This manual identifies and discusses persons, organizations, or materials that may be of assistance to people involved in making changes in schools. The first part of the report begins with an overview of the issues and current concerns in schools, and it explores some short and long term strategies for system change. A discussion follows of how to use resources to enhance a school change program, inclusive of how to determine what kinds of resources would be most useful, where to locate them, and how to integrate them into a program. The balance of the presentation is given over to a listing of agencies or consultant firms, particularly those that have not received broad publicity, that offer a variety of resource assistance to groups working for change in their schools. Related documents are EA 004 668 and EA 004 669. (Author/JF).

Resources for School Change II: A Guide to School Administrators
While national attention is focused on the multitude of crises and dilemmas confronting our public educational system, many small and locally oriented groups of students, community members, teachers, administrators and others are working to create more viable and valuable learning environments in their own schools. Many of these educationally far-sighted persons are seeking to eliminate patterns of institutional racism and youth oppression, the seeds of much of the unrest in our educational institutions. This manual is written for them.

GUIDELINES FOR THE USE OF RESOURCES
Chapter I
Why a Manual on Resources?

This book is directed to people involved in making changes in schools. It is about RESOURCES: persons, organizations, or things which can be of assistance to you in your own school change efforts. This first part of the manual begins with an overview of the issues and concerns in schools today and some short- and long-term strategies for system change. Following that is a discussion of how you can use resources to enhance a school change program, including how to determine what kinds of resources would be most useful, locating them, and integrating them into your own program. That section may be used as an aid in planning and designing change strategies as well as a guide to the roles resource persons will play in them.

The second part consists of a listing of agencies or consultant firms which offer various resource assistance to groups working for change in their schools. In selecting these agencies, particular emphasis was given to some which have not received broad publicity—in some cases because their programs are focused in one or more local areas, in other cases because they have failed to gain national attention. We hope that our presentation of these agencies will be helpful to you in several ways:

1. that it will direct you to resources which can be of immediate service because they are applicable to the needs of your local situation;
2. that you will become aware of the kinds of resource agencies or consultant firms available so you may be able to find a local agency with similar services;
3. that by seeing several examples of the kinds of resources available in some areas, you may get some ideas about resources and services you would like to develop for your own community or school.

This RESOURCE MANUAL is a companion volume to two TRAINING MANUALS—one addressed to school administrators and teachers and the other addressed to consultants and nonprofessional change agents in the school and community (students and parents). Both of the training manuals focus on developing skills to bring about school change that will alter traditional norms of personal and institutional racism and youth oppression.

This manual will focus primarily on the use of resources which are available only outside of your local system: EXTERNAL RESOURCES. Of course, it may well be that an external resource provides the stimulus, training, etc. which will help you develop your own internal resources. Therefore, you will also find that this manual contains much that is relevant to your work with internal as well as external resources: many of the issues in the relationship between client (e.g., you) and resources are similar for both of these types. For example, for each type there are advantages and disadvantages which are based solely on the initial "inside-ness" or "outside-ness" of the resource. In dealing with external resources, this volume attempts to serve the following functions:

1. To provide a resource guide for those interested in programs which attempt to bring about school changes through the use of new techniques as the advocacy of the needs of oppressed interest groups and the constructive utilization of conflict;
2. To introduce the emerging understandings of school problems and new strategies for change, as well as resources, to aid others in becoming involved in change programs;
3. To stimulate thought on, and development of, local resources to fit the needs of specific local situations;
4. To underscore the importance of evaluating resources in terms of their appropriateness for serving local goals and change programs.
Chapter II
The School Scene: A Perspective

By way of introduction to the issues in resource utilization, let us explore several concepts which are central to understanding the current educational scene and any attempts to work for change within it. Few would deny that the questions and challenges being raised in public schools today have created an agonizing ordeal for all those concerned. Obviously, everyone of us, at the same time, can agree on answers and responses to the dilemmas at hand, and it is that disagreement (conflict) which frequently leads to confrontations (crises). Let's start with these:

CONFLICT AND CRISIS

Scenes of confrontation have become the standard diet of news from beleaguered school systems across the country...between administration and faculty; student and teacher; parent and educator; one community sector and another; citizen and government; black, white, and brown. We see these groups confronting each other in disagreement over community control; the processes of desegregation and integration, racism and race relations; student rights; teacher contracts; and the relevance and quality of instruction. These confrontations are usually labelled "crises" at the point when they force the shut-down of a school or when they interrupt the school's normal operating functions: whatever the issues in conflict, when the established decision-making mechanism becomes so threatened that it cannot function (or if it feels that it cannot function), it defines the situation as a crisis.

Moreover, it is through such "crises" that conflict is most visible and most easily transmitted on videotape and wire services. It is not surprising, then, that these "administrative crises" absorb much of the public's attention and concern. Nevertheless, there are only some of the more superficial manifestations of conflict and crises in our schools. The more pervasive underlying conditions which are the sources of daily pressures within the system and between the system and the community rarely catch... such attention. Issues in working conditions of style and competence of teachers; the lack of school structures responsive to creative teaching and learning; inimical and dehumanizing relations between white and non-white or young and old... these are complicated and slippery issues. They are not easily encapsulated in a 50 word—or 15 second—presentation. They don’t have simple solutions. By focusing solely on confrontations and their negative consequences one ignores the legitimacy of conflicting views on these tough and persistent problems. Such conflict is natural in an organization or system whose membership includes a heterogeneous mix of roles, interests, goals, life-styles, loyalties, motivations... races, generations, sexes—for example, a school. Conflicts arise as these different groups claim their fair share of rewards (prestige, status and power); when they compete for priority consideration of their goals and objectives; when they disagree about beliefs and customs; and when they fail to understand others—prejudice, miscommunication and the like. Recognition and appreciation of differences and the conflicts that normally ensue are necessary if pluralism is to prevail in an organization: by dealing openly with differences minority interests can be recognized and individual freedom protected.

