American business has received a challenge from the federal government in a national experiment to find jobs for 500,000 "unemployables." The major purpose of this descriptive report was to develop hard facts for use by business men in making decisions concerning participation in the program. The content includes sections on: (1) Who Are the Hard-Core, (2) The Ingredients for Success, (3) The Problem of Recruiting, (4) Screening, Interviewing and Testing, (5) A Candid View of the Training Problem, (6) Anticipate Personal Problems, (7) Getting Help from the Government, and (8) Industry and the Community. The appendixes contain local sources of help in 80 major cities throughout the United States, regional offices of key manpower agencies, private sources of training assistance, and a glossary of agencies engaged in working with disadvantaged youth and hard-core unemployed. WHAT CAN YOU DO ABOUT

THE HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED?
WHAT CAN YOU DO ABOUT
THE HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED?

An unprecedented challenge has been hurled at American business:
to cooperate with the Federal Government in a bold national experiment to find jobs for 500,000 "unemployables."

Because you, as a businessman, will undoubtedly be asked to "do your bit," the Research Institute has prepared this special report.
Whether or not you decide that you can pledge your company to provide jobs, there are some hard facts you will need to know: the obstacles, the pitfalls, the sources of guidance and financial assistance, the odds for and against success.

The small businessman, especially, must make his decisions on the basis of the everyday realities of his own company. It is our earnest hope that this report will help Research Institute Members make that difficult decision.

WHAT CAN YOU DO ABOUT THE HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYED?

Hottest four-letter word on the national scene today is JOBS! It has been pushed into new prominence by the National Alliance of Businessmen as the answer to the problem of the hard-core unemployed. But "jobs" has long been evident in the vocabulary of the U.S. Department of Labor, the Urban Coalition, the Urban League and countless others. These disparate groups all share the conviction that jobs can provide the ultimate solution to a mixed bag of national problems: the crisis of the cities, poverty, crime, violence, and unequal opportunity.

If jobs are indeed the answer, then industry must be the answerman. The government can offer some inducements, but only the private sector can provide the opportunities. Thus, with the unemployment rate at an unprecedented low, private industry is being asked to do the "undoable" and employ the unemployable. Although the first appeals have been aimed at the industrial giants, the gauntlet has been thrown to the entire American business community. The pressure is already on many small companies to help meet the target: 100,000 jobs for the "hard-core" this year; 500,000 by 1971.

What will you do when they come knocking at your door? Businessmen around the country are wrestling with that question. The company that cannot decide what it can or should do stands a good chance of getting frightened into doing something wrong.

The full implications of industry's enormous assignment are only beginning to be understood. A definition of the term "hard-core" hints at some of the problems: these are the drop-outs, the culturally deprived, the unskilled, uneducated, and inexperienced. They have language problems, medical problems, transportation problems and family problems. They may also have abilities, but if so, most of them don't know it. And many of them don't believe that industry really wants them.

Can industry transform this hard-core into productive wage-earners? The answer must be "Yes, if...;" if it is willing to put aside its selection standards, relax its discipline policies, redesign its entry jobs, provide fundamental training, cushion the impact of personal frictions, set guidelines for supervisors and absorb the backlash. Federal funds will be made available to help business pay for recruiting and training, but odds are that most companies will find these inadequate to cover all the indirect costs.

Where does the small businessman fit in this picture? Some doubt that he can afford to assume any part of the burden. Others ask, "Can he afford not to?" For many businessmen, the answer will be shaped by very personal considerations: a feeling of social obligation, a fear of the consequences of inaction, the pressure of community reaction.

Some businessmen will be influenced finally by practical considerations: the urgent need for new sources of unskilled labor; the cost of preventive steps now as compared with the potentially higher cost later of racial violence, crime or welfare; the hope of expanded markets and the public image pay-off; or the preference for any solution which keeps control in the hands of free enterprise rather than the government.

This Staff Recommendations was prepared to help the responsible business executive resolve his company's dilemma on a rational basis. Institute analysts have talked to representatives from business, community organizations and employment agencies. We culled the experiences of companies that have pioneered in working with the hard-core. We interviewed government funding agencies and training specialists. And from this wealth of data we have extracted the guidelines that will be most pertinent to the small or medium-sized company.

Throughout these pages you will find that we've pulled no punches regarding the problems and the pitfalls. You will also find that the discussion cuts a logical path through the maze of uncertainty so that it can serve as a roadmap for any company that wants to join the national effort.

The Appendix, starting on page 25, provides sources in your own local community to which you can turn for assistance in recruiting, training, counseling and funding for your company's hard-core program.

Who are the hard-core?

If your company is located in or around one of the 50 largest cities in the United States, your local representative of the National Alliance of Businessmen is bound to ask you to pledge your quota of jobs for the hard-core. But unless you try to qualify for federal funding, he will let you define "hard-core" loosely. In some communities, the pressure may come from the city hall, the Chamber of Commerce, or leaders of religious groups. In any case the definition of "hard-core" tends to vary depending on local population mix and other regional factors.
As a result, the campaign to find jobs for the hard-core unemployed is seen by many as simply one prong of the fight against racial discrimination. Certainly, Negroes account for a large proportion of the unskilled unemployed. And Negro rights groups are playing an important role in drawing these people into the mainstream of the economy through every available means.

But the term "hard-core" actually embraces a broader group: it includes all those who have been trapped in the poverty of the ghettos, who are either jobless or are underemployed at jobs which fail to provide a decent living.

Detroit, which has set up a special placement service for them, defines the hard-core as persons who have been jobless for six months or more, have less than $3,000 annual income for a family of three, and have no marketable skills.

The Federal Government's definition, used as a qualifying test in its subsidy programs, is even broader: "...poor persons who do not have suitable employment and who are either (1) school drop-outs, (2) under 22 years of age, (3) 45 years of age or over, (4) handicapped, or (5) subject to special obstacles to employment."

In the definition of individuals eligible to participate in the MA-3 program, "Special Obstacles to Employment," includes (a) unskilled or service workers who have had two or more periods of unemployment during the past year totaling 15 weeks or more, (b) workers whose last jobs were in occupations of significantly lower skills than their previous jobs, (c) workers who have family histories of dependence on welfare, (d) workers who have been permanently laid off from jobs in industries which are declining in their region, e.g., agricultural coal mining, etc. and, (e) members of minority groups.

Regardless of precise definition, the outstanding characteristic of the hard-core unemployed worker is that he has a basic handicap, or more usually a range of handicaps. Most often it is race. Sometimes it's language: one out of four is Spanish-speaking -- Puerto Rican or Mexican-American. Often it is lack of education -- sixth grade on the average. Many are functional illiterates. Lack of skills is almost universal. Health is usually poor, with need for dental work and eyeglasses very common; the average member of the group has seen a doctor only once in his life. Chances are the hard-core man has been arrested and spent 30 days or so in jail for minor offenses. That is a candid picture of the person you are being asked to employ.

Ten short years ago such a challenge would have seemed revolutionary. Today, it is not only being accepted -- it is being met. And business is leading the way.
New perspective for the private sector

While there is no gainsaying the importance of the role big business is playing in working cooperatively with the government to transform the hard-core into productive workers, the small businessman must face his own special problems before deciding to follow suit.

In approaching small businesses in their communities, most business leaders have tended to pitch their appeal at both altruism and enlightened self-interest. But most small businessmen, with a competitive position to maintain, will need some hard-headed, dollars-and-cents reasons for taking on the problem the hard-core present. In communities where labor shortages are tightest, availability of federal funds for training may be a compelling factor. Communities that have confronted the realities of ghetto riots will have their own dollar-yardstick.

