This guide outlines a four-year program of Latin instruction which may be used on either the elementary or high school levels. Although the program is designed to develop all four language skills--reading, writing, listening, speaking--emphasis is placed on reading comprehension. The course also provides for an introduction of Roman culture and civilization and its contributions to Western civilization and literature. Each of the four levels corresponds to one year of the sequence. Five basic areas are covered at each level--phonology, morphology, syntax, vocabulary, culture--with one optional topic which may concentrate on linguistic contributions or outside reading. A section on evaluation criteria for each level is included, as well as a bibliography of audiovisual resources. (DD)
A GUIDE FOR LATIN

Preliminary Edition

Department of Public Instruction

Bismarck, North Dakota
FOREWORD

There is strong agreement that the study of a foreign language, contemporary or classical, should have an integral place in the school curriculum and be available to all American elementary and secondary students whether or not they plan to continue their study programs in colleges or universities.

All foreign languages, classical and modern, share common goals and techniques of instruction. In outlining the guide for Latin, the basic learning skills of listening, speaking, reading, and writing needed in a modern language will be developed for Latin; however, since the main objective in the teaching of Latin is for reading and comprehension and since verbal communication is not a goal in itself as in modern languages, the time sequences for each skill should be adjusted.

This guide is not a methodology textbook; materials of this nature are available to the teachers from other sources. Nor can a publication for foreign language teachers of the State become a course of study to establish local guidelines for coverage of material. It is a guide that will assist the teacher and administrator build a better language program.

The representative committee of Latin teachers who prepared this publication hope that it will be considered as a preliminary edition, and enable teachers to use it on a trial basis with the opportunity to make suggestions for a later edition which will become part of the State Guide for Foreign Languages.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The planning, writing, and production of any curriculum guide is an undertaking which requires the devoted thinking and long-time concern and attention of teachers who are interested in the education of children.

The creation of a guide in a subject area such as Latin also requires constant checking and revisions in planning and writing, to keep pace with changing trends in instruction and in materials.

North Dakota has been fortunate in having a committee, appointed for this task, whose members have been equal to the need and have contributed generously of their time and their knowledge to produce this new guide.

Members of the committee are:

Mrs. Marie M. Feidler, Chairman
Grand Forks Public Schools

Miss Lois Forrest
Fargo Public Schools

Mr. Edward Axtmann
Mandan Public Schools

Mrs. Ruth Grimsrud
Bismarck Public Schools

Mr. Neil C. Souther
Bismarck Public Schools

Appreciation is also extended to those foreign language teachers in North Dakota schools who assisted the committee.

INTRODUCTION

The objectives for Latin and modern languages are basically the same. Even though modern languages are generally considered in one category and Latin in another, there are often more similarities between the two programs than differences. Parts I and II of this Guide are an indication of this. The stated objectives are basically the same; it is mainly in the points of emphasis that the contrast arises. Since there are some differences in principles and practices, and also because there are developments in Latin instruction which deserve attention, this section is prepared as an addendum to accompany the statement of scope, content and sequence for Latin.

Students in a Four-Level Latin program will have the following general objectives:

I. To master linguistic skills necessary for reading with comprehension.

II. To read selections from Latin literature, progressing from relatively easy adaptations to original writings of lesser and great Latin authors.

III. To learn about the Roman people and their culture.

IV. To learn about and be able to appraise the contribution of the Roman language and culture to Western civilization.

Students who undertake less than a Four-Level sequence will work towards the same objectives modified to suit their level. It will be noted that they involve concomitant activities which are closely interwoven, so that no matter how long a student continues to study Latin he will work in all four areas. Within any period of time allotted and within his own capabilities, the student will develop skills to read continuous Latin writings. He will learn about the Roman people and their life, and he will develop an awareness of what is meant by our Roman heritage.
PHILOSOPHY

In over two thousand years in the history of Western civilization, not one day has elapsed that students have not been engaged in the study of Latin. That this immortal language continues to excite the minds of youth after such a long period of time is a vigorous argument for continuing Latin studies. Nonetheless we live in a time which favors pragmatism rather than the mystique of age. So it becomes the important duty of Latin teachers to explain why this most ancient of "area studies" of the Western world, although no longer "the" basic subject of American schools, still merits being "one" of the basic subjects of the high school curriculum. Latin teachers must present with clarity the immense benefits to be derived from the study of Latin which combines within itself the cultural, and in most cases, the linguistic roots of Western civilization.