To deny the existence of conflict is to deny the very nature of differences in pluralistic organizations; similarly, to “suppress” conflict... Clearly, it is in the political interest of some parts of the membership to do exactly that: casting conflict in a negative light is an effective strategy for maintaining power and control. If the public can be convinced that conflict is “bad” for schools—divisive, selfish, dangerous to students' physical welfare, counterproductive to learning, etc.—it follows that they can also be led to believe that the status quo is “good” and should not be challenged.

We have all heard the admonition, "Let’s keep politics out of schools" (...as if we had up to this point). This is no more than a tactic for de-legitimizing political priorities other than those currently in effect and the conflict attendant upon those old and new priorities. In fact,
"THE SCHOOL HAS ALWAYS BEEN A POLITICAL INSTITUTION"

As the mechanism for passing society's accumulated wisdom, norms and values on to new generations; the school has served important political functions in maintaining societal traditions and stability. Perpetuating the present social structure necessitates maintaining existing centers of power and control. It also requires the differential socialization of new generations into various roles in the economy and social life. These political needs support racist and oppressive practices in the face of much opposition and increasing pain to all parties in school conflict.

INSTITUTIONAL RACISM

While by continuing "business as usual," i.e., traditional routines and practices, an institution serves to perpetuate the conditions of majorities and minorities. Most American institutions, including schools, are dominated and controlled by whites and white middle-class values and norms. As an agent of socialization and social control, the school is in a position to be particularly influential in maintaining these standards and practices. Racist biases are clearly visible in school financing patterns, testing and grading procedures, curriculum and tracking systems, staffing patterns, and in the racial profile of the entire achievement structure.

YOUTH OPPRESSION

Institutional racism is not the only manifestation of efforts to maintain social stability—the status quo. School norms and roles also perpetuate adults, as a class of persons, in positions of unchallenged dominance over students, as another class, regardless of individual merit, style, talent or need. These norms, for lack of palatable justification, embrace distance, authority, corporal punishment, strict rule enforcement and other forms of control as legitimate means of retaining the power of the dominant group.

Both racism and the oppression of youth are responsible for daily crises in the lives of unknown members of students who "fail" in school, who are brutalized and battered by the school's execution of its responsibilities in perpetuating the "American way of life." As one might expect, these massive individual crises are not counted among the costs of operating our schools. Of course, these crises frequently lead to an interruption in the organizational routine and a point blank confrontation with the decision makers. Then we do begin to hear cries of "Crisis in our schools!", for at that point the current centers of power are threatened. Unfortunately, it is rarely revealed that such situations are a result of the consistent denial of basic conflict in the system and failure to redress these individual crises.

CONFLICT UTILIZATION

Conflict utilization requires the creation of organizational structures supportive of surfacing conflict in order to deal with it in meaningful ways before it escalates into crisis. This necessitates a perspective in which conflict is seen as a normal part of the organizational fiber and in which norms exist for contending groups to view problems with more clarity through group discussion and imaginative thinking, thus providing both the impetus and direction for change. Moreover, it is necessary to have structures which permit groups to contend with one another legitimately, and to be mutually responsible for outcomes. At times it is necessary to encourage or clarify the conflict among contending groups—in a sense, to escalate it—in order to enhance opportunities for dealing creatively with it. The processes of escalation and utilization can only be performed in a context of clear goals and their advocacy.

ADVOCACY

Advocacy involves the total commitment of a leader, resource person or group in utilizing conflict or whatever activities or conditions are in their constituency's best interest. As an acknowledged style of change agency, its "value-centricity" contrasts sharply from the value neutrality espoused and claimed by most professional roles: the advocate's purpose is to enhance, the status, rewards, prestige, and power of his clients or constituents. The transactions advocacy or the interests of established centers of societal power and control which appears in most supposedly neutral research, training and mediation is rarely exposed. Conscious advocacy probably leads to greater clarity about unmet needs and unsurfaced conflicts, permitting utilization and integration of conflicts at higher organizational levels. Advocacy undertaken for someone else or ambiguous advocacy, as in the case of an adult pressing the rights and partisan interests of juveniles, is somewhat risky, involving potential legal prosecution as well as conflicts with professional norms and ethics.

Power is in a sense a master variable. "Through it one can, or groups can, achieve control of their ends and of the distribution of rewards among many contending advocates. In schools, power is largely in the hands of adult whites; it is formally located in the administrative offices, informally servant to the established economic and political interests of our society. Not much influence is wielded by the clients of the educational process—the student and his parents; actually, very little is even available to faculty members. Unfortunately, some of the most devastating effects of this situation result from very subtle and, therefore, not easily identified techniques of power and control. For example, being in a position to define what does and does not constitute a "crisis" (administrative shut-down of the schools is, brutalization of students is not) ... and other rules of the game (students are failing school instead of schools are failing students) is a great advantage. The scene is set by definitions, and everyone must adapt to or work to overturn that definition in order to make changes.