In the final analysis, the prime prerequisite may be a willingness to take a longer-range view of costs. No one -- not even the most deeply committed -- can pretend that the immediate, short-term costs to business will be small. But when the investment is measured against the long-range benefits to the company, the community and the economy in general, another kind of balance sheet emerges. Call it "investment in the future," call it "insurance" or call it "preventive measures," each company will have to decide for itself how much red ink it can live with in the meantime.

Background for action

The pilot experiment in a joint government-industry attack on the hard-core unemployed was launched in 1967. The inducement for industry was a Federal commitment to assume 100% of the added costs of on-the-job training, over and above what industry would normally pay for traditional sources of labor. The program was ultimately expanded to six private employers in 10 major cities.

One lesson learned from the "Ten Cities Program" was that industry itself is best equipped to prepare and train the disadvantaged, but that the cost of successful preparation and on-the-job training for this group can run as high as $2,300 per trainee. Clearly, the problem could only be tackled by industry and government working together.

The "Job Opportunities in the Business Sector" or JOBS program, launched in January 1968, was the logical outgrowth of these earlier projects. Industry added the weight of 50 leaders in the largest metropolitan cities throughout the United States, through the specially-established National Alliance of Businessmen, to help promote the drive to absorb the hard-core into productive jobs. Working in cooperation with the Labor Department's Manpower Administration, the NAB's first assignment was to get job pledges from industry and help cooperating companies apply for Federal funds under the program known as MA-3. The plan provides for the cooperating companies to bear the normal training costs and the government to pay the extra costs of special training, transportation, correction of health problems, personal counseling and other special help.

Initial efforts of NAB have been directed to the 50 designated cities. (See the Appendix, beginning on page 70.) Ultimately, the project will be expanded into other cities and the rural areas as well.

Overall, NAB expects to meet the quotas set for its initial drive. However, with the closing down of its major source of government funding, on May 15, the Alliance may find its persuasive powers sharply limited. Although there is every expectation that there will be a resumption of contracts similar to those in the MA-2 and MA-3 programs, until a new start-up date for the acceptance of proposals is set, business can merely speculate on what the terms will be.

Early experience indicates that many smaller companies are leary of the complications of government funding. Many have felt that the MA-3 was designed for the giant employer. While the program provided for a consortium or pooling arrangements, the main target was the employer that could offer 50 or more jobs. This obviously ruled out the smallest plants. Other small companies simply preferred the freedom of going it alone. In any event, the temporary halt may serve as added reason to play the game of wait-and-watch. Industry in general still has much to learn about the problems of absorbing the hard-core. The smaller company especially will find it important to proceed slowly and carefully to explore the situation in its own community and to make use of the experience of others.

RIA recommendation: The next few months will be critical. The urgency of the objective may leave little time for philosophizing. Community pressure will be strong. Top management will have to take advantage of every opportunity to observe, to evaluate resources, to make contacts with local agencies and to weigh the impact on its present organization. Our research leaves no room for doubt: For most companies, working with the hard-core unemployed is a new ball game with rules of its own. And more harm can be done by rushing in without adequate preparation than by a reasonable delay. In order to be effective, industry must be more than just willing, it must be prepared.

The ingredients for success

There is no magic formula for dealing with the complex problem of the hard-core unemployed. Research Institute analysts who attempted to distill sound guidelines from the accumulated experiences of other companies found that community factors made generalizations next to impossible. In fact, you can probably uncover contradictory evidence in one company for every "basic rule" that will be offered in another. Inevitably, each company will have to hammer out its own plan of approach. The best you can do is to examine the experiences of others and decide for yourself what implications there are for you. Thus, Research Institute offers no models; the ingredients listed below merely represent the facts as we found them.

From our observation of companies which have undertaken the task of recruiting from the ranks of the hard-core, the most successful seemed to have these ingredients in common:

- They were hard-headed realists with no pretension about their role. Starry-eyed idealism had no place in the picture -- either in individual attitudes or company policy.

- They set realistic goals in policy planning, and were tough but fair in policy execution.

- They did not look to the hard-core as a convenient source of cheap labor. In the first place, these projects aren't cheap; you must be prepared to spend some money to make them work. In the second place, the hard-core unemployed -- or the minority-group organizations that work with them -- are quick to sense when somebody is out to use them and they aren't likely to go along.

- By the same token, the companies with successful programs did not go into a half-hearted hard-core hiring program as window dressing, to curry favor with local minority groups or civic leaders.

- They neither feared nor fawned on the minority leaders. They accepted help from such groups without acting as if they were buying their way out of trouble or paying off a bunch of racketeers. Attitude was, "We may or may not agree with these people, but they are making an honest effort to better their community and we won't get to first base unless we treat them accordingly."

- They looked into the various Federal programs that subsidize manpower training. Many were able to recover most of their extra costs. The MA-3 program, for example, put up as much as $3,500 a man.

- They did not depend on regular personnel people nor on conventional screening techniques. They developed new procedures to deal with the special problems of hiring the hard-core.

- They had no expectation of easy success and were able to weather minor failures without discouragement.

- They were willing to experiment with new approaches to recruitment and selection, and they responded quickly to unpredictable problems of adjustment.
They kept in close touch with supervisors and provided back-up support to assist in handling on-the-job problems of friction and discipline.

They made it unmistakably clear to their staffs, from top to bottom, that top management was 100% behind the project and that the same was expected of them.

These are the qualities that made it possible for them to cope with all the problems of recruiting, selecting, training and adjustment. These problems are discussed below.

The problem of recruiting

On paper, the JOBS program provides that the government will identify and locate the qualified unemployed. The cooperating company will merely have to make available the jobs and train them. In practice, however, industry has found that it may have to beat the bushes to find the hard-core unemployed. Caught up in the ghettos, these people are often cut off from the mainstream of industrial life. They are there, but it takes effort and imagination to reach them. In southern New Jersey, for example, not a single applicant showed up for a publicized program of job training for unemployed migrant workers. Yet intensive recruiting found 300 applicants in two and a half weeks.

The usual approaches won't work. Want ads, TV and radio spots, notices posted outside the factory, private employment agencies, aren't effective here. Many of the hard-core are functionally illiterate; they don't read newspapers. And even if they do hear or read about a job, they may not relate to it because repeated turn-downs have given them a low opinion of themselves. A man who has never succeeded in finding more than casual day labor doesn't think of himself as a potential factory worker or business employee.

In fact many hard-core don't even know what jobs exist, let alone where they are. One Harlem survey revealed that the average teenager could think of the names of only six kinds of jobs. In fact, this is a basic cause of hard-core unemployment: a communications breakdown that cuts these people off from society; they do not relate themselves to the jobs society has to offer and they cannot bring their potential skills to the attention of employers.

In most communities the best source of recruits has been the local State Employment Offices. It is their prime responsibility to keep track of job seekers and they have been enlisted under the JOBS program to recruit and certify the hard-core group for employers who want to apply for Federal funding. The Concentrated Employment Program serves a similar function in C.E.P. cities. (See Appendix for a full listing of C.E.P. cities.) However, local agencies vary widely in effectiveness from state to state and from one local office to another. The best way to check may be through other companies that have used the local service.

Early recruiting efforts made it clear that many minority group people have become so discouraged they don't bother to look for work and are not on any Employment Service lists. In such cases, companies have had to reach directly into the poverty neighborhoods for recruits. Some have sent their own recruiters into the ghettos, as Ford does with its Inner-City Recruitment Plan in Detroit. The smaller companies have turned to outside agencies to do the recruiting for them.