The study of Latin introduces the student to a method of study which, in most cases, is unlike that of any other course he is likely to encounter. Because of Latin’s highly inflectional character, the student must train himself to pay attention to detail in order to grasp meaning. This places a great importance on accuracy in diagnosing precise meaning. Effective language study taxes the memory of the student since, in order to succeed, he must constantly review material learned in order that it become second nature. This type of study, in its sequential nature, can prepare the student, often for the first time, in a methodical, detailed, and painstaking type of mental training which combats the vagueness so often prevalent in American education.

Although some have argued that English grammar is not Latin grammar and, therefore, the study of English grammar should be restricted to the English classroom, the fact is that students are often introduced to formal grammatical terminology for the first time in the Latin classroom where linguistic discipline must come into play. Since Latin grammar differs enough from English, some form of grammatical analysis is essential. Although it is true that linguistic discipline can be taught by the occasional brilliant teacher of English or modern foreign languages, it still remains primarily the Latin teacher’s responsibility to introduce grammar by that most effective of teaching devices: comparison. It is this device that the English teacher does not have at hand. There is an immediate double result from this type of training in grammar. The capable student of Latin becomes very aware of the nature of the structure of the new language and his own, and gains an increased consciousness of the basic nature of language itself: this student moves out of the dark region of linguistic provincialism.

To people who speak English the study of Latin vocabulary is of basic value. It is the civilizing half of English vocabulary which is derived from Latin. This difficult portion of English involves words essential for expressing concepts of life in scientific and abstract terms. It is obvious, therefore, that the careful study of Latin vocabulary will aid the educated man in expressing himself with precision, accuracy, and sensitivity.

Aside from being a major source of English vocabulary, Latin is the parent language of the Romance languages. During the calm and orderly presentation of the sophisticated structural characteristics of a language which no longer changes, the Latin student acquires a splendid base for further language study. This is particularly true for the Romance languages and also those which have a highly developed inflectional system.

In this age of specialization Latin also sheds its golden influence among those students of higher studies in specialized areas. From a very practical point of view, although sometimes not required, it should be obvious that Latin studies should be definitely recommended to those pursuing professions in many fields. A knowledge of Latin must prove of high vocational value to future lawyers, scientists, those in the field of theology, teachers of languages, or, in fact, to anyone desirous of obtaining a general culture.

No less important is Latin literature, an immense literary accomplishment of astounding variety. With the possible exception of ancient Greece, Latin has authors equal to the greatest of other countries and ages. This literature, which encompasses centuries from the earliest classical authors to those of the medieval period, has made the Western world heir to a vast cultural heritage. Since the great Latin literary achievements do not translate well, their aesthetic beauties must be appreciated in the original. The great works of Latin literature, written with assiduous care by authors who paid great attention to style and detail, will offer the student a valuable experience in literary appreciation. Because they are the literary roots of our Western culture, a background in Latin and Greek literature and mythology becomes indispensable to any serious student of Western literature.

Besides the linguistic and cultural values that the study of Latin affords the student, its historical values must be taken into account. For modern Americans, although a sense of depth in culture and language is important, equally important is the development of a conception of the present based on the past. Because of the emphasis of some modern educational philosophies on adjusting the student to society at a given moment in the present, there is a tendency towards a provincialism in time. Latin, in its literature and other manifestations of Roman culture, has left an important imprint on the historical foundations of Western civilization. Because of this, the individual student's comprehension of the significance of the civilizations of classical antiquity should be developed as fully as possible in the American curriculum.

