ABC's: A Handbook for Educational Volunteers.

Office of Education (DHEW), Washington, D.C.

Lec 72

53p.

This handbook presents information on the organization and execution of volunteer programs. Some general questions are answered concerning the aims of a volunteer program, the cost of these programs, and the types of services educational volunteers perform. The organization and administration of these programs are discussed in relation to specific needs. The processes of interviewing, selecting, orienting, training, and assigning volunteers are explained with various techniques and schedules. The importance of orienting and training professional personnel involved in volunteer programs is cited. The uses of high school students as volunteers are explored, with emphasis on training through workshops. The maintenance of morale among volunteers is emphasized since the success of any volunteer program rests upon this. The procedures for evaluating the program are detailed with evaluation forms for the volunteers, teachers or staff members, principals or administrators, and volunteer coordinators. The bibliography presents books on volunteer educational programs. (BFB)

FOREWORD

Volunteers are everywhere! During the past five years, the number of school systems and other agencies using volunteers has increased astronomically. While the size of programs will vary greatly — from three volunteers to a thousand — all programs are alike in their belief that volunteer assistance can make a difference in the quality of education many people receive.

While many programs are well-established, having been in operation a number of years, others are new, seeking aid in setting up and operating a meaningful and rewarding program. It is to these fledgling programs that this handbook is directed.

This guide will provide a basic outline for those establishing a volunteer program. By no means should it be considered a "bible" for volunteers. It is a guide and, as such, should be modified and adapted to meet local needs and situations.

PREFACE

"Life leaps like a geyser for those who drill through the rock of inertia."

Every human being has a circle of influence within his home, among his friends and in his community that can contribute constructively to the improvement of society. Many citizens believe that educational volunteering can substantially contribute to the uplifting of society, as well as improve the welfare of children. At this time, more than ever before, there is a larger segment of the population available and desiring to utilize their talents and give their time to aid and enrich the education of children and others.

As the number of children enrolled in public schools increases, the demands for better teacher performance, more productive classroom management and greater individualization of curricula have grown at an astounding rate. The ability to aid this press of children with needs different from those met by the schools a generation ago has been hindered by the continuing use of aging facilities, poor distribution of teachers and a shrinking tax base for support of public education.

Such a depression of public education has led to the most needy groups getting less and less. Theoretically, monies from the federal government have improved the teaching/learning experience for children and youth. Educational specialists and concerned groups have promoted new programs to affect how and what children learn. However, research shows that the total effect to date has either resulted in little or no improvement or has brought about counter-productive outcomes for the learner.

Within the schools, teachers, often because of the sheer size of their classes, are unable to give many students the special attention and services they need if their education is to be productive and meaningful. More and more, it becomes apparent that a core of trained volunteers can be of invaluable assistance in the classroom, relieving the teachers of non-professional duties and providing many children with the individual attention they so desperately need. Increasingly, school systems are tapping the great under-utilized body of volunteer talent to aid the teachers. A volunteer force of city, suburban and rural individuals, trained in specific skills, equipped with the necessary materials and working under the guidance of administrators and teachers can make and have made a significant and measurable impact on the early learning years.

In the past few years, school volunteer programs in the United States, both within and apart from school systems, have quadrupled. Today, programs are reaching out to involve a larger segment of the school communities and neighborhoods in the educational process as volunteers. The call for additional volunteers to serve has been issued from the White House. In his inaugural address in 1969, President Richard M. Nixon called upon all Americans to help solve the problems of people and communities. He said:

"We are approaching the limits of what government can do alone. Our greatest need now is to reach beyond government, to enlist the legions of the concerned and the committed. What has to be done, has to be done by government and the people together or it will not be done at all."

The ultimate hope is that with this added support and aid, the schools will be able to "drill through the rock of inertia" in learning and make education more effective.

Volunteers in Education
I. BASIC INFORMATION ON VOLUNTEER SERVICES

WHO IS A VOLUNTEER? A volunteer in education is a concerned and dedicated person who works regularly in schools or other educational settings to support the efforts of professional personnel. Volunteers may be male or female; young, middle-aged or senior citizens; single or married; actively employed, retired or on welfare; black, white, chicano or oriental. They reflect every economic, social, racial, religious, ethnic and educational background to be found in this nation.

WHAT IS A SCHOOL VOLUNTEER PROGRAM? It is an organization of persons who work in schools, under the direction of teachers and other personnel, to strengthen the school program or offer special skills to enrich a student's educational experience. Volunteers may also work outside the school to provide homework assistance or other special aid in any educational situation where it is needed.

WHAT IS A TUTORIAL PROGRAM? It is an organization of persons who give one-to-one or small group assistance to pupils needing extra help. Primarily, tutorials concentrate on the improvement of reading, math or science skills.

WHAT ARE THE GENERAL AIMS OF A VOLUNTEER PROGRAM?
- To assist teachers in providing more individualization and enrichment of instruction to their classes.
- To increase children's motivation for learning.
- To enrich children's experiences beyond what is normally available in schools through the unique resources which can be contributed by volunteers.
- To relieve teachers of many non-teaching duties and tasks.
- To provide an opportunity for interested community members to participate effectively in a school's program.
- To strengthen school-community relations through positive participation.
- To build an understanding of school problems among citizens, thus stimulating widespread involvement in the total educational process.

HOW CAN A VOLUNTEER PROGRAM BE INITIATED? The first essential is the acceptance of the idea by the local school superintendent, school board or administrative and professional staff of at least one school. In many places successful programs have been started by (1) concerned individuals, (2) boards of education and local superintendents, (3) professional staff at an individual school, (4) other professionals working together, (5) community or civic organizations, (6) college and high school students and (7) parents.

ON WHOM SHOULD BASIC ORGANIZATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY REST? The responsibility for organizing a program must rest with whomever is willing to establish cooperative working arrangements with the central school administrative staff and the professional and administrative staff in the participating school(s) to get the initial project underway. Whether the program is in-school or out-of-school, the involvement of school personnel is necessary for the program to be a success.

WHAT ARE THE BASIC COSTS OF STARTING A VOLUNTEER PROGRAM? Just how much money a beginning program will need depends upon the scope of the proposed project. However, funds will be needed for office supplies and equipment, telephone service, preparation and reproduction of materials and for postage. These expenses will be incurred by any program.

Another consideration is whether or not staff, either professional or clerical, will be hired and what are the prevailing salary rates in the area. In the preparation of preliminary budgets one should also plan for continuing or expanding the program after the initial or pilot phase is completed.

HOW CAN THESE COSTS BE MET? Initial program costs can be underwritten by local citizen efforts, by foundation grants, by the board of education or by a joint effort. As the value of the program is demonstrated, its cost can be absorbed into the general budget of the board of education.
WHERE DO VOLUNTEERS SERVE? Volunteers serve in settings where people or organizations have requested their help. In schools, teachers and principals ask volunteers to help children needing assistance and enrichment and to aid in other areas of school operation. Volunteers also serve in after-school tutorials, in homework assistance centers and in school and public libraries. They may also aid those remanded to the custody of juvenile courts, receiving homes or detention centers.

Wherever there is an educational need to meet, educational volunteers should be found.

WHAT KINDS OF SERVICES DO EDUCATIONAL VOLUNTEERS PERFORM? Although services will vary according to local needs, volunteer aid generally falls into one of the following areas:

1. Relieving the professional of clerical or non-professional duties.
2. Providing ancillary one-to-one or small group assistance.
3. Giving special aid to children with exceptional talents or difficulties, such as English as a second language.
4. Enriching the curriculum in areas requiring special skills or unique experiences.
5. Preparing materials to be used in the total volunteer program. More specifically, there are 26 basic positions in which noncertified persons or volunteers can be used to strengthen an educational program. These are of special importance if the school or school system is operating with a pattern of differentiated staffing or seeking to include volunteer service as part of a career lattice program. These positions are:
   1. Classroom
      Performs clerical, monitorial, and teacher reinforcement tasks under the direct supervision of the classroom teacher
   2. Audio-Visual Technician
      Inventories, stores, performs simple maintenance tasks, and operates audio-visual equipment; prepares audio visual aids under teacher’s direction
   3. School Counselor
      Performs clerical, monitorial, and counseling reinforcement tasks under the direction of the counselor
   4. School Lunchroom
      Supervises lunchroom according to school practices during lunch periods; maintains order, helps children when assistance is needed, works with administration and teachers to improve procedures; supervises after lunch playground or special activities
   5. General School
      Performs a variety of school duties as assigned by principal, assistant principal or designated teacher; may assist at doors and in halls, office, bookstore, library, clinic, classroom, but is not assigned to a single station
   6. School Community
      Acts as a liaison person between the school and the community by informing parents of school and community services and by informing teachers of community problems and special needs
   7. School Hospitality
      Receives parents who visit the school and, under the direction of the principal, conducts the parent to where the parent may meet with a teacher; may also arrange for refreshments for teachers, parents, and children
   8. Departmental
      Works in a particular school department (language, science, fine arts, etc.) to perform designated departmental tasks such as record keeping, inventories, attendance, supplies, marking objective tests, etc.
   9. Library
      Works under the supervision of the librarian to assist in operating the school library. Shelving, filing, clipping, circulation, and book processing are some of the tasks to be performed
   10. Testing Service
      Works with professional testers in schools or regional centers to arrange for, administer, check, and record student test results
   11. Special Enrichment
      Speaks to classes or other groups on topics related to occupation. These volunteers may be businessmen, engineers, lawyers, doctors, etc.
   12. School Security
      Assigned by the principal to security tasks—doors, corridors, special events, lavatories, parking lot, banking of school receipts
   13. After-School Program
      Supervises, under the direction of the teacher, any after-school activities
   14. Materials Resource Center
      Performs clinical, custodial, and monitorial functions in a materials resource center or learning laboratory

   20. Special Education
      Assists special education teacher in implementing instructional activities for individual or groups of special education pupils
   21. Attendance Officer
      Provides assistance in dealing with attendance problems; may make home calls, the purpose of which is delineated by the attendance officer
   22. Bus Attendance
      Supervises loading and unloading of school buses at the beginning and end of the school day; may be assigned to ride buses especially those transporting very young children
   23. High School Theme Reader
      Reads and checks themes for those writing skills indicated by the teacher
   24. School Health Clinic
      Operates health clinic under direction provided by school
25. Laboratory Technician

Assists in school laboratories (languages, science) under supervision of teacher; sets up, maintains, and operates equipment.

OF THESE SERVICES, WHICH CAN A NEW PROGRAM MOST EFFECTIVELY PROVIDE?

The kinds of services a volunteer program is able to provide will depend upon:

1. The particular needs of the school system, of each individual school, and of each individual teacher. If the program is not in the school, the overall objectives or the program will determine, in large measure, the types of services offered.

2. The desire of school or agency staff for particular services.

3. The availability of qualified volunteers to perform the requested services.

4. The type and amount of special professional and/or volunteer help currently available in the school or agency.

New programs should zero in on the one or two areas in which they can be most effective, rather than attempt to tackle too many problems. Such a "scattergun" technique—trying to do too much from the first—generally works to the detriment of the program.

HOW CAN A SMOOTH RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN VOLUNTEER AND PROFESSIONAL BE ASSURED?

For a smooth working relationship, both volunteer and staff should agree that:

1. A volunteer works under the direction and supervision of a teacher or member of the staff.

2. A volunteer supplies supportive services, but is not a substitute for a professional staff member.

3. A volunteer will not divulge confidential information to which he or she may have access.

4. The volunteer should be given specific instructions and necessary materials for any job undertaken.

5. If parents participate in a volunteer program in their child's school they should not be given access to their child's confidential files. The decision to allow parents to volunteer in their child's classroom should be made by the principal or teacher involved.