Here are some of the places where help is available either free or at a price in most cities:

- City Hall. The hard-core is a problem the Mayor is worrying about and he may have set up machinery to find recruits. The Chamber of Commerce often offers to help. Both sources can fill you in on the experience of other companies in your area. Their chief value is in telling you where to look, not in actually supplying recruits.

- Churches, settlement houses, and other neighborhood organizations in minority group areas are usually able to help find applicants. But they probably won't have facilities for screening or pre-job training.

- The local Community Action Agency that coordinates the Federal anti-poverty program in some cities is a good bet. The CAA has centers and workers in disadvantaged neighborhoods, and it is familiar with all the local job-training programs. In fact, it probably sponsors such programs itself.

- Many cities have non-profit private agencies, such as Detroit's Career Development Center, which train and place minority group workers. Any of the more than 65 Opportunities Industrialization Centers, Negro self-help organizations in cities from coast to coast, will deliver trained workers for a fixed fee per head.

- Civil rights and other minority group organizations are a major source of recruits in many communities. These organizations range from the relatively conservative Urban League, which has been finding jobs for Negroes for several decades, to the militant Black Nationalist groups and radical advocates of Black Power.

Like the state employment offices, the local representation of these groups varies widely in effectiveness. Their coverage is spotty, and since not every agency will have a local branch in every area, it's impossible to generalize. The effectiveness of the moderate Negro groups likewise varies from city to city, depending on how well they can convince local hard-core unemployed that they can actually produce jobs.

In some cities a considerable minority of businessmen report that the militant Negro groups provide the most competent and conscientious workers, presumably because these are the people most likely to make strenuous efforts to improve their place in society. In the words of one expert familiar with the concepts of Black Power, this "may mean hostility but it also means that some Black Power leaders won't have truck with the incompetent people of their own race."

RIA caution: Experienced companies repeatedly voiced this warning: Don't get caught in the middle with two or more of these organizations. Each will demand that you deal with it exclusively. Experienced businessmen warn against making an exclusive deal with any group, since it puts you under their control to some extent.

* Finally, you can hire someone to do your recruiting for you. Firms such as those listed in Appendix C, page 77, will not only handle recruitment but will take over the whole operation -- selection, remedial education, orientation, and counseling -- on a package deal.

RIA observation: Check also Appendix A, beginning on page 25, for a listing of other agencies and sources of help available in your own city. Facilities are expanding constantly, and effectiveness often depends upon specific individuals. Make your own inquiries and your own assessment before firming up your own plans.

Once you find them, how do you screen them?

One of the most persuasive arguments in favor of turning over the entire job of recruiting to a qualified outside agency is the difficulty of screening the hard-core after you've rounded them up. The typical Personnel Director has neither the experience nor the tools to rely on in making predictions regarding on-the-job success for such applicants. Among companies which have already tackled the problem, there's complete agreement that traditional standards go out the window when you undertake to hire the hard-core. Otherwise, few applicants will qualify.

Application blanks or questionnaires will probably turn out to be useless. Application forms which are designed to weigh past employment history, educational achievements or personal background will hardly apply. Watts Manufacturing Company, a Lockheed subsidiary set up in the Los Angeles ghetto, says, "We use a standard form but we don't insist they fill in all the blanks." One of the big auto companies simply asks for name, Social Security number, job experience and record of convictions.
Companies with hard-core programs vary in their attitude toward police records. Some have simply followed the rule of ignoring minor offenses that are unrelated to the job in question. Xerox puts it sensibly: Trainees with records are selected if they show "little likelihood of repeating prior criminal or anti-social acts." In cases where the offense was a serious one, Xerox interviewers note whether "the applicant spontaneously indicates remorse because of the anti-social effects of his behavior."

Bonding may also be a problem, although some assistance may be available from your local Manpower Administration Office. Bonding companies will probably be reluctant to include employees with arrest or conviction records and you may have to cover the risk yourself, as Equitable Life does, for example. After the worker has been on the job for a couple of trouble-free years, the bonding company may be ready to cover him.

Typical screening tests are of no more use than conventional application blanks -- they screen out automatically the very people you are looking for. Hard-core disadvantaged have been conditioned to fail in a classroom atmosphere, their educational and cultural backgrounds are minimal, they lack written communication skill, they panic when working against time, they know that tests are often designed to screen out minority group members. Put all these things together and they are almost certain to score low on conventional paper-and-pencil tests.

RIA observation: This does not mean that the intelligence range of hard-core applicants is necessarily below average. A study of some 60,000 intelligence and aptitude tests given to Americans at all economic and social levels, indicates that the lowest economic groups have essentially the same range of intelligence and potential skills as the general population. Psychologists report that despite the handicaps that hide the ability of the disadvantaged, they have found IQ's in welfare recipients ranging up to a startling 175.

Ordinary intelligence and achievement tests may be little use in screening, but tests can be a valuable tool for diagnosis. They give information about education and skill deficiencies that help to place an applicant in a remedial program. "You have to know who you're working with," a life insurance executive points out.

Tests can also give insights into aptitudes. Dr. H. Greenberg, a psychologist who has specialized in the testing and training of the disadvantaged, places great emphasis on tests that identify personality traits related to various jobs. His organization, Marketing Survey & Research Corp., reports some notable successes with this technique, such as placing 200 Puerto Ricans, drawn from the lowest economic levels, in professional sales jobs that they were able to handle successfully.

Local State Employment Service offices or Concentrated Employment Program offices can help with testing. But the best bet, in the long run, may be to get your hard-core recruits through "feeder" agencies that specialize in preparing these groups with pre-job screening and training.

Some sources indicate that a really good interview will usually give the company more information about an applicant than conventional testing. But successful interviewing of the hard-core requires a great deal of patience, understanding, and courtesy. Even professional personnel people may find it difficult to do this sort of interview, if they think along conventional lines.

A Negro instructor who has successfully trained many hard-core people for jobs warns interviewers not to get too friendly too quickly. "These kids are suspicious. If you try to buddy up to them too soon, they will think you're making fun of them. And don't paint the job in too rosy colors. The applicant can sense it when you are laying it on thick, or dressing up a job to make it sound better than it really is, such as calling a janitor a custodian, or a cleaner a sanitation specialist. Play it straight or you'll have trouble."

The same man gives some special insights into the problems of interracial communication: "Few Negroes understand that the white man can be stupid just like anybody else. We think the white man can't be stupid because he is The Man. He has kept us down for three hundred years, so when he talks stupid we assume he is being devious, leading us on with big promises. He can't be stupid and have oppressed us. So when he talks big, he's sneaky. You get it?"

The Xerox Corporation, which started experimenting with hard-core hiring two years ago in its Project Step-Up, has developed special interviewing techniques for measuring the motivation of applicants. Designed to produce consistent results from the reports of different interviewers, the technique is specifically related to disadvantaged applicants. The questions explore such things as the way the applicant spends his spare time, his relationship with his family, previous efforts to get a permanent job, his awareness of "behavior which is socially acceptable in an industrial situation." Although the company still considers Project Step-Up experimental, Xerox feels the program has helped select highly motivated workers. Xerox will supply single copies of its screening handbook to other companies as long as the supply lasts. Write: Dr. Henry Brenner, Xerox Corporation, Xerox Square, Rochester 14603.

Xerox's research-minded personnel department does its own testing and interviewing. Many experts feel, however, that the average company will do well to take this procedure out of the hands of its regular personnel people.