Because of Latin’s triple usefulness in imparting historical, cultural, and linguistic values to students of the Western world, it is of paramount importance that immortal Latin be given a significant role in the American high school curriculum. Without Latin the American student will perhaps realize why he is a citizen of America; with Latin, however, he will also realize why he is at the same time a citizen of the Western world.
LEVELS

The term Level is used instead of years to indicate a student's progress in Latin. It is recognized that by its very nature and scope, Latin lends itself very well to an independent study program in which a student can advance at his own rate of speed, or a small group can advance together, especially after satisfactorily completing three semesters' work. Certain criteria should be met. Students should meet with the teacher frequently and at specified times. Assignments or contracts should be specifically outlined at the beginning of the course so there is a complete understanding between the teacher and pupil as to what must be accomplished before advancing to the next level. Behavioral Objectives as listed in the Evaluation Section of this Guide should be met, subject to modifications at the teacher's discretion.

Credit should only be awarded for the number of semesters satisfactorily completed. Allowance should be made to award credits on a single semester basis beyond the second level for students on independent study. (e.g., one-half credit per semester).

For students who are academically talented, a Fifth Level class may be correlated with the Advanced Placement Program. The essential handbook is Advanced Placement Program: Course Description, obtainable from CEEB, Box 592, Princeton, New Jersey.
SEQUENCE OF LEARNING

LISTENING - SPEAKING

The Latin language should be listening, speaking, reading, and writing—the same as in learning other foreign languages—even though the major objective of Latin study is reading. Developing listening and speaking skills is important to acquire the essence of Latin as a "living" language and a means of communication. If the aural/oral skills are the first steps, they can be the means of offering many enjoyable experiences.

Advantage should be taken of the student's initial curiosity and of the fact that this is the natural way for a student to approach a foreign language. "Est Anna." "Anna est puella." "Quis est Anna?" "Quis est puella?" and so on provides the beginning of a student-teacher dialogue which stimulates interest and affords a vehicle for introducing the sound system of Latin. The realization that Latin is primarily a medium of communication is one that should remain with him through the course.

Pronunciation is best learned by imitation of the teacher and the inductive method. Since oral communication is not the major objective, the written words may be introduced within a few days in the Latin classroom, and the correlation established between the written symbols and sounds. The skillful teacher will lead the student to drawing conclusions and arriving at certain rules of pronunciation before he is referred to the Pronunciation Guide in the text. Being actively involved in the discovery process is a more gratifying learning experience for the student.

Aural/oral activities help the student learn to read. Oral reading of the text is an effective means of leading the student to read sentences in word groups and to appreciate the aesthetic beauty of oral Latin. The proper phrasing of words helps him overcome the tendency of reading words rather than thought groups. The eye recognizes like endings, but the ear perceives rhythms. Oral Latin questions on reading, anticipating Latin responses, effectively test comprehension.

Listening to tapes can also afford a pleasant experience in literary appreciation if the oral rendition is by a classicist with a pleasant voice, good intonation, and imagination suited to the quality of the text. This is especially appropriate and stimulating in advanced classes where the speeches of Cicero will be infinitely more effective if heard before they are read and then heard again before they are read orally. Cicero’s orations, like Shakespeare’s plays, were meant to be heard. There is a bit of the ham in all of us. Many students will really enjoy reading Cicero, imitating the sound and styles of a good classicist. Latin poetry was meant to be read aloud, and no interpretation of a passage should be attempted before it has been read orally. Scansion of the dactylic hexameters of Vergil should be practiced at every session of the class. The language laboratory may be ideal for listening; if fitted with playback equipment, it will be especially useful.

READING - TRANSLATING

Since reading Latin literature is a prime objective of Latin study, the Latin program generally provides the student with a generous amount of reading material on the promise that one develops ability to read by reading, reading, and reading. From the first lesson, most modern texts provide reading selections adapted to the student’s progress in the linguistic skills and serving as a vehicle for conveying information about Roman life, people, institutions, and history. Adaptations from Latin literature are used until the student is ready to read in the original, the writings of Latin authors of the Republic, the Empire and the Medieval period.