6. Evaluation of a volunteer's work will be confidential.
II. ORGANIZING AND DEVELOPING A VOLUNTEER PROGRAM

Once the initial approval and support of the local authorities have been secured, those establishing the program can proceed with its development. The following plan can be used for any type of program large or small, either in or out of a school. The major difference will be the amount of internal coordination necessary to make the program a success.

DETERMINE

1. Needs

The first step is to determine what needs the program must meet. This is best done by consulting with appropriate personnel, both administrators and teachers, to identify the real and persistent needs of a given situation. Needs to be considered include those of the school, those of the teachers and those of the students. Once these needs have been determined, they should be ranked in priority order from the highest to the lowest. Those developing the program must now decide which needs can possibly be met, considering actual and potential resources.

After the needs have been decided upon, the possibility of implementing them should be discussed with school authorities.

2. Prepare Objectives

Taking the needs into consideration, the next step is to develop objectives which are stated in behavioral terms whenever possible. In the development of objectives, care should be taken to outline the sub-goals necessary to make the program objectives a reality. From these overall program objectives, specific institutional goals may be developed. These will stress the need for tutoring, library service, etc.—those activities necessary to meet the identified needs.

Many direct and indirect benefits stem from the establishment of program objectives. The involvement of key school staff and volunteer leaders in the decision-making will benefit the program by establishing rapport and defining the roles of all involved. Furthermore, concise identification of goals and objectives leads to the development of an effective, workable structure for the volunteer program. Such identification will assist in the recruitment process.

3. Identify Resources

Based on the need and objectives, available resources to implement the program should be identified. Such resources fall into two categories: (1) material and financial resources and (2) human resources or potential volunteers. (Potential volunteers include students, parents, community, civic, social and fraternal organizations, business and industry personnel, senior citizens and other individuals interested in participating.)

If a steering committee for the program is desired, it should be established at this point. Criteria for serving on the committee should be formulated.

If the program is city-wide, the steering committee should represent: (1) a cross-section of the population, (2) organizations who can assist in recruiting volunteers, (3) those who can bring financial or material resources to the program, e.g. printing, graphic designs for flyers, accounting, etc., and (4) those who will participate, as volunteers, in the various phases of program administration.

Necessary materials, equipment, and funds for program operation should also be identified now.

4. Design Program

When organizing a volunteer program, allocate adequate time for in-depth planning. As the plan is formulated, write it down. A written plan, containing all vital elements, makes a program tangible, eliminates some of the uncertainty and provides a basis for solving problems which may arise.

The following steps should be a part of any program design, once modified to meet local needs.

a. Obtain administrative approval for the program from the necessary officials.
b. Identify the services to be performed by volunteers and how these services are best provided.
c. Prepare personnel practices for volunteers in conjunction with central administrative policy including:
   1. Legal responsibility and insurance coverage for volunteers.
   2. Medical standards to be met (e.g. chest x-rays).
   d. Draw up budget and secure necessary funds.
   e. Outline duties and functions of leadership positions.
   f. Select program coordinator and other needed staff.
   g. Establish criteria for and method of recruiting volunteers.
   h. Plan for orientation program in cooperation with local education authorities.
   i. Develop routine procedures and forms to be used in program operation.

Develop a plan for selling the program to the public.

The steps outlined above represent one way of planning a program for volunteers. Some definite form of organization is necessary for efficiency and effectiveness. Alternative methods may be designed and adapted. The most effective organization and planning is often that which is determined jointly by school staff and prospective volunteers.

5. Recruit Volunteers

The most important component of any program are the volunteers who provide the service, time, and talent without which the program could not operate. Special attention must be given to the recruitment of volunteers. Specifics for a profitable recruitment campaign are outlined in the chapter, "Recruiting Volunteers," pages 11 to 20.

6. Re-examine Plan

Before the volunteer program begins, all aspects of the plan should be checked and rechecked to assure that no part of the program design, no matter how small, has been left out. Relate the plan to numbers and types of volunteers recruited. Care must be taken not to overestimate resources. It is better to expand the scope of activities than to overestimate and be forced to cut back...

services or spread them too thin (remember, for the want of a nail, a kingdom was lost!). Once checked, resources can be allocated and the program is underway.

7. Allocate Resources

For maximum utilization of volunteer services, resources, both material and people, must be allocated wisely. A clear definition of the role and responsibility of all involved in a volunteer program makes for a successful undertaking. There are three considerations:

a. Administration — The well-being of a school is the responsibility of the principal. Therefore, it is essential that the principal and his staff manifest interest in the program. Such interest is shown in actions of wholehearted support so that the role and functions of volunteers will be understood and accepted. However, as a word of caution, the principal’s influence on the volunteer program should not be so authoritative that staff feels it is being “pushed down their throats.” A genuine interest can inspire greater positive response within the school.

b. Coordination — The role of the volunteer coordinator should be considered in detail. It is essential that one person have primary responsibility for the operation of the program. Plans for the actual operation of a program and the duties of those involved are fully explained in the chapter on program administration, pages 7 to 10.

c. Materials — At this point, the equipment, materials and supplies to be used by volunteers should be available at the sites where volunteers will be working.

8. Deploy Volunteers

The final step, prior to actual program operation, is the deployment of the volunteers who have been recruited. Consideration for the assignment of volunteers is covered in the chapter, “Interviewing, Selecting and Assigning Volunteers,” pages 21 to 25.

9. Begin Program Operation and Monitoring

Monitoring procedures should begin with the program. Such procedures will assure that volunteers are fulfilling their assignments and provide for the compilation of data necessary for a year-end evaluative report.

10. Report Progress

Periodically, the information compiled from the reporting forms e.g. types of volunteers, time sheets, types of services performed, evaluation sheets from principals, teachers, and volunteers, should be given to persons responsible for administration of the program. This information is then used for evaluation and necessary reports. Regular assessment of this information will serve to indicate ways in which the program needs to be altered to meet its objectives.

11. Evaluate Program Results

The year-end evaluation of program results should lead to an overall re-examination of the operating plans as well as an examination of the goals the program seeks to meet. Designs for program evaluation are discussed in the chapter on evaluation, pages 40 to 46.
III. ADMINISTRATION OF THE VOLUNTEER PROGRAM

The volunteer program must be responsive to the needs of and resources available at each institution it serves. In the administration of a program, as well as in planning for it, the staff of that institution must be involved. The paramount consideration is that the volunteer program be a cooperative effort between the volunteers who give service and the institutions which are the immediate or ultimate recipients of that service.

In any volunteer program, whether operating in a single institution or city-wide, there are certain administrative functions which must be performed to insure efficient operation. In a single-site program, the administrative structure may take the following form:

OVERALL ADMINISTRATOR

E.G.

SCHOOL PRINCIPAL

STAFF COORDINATOR

VOLUNTEER COORDINATOR

VOLUNTEER

TEACHER

OPTIONAL POSITION

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE SCHOOL ADMINISTRATION

Within the school, the principal, who is responsible for school staff, educational program, and facilities should serve as supervisor ex-officio of the individual school program. The school volunteer coordinator should also be under the direct supervision of the principal. For a successful school volunteer program, responsibilities of the principal should include:

1. Discussing the program with the school staff and enlisting their support.
2. Assisting in the identification of the types of volunteer service needed by the staff.
3. Outlining specific school procedures to be followed by volunteers.
4. Making working space available for the volunteers and providing access to lounge and bathroom facilities.
5. Meeting with volunteers and staff to create a team spirit.
6. Assisting in the evaluation of services performed by volunteers.

Because of the many responsibilities a school principal has, some of the above duties, specifically one through four, may be detailed to a professional staff member. (This position is indicated by the dotted box in the diagram.)

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE VOLUNTEER COORDINATOR

The volunteer coordinator, working under the direction of the principal and in cooperation with the staff coordinator, if one is appointed, must:

1. Assign volunteers.
2. Process teachers requests for volunteer aid.
3. Keep files and records of volunteer activities within the school.
4. Confer with principal and staff whenever necessary.
5. Conduct or participate in meetings with staff and/or volunteers to:

a. Orient volunteers to the school situation. (see Orientation and Training of Volunteers, p.26.)
b. Provide preservice training for volunteers to work in specialized areas of need, e.g. reading, language arts, mathematics, science, English as a second language.
c. Assist staff in the effective utilization of volunteers. (See Orientation and Training of Professional Personnel, p. 31.)

6. Determine the need for workshops or in-service-training to increase the volunteers' capacity to serve.
7. Plan meetings so that volunteers may become better acquainted with each other, discuss problems, exchange ideas, and seek solutions to common problems.
8. Check with volunteers who miss time or are unable to fulfill a specific assignment as scheduled.
9. Arrange for recognition of volunteer service within the school.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF TEACHERS USING VOLUNTEERS

The teacher is the key person in guiding the practical learning experiences of volunteers. The following suggestions are intended to help make the best use of the teacher's supervision within the limits of time available.

1. Try to arrange an informal session with the volunteer at an early date to discuss the program and what to expect of the children. Orient the volunteer to the kind of help you would like from her. Try to have a little variety in the tasks assigned, but use her services in any way that will be of help to you and the children. The staff volunteer or volunteer coordinator should be trained to assist you in planning an ever increasing variety of activities.

2. Plan the work you want the volunteer to do before she comes to your room. Create early opportunities for volunteer contacts with individual children. Be specific in your directions.

3. If you are not going to need your volunteer at her regular time, or if you are going to be away from school, advise the volunteer or volunteer coordinator in advance so that arrangements can be made to utilize her elsewhere.

4. If you do not need your volunteer full time, release her so that she can help another teacher.

5. Brief your volunteer in fire drill and dismissal procedures.
Introduce her to the teacher next door.

6. Anticipate information the volunteer will need to carry out assigned duties. Show her where to find materials, how to set up an activity, what books to use with a group, etc. Tell her what limits to set, what special needs individual children have and what to expect of the children.

7. Avoid assigning responsibilities beyond a volunteer’s ability. Do not leave a volunteer with too many children or too large an area to supervise.

8. Provide increasing job responsibility for the volunteer as she gains in knowledge and proficiency.

9. Expect the volunteer to be businesslike about attendance, being on time, staying with assigned responsibilities, and accepting direction from the teacher. Although the job is a volunteer one, the commitment is professional.

When volunteers feel they are an integral part of the school team, they are more likely to impart to the community an appreciation and understanding of the job being done by school personnel.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE VOLUNTEER

The volunteer expresses concern for, interest in and acceptance of those with whom she works. She is responsible for maintaining a professional attitude of mutual respect and confidence. She should also:

1. Be willing to offer supportive and supplemental service under professional supervision and direction.

2. Be punctual and reliable in fulfilling the assignment and notifying the school in case of absence.

3. Become familiar with school and classroom policies and practices.

4. Be capable of adjusting to the teacher’s way of doing things and following her directions.

5. Be willing to have short conferences, periodically, with the coordinator and/or teacher to make for a more rewarding experience.

ROUTINE PROCEDURES

For the smooth operation of a program, procedures similar to those given below should be standardized:

1. Each volunteer unit should maintain a time sheet for volunteers to sign in and out on each day of service.

2. An index card file should be maintained for volunteers in the office. It should list name, address, telephone, person to be notified in an emergency, special skills, etc.

3. Regular procedures should be established for volunteers to notify the volunteer coordinator of absences beforehand.

4. Each volunteer should record daily in a log book the services she performed, her reactions, suggestions, problems, and requests for help.