An official of a public manpower program goes further: "There are two things to be wary of: The higher up you go in the power structure of business, the less first-hand knowledge of the disadvantaged you find. Top executives are not at home with poverty or the special problems of the illiterate. Some of them are not even very close to their own company's operational training problems... Business executives often are happier with business problems than with social problems. And they're trained to avoid stepping on toes in their own companies."

RIA recommendation: The people best qualified to bridge the credibility gap may be your youngest managers and junior executives. Be careful not to assign anyone who is overly sentimental. The "do-gooder" can be as bad as the bigot in the role of communicator.

A candid view of the training problem

Any company attempting to train the hard-core will have to assume that remedial education is essential, particularly communication skills -- reading, spelling, basic arithmetic. Some programs add citizenship, and health and safety. Unless you are prepared to cope with these needs, your program will be doomed before it starts.

You can start with the assumption that the poor speak another language. Minority groups like the Puerto Ricans or Mexican-Americans may be functionally illiterate in their own language as well as in English. But the language of the ghettos may be just as foreign to the business scene. Thus, the training program must provide for some degree of basic education, along with job orientation and instruction in job skills.

Nor will the hard-core make easy pupils. In fact, early associations with education -- if any -- are bound to be negative. Having failed in school and dropped out, they associate formal education with defeat. For this reason, the most effective remedial education has been in a non-schoolroom atmosphere, usually small groups meeting with an instructor, each person proceeding at his own pace and receiving individual attention. Some may progress with remarkable speed. Some will be so far behind at the beginning that they will take a long time to catch up. In the words of one employer, "You cannot assume that these people know anything. That is why training courses are so tough to design."

Some companies have been able to lighten the training load by hiring workers who have been through remedial education or "feeder courses." Job Corps and Neighborhood Youth Corps graduates will already have had help in raising their English and arithmetic skills to an acceptable level. Companies that decide to fill the education gaps after hiring must not only find qualified instructors, but also set aside classroom space and develop courses. Ready-made remedial education courses, including audio-visual materials, are presently appearing on the market. See Appendix C, page 77, for a detailed listing.

The most realistic solution for the smaller company is to turn to outside sources to provide the teachers and facilities. Your local school system is a possible source of help, but there are advantages to avoiding conventional classroom techniques. Remedial education works best when the student sees it tied directly to a job situation -- both in the way the subjects are presented and the setting of the teaching situation. This is one reason why a new vocational school in a mid-Western city has just been installed in a factory building, and is run by a "general manager," not a principal.

Equitable Life, for example, found that an excellent typing teacher was not successful with high-school drop-outs because of her conventional "commercial course" approach. Equitable abandoned attempts to employ its own teaching staff and instead contracted out its program to a non-profit agency that specializes in teaching the disadvantaged.

Its choice was the Board for Fundamental Education, an Indianapolis-based organization that is one of the oldest in the field. BFE has developed a special curriculum for the disadvantaged that emphasizes a highly personalized approach. The classes are run like seminars and the teachers frequently come from disadvantaged backgrounds themselves. A four-grade improvement in educational skills takes about 150 BFE classroom hours and costs $300 to $400.

There is a wide range of other organizations that offer remedial teaching programs to industry. Some, like BFE, are non-profit; others, including subsidiaries of large super-corporations, are operated as businesses. Among the latter is MIND, Inc., a subsidiary of Corn Products Company, in Greenwich, Conn., that uses a system of programmed teaching originally developed for the National Association of Manufacturers. MIND uses neither teachers nor classrooms in the conventional sense. The student listens to tapes coordinated with a text; he progresses as rapidly as he can give the right answers to the programmed questions. The course is run by a human "monitor" whose job is to set up the audio system and act as consultant and assistant to the trainee.

MIND reports success in increasing reading and spelling skills by averages of 2 to 6 grade levels, and arithmetic skills by 3.1 grade levels, in 80 hours of trainee time. A MIND course costs about $400 per student. Its more ambitious 6-month course, labelled PHD (Program for Human Development), provides 440 hours of instruction, periodic follow-up and trouble-shooting on a 24-hour call basis for a flat fee of $2,400 per man. For details concerning costs, start-up dates and schedules, contracts, etc., contact the nearest MIND office or Mr. Lawrence T. Knauff, Vice President, MIND, Inc., 18 West Putnam Avenue, Greenwich, Conn. 06830. Phone: (202) 869-1350.

On-the-job problems of adjustment

Remedial education is only one of the things the hard-core worker is going to need. Most will also require help in approaching the job situation itself. It is impossible to exaggerate the difficulties that many encounter in attempting to understand and conform to the taken-for-granted groundrules of a 9-to-5 job. For the chronically unemployed accustomed to an aimless existence, the mere discipline of a five-day work schedule represents a tremendous change.

One study made by a big corporation suggests that problems with attendance and punctuality are built into a slum environment. "Many of these people are not accustomed to living by the clock. Morning, afternoon, and night are as narrow time divisions as they recognize. Clinics and other institutions experience problems getting clients to observe appointments scheduled on the hour and half hour, for instance."

Without the life-time habits of a fixed routine -- and without a counterpart of the middle-class parent who wakes the family and urges the young worker to hurry lest he be late -- discipline is rare.

Trainees from such backgrounds need indoctrination on the importance of showing up for work every day, getting to work on time, following orders, being a good producer on the job. Without such preparation, more problems will show up in the shop.

Safety training may be necessary. "Their curiosity about what the other person is doing will lead to carelessness and injury, and damage to equipment and production," says a study made for the Department of Labor, adding "There is a normal tendency for younger trainees to want to horseplay and be practical jokers."

You're likely to stumble over some unexpected problems -- such as the transistor radio. A study made for the Labor Department says: "Music has often been the substitute for conversation among the disadvantaged teenagers. Music conveys mood, feeling, and needs more accurately for them than do words. If radios are not permitted in your work environment, be prepared to explain why not."

All this makes essential some kind of indoctrination on how to act on the job. Your new recruits may have already received it; many Federal and private training programs make a special point of preparing people for a job situation. If not, you can hire one of the training organizations to set up an orientation course for your new workers. The Board for Fundamental Education, for example, gives "World of Work" courses that emphasize "the philosophy of competition as it relates to the individual's ability to advance." (See Appendix C for address.)

Breakthroughs with new training tools

The hard-core unemployed are not merely unschooled and unskilled, they are unmotivated. Some of the most discouraging failures we encountered were experienced by those companies that launched their training programs with the expectation that the unemployed would gratefully throw themselves into their new opportunities. The habits of failure and despair are not that easily broken.

Experienced trainers and psychologists who are now specializing in the learning problems of the hard-core point out the importance of rebuilding self-esteem and self-confidence, along with imparting the essential skills that are required on the job. Some dramatic results have been achieved through the use of Sensitivity Training encounter groups. Role-playing techniques have been helpful in getting the disadvantaged to recognize their own skills. T-Groups have also served to break the barriers in inter-racial groups.

"Hours of special training in interviewing skills could not have accomplished the same sense of confidence that one trainee achieved merely by role-playing a typical day", according to the regional director of the OEO. Frozen at the mere thought of being interviewed, the woman was encouraged to review the way she spends a typical day. Soon it became apparent to her that she normally talked to or "was interviewed by" at least half a dozen people in an average morning. The perception that she already possessed some useful skills heightened her confidence in the possibility of further self-improvement.

A high-school drop-out who had flunked the basic math tests and who could not be motivated to enroll in basic education courses changed his mind after a two-week Sensitivity Training experience. A casual reference to his knowledge of the numbers racket led gradually to the fact that he could easily carry 120 numbers in his head. His own estimate of this ability was "nothing special." But an identification of the business skills that were implied by this feat laid the groundwork for an important change in his own evaluation of his future.