Redistributing the power in schools through joint decision-making among contending groups might provide structural opportunities for conflicts to be surfaced and dealt with creatively before they escalate into organizational crises. For this to happen, intensive training programs for students, teachers and administrators are clearly needed. All involved would have to learn new skills and, more importantly, new roles initiated with another group—you will be developing your own sources of information and analytic capabilities, and you will be decreasing your dependence on other vested interests for information and interpretations.

Traditionally, distressed and alienated students have been the least powerful group in schools; they have been least able to advance their unique interests and preferences. Before students can effectively utilize this manual, they must be alienated and committed enough to do some organizing to change school conditions. Diagnosis is not hard to do; questions are not difficult to design, ask of people and interpret. Every day thousands read and listen to reports of statistics, many of which are reported in averages and percentages. Before approaching outside consultants, activists and concerned students can gather information on students' feelings (e.g., about racism and oppression) through a "questionnaire survey." Below is a sample of some questions that may be used.*

Have you personally known any persons to be punished unjustly? What were the circumstances around the incident? Who was involved? When?

Do you know of any teacher or administrator that has treated minority students unfairly? If so, what were the circumstances? Who was involved? When?

We are attempting to bring in outside consultants to ... (specify purpose). Would you be in favor of asking the administration to bring in such help?

[ ] Yes   [ ] No
The questions above are only a sample of questions that can be used to gather information. These could be augmented or changed in any way to fit your situation and needs.

If you decide to use these or an expanded series of questions in a "questionnaire survey" you must plan and be prepared to spend the time and money necessary for "coding the data" (i.e., preparing the information for analysis) and analyzing the results (i.e., adding up all the responses for each question and figuring the average response, and doing this for different sections of your sample—group responses by sex, age, race, grade, or curriculum and see if any differences show up), and also, writing up this large quantity of information so others can understand it. Keep in mind your purpose in gathering this information: to help you obtain the outside help you desire and need. Don't get involved in (or get talked into) more diagnostic research than is necessary for your purposes; work overload is a well-known stalling strategy.

It should not be too difficult to find people to assist with this diagnostic research. Interested students can take responsibility for different steps in the diagnostic process: designing the questionnaire (wording of the questions is a particularly sensitive task); selecting a representative "sample" of students to receive questionnaires (see Appendix A); administering the questionnaire or keeping track of questionnaires that have been filled out and turned in; coding the questionnaire data; designing and conducting open-ended interviews with some students (usually a smaller sample than would be receiving the questionnaire); producing materials (questionnaires, reports, etc.); and presenting the findings. You may be able to get some technical assistance from concerned teachers or local college students who have had some experience in doing this kind of research—or these people may be able to put you in touch with a sympathetic college faculty member who would be willing to lend his skills and talents to your effort.
Even during diagnosis, the process of change will have begun: as other students become involved in and aware of the research that you are doing, a political support base is being built for the proposals resulting from that research. In getting technical assistance from adults in order to do the diagnostic research, both of you will be learning to work together in new ways, with youth setting the goals and adults helping to work for them.

2. Strategies for Getting Resource Help

Armed with clear data you can prepare a description of your situation to go with proposed goals and objectives for change. Your findings and proposals can be circulated to the resources you contact for help and to groups within your school and community as you continue to seek support for your change.

Such reports should go to the student council (if you have one... and if you have one that works) for discussion, to faculty members and counselors, and then to the principal, parents, and, perhaps, board members. At each point you may gain support from new sources, and, with some luck, financial commitment to your proposals. Failure to obtain just consideration from the principal indicates the need to organize support in the community (parents, PTA and other organizations). Care in the selection of community targets is important, for in some communities parents and community organizations are not supportive and responsive to student issues and concerns. Try and reach those who can provide support at the school board: such support will be highly critical later. In presenting your "case" before the school board, be clear about how the diagnosis was conducted—facts and examples—and the recommendations you are making for board help. Try not to be arrogant or demanding; try to win over, not alienate, potential allies on the board.

Failure to obtain consideration from the board warrants escalated demonstrative action. All demonstrations should be carefully planned. Participants should be thoroughly informed before hand of the problems and risks involved in a demonstration. and what such risks are expected to accomplish. Again, utilize the school magazine, bulletin boards, flyers and leaflets, posters, banners, slogans and "rapping" to other students during recess and between classes; their support and cooperation is crucial. Students involved in such demonstrations should recognize the dangers—the threat of punishment, newspapers' distortion of the facts, friends giving in to parental pressures, and threats by the teachers and administration. They should also keep in mind that the more students who demonstrate their legitimate concern, the less the punishment and the greater the possibility of success.

The demonstration itself doesn't have to be a walk out. Staying in school yet boycotting a class or certain classes during certain parts of the day can be effective too. In most states it is not against the law to stay in school yet boycott classes, while it is against the law not to be in school. During the boycott students can hold their own classes, informing students of the current state of affairs, "rapping" on racism and oppression in the school and formalizing strategies for increased pressures on the administration and school board.