5. Orderly procedures should be developed governing voluntee use of materials.

6. A permanent record card should be left at the volunteer central office.

As the volunteer program expands to include more sites, it may be desirable to appoint area coordinators, preferably from those who have have previous experience as a volunteer coordinator or as a volunteer. The duties of these area coordinators would include the following:

1. General supervision of sites in the district —
a. Processes teachers’ requests and assigns volunteers.
b. Shares with the professional staff the task of providing on-the-job training for volunteers.
c. Supervises volunteers if there is no volunteer coordinator.
d. Shares with the volunteer coordinators the responsibility of supervision and evaluation of the work of the volunteer program at each school and for her entire district.
e. Confers with principals and teachers and attends faculty meetings when necessary.
f. Holds regular meetings with volunteer coordinators in the district to stimulate exchange of ideas and the development of new programs and procedures.
g. Identifies volunteer leadership.
h. Is available to individual volunteers for consultation and guidance.

2. Liaison between central volunteer office and volunteer units in her district —
a. Consults with the volunteer program director on questions of policy and procedure.
b. Reports on new procedures originating in her area
c. Processes and relays requests for additional services.
d. Does initial processing of requests for expansion of programs within her district.
e. Attends staff conferences at central office.
f. Presents regular evaluation, statistical, and financial reports to central office.
g. Secures or develops materials needed in the program.

3. Liaison between district personnel and volunteer units –

a. Assists in identifying areas of need in a district.
b. Assists in planning, arranging, and conducting training sessions in individual sites and in the district.

4. Assists in promoting good public relations between the volunteer units and the community.

If the program is city-wide, it will be necessary to have a Director responsible for all volunteer activity. Generally this position is a paid one with job function and duties described by the school or other sponsoring organization. The structure of a city-wide program often resembles the following:

Areas can be assigned by dividing the city into the most manageable grouping of schools or other educational sites.
The organizational plan shown emphasizes a geographic division of responsibility with an area coordinator managing all program components in her district regardless of grade level or sponsoring organization. Such a structure is very effective when volunteers work at widely dispersed sites. An expanding program may also be structured on the basis of its components.

Under such an organization, area coordinators are responsible for the management of regular school and tutorial volunteer service. Individual organizations which have been delegated specific program responsibilities such as the provision of library services to elementary schools, for example, report directly to the central administration. Other special program activities, e.g. a human resource volunteer bank, are handled by the central administration. Such an organization is structured as:

CENTRAL VOLUNTEER ADMINISTRATION

VOLUNTEER ACTIVITY DELEGATED TO ORGANIZATIONS

AREA COORDINATORS

SPECIAL PROGRAM ACTIVITIES

SITE RECEIVING SERVICE

IV. RECRUITMENT OF VOLUNTEERS

Volunteer recruitment is a vital process that requires careful planning. A recruitment plan can be formulated to meet the total volunteer needs of a school or educational program or it can be designed for special projects occurring at certain seasons of the year. A concentrated recruitment campaign can span one month or longer. Recruitment is actually a year-round activity, but most organizations plan intensive recruitment efforts during the course of a program year. For example, one successful organization conducts special recruitment activities three times each year: September, following summer vacation; January, following the December holiday season; and in May to meet needs of summer programs. Recruitment must be on-going to meet new needs and to compensate for volunteer turnover and attrition.

For new programs it is imperative that the recruitment process concentrate on developing a corps of dedicated well-trained volunteers. These first volunteers will determine whether the program will be a success or a failure. These volunteers must have a very clear picture of what they will be doing. Many professionals may be apprehensive about having volunteers working with or near them; therefore volunteers in a new program must be able to carry out their tasks causing as few interruptions or intrusions as possible. The climate these first volunteers are able to set will lead to a wider acceptance of volunteers by other teachers or professionals in the school or agency. These first volunteers are truly trailblazers and must be recruited accordingly.

What kind of individual should the volunteer be? If a “magic formula” were devised, the ideal volunteer would:

1. Be a reliable, friendly, flexible person.
2. Have time and a willingness to serve on a regular basis.
3. Recognize that educational handicaps contribute largely to waste of our human resources.
4. Have - or be willing to acquire - skills that are needed to improve and enrich a learning program.
5. Possess adequate communication skills. An important exception to this qualification is the volunteer who may know very little English, but can converse with non-English speaking student in his own language and make his school environment more understandable.
6. Have good health and moral character.
7. Feel deeply an obligation as a citizen to support and help the schools in their effort to educate each person to the full extent of his capacities.

SOURCES OF VOLUNTEERS

Potential volunteers include housewives, parents, retired persons, professional, military or business and industrial personnel on off duty or released time. College and high school students also are good volunteers. Before a recruitment campaign is begun, there are several factors which must be taken into consideration:

1. Local or state laws which may place limits on the scope of volunteer service.
2. Hours or seasons for which persons are available. For example, if college students are being recruited, it is wise to remember that their service will be cyclical - heavy at the beginning of a term and falling off as time for final exams and term papers approaches.
3. Appeal of certain types of volunteer service to younger people.
4. Availability of public transportation to and from the site of volunteer activity.

If the school is open during the evening or on the week-end, persons unable to participate during the day because of their jobs may find it possible to volunteer during these times. Also, persons working a night or midnight shift may be approached to volunteer either before they go to work or on their way home from the job.

Retired persons are good potential volunteers. A person who has given twenty or more years to a job has accumulated a wealth of knowledge and certain skills that can be valuable to a volunteer program. Many retirees desire to develop and maintain relationships with members of the younger generation. Volunteering is a good way for them to develop such associations; seldom is there a "generation gap" problem.

Another rich source for volunteers are ex-Headstart or Follow Through parents and parent coordinators. If there is a Headstart or Follow Through program in your area, the director can identify for you parents of Headstart graduates or Follow Through volunteers. Having been involved in school activities, these parents can bring very interesting experiences to a volunteer program. Often, through their previous work, these parents or volunteers have developed good working relationships with members of the school staff and can aid in the identification of areas in which other services are needed. They can also be invaluable recruiters of other interested people from the community.

THE RECRUITMENT PROCESS

The basic message of any recruitment campaign is two-fold. First, it must emphasize that school personnel recognize the importance of volunteer service. Secondly, it must not misrepresent the job to be done by volunteers. There have been unfortunate instances when potential volunteers were approached with a distorted picture of the nature of volunteering: "It won’t take much of your time. Just let me add your name to our list and we won’t bother you often." This type of approach does a disservice to the volunteer program, to persons needing volunteer assistance, and to the volunteer.

The responsibility for volunteer recruitment can be delegated to a Recruitment or Public Relations Committee whose membership should reflect a cross-section of the community being served and from which volunteers will be drawn. The functions of this committee include:

1. Maintaining a current inventory of the need for volunteers. This inventory may be compiled from a "Request for
There are three basic components to any recruitment campaign: individual or personal recruitment, mass or public recruitment, or delegated recruitment.

INDIVIDUAL OR PERSONAL RECRUITMENT

This is a direct appeal on a person-to-person basis between active volunteers or working staff and their friends or individuals specifically identified as prospective volunteers. The person involved in a volunteer program personally asks and encourages another to join in. Follow-up is important since the first approach may not achieve a firm response. A letter may be sent with written descriptive materials. Then another personal visit or phone call may help. Here, informality is the key.

Another technique that has proven successful is the "everybody-bring-a-friend" approach. A party is planned or an open-house, private tour, or other special event related to the volunteer program is scheduled. The time when volunteers receive recognition or completion-of-training certificates is a good time to use this technique. Each active volunteer is asked to bring a friend or person who is a prospective volunteer. The prospect is not necessarily "signed up at the event, but receives information about the program, the need for volunteer service, and an understanding of the goals of the program. The event should be well publicized to assure maximum participation. Follow-up on the prospective volunteers must be carried out after a short period of time.

Several other techniques can be employed when the individual approach is used. In peer recruitment, recruiters similar to prospective volunteers are used; parents recruit parents, retired persons recruit other retired persons, etc.

A prospective volunteer may also be invited to observe volunteers in action, or attend a committee meeting. This observation experience may be just the thing to persuade a person to join the team. Or the prospective volunteer may be encouraged to serve in an apprentice role for a short period of time, performing certain services under the direction of an experienced, active volunteer.

The individual or personal method is particularly good for new programs as it permits the recruitment of dedicated volunteers who can assure the success of the program. Volunteers recruited in this manner can be immediately incorporated within the program while their enthusiasm is still extremely high.

Community residents are best recruited through an individual approach. Often persons living in the vicinity of a school or agency are interested in becoming involved in its activities, but have trepidations as to how their assistance will be accepted. On recruiting community residents, the best approach is to establish contact with key people in the neighborhood. These are the people whom others in the neighborhood listen to and respect. A few minutes conversation with people in the neighborhood on the way to and from the school or agency can identify these neighborhood leaders. They, in turn, can tell you of those with the interest and time to participate in the program.

In this type of recruiting a letter or note may not be enough, but may need to be followed up by door-to-door visits. This is a time-consuming process, but the reward is well worth the effort. Once a nucleus of community volunteers has been recruited and is satisfied with the results of their work, it will become a source for attracting other volunteers.

MASS OR PUBLIC RECRUITMENT

This approach is an excellent one for established or rapidly expanding programs as its efforts are designed to reach a large number of potential volunteers to fill numerous vacant jobs. This method should be followed up by a program of individual recruitment. Techniques for mass or public recruitment include:

1. Use of ads in local newspapers, military base newsletters, spot public service announcements on local radio and television stations and posters.
2. Organization of a Speaker's Bureau consisting of people who are representative of the population to be reached. The Bureau could include active volunteers, school staff, and persons who have received assistance from volunteers. It is important that all speakers be prepared and capable of presenting information to a variety of groups and organizations on the value and significance of volunteer service.

3. Publication of a recruitment newsletter or contributing articles on the need for educational volunteers to the school or community newsletter. Such newsletters should reach key organizations and their leaders within the community. Follow-up would include speaking to groups which these community leaders represent.

4. Preparation of hand-out recruitment brochures or leaflets to be distributed to places frequented by many people, such as supermarkets, clinics, community centers, libraries, churches, movies, shops, clubs, etc. These can also be incorporated into business hand-outs or flyers and mailed. Brochures and other printed materials may be effective in arousing interest, but personal follow-up is necessary to obtain definite commitments for volunteer service.

5. Arranging for tours of the school or agency to be served as a part of “open-house” programs. Such tours are good occasions for informing people of the opportunity for volunteer service and distributing publicity material.

6. Participation in the orientation program held for all new school personnel at the start of the school year. This is a good opportunity to distribute information about the volunteer program. Follow-up with those staff members expressing interest may be carried out in a personal manner.

7. Preparation of letters to be sent to parents inviting them to participate in the volunteer program. Often a letter a child brings home may pique a parent’s curiosity about a volunteer program and encourage him to become a volunteer. Samples of letters which may be sent home are found at the end of this section.

Working closely with the school information officer during a mass recruitment campaign can have great value. Not only can he provide technical assistance and leads for contacts, but this close association will aid in good staff-volunteer relationships in the actual program.

DELEGATED RECRUITMENT

It may be possible to delegate certain recruitment activities or portions of the program to a specific agency or organization. Churches, synagogues, and fraternal, civic and social organizations within the community may be asked to announce the new program and the need for volunteers. At their meetings or services, recruitment brochures or leaflets may be distributed and a person connected with the program may make a presentation on the nature and scope of the program.