"Putting people in touch with their own potential is just the first-stage problem," according to one experienced trainer. "The next stage involves a matching of opportunity."

In an effort to build an internal company environment that supports this initial training effort, many companies are conducting Sensitivity Training courses for their supervisors as well. Some regional offices of the Office of Economic Opportunity may be equipped to offer assistance with such programs. Private companies such as Westinghouse Learning Corporation in Pittsburgh and the Human Development Institute in Atlanta are also equipped to help. (See Appendix C for addresses.)

Anticipate personal problems

Transportation will probably be a problem to those companies not located right in a poverty neighborhood. The average hard-core unemployed probably lives some distance from most plants -- and he doesn't own an automobile. His slum neighborhood may not have any public transportation system at all. If there is public transportation, schedules in most metropolitan areas are set up to bring workers into city jobs in the morning and back to suburban homes in the evening. But disadvantaged workers need the opposite.

Some companies have been able to persuade the public transit system in their city to set up new bus schedules. Some help their workers form car pools. Some have had to charter buses, either on their own or jointly with other employers nearby. But the problem can't be ignored: Poor transportation facilities are the primary cause of absenteeism and tardiness among workers from the inner city poverty neighborhoods.

Some companies are being urged to shortcut the whole problem by setting up branch plants right in the ghetto and hiring the people on the block. A Lockheed subsidiary in the Watts section of Los Angeles, making tents on government contracts, has shown a profit. Obviously this is not feasible for the average small or medium-sized employer.

Underwriting a pledge to hire the hard-core has led some companies into fringe activities like arranging for babysitters. Mothers who return to work tend to be more stable employees than younger women without family responsibilities, so some employers consider it worthwhile to find someone to take care of their children. Frequently arrangements can be made with a social agency near the mother's home. Or you may be able to get the help of your local OEO Community Action Program.

Other personal problems may handicap hard-core trainees during the first few months. Health -- both his own and his family's -- may keep him off the job, particularly if he doesn't know how to find and use health services. Personal budgeting is a serious problem area. Never having had a regular income, some of these workers find it hard to stretch their money from one payday to the next. Installment buying is a particular threat. Unsophisticated workers buy inferior merchandise, sign a contract with exorbitant interest and "special charges," and end up with a big chunk of their wages garnished.

There is no end to the problems that might occur on the job. Some workers will be genuinely frightened at their first exposure to a room full of unfamiliar and noisy machines. They will need reassurance as they learn to adapt to this strange world.

Some concerns find the answer in a "buddy" program. The JOBS-NOW projects in Cleveland and Chicago assign an experienced worker as guide and confidant for each newcomer. Another program in Cleveland assigns "coaches" to help each trainee at nights or on weekends.

Most common approach, used by Equitable Life and many other companies, is to provide counselors to help new workers through the training period. Counselors help by giving the trainee a chance to talk out his problems, ask questions, and -- what is especially important -- to receive encouragement. Equitable Life makes a point of seeing that trainees "experience success." In General Motors' "Project Opportunity," Urban League counselors go to an absent worker's home to find out why he hasn't showed up at work -- and if necessary, bring him in to the job.

Counseling can also help with some of the problems of motivation. Disadvantaged background and discouragement can combine to produce a lack of motivation that shows up in poor work performance and drop-outs. Psychologists point out that working below potential is a major factor in the boredom and dissatisfaction that lead to absenteeism and drop-out. One cure is the awareness that promotion to a better job is possible.

Another successful approach to building motivation is economic incentive. Watts Manufacturing, for example, claims that putting pay on a piecework basis cuts absenteeism dramatically. However, other companies report that the piecework incentive for absences merely encourages the feeling that people are free to make the decision whether to slow up or not. What this does to production schedules is the company's problem.

All this and money too?

Entry level salaries have also presented a problem. Most agencies and job training groups insist on starting salaries well above the minimum wage. The Opportunities Industrialization Centers (OEC), a private non-profit program of Negro self-help insists on $2.00 an hour. Their position is simply that salaries must be higher than welfare or unemployment payments.

Major retailers have been turned away by other minority training and recruiting agencies because retail salaries are "notoriously low." An insurance company had a similar experience when it proposed to open up some 60 to 70 clerical jobs to untrained and inexperienced Negroes. Despite its willingness to pay the standard starting salary of $65 per week during a full period of training in typing and clerical skills, the company found few takers. The explanation offered by local employment agencies was that the average middle-class high school graduate could afford to work at that pay since such girls usually lived at home and used their entire paycheck for clothes and personal whims. The minority group female, on the other hand, is often the major breadwinner in the family and cannot afford the luxury of an attractive office job if it means a minimum salary.

Such experiences inevitably lead to frustrations on both sides. Some effort is underway by the Concentrated Employment Program to relax the $1.60 minimum wage standard in C.E.P. cities for the 14-18 year-olds who work part-time and attend school part-time. Exemption of this youngest hard-core group from Wage-Hour minimums could ease the burden on companies who want to cooperate but are finding it impossible to pay full-scale wages for the hard-core level of productivity.

By and large, however, minimum wage rates will have to be paid and Wage-Hour rules observed if Federal funding is desired. Under the MA-3 program, the $1.60 rate applies from the first day the employee/trainee enters the company. What's more, company policy regarding legal holidays, sick leave and vacations must be observed. These can be figured into the "fixed unit cost," however, and reimbursed by the government. Generally, the higher the rate of pay the more likely the training will receive government assistance. "The rate of pay for the job skill being developed will be an important factor in proposal evaluation," according to the Manpower Administration's instructions for MA-3 proposals.

Note on unions

Approval of unions is usually necessary in order to qualify for public money. In any case, it is usually unwise to exclude a union from participating to some extent in the process of absorbing marginals into a workforce.

Once you've decided to go ahead with a hard-core project, if you have a union, tell its leadership what you're planning and what your purpose is. It is especially important to convince the union that you are not deviously trying to hire cheap labor or bring in nonunion workers to break your contract. Later, when the new workers arrive, shop stewards should be invited to tell them what the union is and how it functions. In the case of neighborhood Youth Corps trainees under the Work Training in Industry program, obtain union approval before hiring. (No trainees will be assigned to a company which has a labor dispute going on in its plant.)

Despite recent proclamations by union leaders, their opposition to hiring of marginal people is bound to continue. Unions are also likely to oppose the practice of placing hard-core workers from training programs in better positions than those of many regular employees.

However, unions are under a great deal of pressure from the Administration to cooperate in job programs. Some of this pressure is bound to filter down to locals. Businessmen will be in a better position than in the past to pressure unions to cooperate.

Preparing internally for the "cultural shock"

Much has been written concerning the culture of poverty and much is being done to bridge the gap for the culturally deprived. But much is still to be learned about the impact of the latter upon the industrial environment they are being invited to enter.

Southern companies operating under the Civil Rights Act have already been forced to face up to the problems of segregated toilet facilities, separate cafeterias, recreation facilities and parties. The social problems are real ones but they are being handled with great care and sensitivity in many cases. Many companies in other areas will also find themselves rethinking the pros and cons of office picnics, Christmas parties and similar activities.

Most difficult to cope with will be the subtle effects of prejudice that exist everywhere. The more a company extends itself to make allowances for the hard-core group, the more careful it will have to be to anticipate resentment among the existing workforce.

Old hands may react to the news by threatening to quit. When top management calls their bluff, however, they rarely do. To minimize such frictions, recruits drawn from the hard-core should be spread out in twos or threes throughout your plant, not clustered in one department. In many cases it may not be necessary to identify the new workers as special or different. In one plant, trainees work with the regular help and only the supervisors know which ones have been hired under the special program.