If you do decide to go outside the school, have a written statement for the local newspaper and TV stations to keep facts about your situation from being distorted. Do not let the media "stage" activities for you and carefully control who talks to them. Also, your demonstration must be well organized; there must be a commitment on the part of all students involved to behave according to pre-established rules and regulations (e.g., no violence, trashing or provoking of police).

If you are already involved in a protest movement and cannot wait to diagnose the situation as extensively as outlined above, then one of the student demands should be that students serve on a committee to bring in outside researchers. This is important because of the partisan nature of research; consultants who will support students' partisan interests should be chosen.
It is quite likely that you will have to take major responsibility in locating the money needed to finance such outside help and/or your change program. Financial resources are always difficult to obtain, although there are hundreds of foundations and governmental agencies that are in the business of funding. More often than not the bureaucratic "clog" frustrates and deters those seeking financial support. Appendix 3 of this resource manual lists a few national organizations and federal government offices that provide special "brokering" services in locating funds for programs sponsored by minorities and students. MOST, HOWEVER, DO NOT HAVE FUNDS THEMSELVES.

Before contacting outside funding resources, it might be more appropriate to exhaust local resources. For instance:

1. The use of your own questionnaire survey data, as described above, may result in an allocation of money by your board of education.

2. If the school system claims it does not have the necessary funds to respond to your request for outside help, get them to agree in principle to your proposals, then take your data to some community group or organization (such as Model Cities, CEO, or community mental health centers) and present your case. Solicit funds from them directly or get their help in submitting a proposal to another funding agency.

3. Find interested teachers who are willing to support a student request that the school board allocate money to be shared, for example, among teachers, students, and some community group (e.g., PTO). Possession of their own—although small—budget increases the power of these groups by enabling them to contract directly with outside consultants and other resources. It also stimulates the formation of teacher-student-parent coalitions to work for improved quality education.
3. What Adults Can Do To Help

Parents have more power than students but often less than those who run and are involved in the school. Nevertheless, there are a number of ways you can be helpful in reaching new resources for school change. Parents may try to teach students how to do diagnoses, as outlined above. You may also follow up on rumors of students’ being treated unfairly or inappropriately. Parents can formulate questions to ask students who have experienced unfairness and get them to describe what happened, including times, dates, places and the specific outcomes. It is important to be specific and to document a series of incidents. Take your findings to the principal—often a parent’s inquiry will receive more rapid attention than that of a student. A group of parents may want to submit a statement suggesting that the school contact an outside consultant in order to make a thorough diagnosis of problems.

When racial and/or intergenerational strife erupts in school, parents can organize and demand to be involved in the decision to bring in outside consultants. You may also act independently and hire a consultant directly. The basic question for parents is whether or not you will organize to support students’ grievances and concerns. Allow too often adults—even well intentioned adults—“take over” a student movement.

Teachers and administrators also can utilize some of the above strategies in working with students. Educators have access to their professional associations for various kinds of support and help. Administrators, who are usually more powerful, have more resources at their disposal, yet administrators often find it difficult to act upon students’ demands or even their own values because of countervailing pressures from the community and their peers. Often in the face of crises, most of you (and other adults, of course) attempt to de-escalate that condition through repression or co-optation of dissenters. Too often you as administrators agree to token solutions without addressing yourselves to the underlying problems that brought on the crisis situation. When you might wisely opt to think through the opportunities for quality educational changes that are possible under such conditions, you frequently find yourself overwhelmed by the pressures from community forces, fears of losing esteem and/or his position, and hampered by lack of immediate knowledge of specific strategies and alternatives. Thus, we also often find that schools are re-opened in a matter of hours or days, with the real causes of the crisis still intact and ripe for building toward an even greater disruption. In large urban areas such schools are often kept open with the presence of monitoring devices (security police, television spy cameras, locked and sometimes chained doors) and the threat of legal and physical punishment to those who “step out of line” (detention rooms, suspensions and expulsions, corporal punishment), all of which result in spiraling educational costs to taxpayers.

More meaningful and creative administrative training programs help free-up the administrator from his traditional role and provide him with new skills so that he may bring broadly agreed upon values into congruence with his own behavior as he relates to students and other groups in the school and community. Such training programs encompass political strategies of leadership for change; e.g., understanding the partisan nature of research and being willing to use it as such can enhance a wise administrator’s political advantage in school change; also, being aware of those critical periods during times of high tension when the board of education is most open to administration proposals for basic school change. Both teachers and administrators can learn to utilize conflict to develop support for long-term system change activities.
Chapter IV

The Many Faces of a Resource

As you would tailor a change program to fit the specific needs of your situation, so should you choose a resource capable of serving the specific needs of your change program. In this section we begin to define some general categories of resources, emphasizing those distinguishing characteristics which you can use to determine whether or not you will need that kind of resource. Different kinds of resources serve different purposes; you may seek out a resource to get: (1) information, (2) help in doing a diagnosis; (3) help in planning or implementing your change program, (4) training in new skills, (5) the political impact of a prestigious "outsider," (6) someone to commiserate with, or (7) all of the above. Because all of these—and more—kinds of resources are available, you will want to define as clearly as possible your particular resource needs.