One thing cannot be overstressed! Never exclude any group or individuals from your program because they differ with your point of view. It is far better to have them openly discussing their differences than to have them plotting behind your back.

Another resource may be the local Volunteer Bureau, a central registry for individuals interested in volunteer service to which agencies make requests to meet their volunteer needs. The Bureau then tries to match the desires of volunteers with the needs of agencies. Often the Volunteer Bureau can identify other service organizations which can provide volunteers. It is possible to locate most Volunteer Bureaus through the local Health and Welfare Council, Community Chest, or Chamber of Commerce.

A third possibility is to have an organization assume total responsibility for a particular fact of a program. For example, if a tutoring program is being organized, a group, e.g. National Council of Negro Women, may wish to set up a library component to complement the tutoring program. In this case, the NCNW would draw up its own program to dovetail with the tutoring program and would assume responsibility for recruiting the necessary volunteers to make the library component operational. Although it would be run by a different group, the library component would be considered a part of the total school volunteer program. Such delegation of program components may be planned for a single school or for an entire school system. It is important to see that all necessary arrangements with each organization agreeing to accept delegated responsibility are carefully worked out and completely understood by all parties involved.

One resource for volunteer recruitment which cannot be overlooked is the effective and satisfied volunteer. The most successful recruitment campaigns are those which involve volunteers who have fully enjoyed their participation. Personal enthusiasm can be highly contagious and provide the spark to kindle interest into a willingness to try volunteer service.

Following are sample forms which will be useful in a recruitment campaign:

V. INTERVIEWING, SELECTING AND ASSIGNING VOLUNTEERS

INTERVIEWING POTENTIAL VOLUNTEERS

Any organization that hopes to succeed knows it is necessary to have competent personnel. Competence can be defined as a fitness for purpose, and every job requires some degree of fitness.

Volunteer programs will be effective to the extent that volunteers are competent for their jobs. Thus the success of volunteer service depends on fitting the right person to the right job. This is the basic objective to be met in interviewing prospective volunteers.

Some persons having an interest in volunteer service are surprised to learn that the interview should be standard procedure. However, prospective volunteers seldom resent it, providing it is managed with skill and personal consideration. The interview can serve to make the volunteer feel important to the degree that it emphasizes that a volunteer's ability to perform meaningful activities will meet specific needs of the school or agency served.

The interviewing of the volunteer is usually done by the volunteer coordinator, but this procedure may be shared with others. In any case, the persons interviewing should have certain skills and experiences. They should be skillful in observing and be at ease when conversing with strangers. Interviewers should also be very familiar with the philosophy and procedures of the volunteer program and have knowledge of all volunteer jobs currently available. It is extremely helpful if the interviewer has served as a volunteer or spent time observing volunteers in action. This will enable the interviewer to give clear explanations of what is expected of a volunteer and what a volunteer can expect from the program.

Although many think of interviewing as a highly technical skill practiced by a small number of professionals, many of the techniques of interviewing are practiced daily in ordinary conversation. By building on that base of common experience, it is easy to acquire proficiency in interviewing.

Interviewing is communication, with the particular purpose of gaining knowledge of prospective volunteers and determining their potential to help meet the needs of the volunteer program. The goals of interviewing are (1) establishing a friendly relationship, (2) securing information, (3) giving information, (4) providing potential volunteers a chance to ask questions about the program, and (5) determining where they can be used in the program. The interview should not be viewed as a selecting out process, but rather as an opportunity to assure that each potential volunteer is placed in a situation where she can make the most of her time and skills and receive the greatest satisfaction for the time she gives.

The personal interview is an effective means of becoming acquainted with the potential volunteer, finding out individual interests and developing understanding between the volunteer and the volunteer program. In the interview, potential volunteers should have an opportunity to express likes and dislikes, explain specialized skills or experiences and outline time available for volunteering.

Group interviewing is another effective means of developing goodwill and understanding between potential volunteers and the program. While the opportunities to become personally acquainted and learn of individual interests are diminished, there are certain advantages. Persons with urgently needed skills can be encouraged to participate through a group interview. The fact that individuals familiar with the program can expand community awareness may result in others joining the program. It may be necessary to follow-up the group with personal interviews of the more interested people. Group interviewing has special application when clubs or organizations assume responsibility for a special component of a volunteer program.

Effective interviewing achieves feelings of mutual confidence between the interviewer and potential volunteer. As with other skills, practice helps the interviewer become more successful at creating these feelings. Specific techniques that can assist are:

1. Put the potential volunteer at ease with a warm greeting. Perform an overt act such as offering a chair or taking a coat. Start the conversation with a general remark about a general topic. Continue pleasant conversation until the volunteer is relaxed. Remember, conversation must always be volunteer-centered.

2. Begin the interview where the volunteer wants to and help her explain what motivated her interest in the program.

3. An important interview technique is the art of questioning. Questions are asked for two purposes: To obtain needed information and to direct the conversation into particular channels. Open-ended questions are better than "yes" or "no" ones. It is very important that the interviewer be a good listener. By asking brief and relevant questions, it is possible to find out whether or not the volunteer understands the essential points which have been made.

4. Weave an interpretation of the program into the conversation. This is the art of giving information. The interviewer must look interested and present the information in an interesting manner. The amount of information given will depend upon the volunteer. One with special skills or previous volunteer experience can be given in-depth information. An applicant with few skills or no previous experience may be overwhelmed by too much information.

5. Be certain to obtain information specifically related to potential assignments. This might include physical limitations, availability of a car, or definite time constraints.

6. Descriptions of possible assignment can encourage the volunteer to talk about previous volunteer or work experiences. In this manner, conversation can be directed toward educational and life experiences, including personal attitudes. Specific assignments are discussed in relation to the volunteer's experiences, interests, abilities and attitudes.

7. Don't permit an interview to drag on. It should be just long enough to become acquainted, to find out about the volunteer's interest and motivations, to provide information about the program, to answer questions, and to discuss potential assignment. Normally, an interview may last up to a half hour.

8. Ending the interview when the volunteer can be placed is easy. Be certain, however, that the volunteer has a clear understanding of where and when she is to serve and what next steps must be taken, such as X-rays, orientation, etc.

9. When the volunteer cannot be placed, be honest and explain that there is no assignment consistent with the volunteer's qualifications. Subterfuges, such as waiting list or future interviews annoy and disappoint and can make the potential volunteer antagonistic toward the program. Another technique to use in such instances is that of referral to other volunteer programs. Such referral should provide the name and address of a specific person, but should not be made unless the interviewer believes the volunteer will qualify for the other agency's program. A sample interviewer's report and volunteer job description follow:

SELECTING THOSE TO SERVE

The selection of volunteers should be guided by the goals of the program. These goals, in turn, should serve to reinforce the philosophy and objectives of the school or agency.

Therefore, the primary selection consideration is the capacity of volunteers to extend services to the student, schools, or agencies. A secondary consideration is the satisfaction and enrichment volunteers experience through their service.

Individual qualities to be considered during the selection process include:
1. A basic acceptance of differences in people, values, standards, goals, and ambitions coupled with respect for individual integrity.
2. Warmth and friendliness in relating to people.
3. Respect for the principle of confidentiality.
4. Commitment to the concept of volunteer work.
5. Possession of knowledge, learned skills, experience, hobbies, and interests that lead to a constructive contribution to the volunteer program.
6. Recognition of abilities and resources possessed by others and willingness to accept these talents.
7. Mental alertness, readiness to learn, sense of humor, and the ability to grasp new ideas and accept work evaluation by authorized supervisors.
8. Sufficient sense of organizational procedures to be able to accept discipline and work happily within a structure.
9. Maturity of outlook and sense of personal security enabling one to function without continued praise from others.
10. Ability to neither impose personal values on others nor judge others by personal standards.

Each volunteer should be selected according to the job to be done, the qualifications required for effective job performance, and the attitudes verbally expressed and indirectly revealed. Experience indicates that volunteers who are carefully selected demonstrate a pattern of more regular service over longer period of time. Yet with a careful and sensitive assignment policy, most programs find spots for all desiring to serve, regardless of the uniqueness of an individual request.

ASSIGNING THE NEW VOLUNTEER

The careful assignment of volunteers can be one of the most significant procedures in the operation of the volunteer program. By assigning responsibilities that correspond with their talents, interests, and potential capabilities, volunteers can be given opportunities to contribute to the enrichment of the school or agency program, and simultaneously experience personal satisfaction.

It is important that the volunteer understand the nature of a proposed assignment completely. For this purpose, written volunteer job descriptions are a big help. Clear consensus on job expectations from the beginning can reduce the likelihood of later disappointment and dissatisfaction. The need for consensus on what the job entails is paramount if the new volunteer is to remain with the program any length of time. Failure to define adequately the role to be assumed by a volunteer is a major reason for persons dropping out of volunteer programs. As most volunteers are ready to work immediately, assignment should be made as soon as possible with the volunteer's experience, skills and interests clearly in mind.

As the actual assignment of a volunteer usually occurs sometime after the initial interview, the volunteer should be called and given the details of her assignment. This telephone call should be followed by a letter telling where and when to report. The letter should also give explicit directions on how to reach the school or agency where she will be working. This would include directions to appropriate public transportation. The volunteer should also be told what office to report to and whom she is to see. While these are simple things, they can make a volunteer feel at ease when she begins her assignment.

There are four other assignment techniques which serve to strengthen a program:

1. As soon as possible, notify the volunteer coordinator at the school to which the volunteer has been assigned. Specify the day and hour the volunteer will be reporting so that the coordinator will be prepared.

2. At the same time, school personnel should be told of the volunteer's arrival and the job she will be performing.

3. New volunteers can be assigned in teams of two. Thus, a feeling of comfort and security is derived from entering a new situation with someone else who is also beginning the same new experience.

4. In any program there are some unattractive jobs such as filling out attendance sheets and filing, which must be performed. Rather than assigning them to one volunteer, let all at one location share them on a rotating basis.

If a suitable assignment cannot be made immediately because of nonmatching time, transportation difficulties, etc., the volunteer should be told the reason and be encouraged to participate in orientation meetings and other general activities. In this way, the interest of the volunteer is sustained and some of the essential training can be completed prior to actual volunteer service. It is much better to involve a volunteer in training than to delay any participation until a specific job assignment can be made.
VI. ORIENTATION AND TRAINING OF VOLUNTEERS

When designing a training program, an administrator or coordinator should set three basic objectives:

1) To orient volunteers and to train them for the jobs they are expected to accomplish

2) To orient staff members to the program and to show them how to use volunteers effectively

3) To provide on-the-job training and assistance for volunteers and professionals to meet needs and solve problems which arise as volunteers work

While this chapter is concerned with volunteer training, the objectives of a total training program for all involved — volunteer, professional, and administrator — must be considered through all planning.

A prime ingredient for a successful volunteer program is a well-informed and competent volunteer. Such a volunteer will be knowledgeable about the objectives of the program; she will thoroughly understand what her role is to be and she will be equipped with the skills necessary to make her assignment a pleasant and personally rewarding one. One way to achieve such competence is through a sound training program. Another benefit of training activities is that they are a means of involving volunteers in the program quickly, thereby maintaining their interest and developing their skills before they receive a specific job assignment. Through training, volunteers may discover they are more interested in another type of assignment than the one for which they originally signed up.

Every one has a need for knowledge, growth and new experiences; every person wants to learn new things. Those who volunteer often have an especially strong motivation to learn. They want to learn how to help others and how to help effectively. This eagerness will make the job of the trainer a rewarding one. Each person will bring his own special skills and knowledge which he can share with the group. In turn, he will want others to share their special abilities. But a good training program will not only equip volunteers with new skills and techniques, it will also give them an opportunity to learn about themselves and to become more aware of how others see them.