It cannot be repeated too often that everyone in your administrative structure, from top to bottom, must be told what your program is intended to do, that you are solidly behind it, and that you expect wholehearted support for it. Many a well-conceived project has bogged down because somebody down the line didn't get the word.

But the key man in the whole hard-core project will be the supervisor. He has been geared to getting out quality work, on time, and at minimum costs. The hard-core program will put him in charge of people who have little concept of time, order or work standards. If he is to function at all, he will have to feel that you are fully behind him in the project and that success will pay off to his own advantage. This means that when hard-core trainees in his workforce inevitably cut down efficiency and productivity, the company does not subject him simultaneously to pressure to cut costs and increase production. It is essential that some tangible ways are found to tie his self-interest directly to the success of the training program.

RIA recommendation: Not every supervisor can handle this tough assignment. Employers have found that liberal attitudes on race relations are less important than personality. The supervisor must be understanding and patient -- "a patient perfectionist" is one expert's prescription, but he must show an inner toughness. Hard-core trainees are likely to be tough kids. He must enforce the rules fairly but not too rigidly. He must have the kind of personal security in his own job that will let him give the recruits a little leeway, particularly at the outset.

The supervisor's relationships with the regular workers are equally important. Old hands may resent and criticize the special training and educational opportunities given to the new recruits; they may see them as a threat to their own jobs. In this situation, the supervisor can be something of a public relations man.

Many supervisors may be unprepared for this kind of responsibility. Special short courses to help supervisors deal with hard-core unemployed are offered in various parts of the country by such organizations as Westinghouse Learning Corporation in Pittsburgh and the Human Development Institute in Atlanta (a Bell and Howell subsidiary). One of the most ambitious programs is ASSET -- Advanced Supervisory Skills Through Empathy Training," a project of the National Association of Manufacturers. ASSET provides a series of one-day workshops that give supervisors basic information for understanding minority groups and provide opportunities for discussion of actual plant situations.

Big gains by small companies

The entering wedge could only be driven by the major employers, but increasingly small companies are being drawn into the act. Obviously they have neither the financial cushion nor the range of job opportunities that can be offered by the Fortune 500. But they still have a role in the picture. In fact, some State Employment Service people insist the small businessman has a distinct advantage: "He knows his own operations. He knows his own supervisors. He can judge training programs better than any personnel executive in a large company. Personnel people in general don't know all that much about how to train a welder or a furniture polisher. But the head of a small company is usually in closer touch with the realities."

Small and medium-sized companies that have cooperated in attacking the hard-core problem have usually done so by forming a consortium with other firms in the same city to conduct training classes on a pool basis. Success stories are hard to come by, mainly because these groups tend to prefer to play down their efforts out of a disinclination to become "heroes" in the local press. (The avoidance of publicity is not merely a matter of good taste, it is good sense. There is always the danger of inviting excessive demands from rival minority groups.)

Still there is ample evidence that constructive efforts are under way in many communities. National attention has focused on the major metropolitan centers, but some Chambers of Commerce insist that it is easier to be successful in a small city than a large one. Civic pride and community cooperation can be easier to tap.
Many small company executives who cannot pledge jobs directly are contributing their efforts on a community basis. Businessmen are joining together in many cities to buy up property in ghetto areas with a view to building shopping and recreation facilities. Some are backing ghetto business with financial loans. Others are attacking the hard-core problem, along with other urban problems, through Community Action Programs.

In a variety of ways, the business community is responding to the challenge of fighting the war on poverty. The new partnership between government and industry may turn out to be one of the most important spin-offs of that effort.

Getting help from the government

The major source of Federal funds for hard-core training programs was the so-called MA-3, sponsored jointly by the Manpower Administration of the U.S. Department of Labor and the National Alliance of Businessmen. However, the closing date for proposals was May 15, 1968.

Amounts reimbursable to the employer under the MA-3 program ran from $2,700 to $3,500 per trainee. Contracts were for a two-year period, but an individual worker's training is not expected to run over 12 months. Expectation is that the MA-4 contracts will eventually follow much the same pattern. Regional offices of the NAB and/or the Manpower Administration can keep you advised.

Meanwhile, other government agencies continue to offer a variety of assistance to the business community. Here is a brief rundown:

- The CEP: Outside the NAB 50-city area the main thrust of the Manpower Administration's activities will be on the Concentrated Employment Program. At the present time it is serving 20 cities and two rural areas. If appropriations are granted, this program will be boosted to about 115 areas, which roughly will reach every state and a selected list of cities with populations of 25,000 or more. The Concentrated Employment Program, operating through a single local sponsor, usually a public agency, will work with local, state, and private industry groups in providing lists of the hard-core unemployed to determine who they are and where and how they live. Procedures are now being established for seeking out the hard-core, counselling them, and providing health and education services and training.

  Since the CEP approaches the hard-core from the training end, it often has a backlog of people for whom it needs jobs. At the moment, CEP officials report that they have 27,000 hard-core trainees already trained, screened and awaiting placement.

- Youth training: Appropriation provisions are pending for expansion of the Job Corps, Neighborhood Youth Corps, and programs such as Work Experience, New Careers, Operation Mainstream, and the Work Incentive Program. These will provide a vast supply of new workers who are partially trained and will be ready for employment in private industry. In addition, under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act and through the Manpower Development Administration a number of regional and local vocational schools will provide additional sources of partially trained workers in every state of the Union.

- The Small Business Administration, through its Department of Defense set-aside procurement program, will be giving special preference to any firm which has plans for the hiring of the hard-core unemployed. In addition, SBA has a Local Economic Development loan program which provides special assistance to those firms that will locate in ghetto areas and will hire ghetto residents. The Department of Labor will also make available special training funds to SBA loan applicants who include the hiring of hard-core unemployed in their plans for business expansion.

- HEW has a program of grants to local school districts for counseling, vocational training, and other pre-employment tools to assist the disadvantaged youth in preparing for a job.

- The Model Cities Program: Legislation under the Department of Housing and Urban Development provides important opportunities to businessmen engaged in slum rehabilitation and the use of hard-core unemployed in the construction process. This legislation will also assist in providing physical facilities such as health clinics, neighborhood centers, etc., which eventually will provide the businessman with an upgraded source of employable people.

- HUD also offers grants for both planning and construction assistance in the field of urban transportation, city planning, community facilities such as housing, business development in urban renewal areas.

- The Economic Development Administration (EDA) under the Department of Commerce also offers an extensive loan service to specified economic areas with substantial unemployment. These loans can be used for industrial development and outright grants are made for the construction of public water and sewage facilities, road and transportation development, and other community facilities which will facilitate economic growth. These funds are made available through Economic Development Districts. Over 900 local development areas are eligible for such assistance. In addition to the Appalachian Regional Commission, five other areas are now getting underway. They are: Upper Great Lakes, Ozarks, New England, Four Corners and Coastal Plains.

RIA observation: While some of these programs may seem remote from the direct problem of hiring the hard-core unemployed, they all underscore the fact that the Federal/private industry partnership is now a reality and a functioning proposition in many areas. There still remains a horrendous task of coordination of local and state governments working with the business community. But efforts are now under way to rationalize the whole Federal grant program to state and municipal sources. Private businessmen have a great stake in seeing to it that these programs are coordinated and reflect their opinions.