What follows is a descriptive list of resource-types. In compiling it we have borrowed heavily from the work of many educational, social, and political theorists who have given a great deal of thought to classifying "resources" in terms of the roles and strategies used by each. A lengthy and abstract analysis of each kind of resource is not our purpose in this manual. The list does attempt to provide useful information about types of resources, including (a) a general name for the resource-type, (b) a very brief statement about the typical role or strategy utilized by such a resource, and (c) some ideas about what to expect from or beware of in your relationship with that particular kind of resource. This list is intended as a guide to help you to define your resource needs and to recognize and evaluate the services offered by any specific resource.

1. the ADVOCATE
   a) may use various techniques in fulfilling his open commitment to the promotion of the interests (status, rewards, prestige, power...) of a specified group.
b) an acknowledged "value centric"—as opposed to a "value neutral"—stance; i.e., he has clear values of his own which he will announce and work for.

c) okay if on your side; groups with competing/conflicting values or interests will not appreciate this role on behalf of their competition.

d) "establishment advocates," particularly, may be cloaked in using any of the other names listed below; i.e., the cloak is not necessarily visible or deliberate; frequently even the resources themselves confuse their promotion of system maintaining programs with "value neutrality."

2. the GROUP TEAM

a) group effort whose strategy usually consists of a mix of human relations, advocacy, negotiation and organizational change and development techniques to bring about short- and long-term school change.

b) team composition may reflect a demographic mix (by age, race, sex) similar to that of the client system, and, through its various members, works directly with the several contending groups in a system, often spending time initially in developing needed skills within the separate groups (e.g., multiple styles and strategies that students can use in advocating their partisan interests).

c) relationships among team members themselves are susceptible to the same conflicts which exist among the contending groups they represent or serve.

d) when a local "change team" is developed, the interface of the team with the rest of the system—the interaction of individual team members with their respective constituencies—is a key factor in the team's continuing usefulness. Frequent sources of difficulty occur in the interfacing, especially in trust, communication, transfer of skills and value and goal differences.

3. the CURRICULUM DEVELOPER

a) develops material for use by non-experts

b) materials are, at least to some extent, pre-packaged

4. the HUMAN RELATIONS TRAINER

a) focuses on roles, phases of development and interpersonal interaction within groups through intentionally unstructured development process.

b) because understanding is derived from examining common experiences and the behavior of participants as it unfolds in the situation, the lesson is an unusually personal and vivid one.

c) general goals include developing a climate of openness and inquiry that frees the individual to think about his behavior, to expand his awareness of human interaction, to change his behavior through expanded self-discovery, and to make clearer choices about the action he takes.
emphasis on interpersonal interaction may lead to inadequate consideration of equally real political constraints in the life situation outside the group; i.e., success in changing individuals' attitudes or skills does not guarantee the ability to behave differently nor subsequent structural change in on-going organizations of which those individuals are members.

5. the MEDIA (literature, films, recordings, newspapers, etc.)

a) when used to bring outside information to those involved in the change programs are extremely useful as supplemental resources (e.g., to stimulate, to emphasize, to provide broader perspective, to link to the outside, etc.)

b) when used to publicize your program to the broader community the media are frequently less than helpful; e.g., selected or disparaged, coverage in newspapers, T.V., and radio. To minimize this, have carefully prepared written news releases available for reporters.

c) for whichever purpose media are used, remember: variety is the spice of media utilization, and overuse leads to saturation.

6. the MANAGEMENT TRAINEE

a) focuses on administrative processes and roles in an attempt to improve the communication and influence skills of leaders.

b) assumes that because managers occupy key power positions, their growth and change can alter dramatically the entire organization.

c) focus assumes the basic soundness of the institutional structure in which the managerial process and roles exist.

d) highly dependent on the motivation and commitment of those being trained.

7. the MEDIATOR

a) attempts to act as a neutral "third party" in trying to bring about acceptable compromises between competing interest groups.

b) particularly when formal negotiations are involved, an impartial result will be more likely if each interest group possesses relatively equal power (skills, flexibility and freedom) in the bargaining scene.

8. MONEY

a) may be hard to come by.

b) usually available if you look hard, in the right places (see pages 16-18 and Appendix B), and draw up a budget carefully.

c) some funding sources cater to specific interest/mng groups.

d) control of the budget for a change program is usually synonymous with controlling the goals of the change program.
e) not as important as it sounds; a lot can be done with a little (experience shows the reverse also to be true); stressing the importance of money may provide a cop-out... "We hardly have enough money to keep the schools open. We can't be spending what precious little we have on change programs. Therefore we can't change!"

f) money may co-opt... you may end up trying to design fundable changes instead of trying to fund important changes.

9. the ORGANIZATIONAL DEVELOPER

a) takes both a planned and long term perspective toward organizational change and generally focuses on organizational members rather than organizational structures, technology, or its relationship to the larger social environment outside the organization.

b) generally takes as his client the total organization and is directly responsible to the formally legitimized authorities of the organization. In this capacity usually accepts the organizational goals of these authorities as given.

c) focuses on all aspects of the human organization (e.g., formal and informal communication and influence; satisfaction and effectiveness; and conflict).

10. the OUTSIDE AGITATOR

a) more often apparent than real; the label "outside agitator" often is used by those possessing power as a diversionary tactic (to distract attention from issues) and/or to de-legitimize the advocate of a low power group.

b) a special type of advocacy, often used effectively to build group consciousness and cohesiveness within oppressed groups and to link to external groups having similar issues.

c) a conflict escalating strategy.