At the same time, it allows for a heightened awareness and sensitivity to others. This auxiliary learning will occur while the group is learning new skills, working with each other and learning about volunteer programs.

Volunteers gain new knowledge from the training situation. During training, each should be able to learn by looking at the group and at himself. One of the objectives of training is to help the volunteer incorporate a new knowledge of skills and techniques into a new awareness of self and others as she prepares for her volunteer assignment.

Training may also make new experiences possible for the learners. From the training situation, the volunteer may gain new friends, new interests, a feeling of belonging to an organization which extends beyond the boundaries of a neighborhood and new contacts with a variety of people. Most importantly, each person will have a chance to do things with others — a chance to do things she has never done before.

One may well ask, how can all these objectives, both program oriented and personal, be met through training activities? It is important to remember that while some of these objectives must be planned for, others occur simply through group interaction.

All training activities should be conceived of as a total program, including the following components:

1. Orientation to the volunteer program

2. Pre-service training for the job to be accomplished

3. Orientation to the specific job site

4. On-going inservice training on the job

In planning training activities, it is necessary to make a distinction between orientation and training. Orientation acquaints the volunteer with the policies, procedures and goals of the program and sponsoring agency or organization. Training should develop concrete skills to accomplish specific tasks. Orientation should be an introduction to volunteering and to the school system or agency the volunteer will be serving. It should also give the volunteer an understanding of what her role will be. The training that follows orientation is more specific and operational. It should be so structured that the volunteer knows immediately why materials are presented and how they will be used on the job.

ORIENTATION

Orientation sessions should give the volunteer an overview of the total program, as well as general information on the group or individuals with which she will be working. Orientation should take no more than two sessions of two hours each. Preferably, it will be done in one session so that volunteer interest will not wane before specific job assignments are made.

Meaningful orientation activities would include:

1. Objectives and aims, policies and procedures of the volunteer program

2. Brief survey of the development and operation of the school system, agency or organization the volunteer will be serving, including its problems and needs

3. Areas in which volunteer assistance is used including administration of the volunteer program as well as that of the school or agency. This explanation should also include the basic skills needed in each area

4. General characteristics of the group or individuals the volunteer will be assisting.

5. The role of the volunteer in the school or agency setting.

These sessions may be conducted by the volunteer coordinator with the assistance of school or agency personnel and experienced volunteers.

While there are many ways in which orientation may be arranged, the following format has been used with success in many educational volunteer programs. The session will take from 3 to 3½ hours and is usually scheduled for the morning as most volunteers are free at that time. However, orientation sessions should also be scheduled for the afternoon or early evening to accommodate volunteers who cannot attend a morning meeting. This will be especially true for after-school or evening tutorial programs.

- This presentation should give an overall concept of what the school or agency is attempting to achieve through its curriculum or program. It may include an overall description of how the school system or agency operates, what its problems and needs are and what the volunteer has done or can do to meet some of these needs to support the total school or agency program.
- As a general introduction to volunteer service in the schools, a film (such as "The Art of Human Giving," prepared by the Des Moines Area Community College) may be used in this portion of the orientation.

- This presentation should interweave a description of the volunteer program and volunteer service is used to support the program of the schools or agency
- the goals and objectives, policies and procedures of the volunteer program, and

- areas in which volunteer assistance is needed and what skills are required for each job.

If available, slides, a slide-cassette presentation or a film showing volunteers, filling a variety of roles, should be used. The coordinator may also wish to include facts and figures on the amount of service given to the school system or agency by the volunteer program.

Volunteers should also be given materials containing the policies and procedures of the program and outlining possible job assignments and the skill requirements for each. Often this material is incorporated into "A Handbook for Volunteers."

There is discussion with volunteers, answering questions which have arisen during orientation. Following this, volunteers receive their assignments. Those who have indicated areas of interest requiring additional training are notified of the training schedule. Those to serve as general assistants are notified when and where to report.

Although orientation sessions have been held for as many as 50 and as few as five people, the ideal group is composed of 20 to 30 persons, allowing for more group interaction, yet not freezing shyer people into silence. Therefore, orientation sessions should be scheduled several times a year. Usually there is little need to have orientation after Easter as most people interested in volunteering will then wait until the fall rather than begin so late in the school year.

Sometimes the problems arise of what to do with a volunteer who comes in just after orientation. Do you assign her or do you make her wait until the next orientation. The answer is a loud NO! Do not make her wait!! By all means contact an understanding principal or school coordinator and assign the volunteer there until the next orientation. There are many means to an end and a good volunteer should not be turned aside because she had the misfortune to come in the day after orientation.
PRE-SERVICE TRAINING

Following orientation, all volunteers not working as general school or classroom assistants should receive pre-service training. Such sessions are necessary for those areas of volunteer service which demand special skills as:

1. One-to-one or small group tutoring in areas such as reading, math, science, etc.
2. Conversational English for non-English speaking children.
3. Pre-kindergarten programs.
4. School library assistance.
5. After-school tutorial or recreational programs.
6. Adult education programs.
7. Media and audio-visual equipment maintenance.
8. Other special areas defined by the needs and objectives of the program.

In addition, volunteers will need specialized training if they are to use programmed materials such as Distar Reading or Math the Houghton-Mifflin math series, etc.

ELEMENTS OF TRAINING

While the specifics of any training activities must be worked out to meet the needs of each volunteer program, there are several elements which will be common to any pre-service training program:

1. Overview of the area for which training is given.
   Volunteers need to be given some background of the area in which they will be working. For example, if a volunteer will be assisting a teacher using the Sullivan reading program, Project Read, he or she should be acquainted with the philosophy underlying the program and the objectives it seeks to attain. Given this basic information, the additional methods and materials the volunteer receives have perspective and greater meaning.

2. Principles of human growth and development for the age group with which the volunteer will be working — "how people learn.”
   To achieve the greatest degree of effectiveness, volunteers should be given a general outline of how people learn and what factors can be used to stimulate learning. For instance, motivating an adult to learn basic reading skills is different from motivating a junior high school student. Working with a sixth-grader on mathematical concepts requires an approach different from the one used with a second-grader because the difference in age implies not only a difference in the materials used but also a difference in the way the pupil absorbs the materials. An understanding of maturational differences will enable the volunteer to adjust her material to meet her tutee's needs and can eliminate part of the time-wasting trial-and-error approach to stumbling upon something that works.

3. General characteristics of the group or individuals the volunteer will be assisting.
   All people are different, but certain differences can be characterized. As an example, younger children usually have shorter attention spans than older children and therefore need shorter units of work and a wider variety of activities to teach a concept. Children who have difficulty reading may tend to be non-verbal and need to handle objects rather than just talk about them in order to conceptualize. Making the volunteer aware of certain learning characteristics of the group with which she will be working gives additional skill in how to cue in on a problem and help remediate it.

4. Definite objectives to be met through volunteer assistance.
   In addition to having a perspective on the area in which they will be working and the people they will be assisting, volunteers should have a clearcut understanding of what they are seeking to accomplish — what their goals are. The setting of objectives is beneficial to volunteer as it suggests an end which should be reached within a given time. To illustrate this point, a volunteer is working with a child for whom English is a second language. She knows that her goal is to equip that child with enough English to participate fully in the classroom. Therefore she will spend her time building an English vocabulary and teaching basic structural patterns. She will not concentrate on the finer points of grammar, but will leave this for later instruction once the child can communicate with some facility in English. In this case a clear cut goal has determined how the volunteer will approach the tutoring situation and how she will proceed.

5. Specific activities to be carried out to meet the objectives.
   Many aspects of training serve to give the volunteer a sense of security and confidence when she begins her assignment. One of the simplest is to present activities which the volunteer can adapt and modify to meet the special needs of the pupils she will assist. Reading aides should try out, for example, activities they can use with student having difficulty with consonant blends, or blending word parts or understanding what they read. These activities give the volunteers a starting point from which she helps. Often a volunteer handbook or guidebook prepared by the program will contain specific activities for volunteers to carry out as well as suggest ways in which other activities can be developed.

6. Materials, games and ideas for volunteers to use.
   Hand in hand with specific learning activities go other materials and games which can make learning fun. Volunteers are usually very resourceful people and given a few basic materials can create what they need to meet a given situation. Therefore, basic instruction in making charts, graphs, pictures, puzzles, etc. and operating different kinds of equipment such as tape recorders, projectors, etc. will lead to imaginative uses of this equipment and materials by volunteers.

7. Definition of the volunteer’s role in relation to professional staff.
   Equipped with aspects of the knowledge and skills outlined above, a volunteer must know what the professional, whether teacher or other staff member, expects. Her goals and to some extent, the goals of program, are tempered by professional expectations. Once a volunteer knows what her role is to be, she then has a framework in which to work. A definition of the volunteer's role should be in specific rather than general terms. It is not enough to say that a volunteer will provide supportive services to teachers and handle various clerical tasks. The duties of the volunteer should be specified i.e. check attendance, fill out health forms, prepare seat work, etc. Clarifying the role the volunteer will assume marks the beginning of a comfortable working atmosphere in which both the professional and volunteer know their duties and can act as a team to carry them out.

8. Definition of the staff member's role in relation to the volunteer.
   Just as the role of the volunteer must be defined, so must be the role of the professional staff member as it relates to the volunteer. Within a school situation, not only the teacher with whom the volunteer will be working, but also the principal and other staff members, should clearly understand how they support volunteer service. Through role definition, the professional will know what supportive services a volunteer can provide and how he can utilize these services to best advantage.

For example, one program specifically outlines professional responsibilities for volunteer service. One area in which volunteers are used is the developmental classroom, a program for first grade children not able to perform at the level necessary to learn basic academic skills. Teachers know that they are expected to explain the program to the volunteer. Then, they review the use of materials and equipment within the classroom that volunteers will be using to develop spatial relationships, motor skills, language development, social skills, etc. They are also encouraged to include the volunteer in planning class activities. Thus, the volunteer and teacher are able to work as a team with each having a clear understanding of what her role in the partnership is to be.

DEVELOPING THE TRAINING PROGRAM

In developing a training program, the following suggestions can prove to be extremely useful:

1. Keep the training practical and specific as volunteers don’t want to hear much professional and educational jargon and gobbledygook. Remember this is a training session, not a six credit college course! Keep lecturing to a minimum.
2. Use a variety of techniques: role-playing, buzz sessions, reports, etc.
3. Involve local specialists who can give solid, substantial training. If funds will allow for consultants, don’t overlook outside persons who may have a new approach.
4. Prepare good visual aids and written materials for use in training.
5. Use experienced volunteers to help train new volunteers.
6. If possible, have a comprehensive training manual to give to volunteers.
7. Teach in small groups so there can be stimulative discussion.
8. Plan a second training meeting after volunteers have been working a month or two — it’s hard to grasp everything the first time you hear it or before you’ve really worked on the job.
9. Get expressions from volunteers of what THEY need and want in the training. Gear the training to these suggestions. Have the volunteers evaluate what they are getting. Complete evaluation of training is a must! Use those who have been trained and those to receive training to determine what works, what additional elements are needed, etc.