From the beginning, emphasis is placed on the student’s developing the habit of reading for comprehension. He is taught to comprehend meaning in the Latin word order, in thought units, with careful attention to inflectional changes, with judgment suspended until the end of the sentence. At no time should he be satisfied with deciphering words or phrases per se. Comprehension may be tested by means of Latin questions to be answered in Latin, Latin summaries, or questions and answers in English.

Comprehension may also be tested by having the student translate given passages. However, it must be recognized that translations require additional skills. Although this procedure requires accuracy in discerning the structural pattern of Latin and also the skill in expressing it in comparable English, it remains an activity for drawing the student’s attention to details and style. There is a thing more especially where students expect to complete only two Levels, to have more "extensive reading" and less "intensive reading and translation." In Levels III and IV the two may be combined to make possible extensive reading of Classical authors and also more particular study of an author's style. By this time the student will have achieved a certain maturity so that he is prepared to pay more attention to his own style, the choice of appropriate words with exact shades of meaning and effectiveness.

WRITING

The writing skill may be developed simultaneously with the reading skill in Latin if it deals with the same material the student has said, heard and read several times. Completion exercises, exercises in changing the structure and forms of sentences, and dictation of previously studied material add to the student's sense of accomplishment and to his speed of learning. By the time a student has completed Level I, he should be able to write simple sentences based on familiar material. Question and answer exercises may be used in addition to the traditional procedure of translating English sentences into Latin. In Levels I and II the work generally should be done under direct teacher supervision; in the later Levels the student may write more complex sentences but will generally correlate them closely with the material being read. Some students may profit from writing creative compositions. At all Levels, work should usually be done under close teacher supervision. Not only may some students profit from writing creative compositions in which certain structures are called for (e.g., the employment of a supine, gerundives, or exclamatory accusatives), but also most students will profit from translating increasingly difficult English sentences and passages into Latin.
A very definite, conscious effort should be made to help the student master vocabulary of a given Level and then to expand his reading vocabulary. Constant review is necessary. Regular attention should be given to the principles of word formation. All the possible devices for expanding knowledge of the lexical meaning of words should be kept before students constantly. They should be encouraged to deduce meanings intelligently, resorting to dictionary definitions when necessary. They should learn thoroughly the most common stems, as well as prefixes and suffixes, for use in determining the meaning of new words.

The study of Latin is unique in that the linguistic contribution of Latin to English is stressed at all times. As far as practical, students are expected to learn English derivatives from words they have learned in their basic vocabulary. They should be able to apply the principles of word formation to English, with emphasis on the main stems, prefixes and suffixes, loan words and cognates.
INFLECTIONS - SYNTAX

The automatic association of form and syntax is necessary for facility in reading. To fix this association, the student of Latin should learn the inflected forms and the functions which they signal together. Although direct explanation by the teacher of new material is often the best, most concise, and most economical method of presentation, there is also great value, when time allows, in the use of the inductive method, having the student meet a new form in context and infer the function of the form from its context or from similarity to forms and functions already learned, with the help of the teacher. Being actively involved in the learning process by thinking things out for himself is more stimulating to a student than being a passive recipient of information, and will at times result in better retention.

It is important that the student constantly realize that the complex morphological system of Latin has an essential function as a key to meaning. It is also important that he see forms in context and practice them in sentences. After the student realizes the importance of inflection, the learning of paradigms will appear meaningful and valuable. They will become a useful frame of reference that will keep in order this complex system. The two processes of practice in context and learning of paradigms actually are likely to be done in an interwoven fashion (presentation, practice, memorization), but care must be taken that the student is always aware of the use of the forms, and does not identify them by their position in the paradigm. The Horizontal Paradigm has recently come into use as a convenient device for associating forms of the five declensions and their functions.

