This publication lists, by major institution, 32 population information resources in the United States. Each entry provides name and location of center or library, person in charge; date established; number of staff; size of collection and acquisition rate; area of specialization; publications circulated; services offered, and whether or not the facility is equipped to handle outside requests. Personnel and organization indices are provided. (ED 050 961 is a preliminary listing of information sources outside the United States.) (JLB)
This publication was made possible through a grant from the Population Council of New York.

The serious problem of information storage and retrieval is not the storage but rather the retrieval; for what will it profit a man if he has the entire collection of the Library of Congress on the corner of his desk if he cannot effectively and efficiently gain access to its intellectual content?

The literature of family planning is published in many countries, in many languages, and in many formats. Yet the information these documents contain is vital to workers no matter where they are, to keep them from repeating work done elsewhere and to insure that good methods developed in one place are utilized in other places.

—Estelle Brodman
As separate services proliferate, grow, and succeed, the prospect for standardization and compatibility diminishes. There is clearly a need for national planning and coordination to insure, for all subject fields . . . adequate systems of bibliographic control.

—National Advisory Commission on Libraries
No separate library facilities; small reprint collection not open to public.
The twentieth century . . . has brought new pressures to bear upon the organizational processes of libraries, and at the same time new opportunities to develop and test new methods in the many special libraries that have been established . . .

Somewhere in the world there is a woman giving birth every minute. What we have to do is find that woman, and stop her.

—Population Expert (Anonymous)
The Population Studies Program at Duke University is a graduate training program in Sociology and Economics. The program's library consists of a collection of census reports and other books and materials housed in the research room used by Population Program Graduate Trainees. The library is not set up for circulation and is used primarily by trainees and staff connected with the graduate training program.
There is a certain irony in the fact that a culture, such as ours, which places such great emphasis upon science and extending the frontiers of knowledge, should view with such indifference the importance of organizing and servicing that knowledge in the most effective and efficient ways possible.

The difficulty seems to be, not so much that we publish unduly in view of the extent and variety of present day interests, but rather that publication has been extended far beyond our ability to make real use of the record.

But technological innovation does not have to be disruptive; it is not necessarily a hostile force dislocating comfortable routines. That librarians are deeply troubled by the new technology can be directly attributed to their devoting excessive attention to the techniques of their craft, and to their neglect of the fundamental questions that they should have been asking.

At present, the Population Studies Center does not have a library. The Center does have a collection of reference documents, including publications from the United States Census from 1900 to the present, United Nations documents, and selected censuses and vital statistics publications from foreign countries such as China and Pakistan.

The Population Studies Center has recently hired a librarian on a part-time basis, and plans to move its collection of reference documents to larger quarters this summer.

Librarianship must develop a sound research policy that is directed toward the solution of fundamental problems, not a series of statistical exercises in which counting and tabulating masquerade under the guise of scientific enquiry. Quantification and research are not synonymous, and the slavish following of a methodology, however good the design, does not guarantee valid results. Today, librarianship is not research-oriented, but it must become so if the why is properly to be related to the how.