TECHNIQUES OF TRAINING

There are many ways of training volunteers or professionals. Often many programs will use the lecture approach as it is one of the easiest methods, from the trainer’s view, of getting information to an audience. However, it is not always the most successful as it requires little audience participation and response. Unfortunately many audiences — and volunteers are no exception — have the tendency to "tune out" when deluged by a flood of words. This does not mean that a training program should never include lectures; certain topics may best be presented in a lecture. This is only to suggest some alternative training techniques which may also be used:

1. Role-playing

Role-playing is an accepted way for participants and audience to learn a variety of skills and to gain insights about human behavior. Those being trained often enjoy and learn quickly from role playing. It is a direct learning experience in which the learner lives through the situation being acted out. Role-playing also involves many group members and develops before the audience data about human behavior and human relations. It provides a common experience for group discussion and helps people gain insight into their own feelings and the feelings of others. Through role-playing many feelings, attitudes, and behaviors can be demonstrated before a group, and information can be presented.

Role-playing also gives group members a chance to try new behaviors and skills in a laboratory setting. Here, they can make mistakes that would be unfortunate if made in a real-life situation. Role playing will also enable your trainees to try out new behavior in front of their peers rather than in front of the people with whom they may be working.

When doing role playing with your training group, keep these steps in mind:

- Have a director responsible for all the procedural aspects of role playing, thus getting the total group involved.
- Determine and define a problem to be role-played.
- Establish a situation.
- Select and cast role players.
- Brief and warm up players.
- Act out the situation. It is important to cut the role playing when the essentials have been played.
- Discuss the situation, with role players and audience analyzing the "play" to see what has been learned or revealed. The situation can be re-played if this seems plan for the use of insights gained or new skills learned. When initiating role-playing with your group, it is also important to use a simple, non-threatening situation that can be understood easily by the group. Be careful with the selection of role players, as people must feel reasonably comfortable about playing a role. Situations that would invoke personal exposure should be avoided. Make sure the players and the audience are convinced that the actors are portraying roles and should be observed only in terms of the role being portrayed. It is a good idea to give the role players a name other than their own to reinforce the role idea.

It is best to use role-playing only if the problem in question is one involving problems in human social relations and their solution. Conduct role-playing without too much planning or preparation. The value of role-playing lies in the spontaneity of the players' reactions.

Look for more information on role-playing in the chapter on using high school volunteers.

2. Video or audio tape vignettes and case materials

The taped vignette is a helpful teaching device through which a group can see or listen to a situation on tape and then discuss it. If there are particular situations which you want presented to a group, you can even have the volunteers produce their own. The trainees can be given a case, that is, a summary of a problem or situation, imaginary or real, presented in such a way that it will provoke discussion and possible solutions to the problem.

When using either of these techniques, the trainer must be sure that he has the audio-visual equipment he needs and that it is in working order. It is also imperative that a competent operator of the equipment is present. An entire training session can be ruined when the movie projector has no bulb or no one knows how to operate the tape recorder.

3. Buzz groups

The "buzz group" is a device for getting many persons in a large group involved. Two or three people “buzz” with one another for a short period on a specific question. Other subgroups include discussion and “discussion 6-6,” in which six persons meet for six minutes to discuss a particular question. After discussing the problem in the subgroup, feedback is then given to the group as a whole.

Use subgroups. In working with those in your training group, remember that a good way to involve each one of them in discussion, in thinking, and in problem-solving, is simply by dividing the group into small subgroups to tackle a question or a problem. This increases participation by creating a situation in which each member of the group feels more responsibility to participate and more comfort in doing so in front of a similar group. Each member of a subgroup is more apt to speak up and say what is on his mind.

4. Workshops

A workshop is commonly a gathering of people for the purposes of receiving information, exchanging experiences, training, and directly participating in activities related to problem-solving or skill development. Workshops may use specific teaching skills for demonstrating the use of particular materials or equipment.

5. Movie forum

The movie-forum is a program that includes first a motion picture, then a speaker, followed by a discussion led by a skillful leader. The leader might supply the group with an outline of questions which would guide their thoughts while viewing the movie.

6. Panel discussion

The panel discussion is an informal conversation between several persons in front of an audience. This provides an easy transition from panel to audience discussion, but requires a skillful moderator.

7. Brainstorming

Brainstorming is a kind of informal “group think” session. It usually works best when the question to be discussed is simple, when judicial judgment is ruled out, when free-wheeling is welcomed, when all ideas are accepted, and when a combination and improvement of ideas are sought. The value of this method is that everyone can participate (groups range in size) and judgment is ruled out. Also, out of many ideas, a number of usable ones usually emerge. Participation is at a high point; everyone’s ideas count.

8. Lecture alternatives

The lecture-forum is a formal lecture followed by a period for discussion and questions by the audience. The plus factor of this method is that facts and information are supplied. The negative factors include the difficulty of heavy dependence on one person and only brief questioning — no real audience participation.

The lecture-discussion group is a device where both the speakers and the participants interact. After the content has been presented, the audience asks questions, makes comments, and enlarges on points made.

ON-THE-JOB ORIENTATION

Before beginning their assignment, volunteers should have an on-site orientation informing them of specific policies and procedures of the school or site where they will be working. While these policies are important for any agency, they are even more crucial if the volunteer is assisting in a school situation. Such orientation may be handled by the school principal or chief administrator of the site or his designee. It may also be conducted by the site volunteer coordinator. Regardless of who conducts the on-site orientation, it should have three major parts and take no more than one session.

1. Getting acquainted with the work situation should include an introduction to the administration and staff, as well as a few facts about the immediate community, the agency or school they serve. At this time a tour of the plant can be given noting exits, fire drill route, lavatories, supply and bookrooms and eating, smoking and parking facilities. A brief observation of classes can also be given.

2. The volunteer coordinator or staff person should inform the volunteer of her administrative responsibilities which include filling out the time sheet, reporting absences, using equipment, etc.
3. It is important that the volunteers be informed of all pertinent policies and procedures. This should include scheduling, discipline of students, releasing children to adults, use of telephone, homework and notes to be sent home, use of school or agency keys, use of custodial services, etc. If possible the volunteer should be given a copy of the handbook listing all procedures to use as long as she serves in the school.

Once the volunteer is assigned to the person with whom she will be working, on-the-job training is underway. For classroom situations the teacher should discuss with the newly assigned volunteer:
1. The educational level of the class.
2. Special problems within the class.
3. Class routines and procedures.
4. The specific job the volunteer will do.

Additionally, the volunteer and teacher should draw up plans for periodic meetings to discuss the volunteer’s activity in the classroom as it relates to the students with whom she works. Before the volunteer begins, she should have an opportunity to observe at least one class session to get the feel of the situation she will be entering.

Volunteers assigned to general duties in the school office, health room, playground, lunchroom, etc., should be briefed by the person in charge of that area or by the volunteer coordinator.

CONTINUING TRAINING

Provision should be made for in-service volunteer training during the year. This will give volunteers an opportunity to discuss problems which have arisen while tutoring and to learn new techniques to meet these needs. Other training may be scheduled to instruct volunteers in the preparation of educational aids and in the operation of various machines and audio-visual equipment.

If desired by both, special training sessions to handle a problem or situation may be planned and executed jointly by volunteers and school or agency staff. Volunteers should assume responsibility of preparing and presenting non-professional materials while staff members handle all professional aspects.

Volunteers should have other opportunities to broaden their scope. Volunteers may be encouraged to meet as a group at least once a month to strengthen their morale, improve the quality of service, and foster an esprit de corps that is vital for an integrated program. Opportunities for outside experts in fields related to the volunteers’ work to speak can be a source of inspiration, motivation and knowledge.

Volunteers should be encouraged to engage in a variety of activities directed toward increasing their own competence. Some suggested activities are:
1. Attending school faculty or agency meetings, by invitation
2. Attending workshops in specific subject areas
3. Attending conferences
4. Observing skilled teachers or volunteers
5. Reading pertinent books or periodicals
6. Reading curriculum guides or agency operational policy
7. Consulting informally with staff members or other volunteers

To improve the quality of the program, volunteers should be encouraged to develop ideas for better volunteer service and relay them to the volunteer coordinator for follow up. Another adjunct of volunteer service should be participation in community or civic organizations having improvement of the schools or service agencies as one of its primary objectives. As the ultimate consumer of the educational process, parents, in the long run, can bring about more immediate changes than “do gooder” organizations can. Thus, volunteer service can turn into citizen power in action.

VII. ORIENTATION AND TRAINING FOR PROFESSIONAL PERSONNEL

To realize the full potential of the services they give, it is vital that volunteers be welcomed and accepted by the professional staff of the school or agency where they will be working. Volunteers should be made to feel that they are a part of a team - a team whose major objective is to provide a quality education to children and others.

In many instances, volunteers, well-trained for their assignment, find that the professional with whom they are to work cannot fully use their talents. In the majority of cases, professionals do not fully utilize volunteer abilities because they are unsure of what a volunteer can do or because they are reluctant to relinquish a portion of their duties, even the non-professional ones, to another. Therefore, such an attitude of uncertainty limits what the volunteer can hope to accomplish even before her assignment begins. Reports from established educational volunteer programs indicate that when professional staff members have a full understanding of the role of the volunteer they accept them readily. Thus, when one teacher uses volunteer assistance satisfactorily and shares this knowledge with other teachers, they, too, become willing to have volunteers in their classroom.

While the word-of-mouth approach is one way to inform professionals to the value of volunteer service, a developing program must have a method to inform larger numbers of professionals of volunteer benefits. Sound orientation activities for professionals, coupled with on-going assistance as they work with volunteers, is one way to accomplish the desired effect.

There is ready recognition of the need to train volunteers, but often little is done to “train” staff members to understand, accept, and assist volunteers. Many of the negative or questioning attitudes and concerns of educational staff can be modified by advanced planning and thoughtful orientation which directly involves them. Also the frequent turn-over in school staff especially in low-income areas indicates a need for continuous orientation to the benefits of volunteer service. It is important that such orientation should involve all staff members, both professional and non-professional, administrative, teaching and clerical. Such an orientation program might be given during "released time" periods.

COMPONENTS OF A PROGRAM

An orientation for staff should have its prime purpose an explanation of the roles volunteers can fill and what part must be played by staff members to allow for maximum benefit from volunteers. Five sub-goals grow out of this objective:

1. To acquaint the staff of the school or agency with the goals and structure of the volunteer program.
2. To define areas of curriculum or program activities which can be carried out by volunteers under professional supervision.
   a) Describing skills and techniques volunteers will have in a given area.
   b) Demonstrating materials volunteers can use.
3. To equip staff members with techniques for fostering sound interpersonal relationships with volunteers.
4. To interest staff members in inservice training and assistance as they work with volunteers.
5. To explain the need for meaningful evaluation leading to the improvement of the volunteer program.

PLANNING FOR ORIENTATION

When planning the orientation session, involve all persons necessary to make the program successful — administrators, teachers and volunteers. Having them involved in the planning will bring different perspectives on the role of the volunteers into the picture and should suggest additional topics which need to be brought to the attention of all staff members.

Allocate adequate time for staff orientation. Ample time should be allowed for full and open discussion, particularly if this is the first time volunteers are to be used at a site. The fuller the understanding of the program is, the greater the chance for success. Finding sufficient time may be difficult; perhaps the time allotted for staff development can be used for orientation. Orientation should take no more than one half-day meeting at the most. Regardless of time, plan to keep the atmosphere relaxed and informal, but well organized. A hot coffee pot is also a good idea.

In acquainting staff members with the goals and structure of the program; the procedure used should be similar to that used with new volunteers. As a general introduction to volunteerism and to demonstrate the various assignments often given to volunteers, audio-visual presentations should be considered. As one goal of staff orientation is to develop the concept of the team approach, volunteer-staff pairs who have worked together with success should be used. They can be effective in stressing the need for meaningful interpersonal relationships. Staff members already skilled in the utilization of volunteers may be used to define the role of the professional in relation to the volunteer.

