For use by junior and senior high school English teachers and students in search of appropriate subjects for written compositions, this publication contains 1,237 topics compiled from a questionnaire sent to about 250 teachers. The topics are divided into categories: personal reminiscences, personal reactions, the familiar essay, description, processes, argumentative exposition, comparison and contrast, persuasive exposition, character sketch (types and individuals), fantasy, sports, the news, science, the arts and entertainment, farming, religion, philosophy, the school, and literary topics including "creative" writing paralleling literary works. Also suggested are eight techniques from which composition topics can be generated, the best topics being usually "those which have grown out of the classroom discussions." (DD)
A Thousand Topics for Composition: Revised

Since the supply of A Thousand Topics for Composition: Revised is nearly depleted because of the popularity of the list (thousands of copies have been sold throughout the country since the original publication in 1951), a revision was recommended; and so a questionnaire was sent to about 250 junior and senior high school English teachers, requesting topics they have found effective in their units on composition.

After reviewing the topics accumulated in an excellent response from the teachers, it was decided not to limit the new list to one thousand topics but to present all topics suggested. An attempt was made, however, to sort out topics to avoid repetition wherever possible. Nevertheless, topics may be repeated in different areas. If there are repetitions, they are unintentional. Some of the original topics have been deleted where they have become dated.

In the original publication of A Thousand Topics for Composition, Marjorie E. Fox, the compiler, stated:

Because having something to say is the first requirement for good writing, the most constructive method of teaching composition is through an approach to subject matter. If a student has something to say he will be interested in saying it well so that he may transmit his ideas accurately and clearly to the reader. If he understands that the purpose of his writing is to convey experience and thought rather than to demonstrate sentence construction and the proper use of punctuation, his writing will have added interest and meaning. It is the teacher’s first job to convince the student that he has something worth saying.
Since the teacher's role is very important in preparing the student for the composition assignment, here are a few techniques that some teachers have found worthwhile in giving the student "something to say" so that he may be interested in writing a good composition.

Suggested Techniques

1. Ask students to bring in pictures of people from magazines or newspapers. Write a descriptive theme developing physical details, moods, and environmental blending elements.

2. Use a quotation, such as, "Great is the battle god, great, and his kingdom a field where a thousand corpses lie" (War's Kind by Crane). Students write their idea of the meaning, arouse strong feelings, persuade.

3. To get characterization in a theme, use some of Edgar Lee Master's poetic characterizations from Spoon River Anthology.

4. Use records, such as "Venus" (modern rock records or classical), to inspire students to write a mood or feeling received from same.

5. Use the five senses — feel something and write your reaction, or smell incense and develop an essay from your reaction.

6. Work with answers to literature questions to inspire writing. Much writing is stimulated through literature.

7. Use a newspaper subject, such as a notable person and write a "thumbnail" sketch of an actual event in the person's life.

8. Class discussion of Patriotism, Justice, Home, Truth, stopped at a proper moment might suggest some personal opinions to be written.

These few techniques are presented only as suggestions, not as the only techniques. These techniques may give a teacher an idea for some original presentation.

Miss Fox's statement which was repeated in A Thousand Topics for Composition should be quoted again:

> The groupings are somewhat arbitrary. The topics are listed according to subject matter, though the subjects for exposition have been broken up in some cases to indicate methods of treatment. It is hoped that this will be an added convenience for the teacher who assigns a theme with a particular method of development in mind. The lists do not include all kinds of treatment, and topics from one list could, if the writer chose, be developed to fit another pattern.

Two new areas have been added to this revision: "Philosophy" and "Literary Topics." The latter has been subdivided into "Individual Critical Analysis," "Comparison and Contrast," and "Creative Writing Paralleling Literary Works." Many of the suggested topics from the teachers indicate a growing interest in developing topics from the literature assignments in the classroom.

The teacher is encouraged to use these lists as a stockpile of ideas from which to formulate his own topics. Ideally, the best topics are usually those which have grown out of the classroom discussions.

PART II OF A THOUSAND TOPICS

This Bulletin is Part I of the revision of “A Thousand Topics for Composition.” Part II, prepared especially for the elementary level, by Professor Walter J. Moore, College of Education, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, will comprise the February issue of the Illinois English Bulletin. In addition to lists of topics for composition, many of which may be used by secondary school students as well as elementary, many motivational techniques are included. Both the January and February Bulletins should be of great interest to both teachers and students who many times have had to grope for appropriate topics.