11. the PROBLEM SOLVER

a) a systematic process designed to find solutions for problems facing an individual, group or organization.

b) useful only in the context of certain prescribed rules and regulations, the first being that all parties must be able to reach agreement regarding what the "problem" is.

c) attempts to instill skills so internal people can do it themselves.

12. the RESEARCHER/DIAGNOSTICIAN

a) skills can be particularly useful in diagnosing the problem/needs of the situation in a school or system, in training local people to conduct the diagnosis themselves, or in providing expert information on diagnostic research of comparable situations.
b) needed for evaluation of the effectiveness of any change strategies implemented.

c) is a political tool; the process of research is neither "value neutral" (e.g., issues chosen, questionnaire designs and sample selections bias findings) nor without an impact of its own (e.g., absorbing time, money, and attention which might be spent on other phases of the change effort).

13. the SPEAKER

a) prestige source of information; on the basis of specialization or breadth in training and/or experience, or credentials.

b) can be used for cooling off or stirring up the local scene.

c) relationship with client system is usually limited to a "one-shot" appearance; in fact, frequently unavailable for a long term relationship.

14. the TEACHER TRAINER

a) focuses on teacher role in learning process, but may emphasize attitudes, skills and/or peer processes of teacher and students.

b) highly dependent on motivation and commitment of those being trained.

c) lack of structural support in the system for such training programs or for the newly (re-) trained teacher is a frequent source of failure in the long term.

15. the TRAINER OF CHANGE AGENTS

a) works with selected individuals committed to bringing about change in the system with the goal of transferring self-renewal capacity to the system through the development of local talent.

b) commonly uses aspects of several of the styles listed above.
Chapter V

Developing a Working Relationship With Outside Resources

Resources do not necessarily come pre-packaged into "pure" types as suggested in the proceeding list. In fact, they are more likely to possess a mix of perspectives, styles, techniques, strategies—and impact! As you communicate with prospective resources, compare the above descriptions with what the resources are saying about themselves, their perspectives, and their work. Be especially sure to find out...

- Is the resource's focus consistent with the goals of your change program?
- Is the resource's style compatible with your own?
- Is the resource's strategy appropriate for the political situation in your system?

The relationship between external resources and local personnel can become problematic at any number of points during their work together, particularly when there is a lack of understanding and clarity at the outset of what each can expect of the other. As a rule of thumb, it is a good idea to have a contractual agreement on paper describing any of the resource's services which are to be provided and any remuneration which is to be given in the future. For the protection of both the resource and yourself, this document should be very clear on points such as the following:

- What group or groups would the resource be working for? Accountable to? What group or groups would the resource be working with? Have access to? Will the resource be identified with one group to the detriment of an ability to do needed work with other groups? For example, since loyalty to the administration may inhibit an effective consultancy, it may be necessary to arrange for the resource to serve as the agent of a different, multiple, or "no special" interest group. (A word of caution: the last usually ends up being the one paying the bills.)

- How much time will the resource be devoting to working with your program? How frequently and over what period of time? At what point in the change program does the work of the resource begin?

- Whose agenda is going to get worked in the resource-client relationship? Will the resource unequivocally serve the goals you've established for your program? Do your needs fit into some of the general goals of the resource? If your goals differ, can some compromise be reached in the working relationship?
How will over-dependency on the resource be avoided? Withdrawal traumas (problems in maintaining the continuity of the program as the relationship with the external resource is being terminated) minimized? What new roles and skills will you have acquired to enable you to carry on the program?

How, when and for what reasons can this contract be re-negotiated, and performance of both parties be checked?

Probably the most important purpose that such a contract will serve is that of forcing you and the resources to do some detailed planning. It will stress clarity of your mutual interpretation of the problem diagnosis and your commitment to and expectations for the change program. Be tough with yourself and the resource you would work with by demanding specificity in goals, strategies for reaching those goals, and commitment to the program. You will have no trouble finding barriers to your change efforts without adding the problems caused by lack of clarity or agreement on basic problem definitions, goals and directions. This may require that you and the resource confront one another around differences and do some hard negotiating to resolve those—excellent practice for the work ahead!

A very important issue in the relationship of the outside resources to groups in the local system is the integration of "external" and "internal" resources used in the change effort. Good coordination between these types of resources can be a major source of strength in a change program. Poor coordination—as when external and internal resources duplicate each other's services or contribute disparate and conflicting "help"—is equally disastrous. Internal resources alone often are not technically capable of filling all the needs of your change program. You may wisely determine to seek outside resources to serve some of your change goals. Nevertheless, be cautious: internal resources frequently tend to be under-valued and under-utilized. Experience shows that when we turn too quickly to outside expertise before first exploring those resources already existing in the system, the change program can lose money, lose time in orienting the resource to the unfamiliar program (and vice versa), and most importantly, lose the support and cooperation of internal resources which could have (or think they could have) served just as well.
Throughout this manual we have stressed caution in seeking out and selecting resource assistance, and we have catalogued numerous potential pitfalls and difficulties in working with resources. This manual itself is one example of an outside resource you might use, the advice given applies to it, too! Proceed with caution... but by all means, proceed!
PART II

ILLUSTRATIVE RESOURCES
REGARDING THE FOLLOWING LIST OF ORGANIZATIONS

This section consists of a list of agencies or consultant firms which offer various resource assistance to groups working for change in their schools. In compiling this manual, letters and questionnaires were sent to over 500 organizations whose work we knew personally—albeit in many cases only casually—or who were recommended by other organizations we had contacted. In the effort to locate resources which might be of service to local groups working to change their schools we did not limit the search to “educational” organizations. A copy of our letter and questionnaire are included in Appendix C so that you may see what information was requested of the organizations listed in this manual. These documents are also made available as samples for your use as you gather information on other resources.