Grammatical analysis following the reading, if necessary, may be done in sentence exercises prepared for the purpose or in reading selections. Nonetheless, one should not forget that learning grammar is subservient to the purpose of reading Latin for comprehension and enjoyment.

Level I

Phonology

1. Latin pronunciation with emphasis on:
   - Vowel sounds different from English: e, i, o, u, and y
   - All diphthongs
   - The consonants:
     - ph as p
     - th as t
     - b as p before s or t
     - hard c and g
     - l as consonant y
     - s, v as w
     - trilled r
     - st, as kw

Morphology

1. Nouns: first three declensions; fourth and fifth as time, text, and class permit
2. Adjectives:
   - First, second, and third declensions; irregulars--allus, alter, etc.
   - Comparison of adjectives including special superlatives in--imus and--limus; comparison of irregular adjectives--bonus, malus, etc.
   - Declension of comparatives
   - Possessive, demonstrative, reflexive
   - Cardinal numerals-- unus to centum, with declension of unus, duo, tres, milia; ordinal numerals--primus to decimus

Syntax

1. Nouns, pronouns, and adjectives
   - Rules of agreement: subject with verb, adjective and particle with noun or pronoun, appositive, relative pronoun with antecedent.

Concept

Less important items are:
1. Locative 2. Vocative 3. Infrequent combinations such as agricola bonus 4. One and three ending adjectives of third declension (can treat as variations of two-ending adjectives) 5. Second declension nouns in er (treat as variation of us nouns) 6. Future tense (occurs 63 times in 2318 indicative forms) 7. Future perfect tense (14 times in 2318).

Four-Year Sequence Level II

Phonology

Continue to stress rules learned in Level I regarding pronunciation.

Mechanical aids, such as tapes, are useful for short drills.

An effective means of practicing oral Latin is learning, singing, or reciting songs, lines of verse, mottos, and brief quotations. Here rhythm aids memory of the sounds.

Morphology

Nouns: irregulars, such as dores, vis 6th, avm 4th & 5th declension.

Pronouns: idem, indef. pro, alius, qui, quidam, quis, quisquere.

Adjectives: comparison; 9 irregulars: alius, alter, ullus, nullus, unus, solus, totus, uter, neuter; indefinite adjectives.

Adverbs: Rev. formation and comparison.

Verbs: Subjunctive of all conjugations; active and passive; deponents and semi-deponents; irregulars ego, fero, fio, volo, nolo, nullo; impersonal verbs, coepi, etc.

Verbals: all infinitives and participles the gerund and gerundive.

Syntax

Nouns & Pronouns - Usage of cases

- b. Genitive: with certain adjectives and verbs; with causa and gratia; gen. of the whole; gen. of description.
- c. Dative: with certain adjectives; agent; purpose, reference; possessor with compound and intransitive v.
- d. Accusative: subject of infinitive in indirect statement; subjective complement in indirect statement.
- e. Ablative: ablative absolute; without Latin prepositions; description; respect; degree of difference; cause comparison; separation; with deponents: fringo, potior, uter, vocor.
- f. Locative: with place construction.

Verbs - Uses of Subjunctive

- a. Adverbial clauses
  1. Purpose clauses with ut, ne, qui, quo.
  2. Result clauses with ut, ut non.
  4. Anticipatory clauses: with dum, (while) antequam, priusquam.
- b. Noun clauses
  1. Substantive volitive, desire or purpose, with ut, ne.
  2. Noun clause of fact or result.
  3. Indirect question.
  4. Clause following expression of fear or doubt.
- c. Relative clause of description
- d. Independent volitive

Sequence of Tenses - Verbal

1. Gerunds and gerundives, with ad causa, gratia, to express purpose.
2. Periphrastic constructions;
3. Indirect statement
4. Negative commands

Without subjunctives, ablative absolutes, indirect statements, and gerunds and gerundives, it is practically impossible to read any really idiomatic Latin.
