Policies and procedures for field trips are in this resource guide. The handbook is divided into 2 major sections: sites for trips by elementary school classes and sites for secondary classes. Elementary class sites are classified by resource and include agriculture, arts, conservation, educational guidance, food processing, historical museums and sites, home furnishing, manufacturing, mining and quarrying, recreation, communication and utilities services, consumer services, and public services. Within each category, sites are listed alphabetically. In the secondary section, sites are classified by subject area and include those related to art, business, English, foreign languages, history and social studies, homemaking, mathematics, music, and science. Major topics covered by the guide include the philosophy of field trips, general objectives, teacher planning, and rules and regulations governing field trips. Also included are copies of forms used by the Olean (New York) Public School System. (PS)

INTRODUCTION

Some months ago, I was a chairman of a committee of teachers from the Olean school system charged with the investigation of the possibilities for outdoor education in our area. My work with Boy Scouts had already created in me a strong interest in this kind of program, and this interest was deepened when, through the generosity of our school board, I was enabled to attend some special summer courses in outdoor education at the University of Michigan. My interest also quickly broadened to include, not only the kinds of education typically associated with "outdoor education," but with all education outside the classroom. A study of recent developments in educational theory and of the experience of some other communities, convinced me that, here in Olean, we do not make adequate use in our teaching of the immense resources of the environment.

To put it another way, it is almost trite today to assert that education must no longer be confined to the classroom. Our pupils move about the school buildings, using various facilities and equipment: library, science room, gymnasium, and so on. The idea of teaching outside the classroom is hardly novel in our day.

Furthermore, we know that our pupils learn a great many things from their environment outside the school.
Indeed, are we not all at times dismayed to observe how quickly they learn in those other surroundings as compared with the relatively plodding pace of the classroom? Can we not capitalize on the rest of the environment via the educational or field trip? I do not believe we use this vehicle as extensively and productively as we might in spite of the vast array of opportunities which beckon from everywhere.

I have accordingly produced this handbook to serve as a convenient tool for teachers who wish to use field trips to nearby places as to display some of the riches of our surroundings.

But is we agree on the usefulness of trips in general, some particular questions remain. Which field trip? When? The handbook proper should help to answer these questions also. The handbook is divided into two major sections: sites for trips by elementary school classes and sites for trips by secondary school classes. In the section for elementary classes, sites have been classified as to kind of resource as follows: Agriculture, Arts, Conservation, Educational Guidance, Food Processing, Historical Museums and Sites, Home Furnishings, Manufacturing, Mining and Quarrying, Recreation, Communication and Utilities Services, Consumer Services, Public Services. Within each category, sites are listed alphabetically.

In the secondary section, sites have been classified by the subject area of the curriculum to which they seem

There is, naturally, some repetition of sites from section to section. Each site has been given a code number for convenient indexing. Elementary sites are numbered in the order in which they appear in the handbook E 1, E 2, E 3 and so on. Secondary sites S 1, S 2, S 3 etc. But this booklet is by no means complete. It presents only nearby sites, though the notion of educational trips might well include those at a very great distance. And of the nearby sites, its treatment is not exhaustive. Everyone who uses this handbook may wish to add to it. The lists of sites in each section, elementary and secondary are followed by blanks allowing teachers to add descriptions of worthwhile sites they may discover in the future. By assigning an appropriate number to the site, the teacher may also add the site to the indexes which follow the major sections of the handbook.

There are two such indexes. The first is a general subject index which indicates by site number trips relevant to various subjects. This allows for discovery of sites which, listed according to primary interest in center of handbook, may also be useful in other subjects.

The second index contains two lists: site numbers of trips requiring a half day or less, and numbers of trips requiring more than a half day.
Following the indexes, you will find blank copies of forms to be filled out when planning and applying for permission to take a trip. There are four such forms. The first is a request to be sent to the principal for permission to take a trip. The second is a permission slip to be sent to parents to secure their permission for the pupil to take a field trip. The third is a request for parental assistance for use when the teacher needs monitoring help on a trip. The last is a request for transportation to be sent to the office of the Assistant Superintendent of Public Schools. While there may seem to be many forms, they are all rather simple and should not discourage planning of trips.

This book is offered in the hope that it will help you plan worthwhile field trips and so assist our pupils in their development into happy, productive adults.
PHILOSOPHY OF FIELD TRIPS

Well-planned field trips that are coordinated with the curriculum and that have a purpose which has been made clear to the pupil (even if that purpose is simply to arouse curiosity) can be a vital part to the teaching-learning process at all levels of schooling. Field trips give concrete meaning to the specific learning project. On the elementary school level, the first field trips should be simple in nature—such as walking to a nearby park to observe different kinds of trees, or to watch everyday work at the dairy, post office, farm or fire station.

