy.
He sings, "Now is winter.
Thunder sleeps.
Falls the snow.
Thunder sleeps.
Grass is gone.
Thunder sleeps.
Birds are gone.
Thunder sleeps.

Warmth is gone from the sands,
from the red rocks,
from the canyons.
Thunder sleeps.
It sleeps."

In my father's wagon we go.
Behind my father's horses we go.
On the Trail of the Holy Songs we go to hear the voices of the Gods.
THE SING

It will be a long time
before the night sky bends down and the stars hang low and the supper fires
of the camping people
dot the night.

Our wagon
comes within the circles
of supper fires,
comes within the circle
of firelight,
and I see all the People who have come to the Sing.

There are many People here.
There are many horses here.
There are many wagons here.
There is one truck.
It makes me happy to see
all of the People walking around
and standing and sitting.
It makes me happy to see
all the colors that there are in the skirts of the women in the shirts of the men and in the blankets
that all the People wear.
I can see all the horses.

I can see a race horse that belongs to a man my uncle knows.

After the Sing is over, the men will race their horses.

My father will bet which horse will win.

And then perhaps he will win a better concho belt than the one he has in pawn to the trader.

There is a new hogan built just for the Sing.

There are some shelters built just for the Sing, and at one side is the Cook Shade where all kinds of foods are cooking.

The smell of food makes me happy.
I think it is good to be happy when food is near.

As it gets darker more fires are lighted and within the circle a big one burns.

Smoke get in my eyes and I can taste it in my mouth.

In the folds of my mother’s blanket, in the warmth of my mother’s blanket, in the quiet of my mother’s blanket, close to her heart I sleep and awaken to hear the Gods, the Singers of Songs.
Now is the time for the singing.
Now is the time for the songs.

We go,
we go,
on the Holy Trail of Song.

We go,
we go,
to hear the voices of the Gods.

They say,
on the path of the rainbow,
they say,
on the bridge of the lightning,

they say
on the trail of pollen
went the Elder Brother, Reared-in-the-Mountains,
Young Man,
Chief.

We go to hear them say it.

Look! Look!
they say,
they say,
the Gods are walking.

The Gods are walking.
Follow the trail of song.
Hu-Hu-Hu-Hu.
Look! Look!
they say,
they say,
the Gods are dancing.
The Gods are dancing.
Follow the trail of song.
Hu-Hu-Hu-Hu.
Look! Look!
they say,
they say,
the Gods are singing.
The Gods are singing.
Follow the trail of song.
Hu-Hu-Hu-Hu.

It is finished.
The Sing is finished.
Dawn light is here.
Gray light is here.
Morning is here.
Day is here.
The sun comes again
to warm the world.
The Sing is finished.
It is finished.
Finished.
THE BETTING

The men go for horses that have walked away
to find grass to eat.

The women put blankets
and food
in the wagons.

My uncle tells my father
to wait awhile
because
my uncle says
he knows a man who has a horse
that can win a race.

All the men stand around.

They talk together
about this horse.

My father get the things
out of the wagon
that my mother has put in it.

He is going to bet them
on this horse
that my uncle says
can win a race.
The trader comes.
He does not like the horse
    my uncle knows.
He puts up a hundred dollars
    against the horse.
All the Indian men
    take off their concho belts
    and rings and turquoise and bowguards and blankets.

They throw them on the round
    to make a pile of things
    as much as a hundred dollars.
With another man
    my father bets his bowguard against a concho belt
    on that horse
    my uncle knows.

The men choose a flat place
    to run the race.
They say,
"We will run
to that place
and back."

They mount their horses.

They line them up.

One man stands by the pool of things that are being bet
against the hundred dollars.
THE RACE

The starter takes his hat off.
He lifts it up.
He lifts it up.
He holds it there.
He drops it.
They are off.
They are off.
They are running together.
No horse is in front.
No horse is behind.
They are together.
Together,
Running, running.

The black one that the trader likes stretches out,
running,
running,
gets in front,
running,
running.

Sand flies.
People shout.
The People shout.
Now comes the horse
my uncle knows.
There he is,
there he is,
in front,
in front,
away in front.

He has won the race.
The horse my uncle knows
has won the race.
The horses come back.
They are sweating.
Their sides go in and out just like my blouse
goes in and out.

We are tired,
the horses and I are tired.

It takes some running to win a race.
GOING HOME

The horse race is finished.
My father has a concho belt
and money in his pocket.
Now we go back
on the home trail.
Back to the hogan.
Back to the sheep.
Everything is finished.

We have listened to the Holy Songs.
We have walked
on the Holy Trail.
It is finished.
Our hearts are good.
All around us is good.
We ride along
on the home trail.
It is finished.