Some of the resources noted in this manual can serve as training agents to local groups who may wish to plan and implement their own change efforts once the appropriate skills are acquired. Others may be used in more long-range, or on-going ways, in which there is close contact between the local group and outside consultant for the duration of a change effort. Still others can be viewed as supplemental to efforts already underway.

For those agencies who returned the questionnaire we are able to provide detailed information, based on their responses and the additional material that many of them sent to us describing their goals and purpose, program and fees. The questionnaire responses provided information on (1) the kinds of resources available (literature, films, speakers); (2) what—if any—limitations there were on the groups to whom these resources would be available (students, community members, teachers, etc.); (3) whether or not a fee would be charged for any of the resources or to any of the groups; (4) any geographical limits on the availability of their resources; and (5) their specific ability to provide financial support for local programs initiated by any group.

The format we have chosen for presenting the organizational information covers all of this information to the extent that it was provided by the organization. By filling in the adjacent circle, we have indicated which of a standard list of resources the agency provides, which of a standard list of client groups might utilize their resources, and whether a fee would be charged for or to any of those. For example:

<tr>

<tbody>
<tr>

<td>Film</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Recordings</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Speakers</td>
<td>0</td>
</tr> </tbody>

According to this sample, the agency can provide literature, speakers, and short-term consultants or trainers. The literature is free, but there would be a charge for the other two services, possibly travel expenses and an honorarium. If the agency sent us any more specific information about their fees, this would be included later.

<tr>

</tr> </tbody>

This second agency's resources are available to community members, teachers, school administrators, other professional school staff and boards of education. Fees would apply only to certain of these groups: teachers, school administrators and other professional school staff. In fact, many of the actual agencies do indicate that their fees are flexible, and depend upon a group's ability to pay. In such cases, this also would be indicated in an "Additional Information" section.

Thus, in the following hypothetical example: School Change, Inc.

Additional information:
Free price list available on request.

School Change has literature, films, records and speakers which are available to all groups listed, all on a nation-wide basis, and all for a price. You would need to get in touch with their man, I.M. Johnson, for that free price list. Either write him at the School Change address or phone, area code: 000, and the number 000-0000.

Following the annotated list of resources is another list: the addresses of many organizations from which we had no further information at the time of publication. You may want to contact some of these yourself and learn about their services as you explore potential resources for your change program. In doing so, refer to the text of this manual (especially Chapters III and IV) and the questionnaire in Appendix C as guides in planning the information you will want to get from each resource.
We wish to stress that the inclusion of an agency in either of these lists is not an endorsement; it has been printed strictly for your convenience. Likewise, the exclusion of an agency does not necessarily imply our disapproval of its work. In-depth evaluation of each resource has not been possible in the design of this manual. We encourage the use of the evaluation guidelines provided in the proceeding section when considering work with these or any other external resources.

Additional Information:
The program of the Center combines service to schools and individuals, graduate study, and research in the attempt to create educational environments that are more responsive to the psychological dimensions of youth -- in contrast to the traditional emphasis on cognitive learning, often at the expense of affective development. Client groups may be charged for the Center's resources. Curricula on "Self" and "Racism Elimination and Racial Awareness for Whites" are currently being developed.

Dayton, Ohio 45408

The purpose of the Network is to enter school systems during pre- and post-crisis conditions to engage in a variety of activities, namely: research, diagnosis, inservice training for administrators, teachers, students and other auxiliary professional groups. It also works with parents and community groups. It works with the above groups to help schools combat racism, to assist in the development of more relevant curricula and to encourage democratic decision-making. The nature of the service contract is left to individual directors.

Additional Information:
A cooperative effort with the Mott Foundation, NCECD assists in the development and expansion of community education programs in the region. The Center provides basic information on community education to interested individuals and groups, and consultant services to explore the possibility of implementing the community school concept. Limited financial assistance is provided to a few school districts toward becoming demonstration centers in community education. Leadership development programs including in-service seminars, university courses, workshops and training materials--are conducted to train community school leaders.

The special assistant served as the principal liaison between the Spanish surnamed community and the Assistant Secretary, and developing an expanded program of activities relating to health which will best serve the interest of Spanish surnamed Americans. A major goal is increased community participation in health matters and meaningful utilization of Federal programs and resources to resolve health needs. The Special Assistant has contacted public officials, educators, students, community representatives and others seeking information and assistance on health related matters.

SIMPLE PROCEDURE FOR RANDOM SAMPLING
Random Sampling

When conducting a questionnaire survey (or interview survey, for that matter) it is usually feasible to contact only a small portion of the student body (teaching staff, etc., whatever "population" you are surveying). In order to ensure that your results are valid, i.e., reflect accurately as possible the responses you would get if you contacted the entire population, the questionnaires must be filled out by a representative sub-population: a "sample." Representatives in a sub-population is ensured by random selection of the total population you want to study: random sampling!