One effective avenue is provided by the local Community Action Boards which have been set up through the Office of Economic Opportunity. By and large, these programs are run locally and reflect indigenous interest in improving the lot of the poor. In spite of divisiveness and quarreling now rampant in many community action cities, many programs are now taking shape which improve the community where the businessman has his factory. Non-participation in this process by the business community would result in a loss on all sides.

Industry and the community

One central fact is bound to shape all future Manpower programs: They will inevitably be local in nature. This is where the industries are -- where the classrooms, the day-care centers, and the clinics will have to be.

At the present time, the Department of Labor has set up a program called Cooperative Area Manpower Planning System (CAMPS) to link Federal efforts with the resources at the state and local levels. CAMPS will operate at every level -- Federal, regional, state, and local. At each level it will pull together all the Manpower services which bear on jobs. In the future its greatest impact will be at the local level where it will:

... help communities develop their own Manpower blueprints;
... survey job needs;
... assure that all Federal programs that help the jobseeker are available.

During the past several years there has been a new awakening of the partnership of private industry with government. Increasingly, the businessman is coming into contact with these new forces, both as an entrepreneur and community leader.

At the present time, there are over 275 grant-in-aid systems emanating from the Federal government. The enlightened businessman who has adjusted to this fact of life can participate in the decision-making all along the way.

With the pendulum swinging more and more toward local and state participation, decentralization of the Federal government's activities has been marked. As a result, regional offices have been set up in practically every State of the Union. Officials are much better informed. Business groups such as the Chamber of Commerce, National Association of Manufacturers, and other industry association groups, are now pouring out a great deal more information on government programs which may affect their livelihood.

Thus, while government may be getting more complex, it is also true that it is becoming more accessible. The same is true for all elected officials and public employees. For this reason, programs such as the one aimed at the hard-core unemployed are bound to have wider impact in the future. The persistent businessman who is seeking assistance from the government will find it more easily. The increase in public services has now become the fact of life. Enlightened businessmen are planning in terms of a growing partnership.
APPENDIX A

REPRESENTATIVE SOURCES OF GUIDANCE AND ASSISTANCE
80 MAJOR CITIES

The real task of absorbing the hard-core unemployed into meaningful jobs can only be confronted at the local level. In every major city and rural community throughout the United States, agencies are springing up to help bring industry and the hard-core together.

Listed below are important sources of assistance and guidance in each of 80 major cities. Much of the information was obtained by our research staff from local officials, Chambers of Commerce or key civic leaders.

Since facilities are expanding constantly and staffing is always subject to change, it is impossible for any such directory to be complete. If you need additional help or information, we suggest that you contact your Mayor, City Manager, State Employment Office or Regional Manpower Administrator for guidance.

HUMAN RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT DEPARTMENT
Contact: Bill Knox, coordinator (316) AM 2-8211—Ext. 388 or 389
City Hall Annex, 104 South Main Street, Wichita, Kansas 67202
This Department is official coordinator for public and private organizations (Board of Education, C of C, etc.) in dealing with training of the hard-core unemployed. Right now the Department is compiling information which will be used by top executives in the area to promote tailor-made programs for business. Mr. Knox's staff is also beginning to introduce a local "Alliance of Businessmen" in conjunction with the NAB. National Alliance of Businessmen representatives have been meeting with local civic leaders to plan the project.

WICHITA AREA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION
Contact: Paul Wood, president (316) FO 3-5711
First National Bank of Wichita, Main and Douglas Streets, Wichita, Kansas 67202
Although this corporation was formed to provide loans for small businessmen, and disadvantaged members of the community, the executives who direct the corporation will provide guidance for area companies in dealing with the hard-core unemployed. After a civil disturbance last summer, the Corporation, along with First National, helped 28 Negroes who had been arrested establish their own business. The young men have expanded an initial hamburger stand venture into a gas station, a few more hamburger emporiums, and are stockholders in two supermarkets in a predominantly Negro neighborhood.

Ohio Bureau of Employment Services
2026 South Avenue, Youngstown, Ohio 44503

CO-OPERATIVE AREA MANPOWER PLAN (CAMPS)
Contact: Mr. A. E. McCully (listed above).
This federal program is sponsored locally by the Youngstown Manpower Coordinating Committee, a group of civic and business leaders, who, working under the leadership of Mr. McCully, interview and send representatives into the community to seek out and train the hard-core unemployed. Headquarters are in Mr. McCully's office, listed above.

EMPLOYER JOBS COUNCIL
Contact: Mr. J. Kenneth Lloyd, Chairman (216) 744-5201
Bureau of Employment Building,
2026 South Avenue, Youngstown, Ohio 44503

More than 70 manufacturers and retailers are part of this general council which coordinates all hard-core training facilities and placement services in the Youngstown area. The Council is trying to create jobs for the under-employed and works through Mr. McCully's office (listed above).

Following is a list of the four major divisions of the Council, a brief description of the function and the name and position of the Chairman of each division:

A. The Recruitment and Assessment Committee, Contact: John W. Guffey, Industrial Relations Manager, Aeroquip Corp. Determines where and how trainees should be made employable using the fullest resources of federal, state and local funds. Committee members also go into the field to find recruits for job programs.

B. Job Preparation Committee, Contact: Douglas Shasby, Commercial Manager, Ohio Bell Telephone Co. Arranges training facilities, instructors, programs, and has worked with the Chamber of Commerce in advertising the availability of new employees for business.

C. Supportive Services Committee, Contact: Perry Meshel, Executive Assistant to the Mayor. Incorporates public and private, civic and religious, and large and small organizations in the Youngstown area that offer trainee, placement and welfare services.

D. Job Committee, Contact: James K. Lee, Manager for J. C. Penney Co. at Boardman Plaza. Their role is to actually place the disadvantaged workers after they are trained and to meet with businessmen to discuss hiring the trainees.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION R. C. CHURCH
Contact: The Rev. Patrick Tierney
811 Oak Street, Youngstown, Ohio 44506, (216) 747-3533.

In dealing with the problems of the hard-core unemployed, an experiment launched by Father Tierney, assistant pastor of the parish, has had tremendous success with the youth in a poor section of the city. In the summer of 1967, Father Tierney started a "car wash" program, offering reasonable rates to have youngsters wash private vehicles. For many of the young men and women it was their first real incentive to enter the business world. Father Tierney played a hunch, but it worked. He masterminded a car wash plan on a bit larger scale -- the parish received the contract to wash the local car and truck fleet of Ohio Bell Telephone. Immaculate Conception is continuing its efforts to find training and jobs for disadvantaged youth in their area.
APPENDIX B

REGIONAL OFFICES OF KEY MANPOWER AGENCIES

While there are numerous agencies — public and private — working on some phase of the manpower problem, four provide the real "backbone" for all programs aimed at the hard-core unemployed: The Manpower Administration of the U.S. Department of Labor; the National Alliance of Businessmen; the Office of Economic Opportunity; and the Concentrated Employment Program. Regional offices of these key agencies are listed in this Appendix.

URBAN CONCENTRATED EMPLOYMENT PROGRAMS SCHEDULED FOR AREAS NOT INCLUDED IN THE "JOBS" 50-CITY PROGRAM.

The project known as Job Opportunities in the Business Sector is a reality in 50 cities in the United States. However, many smaller cities are not benefiting from the Concentrated Employment Programs underway in the 50 JOBS cities. To rectify the situation the U.S. Department of Labor's Manpower Administration has planned to expand the CEP operation by the end of Fiscal Year 1969.

If your business is located in any of the cities listed below, you can obtain information and assistance by calling the Regional Manpower Administrator in your area.