Many, if not all of the training techniques outlined in volunteer training can be used in orienting the staff. Combining several of the techniques leads variety in the orientation session and will help keep interest high.

There are many formats which may be used for the orientation of staff. A session for the staff at a specific site is only one suggestion. Another alternative would be to have a session including some new and some experienced volunteers who serve in a school or related agency. Whatever the format used, the emphasis should be placed upon helping the staff understand the values to be derived from volunteer participation and how volunteers can extend the service capability of the school or agency.

The desired result of the orientation session is to obtain staff cooperation in the implementation of the volunteer program. In the final analysis, the success of the volunteer in the educational setting depends upon the degree of positive readiness of the staff to work with volunteers, and vice versa.

An alternative format for staff orientation is a joint volunteer-staff orientation. Benefits other than common understanding of goals and practices can be realized through this type of joint activity. It can, for example, lead to healthier volunteer-staff relationships. Joint sessions can also reduce the time and energy expended on orientation programs. This format will also enable the volunteer to become acquainted with the staff member with whom she will be working.

Regardless of what format is used, a successful orientation for staff will make them feel comfortable with volunteer assistance and increase their interest and desire to use volunteers.
VIII. USING HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS AS VOLUNTEERS

When planning for a new volunteer program or expanding one already in operation, the use of high school students as volunteers should not be overlooked. They often can bring to a program a spark of enthusiasm and empathy which older volunteers have lost. Because of the relative closeness in age between them and the children they assist, they are frequently able to view the child in a manner different from adults and may be able to establish a stronger rapport with younger children. The child being tutored is also less like to see them in a parent or teacher role, but is more prone to view them as an older brother, sister or friend.

Benefits from using older students to assist younger ones accrue to both the tutee and the tutor. Results from several programs of cross-age tutoring demonstrate that while both tutee and tutor gain skills, often the gain made by the tutor is greater. Such tutoring activity has led to enlarged vocational aspirations, greater empathy for the classroom teacher, and growth of self-pride as a result of a tutor’s work as an “instructor.” In addition, such a tutoring experience can be relevant to the tutor’s later functioning as a parent and employee.

If the program is an out-of-school program, recruiting high school volunteers is a fairly uncomplicated matter. In addition to the regular methods of recruitment outlined in the chapter on finding volunteers, high school students can be located through contact with teen clubs and recreation centers. School and church youth groups are also good sources for potential teen volunteers.

High school students have established a history of successful volunteer work in hospitals as candy-strippers, nurses aides, etc. There is no reason for their not achieving a similar level of success in educational programs. One added benefit derived from the use of student volunteers is that such volunteer experience can lead to related job fields. How many girls have entered nurses’ training because of a rewarding experience as a candy-stripper while in high school?

In scheduling high school volunteers, care must be taken to see that volunteer work does not interfere with the student’s regular school program.

Once high school students have been recruited for out-of-school programs, they must be given the same orientation and training as other volunteers, preferable in mixed groups (Don’t train all the students as one little group!) When students volunteer, there should be very clear explanations so that they thoroughly understand what their purpose is and what they are supposed to accomplish. Once involved in the program, students will often pinpoint areas in which additional service is needed and, being action-oriented, suggest ways in which the needs can be met — so coordinators be on your toes when using volunteers as they can really move a program!

Incorporating students into an in-school volunteer program may be a bit more difficult, but the positive results more than outweigh the problems. Areas of concern to the coordinator wanting to use teen volunteers during school hours include releasing students from classes, planning for transportation and defining the role of the student volunteer.

HOW TO PROCEED

Once you have decided to use high school volunteers during school hours, the first step is to identify areas in which they can serve. In addition to regular tutoring activities, high school students have been used effectively in physical education, art, music and drama programs at the elementary level. These services are especially needed in schools where specialists in these areas are available only a few days a week or not at all. Student volunteers can be used to maintain a day-to-day program for younger children in these fields. One school system has found high school volunteers particularly effective in working with children in the special education program, as well as providing one-to-one enrichment activities for gifted children.

After the needs have been identified, the potential program must be sold to the high school principal. Many principals will be amenable to the program if (1) the elementary schools at which the students will be working is close enough so that transportation is not a problem, (2) the student volunteers have clear-cut duties and responsibilities and are well supervised and, most importantly, (3) volunteer service does not interfere with the student’s attendance of major subjects.

Good planning can overcome the problem of the function of the student volunteer and his supervision. Using a high school near the tutoring site will overcome the problem of transportation. As most high school students have periods for study hall or “personal inquiry” built into their schedules, there is time for volunteering.

If the principal is agreeable to the project, the next step is for him to assign an interested and willing teacher to act as high school coordinator. This teacher, working very closely with the volunteer coordinator, will recruit students to serve as volunteers, assist in scheduling the time of their service and generally serve as liaison and contact between the high school and the school volunteer program.

In many instances such an interested, concerned teacher has been the sparkplug for establishing a high school volunteer program. In one city, such a program was started by a Family Life teacher while searching for possible projects for the class to carry out. As many of the students were interested in working with young children, she approached the school volunteer coordinator at a nearby elementary school to discuss the possibility of her class working as volunteers. The volunteer coordinator was excited about the idea and the two of them drew up a plan whereby the high school students would tutor students in reading and math and assist in the kindergarten program, working on a staggered basis during the Family Life class period. The students accepted the plan and the principal agreed it was feasible. The students began volunteering and in one semester, the idea of school-time volunteer service had spread to other classes. Other teachers agreed to release students from class as long as their work remained satisfactory, and by the end of the school year over 50 students were working as volunteers. In a twist on the normal end-of-year recognition program for volunteers, the students decided to honor the elementary pupils with whom they had worked and invited them to a party at the high school. This school-to-school program is now in its second year of operation and has spread to two other high schools in the same city.

Supervision of the high school volunteers is also handled in an interesting manner. Although students must sign in, as do all volunteers, they also report to a parent who serves as volunteer student coordinator. Thus, if for some reason, a student cannot be present, the parent is there to fill in and keep things moving smoothly.

TRAINING FOR HIGH SCHOOL VOLUNTEERS

High school volunteers should receive the same program orientation and pre-service training as do adult volunteers. In providing pre-service training, one can consider using two techniques which have been effectively used in training teen-aged volunteers. The first of these is role-playing, a way of learning from acting out various problems and situations; the second is workshops.

Role-playing is an important, effective training device which, for many reasons, can be used both in pre-service and in-service training. It develops fullness of feeling and empathy for the situation. By acting out and watching how other people might react in a given situation (for example, a volunteer meeting his tutee for the first time), students learn to anticipate problems and to practice dealing with possible problems so that they will have confidence when such problems actually arise. Role-playing also helps by putting the student into another’s shoes in order to create a deeper understanding of that other person. Asked to play a tutor with a disruptive tutee, he is persuaded to think through the problem, and to practice dealing with it in a non-threatening situation. Through the process of acting and then discussing with others what he did as he role-played, the tutee becomes more aware of his own behavior, and is better able to confront a similar problem in actuality.

Role-playing, in short, is an interesting, fun-filled, and meaningful way of helping your tutors to feel more comfortable in a role which is new and sometimes threatening.

CONDUCTING A ROLE-PLAYING SESSION

A. Where to begin

1. Chat informally with the students as a group to get an idea of what they are thinking about, what is bothering them. Find out what scares them most about tutoring – what specific problems they have.

2. At first, do not discuss what role-playing is at length for it may make the students self-conscious. Have your tutors think about some problems they might be interested in trying out, Make the problem specific so as to make it easier to slip into the role. Set the stage; use props if you have them.

3. Start with common problems of interest to many members of the group. Begin actual role-playing with brief situations lasting only a few moments just to start things moving and involve people. Encourage an easy, slow, informal atmosphere. Humorous role-playing situations are good ways of getting shy students into the act. At first it is better to avoid actual tutoring situations; instead, start with something more familiar (people riding on subway, kids arguing over a comic book, etc.) as ice-breakers.

4. When getting started, multiple role-playing may be used. Here the entire audience forms into role-playing groups, the size of the groups depending on the number of participants required for the particular case. All groups role-playing simultaneously. Afterwards, each group discusses its results. This method quickly makes people less shy.

5. The role-player must not break out of his role-playing for intellectualizing or discussing. You as director can interrupt discreetly when necessary (if action is lagging, if confidence is needed, etc.), but essentially the flow of role-playing should not be interrupted or participants will lose interest.

B. Getting actors

1. Discussing problems that members of the group want to see acted out gives some idea of who might volunteer. During the session, watch people's eye movements, and headaches to see who is becoming involved, who shows a desire to participate.

2. If you build interest around a problem, you'll find that your tutors will be eager to role-play it. Don't pressure people, but give a good try to get a person into the act.

3. Don't encourage "actors" or those who are overly eager to try too much. Sometimes the sessions can be monopolized by a few "hams." Ideally everyone should experience a try. Don't rush into the role-playing situation but lead into it gradually.

C. Closing the session

Towards the end of each session talk about what you have seen. Help the students articulate what they have learned from the role-playing. Help them see the different ways in which people react to situations... that there is no one right way to handle a problem but that some ways work better than others. Try to make them aware of any observed movement toward solving a problem. The group, from watching each other, will have much material for discussion.
D. Additional tips

1. As students become more adept at role-playing, add new techniques to your supervision. As the role-playing is going on, manipulate the roles: e.g., make the volunteer more aggressive or the child more withdrawn. Change the attitude of the person being role-played; e.g., have a child who is happy suddenly become depressed.

2. Encourage the tutors to do more surprising things: to move around more, start singing or dancing, kicking wastebaskets. Point out the effects of change of pace and movement.

3. Have a person play someone of a different age or sex.

4. Try to concentrate more on the problem than the behavior of the role-player. Emphasize in discussion that the purpose of role-playing is not to develop actors but rather to develop more effective tutors.

TRAINING THOUGH WORKSHOPS

In many training programs, workshops are highly successful because they allow for learning by actually doing rather than the more passive and traditional kind of learning by listening and taking notes.

Teens and adults alike often tune out long verbal lectures because somehow the material is not relevant to them... they are not involved. Workshops prevent apathy by allowing people to use the materials as a means of learning how to use them, with the result that learning is more immediately relevant and challenging.

Of course, everything can't be covered in a workshop. Sometimes lecturing to a group is necessary to present certain material efficiently. Thus, it is important to be selective in setting up workshops. Choose a problem which can be generalized from... in other words, set up a workshop from which a student can glean ideas to apply in other situations. What he learns must not be so specific that it can only be followed once.

On the following pages some workshops are suggested for you to adapt to your program as you see fit:

1. Making Materials for Tutoring

   Student-made games and materials should be an important mainstay of programs. Students tend to invest more of themselves in things they make and they are likely to use these materials with more enthusiasm. Also, they learn themselves since making materials require a certain depth of understanding. And, of course, each child responds more to something that was made just for him. The following are a few ways of stimulating students to make their own materials during training. One good way of stimulating self-made materials is by having only a few commercial games and materials available.
   a. Give the students copies of Spice or one of the reference manuals suggested under references. Have each tutor select a game suggested in the book and actually make it.
   b. Next, have the students make another game which does the same thing as the game they have copied but which takes a different form, thus forcing them to be more creative.
   c. Give each student paper, paste, a cardboard box, magic markers, and scissors. Define a problem to be solved (for example, teaching synonyms) and have each one develop a different game to solve the problem.
   d. Give each student a magazine and have him cut out and mount pictures which he feels would most inspire children to write stories. Have him try pictures on another student having that student suggest a story to go with the picture. This exercise will give practice in asking stimulating questions about pictures.
   e. Show the students pictures that you have chosen and have them write a play for the younger children to act out.