Points to Remember in Selecting Your Random Sample:

1. The size of your sample in a questionnaire survey of students should be no less than 10% of the total number of students in your school. For example:
   - If there are 1,500 students in the school, you should distribute questionnaires to at least 150 of them.

2. Perhaps the easiest way to get random selection of names to include in your survey is to use an alphabetical list of all students in the school. If you can, get permission from the principal to use the student roster for your school. Explain what you are attempting to do and solicit his help—or have someone else approach him with more political pull. If you are unable to get access to this "master list," your student directory or homeroom lists can be used.

3. To get a sample of 10% of the students, take every tenth name on this alphabetical list (10% of the student body = 1/10 of the student body, or one out of every ten students).* It is important that every one of those selected does fill out the questionnaire or your findings will be vulnerable to attack.

*If you want to sample 20% of the students, you would need to use every fifth name on the list (20% = 1/5, or one out of every five students), and so on....
4. You can also get more elaborate with this procedure: for example, by dividing your alphabetical list by grade level and taking every tenth person within each grade, you will achieve a proportional representation of the grades in your school. Further, if there is a small percentage of minority students in the school (e.g., 20% or less) you may want to have all of them fill out questionnaires. In that case, be sure to strike their names from the master list. Your findings would be challenged if there were any duplication of people in the two samples.
APPENDIX B
BROKERING AGENCIES
Some of the agencies listed in this appendix may be able to assist you in locating financial support for your change program. In most cases, these agencies DO NOT HAVE MONEY FOR FUNDING, but are experienced in finding places that can support interesting programs. The list contains only a suggestive sample of agencies that may provide a brokering source. Such services may also be available to you through various organizations in your own community.
APPENDIX C

LETTER AND QUESTIONNAIRE
SENT TO RESOURCE ORGANIZATIONS
Included in this appendix is a sample copy of the letter and questionnaire we sent to the various agencies or consultant firms throughout the nation. The lack of time prevents us from following up on those agencies which were slow in returning their questionnaires. The list of agencies and consultant firms included is by no means complete. Yet we feel that the entry forms and select listings coupled with the conceptual issues and strategies for utilizing resources can be of value to various groups seeking help. The enclosed letter and questionnaire (and just a phone call) can facilitate your resource capability by collecting more detailed information on the agencies and consultant firms listed or not included in this manual.
Dear

The Educational Change Team has contracted with the U.S. Office of Education to produce a manual of resources which are available to local groups interested in effecting quality change in secondary schools. It is hoped the Resource Manual will fulfill several purposes:

1. Serve as a resource guide to those interested in programs which attempt to bring about school change through the use of such techniques as the advocacy of the needs of oppressed interest groups, and the constructive utilization of conflict;

2. Introduce new strategies for change, as well as resources to aid those as yet uninvolved in such programs;

3. Stimulate thought on, and the development of, local resources to fit the needs of specific local situations;

4. Present ideas on how to determine what resources might best fill local needs.

The manual will consist of two major sections: 1) a general discussion of the issues involved in the use of outside resources; and 2) annotated lists of organizations offering action and/or research, as well as financial, resources. In the second part of the manual we expect to include, in addition to educational organizations, some local, regional and national groups whose work has involved them in issues similar to those faced in public education, and whose resources would benefit those working primarily for educational change.

We would like your permission to list your organization in the manual. In order for us to do this, it would be helpful if you would send us descriptive information about: 1) the organization, including its goals and purposes; and 2) the kinds of resources it can provide to various groups (e.g., students, teachers, administrators, community).

For your convenience, we have enclosed a form on which to indicate such information. Please complete the form and return it with any descriptive brochures or literature you might have available. Our annotation on your organization will be a compilation of the information from these two sources.

School of Education - The University of Michigan
As it is presently constructed, the Educational Change Team has two major components. The first, sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, is the Network on Educational Unrest. This action arm of the Team has worked over the past year to establish a network of regional teams able to act, when called, into local crisis situations. The second major component of the ECT is a project funded by the National Institute of Mental Health to conduct research in selected schools throughout the nation that are experiencing different levels of conflict and crisis. The focus of this research is to examine in depth the causes of crisis and overt conflict, or their absence, in these schools.

Based on our research and experience in this area, we have concluded that school crisis and conflict may be traced to two major underlying causes: institutional racism; and the lack of control that oppressed groups, particularly students, have over their own lives in school. We feel that in order to deal with these issues, there must be both consultant advocacy for the interest of oppressed groups, and the constructive use of, rather than the suppression of, the conflict inherent in any organization composed of various interest groups.

As may be seen from the above, one of our primary interests is to indicate ways in which local groups outside of professional education (e.g., students and community members) may obtain the resources they need to promote their interests. The enclosed form requests information about the kinds of resources your organization might have available to student and community. Also, we welcome supplemental information or comments on this issue.

Thank you for your consideration and cooperation; we look forward to hearing from you.
ORGANIZATIONAL INFORMATION FORM

Please fill out this form in addition to sending us your own material about the organization. Several of the items below specify the kind of supplementary information which would aid us in compiling the resource manual. Also, if you have any other materials that you think would be helpful, please include them, too.