*ALBUQUERQUE, New Mexico
*BRIDGEPORT, Connecticut
*CHARLOTTE, North Carolina

APPENDIX C

Private Sources for Training the Hard-Core in all Parts of the Country

In addition to local organizations and government agencies, there are a number of private commercial and non-profit institutions available to conduct, plan, or provide hardware for the training of the hard-core unemployed. Listed below are some of the companies that are equipped to help you with your training problems or take over the training completely.

The costs for each program are listed when possible; however, they vary widely on the basis of tailor-made programs for individual employers. When dealing with these companies, you should ask them:

- Will you meet our specific needs?
- Will the trainees be adaptable to any employment situation?
- Do you provide follow-up counseling services?
- Can you reach the trainee at his present level and end up by teaching him more than he already knows about how to solve personal and community problems?

It is also a good idea to ask for detailed accounts of past contracts held by the company, and the firm’s specific qualifications for achieving your goals.

Most of the companies listed in this section also have field offices convenient to one or more of the nation’s 100 largest cities. Contact the central headquarters for local addresses.

New York, N.Y. 10022
(212) MU-8-7600
Contact: H. Salpeter

Woolman Systems provides a comprehensive basic literacy and arithmetic program for unemployed and underemployed people, as well as drop-outs, mentally handicapped children and adults, prison inmates, and military personnel. The trainee's progress reports are computerized so that the employer can keep track of trainees' progress. Dr. Myron Woolman, a psychologist who heads the company, has designed the techniques, systems and materials used by Woolman Systems. For a typical project, the cost is $3,500 per trainee.
There are literally hundreds of agencies—public and private—engaged in some phase of work in connection with disadvantaged youth and the hard-core unemployed. In order to help you find your way through the maze, we have compiled a glossary of some of the most important programs. It is by no means a complete directory of sources of assistance, but it will help you especially to clarify the "alphabetical" confusion.

AIM — Action In Manpower: Cleveland job-training program for the disadvantaged.

ASSET — Advance Supervisory Skills through Empathy Training — New program established by the National Association of Manufacturers to train supervisors in dealing with hard-core unemployed or minority group members. One-day workshops held all over the country.

BOARD OF FUNDAMENTAL EDUCATION — Non-profit organization that pioneered in educating dropouts and functional illiterates — provides basic education courses to industry on a fee basis. Headquarters in Indianapolis.

CAA, CAP — Community Action Agency — Contracts with Office of Economic Opportunity to administer Community Action Program, coordinating practically all Federal anti-poverty projects in a city or rural area. Termin Community Action Project in some municipalities.

CAMS — Cooperative Area Manpower Planning Systems — A locally-oriented system developed under the Department of Labor in 1967 to meet the need for joint planning and coordinated action in manpower development and related fields. Serves as a link between Federal, state and local agencies.

C.E.P. — Concentrated Employment Program — Created in March 1967 to place all Federal job training programs in selected cities and rural areas under one sponsor. Administered by the U. S. Department of Labor. (See Appendix C, for a list of 50 planned CEP cities.)

FPR — Federal Procurement Regulations — Available from the Government Printing Office in Washington; covers all government contracts.

JOBS — Job Opportunities in the Business Sector — Major Federal program to find work for hard-core unemployed. Sponsored through the National Alliance of Businessmen in 50 major cities.

JOBS-NOW — Work Training Programs in Chicago and Cleveland.

JOIN — Job Orientation In Neighborhoods — A government agency at the local level which was designed to recruit and train the disadvantaged and serve as a feeder program for jobs. Superseded in some communities by NMSC.

MA-1-67 — 18 month experimental program in small number of cities under the Manpower Development and Training Act to fund on-the-job training with a private employer under subcontract. Program now superseded by MA-3.

MA-2-67 — Second experimental Federal program MA-1 plus fixed unit-cost approach, plus a requirement that the training contractor employ the people he trains. Contractor had to train a minimum of 50 employees under a 21-month fixed-price contract. Now superseded by MA-3.

MA-3 — Current major Federal program for funding hard-core training. Closing date for proposals was May 15, 1968 but contracts will run through 1970. May be the model for future MA-4. Basically the same as MA-2, but with these changes:
- Prime contract period extended to 24 months.
- No individual trained beyond 12 months (means employer can handle two groups of trainees).
- No minimum number of trainees required (opens program to small business and industry).
- Smaller concerns can join together in consortiums and apply for a training contract.

MDTA — Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962 — Basic Federal legislation covering on-the-job training programs. Administered by the U. S. Department of Labor. Sets up centralized "Skills Centers" for grouping many occupational training programs and supportive services, generally under public school administration. Thus, education, training, counseling can be centralized to provide maximum utilization of local facilities. Provides funding for on-the-job-training through the NAB.

MIND — Methods of Intellectual Development — Provides basic education and skills training, using teaching machines, on a fee basis. Subsidiary of Corn Products: headquarters in Greenwich, Connecticut. (See Appendix C for details.)

NEW CAREERS — Provides jobs for unskilled in public-service field by restructuring professional vocations — does not affect private employers. Run by U. S. Department of Labor's Bureau of Work Training Programs.

NMSC — Neighborhood Manpower Service Centers — Successor to JOIN. Recruits and trains the under-employed and the under-educated in preparation for jobs in industry.

NYC — Neighborhood Youth Corps — Two-part OEO job-training program for 14-21 year olds. In-school programs aim at preventing drop-outs by providing part-time jobs that simultaneously give valuable experience. The largest of the programs that provide work experience for those not yet ready for competitive employment.
OEO — Office of Economic Opportunity — Independent Federal agency given major responsibility for anti-poverty programs.

OIC — Opportunities Industrialization Centers — Private non-profit program of Negro self-help that trains minority group members for jobs. Started in Philadelphia; now has more than 65 centers in cities across the nation. Provides trained workers for an industry on a fee basis. A “feeder” program prior to skill training is a unique element designed to increase the trainees’ employability.

OJT — On the Job Training — Program set up by the Department of Labor under the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962. Reimburses employer for time his skilled workers and supervisors spend on training new workers.

OPERATION MAINSTREAM — Offers opportunities for adults similar to those provided for youth under NYC. Gives experience and training to chronically unemployed adults in rural areas through jobs on community improvement projects. Administered by the U. S. Labor Department’s Bureau of Work Training Programs. Does not affect private employers.

PHD — Program for Human Development — Basic education program, devised by MIND, Inc., which seeks to raise educational level three to five grades in one hundred sixty hours of training.

RFP — Request For Proposal — Federal Government announcements asking for proposals for a contract to carry out a project, such as a private employer’s MA-3 job training program.

SEED — Skills Escalation and Employment Development — Joint government-industry program to provide metalworking training for unemployed in Newark, N.J. disadvantaged neighborhoods.

SPECIAL IMPACT PROGRAMS — Aim to improve conditions in city areas containing large numbers of poor people. Manpower training provided on community development projects; does not affect private employers. (But gives business and industry cash incentives to move into such areas.)

STEP — Solutions To Employment Problems — Program of the National Association of Manufacturers designed to achieve more effective utilization of human resources through industry’s hiring of hard-core unemployed and other disadvantaged persons.

VISTA — Volunteers In Service To America — A domestic Peace Corps.

WORK INCENTIVE PROGRAM — Encourages welfare recipients to get a job by allowing them to continue to receive a portion of their welfare payments. Does not affect employers who hire such workers. Administered by U. S. Department of Labor’s Bureau of Work Training Programs.

WTI — Work Training in Industry — On-the-job training program for Neighborhood Youth Corps members who have dropped out of school. Part of the Federal anti-poverty program but administered by the U. S. Department of Labor.