2. Administering Informal Tests

   Students may wish to administer some informal test to tutees at the beginning of the program to point out any outstanding problems. Within the school system there are probably several reading specialists who could help you find an appropriate informal test. Several useful tests include:
   a. Phonics Inventory Tests. Some programs have asked reading specialist to prepare two one-page tests on phonics.
   b. The Dolch Word List.
   c. The most important thing to remember is that since the student is not a remedial reading teacher, he should not be asked to administer a technical reading test. A simple, clear-cut test or check list seems most appropriate to the skills and understanding of teenage tutors. Whatever test you give the students to use, be sure to give them time to practice administering it (or a more difficult version of it) to themselves during training.
   d. Give each student a magazine and have him cut out and mount pictures which he feels would most inspire children to write stories. Have him try pictures on another student having that student suggest a story to go with the picture. This exercise will give practice in asking stimulating questions about pictures.
   e. Show the students pictures that you have chosen and have them write a play for the younger children to act out.

3. Using Audio-visual equipment

   As students go through the following activities with various audio-visual aids, they should learn how to operate the equipment and how to use it creatively with their tutees. In your library you might provide a copy of A-V Instruction: Materials and Methods (McGraw-Hill Book Co., West 42nd Street, New York, New York) for the tutors to read in their free time.
   a. Cameras.
   b. Tape recorders.

and then listen to themselves talking. Students are proud when they notice the improvement in their own, as well as their tutees/speech.

c. Typewriters.
Like cameras, typewriters are an excellent device for stimulating children to write their own stories. The large-type primer typewriters have proven particularly valuable because the type is inviting and readable by younger children. In one program there is always a waiting line for the typewriter. Both tutors and tutees use it – tutors, for typing up the tutees’ stories and, even more frequently, for preparing teaching materials. Younger children are often motivated to write stories and letters just because it is fun to pick out words and see your own words appear in official-looking type. Typewriters can also be used in training. Have the tutors adapt activities to a tutorial situation.

d. Record players and records.
1. Go to the public library and visit the record room. Find the children’s section and select records, both singing and speaking, that could be useful in tutoring. Play some library records in training sessions, discussing how they might be used for tutoring.
2. Find records with catchy lyrics and rhythms that tutees would like. (Tom Glazer’s “On Top of Spaghetti” is particularly suitable.) Type words to song on ditto masters. Later, copies can be passed out for a song fest.
3. Give the students the challenge of finding out where, in your areas, films can be procured. Check the public libraries, the public school, and the schools of education at nearby universities.

e. Film strip projectors and move projectors.
Borrow some film/filmsstrip catalogues from your school A-V center (or visit the center).
1. Give each student a catalogue. Have him look through it and select three films or filmsstrips that he would want to use in tutoring. Ask him to plan three lessons around his selections which can be shared in discussion with other students.
2. Show films and filmsstrips (hopefully one that was suggested in the above activity) and discuss how the machine is run. Take turns showing them and consider various tutoring methods that would make imaginative use of it.
3. Give the students the challenge of finding out where, in your areas, films can be procured. Check the public libraries, the public school, and the schools of education at nearby universities.

IX. MAINTAINING VOLUNTEER MORALE

From their first involvement with the program, volunteers should begin to develop a feeling of belonging that will increase their desire to participate. The motivation to remain a part of a program is extremely important. A corps of satisfied volunteers who return year after year is not only the backbone of a program, but is also the best source of additional volunteers. While the desire to help others may be the initial stimulus to serve, a but is also the best source of additional volunteers. While the desire to help others may be the initial stimulus to serve, a volunteer’s continuing performance is directly affected by the degree of satisfaction her work provides. This satisfaction is a volunteer’s sole reward – she gets no pay check.

Therefore, if a program is to be successful and expand, great care must be taken to see that volunteers are satisfied and maintain a high level of morale.

Morale can be sustained by occasional mention of the benefits volunteers derive from their participation. These benefits, while discussed informally and in a light-handed way, can include:
1. Reminding the volunteer how useful her service is to others.
2. Stressing how volunteer service leads to more information on many relevant subjects.
3. Pointing out how volunteer service has led to the acquisition of new knowledge and skills.
4. Showing how volunteer service can lead to diversified jobs and additional responsibilities.

Publicity is another good way of maintaining volunteer morale as people always feel better when others are aware of what they are attempting to accomplish. Volunteers’ feelings of worth about themselves and the program can be reinforced through articles in the newspaper and reports or progress made on radio or television. A newsletter, published by the volunteers themselves and the program can be reinforced through articles in the newspaper and reports or progress made on radio or television. A newsletter, published by the volunteers themselves and the program can be reinforced through articles in the newspaper and reports or progress made on radio or television.

A newsletter should not only be distributed to volunteers, but also to staff and professional personnel to make the total program dynamic and important.

Careful matching of a volunteer’s interests and abilities with the job to be done will have much impact on volunteer morale. If volunteers sense an uncertainty about how they are to be used, they will develop doubts about staying with the program. Volunteers must have the freedom to express their dissatisfaction with current assignments or their interest in another assignment. If jobs have growth potential, volunteers should be promoted or given additional responsibility; if increased responsibility is limited, then the rotation of volunteers should be considered to keep interest high.

The importance of recognition for volunteers cannot be overlooked. Formal recognition programs and ceremonies are important. These may include:
1. Letters of appreciation
2. Presentation of awards, pins and certificates for service
3. Notes of appreciation in house newsletters or local papers
4. Formal introduction at school assemblies and programs
5. Coffee hours, teas and luncheons

Through such events volunteers will come to feel that their service is wanted and appreciated. Programs will develop recognition ceremonies to meet their particular needs and situations. The most important element of such a ceremony is that it provides an opportunity for others to hear of the job volunteers perform. To be sure, those involved on a day-to-day basis with volunteers are aware of their accomplishments, but an awards ceremony provides an opportunity for a broader public to learn of their activities.

Many volunteer programs across the country normally culminate a year's activity with a volunteer luncheon or dinner. At this occasion, with members of the school board and representatives of the superintendent's office in attendance, volunteers receive their certificates for service. Often special awards are given to those for service "above and beyond the call of duty." Members of the press are invited so that the greater community may learn of the rewarding service and identify the honored volunteers. This is good public relations for the entire program.

It is not difficult to sponsor such an event as this; many businesses and industries within the area can be called on for contributions. A hotel or hall may donate; perhaps a stationer or large industry will underwrite the cost of printing. All these services will reduce the cost to the program.

As worthwhile as these formal events are, day-to-day recognition is just as important. Examples of common courtesy and small expressions of thoughtfulness will, in the long run, be more meaningful than certificates or annual letters. Providing a special place where they can hang their coats and leave their belongings will make volunteers feel wanted. Arrangements for parking and coffee breaks also add to this feeling. In some programs, volunteers are given button or name tags which identify them. These also serve to give the volunteer a feeling of belonging in the total structure.

One of the most important factors influencing morale is the relationship that develops between people. One may volunteer because of the desire to work with a friend. Once at work, new associations and friendships develop with a variety of people. The nature of these relationships, whether with professional personnel or with another volunteer, will affect the nature of the program. A volunteer who enjoys the people with whom she comes in contact on a regular basis is likely to remain with the program.

The impact of relationships between professional personnel and the volunteer has a direct bearing on the quality of service given. Regardless of how well-informed or knowledgeable a volunteer is, she must be sure that her interests and desires dovetail with those of the professional. In other words, even if the volunteers, by virtue of previous education, training or experience, feel they have a better grasp of the matter than the professional, she must remember that the professional is in charge! The professional, by virtue of her responsibility and day-to-day contact, generally has an overall understanding of the problem. The volunteer is there to supplement those services.

As the primary goal of all personnel, whether volunteer or professional, is providing the best service, the idea of the volunteer as a member of the team will help maintain high volunteer morale. For such a team approach to be successful, the professional personnel should not view the volunteer as one who performs only routine, mechanical tasks, but should be willing to allow her to serve in many capacities, limited only by the knowledge, experience, and skills the volunteer has or is willing to acquire. In this way volunteer service can become a step in a career ladder program if the volunteer desires.

X. EVALUATION OF VOLUNTEER PROGRAMS

Carl B. Smith
Indiana University

Evaluation should start with the initial planning activities and continue throughout the operation of the program. It should not be something done once a year to look at the scores children or adults have made or the number of children or adults who entered and left the program. That data should be collected, of course, but they represent only part of what is necessary to assess a volunteer program.

There are three major activities to effective evaluation:
1) Ask questions that focus on important decisions;
2) Establish valid criteria for judging information;
3) Use appropriate means to gather data.

Thus an evaluation scheme looks like the following:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Major Questions</th>
<th>Sample Criteria</th>
<th>Sample Means</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Are we working on a real need?</td>
<td>Societal goals.</td>
<td>Interviews</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Is our objective manageable?</td>
<td>Understandable.</td>
<td>Questionnaire.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Personnel available.</td>
<td>Volunteer forms.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Techniques available.</td>
<td>Interview expert.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Logs.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Do the procedures work?</td>
<td>Client opinion.</td>
<td>Questionnaire.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Expert opinion.</td>
<td>Observation.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Does the product match the objective?</td>
<td>Check with stated objectives.</td>
<td>Tests and narrative records.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The analysis and summary of all those aspects constitutes an evaluation of a volunteer program.

PROCEDURES FOR ENACTING CHANGE

The most effective program will depend on assessment of specific needs and resources. The following outline offers a listing of areas that should be considered:
1. Determine extent of need through survey of those to be served, staff discussions.
2. Establish objectives through staff recommendation; community involvement.
3. Find personnel through recruitment; in-service training.
4. Create facilities through remodeling; new construction.
5. Purchase materials for specific skill development; high interest reading; variety and flexibility.
6. Select children or adults through discrepancy criterion; teacher recommendation.
7. Schedule treatment to child’s or adult’s best advantage on a frequent basis.
8. Evaluate regularly child’s or adult’s progress; procedures of selection and treatment.
9. Report results to child and parents or adults; classroom teacher and principal or agency supervisor.

COMMON PITFALLS

The following checklist may help in avoiding some of the common pitfalls of tutor programs, in either the planning or operative stage:

Organization — Failure to define responsibility and authority. In each situation, the question “What is his role?” should be answered.

Personnel — Training and supervision are essential.

Facilities — Failure to provide adequate and attractive space. The quarters set aside or provided for the program should be attractively decorated.

Materials — Failure to allow sufficient funds for materials. Often little or no money is allotted for the purchase of materials.

Selection — Using only standardized group reading tests in making the selection.

Time — Too few weekly sessions. Providing once-a-week sessions of 60 minutes or more is not advisable. Successful volunteer programs have proved that it is necessary to meet two or more times a week for any noticeable improvement over a semester.

Terminating instruction arbitrarily. Ending instruction at the end of such arbitrary time periods as, for example, six weeks could be a mistake. Instruction should be carried on until the student’s progress indicates that he can profit from the regular classroom instruction.

Assessment — Determining progress by standardized group scores. Ordinarily the standardized group test does not measure the skills taught in a reading class.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

There are many sources of information that will be helpful to educational volunteer programs. It would be of little value to list them here when complete bibliographies are available from the National Center for Voluntary Action (Washington, D.C.) and in Your Volunteer Program, published by Project MOTIVATE, Des Moines Area Community College.

The books listed below would be of great value to any educational volunteer program and could make up a basic library.
