Library Objectives, Goals, and Activities

200 WORD ABSTRACT

This publication represents a new approach to the determination of public library goals. It contains objectives and goals, as well as activities relating to goals, for all functions of the Inglewood Public Library. Unique is a concept of common goals and activities which apply to three or more division within the Library.

In compiling general goals and activities, we developed the following list of uniform headings: budget; community relations; cooperation; latest developments; materials; materials circulation; materials maintenance; materials processing; personnel; policies and procedures; records and files; reference and information; services; supplies, equipment, and maintenance; and volunteers.

In addition to City ordinances relating to the Library Department, Library Board, and Friends of the Library, the following Library divisions are included: Extension, Circulation, Circulation Control (registration and overdues), Reference, Information, Serial Publications and Documents, Children's, Young Adult, Audio-visual, Social Services, and Technical Processes.

This study should be useful for public libraries preparing their own goals studies, position descriptions, or procedural manuals, and especially useful as an aid to library administrators in analyzing and making comparative evaluations of their own organizations or in considering the possible application of management by objectives.
INTRODUCTION

THE NEED FOR GOALS

The public library, as a service agency, must continually evaluate its function if it is to provide meaningful resources, services, and programs to a community that continually is changing. A basic approach is for the library to determine its goals. Goals influence the quality and types of services. Decisions can be more readily made when goals are stated. Planning and programming can be more effective and realistic when goal statements are established. Specialized goals influence the internal organization and effect the selection and assignment of personnel. These general goals can also form a basis for determining quantifiable short term goals. Identifying general goals is valuable as a point of departure for any detailed analysis or study of the public library operation.

PREPARATION OF GOALS

We determined initially to analyze our present library organization in terms of objectives, goals, and activities — all of which help provide a thorough view of the library organization. We then requested all division heads and their staffs to formulate their divisional objectives, goals, and activities. Concepts and relationships of divisional objectives, goals, and activities were clarified with a series of meetings between the division heads and their key staff and the library administration. The goals study was then assembled and reviewed by the staff.

It became apparent that there were many similar goals and activities. At this point all these common goals and activities were extracted and restated to provide uniformity. In compiling general goals and activities, we developed the following list of uniform headings: budget; community relations; cooperation; latest developments; materials; materials circulation; materials maintenance; materials processing, personnel; policies and procedures; records and files; reference and information; services; supplies, equipment, and maintenance; and volunteers.

VALUE

The publication and distribution of this goals study was prompted by its possible usefulness in a number of ways:

1) As a checklist to make staff members aware of the objectives and goals of their division and overall Library Department objectives and goals.

2) As an aid in preparing library studies such as position descriptions or division policy and procedural manuals.

3) As a basis for establishing short term quantifiable goals and performance indicators for possible use in management by objectives.
4) As a basis for possible consolidation of like functions through a task force or matrix approach, or reorganization of library structure.

5) As an aid to library administrators, professional staff, and city officials in the understanding of the municipal library function.

6) As an aid to library administrators in making comparative evaluations of their own organizations.

7) As case study material for library schools.

GENERAL GOALS AND ACTIVITIES

As indicated in the introduction, the goals study was begun by requesting division heads and their staff to formulate objectives, goals, and activities. This was followed by a series of conferences with the Library's administrative staff resulting in more clarified concepts. The study was then assembled and reviewed by the staff.

After the last staff review an analysis of the goals and activities indicated many common goals and activities. We observed that some goals and activities of a general nature were not included in other divisions where applicable. It was, therefore, necessary to re-evaluate and restate those goals and activities that were common to most or all divisions.

It should be noted that although there are many goals and activities in common, each division interprets these goals and performs these activities in a manner relating to its divisional requirements.

The following is a listing of general or common goals and activities (that is, common to three or more divisions) arranged by subject.