Field trips may eventually be rather elaborate and extended. Some field trips have covered hundreds and even thousands of miles.

Instructional Level Guide

The instructional level of each resource is indicated at the top right-hand corner of each resource.

S or Sr. indicates Senior High Level
J or Jr. indicates Junior High Level
I or Int. indicates Intermediate Level
P indicates Primary Level
GENERAL OBJECTIVES OF FIELD TRIPS

Field Trips are taken to:

1. To provide varied, wholesome and unusual educational experiences that are impossible to provide in the school itself.

2. Develop a feeling of pride for positive attitude concerning the community in which the student lives.

3. Develop within each student an inquisitive, inquiring quest for learning more about the world around him and how he or she fits into it.

4. Provide opportunities for:
   A. Learning proper conduct in public places
   B. Observing and listening
   C. Accurate collecting and summarizing of materials
   D. Learning social relationships on levels, different from those of the regular classroom setting
   E. Discovery of places of interest for future individual study
   F. Meeting experts and authorities in specialized fields.

5. Promote a broader interest in study through the enrichment of perceptual and auditory experiences.
6. Give the teacher an insight into interests and aptitudes of students.

7. Introduce a unit, culminate an activity, or climax a unit of study.

8. Appreciate the American democratic system as it exists and how the individual is an important part of this system.
TEACHER PLANNING

The following is a list of questions that should be considered when contemplating the utilization of Community Resources.

Teachers should consider them carefully in their planning.

I. Educational Values
   A. What knowledge will students gain from this experience?
   B. Are there any vocational values?
   C. Is there any opportunity for skill development?
   D. What social values are present?
   E. Does the experience tie in with the child's cultural, social and educational background?
   F. Does the experience correlate well with the curriculum of the school system?
   G. Are there reading and other related resource materials available to the students?

II. Practical Considerations
   A. Are there any geographic limitations to the trip?
   B. What are the hazards that are involved? What liabilities might there be?
C. Will you have any problems with group control?

D. What are the considerations in regard to "group size"?

E. Are accommodations for rest rooms, lunch stops, drinking water available?

F. Will the souvenir vendors and other commercial ventures pose any problems?

G. Are there any costs involved in admissions and transportation? Are these costs prohibitive?

III. Criteria for Resource Persons

A. Is the character and reputation of the suggested individual in accord with commonly accepted standards?

B. Does he or she possess the knowledge necessary to present the materials in an intelligent way?

C. Will the manner in which the material is presented be interesting and on the level of the students?

D. Will the presenter attempt to unduly enforce an attitude, opinion or idea that is contrary to the basic philosophy of the school system?
RULES AND REGULATIONS
GOVERNING FIELD TRIPS

1. "Request for Permission" forms, should be submitted to the building principal for his approval at least two weeks in advance of all contemplated trips.

2. One teacher should fill out the "Field Trip Request" form if more than one class is going on any particular trip. This teacher should be considered, "teacher-in-charge." It shall be the "teacher-in-charge's" responsibility to: (1) coordinate plans, (2) be sure transportation requirements are made.

3. A "Parent Approval" form must be received from each child before he is permitted to participate in the trip.

4. All pupils who go on a trip originating at school must return to school with the group.

5. Parent participation accompanying groups and in helping the teacher plan and organize the trip is to be encouraged. All rules of conduct applicable to teachers also apply to parents. A copy of the appropriate acceptance form is found with the other forms.

6. Teachers in charge of the trip will be responsible for informing the building principal, of any delay in the time of return.

7. Teachers have the same coverage of insurance that they have while they are in the classroom. A field trip is nothing more than an extension of the classroom.

8. The teacher is, at all times, in charge of the group and must assume the following responsibilities:

   A. Have the group ready to board the bus at the specific time.

   B. Explain to the students the necessity for quiet and order in the bus during the trip. Observation of points of interest along the way is a worthwhile and educationally profitable use of the onroute time, and is in harmony with the reason for these school-time trips.

   C. Exert appropriate control to provide a safe driving climate.

   D. If it is necessary to have lunch aboard the bus, every effort should be made to keep the bus clean. A cardboard carton, as part of the group equipment, will simplify disposal of debris.

   E. Since first impressions are lasting ones, every effort should be made to have the children understand that their every action is being viewed by the public.

   F. Be sure that on return to the school, all children have transportation home.
G. Inform all parents who accompany the group what their job is to be--and its limitations--in view of the over-all responsibility of the teacher.

H. Teacher or teachers conducting a trip should be the first to arrive and the last to leave. Under no circumstances should a teacher, upon return to the home school, leave before each and every student has been called for by his parent or transportation provided.
