A student program to combat chronic absenteeism, suspension, and behavior problems was implemented in September, 1972, at Memorial Junior High School in San Diego. The major aim of the program is to develop a small school environment to foster the growth of the whole student. Objectives focus on helping students develop a positive attitude toward school, helping students and teachers develop improved interpersonal relations, and improving academic achievement. The school maintains 300 students and has its own staff and schedule. The staff adopts a "head-on" approach to problems, offering comprehensive testing programs which help teachers identify the academic needs of individual students. Seminars and simulations are used to deal with problems. Student centered curriculum motivates students toward academic achievement, involves students in activities, and, moreover, offers some opportunities for decision making. The school curriculum, based on interdisciplinary studies developed by the staff, centers on three themes which were suggested by an initial survey of student needs and interests: A New Dimension, The Personal Side of Living, and The World of Work. After two years, teachers are pleased with the flexibility and general results of their curriculum; results of achievement tests, to date, have been inconclusive. Future plans for the school include more individualized instruction and an expansion of the human relations program. (Author/JH)
In 1971 Memorial Junior High School, San Diego, California, had the highest student absence rate among the city's junior high schools; 43 percent of Memorial's over 1,000 students were considered chronic absentees. Suspensions numbered 172.5 per 1,000 students, compared to a district average of 73.2. Unprovoked assaults were prevalent. Elementary schools in the area recommended any junior high but Memorial to their sixth graders; one feeder school had sent Memorial less than ten students in the two preceding years.

Antagonism between the school's predominately brown/black, inner-city student population and the predominately white, middle-class faculty was widespread.

In September 1972, 300 Memorial students were selected to participate in a new program called Project People, later to be known as the School of Urban Studies. The program was not merely an extracurricular activity, a single course, or a curriculum plan but a complete "school within a school." The aim of the program was to develop a small school environment which would foster the growth of the whole student.

After two years, the results of the "minischool" are impressive. The absentee rate of students in the School of Urban Studies has dropped from 7.4 per cent per day to 1.8 per cent. The rate of suspensions for teacher defiance has dropped from 11.1 per cent to 4.4 per cent among the program's students; unprovoked assaults are down by one-half. A survey of student attitudes shows 83 per cent of the Urban Studies students feel their teachers are personally interested in them, while only 32 per cent of a control group express the same feeling. No students have been lost from the program through ethnic or disciplinary transfers, and in 1973 Memorial experienced a 30 per cent increase in enrollment--an increase the school's principal attributes largely to the influence of the new program.

Clearly, the School of Urban Studies is making a difference at Memorial Junior High.

SEEKMNG A NEW APPROACH

The School of Urban Studies was born from frustration. In recent years students at Memorial Junior High had experienced more remedial and compensatory programs than students in any other San Diego school. Despite the special programs, many of them excellent, the achievement level of the students remained frustratingly low and behavioral problems continued to mount. Still, in the face of this discouraging evidence, Memorial teachers remained convinced that their students had the potential for better performance. Based on this conviction, Robert Durham, then chairman of the Social Studies Department, suggested a program that in time developed into the School of Urban Studies.

In designing the new program, the first step was to assess the needs of Memorial students. This assessment resulted in a statement of objectives for the School of Urban Studies which continues to undergird the program; the objectives are (1) to help students develop a positive attitude toward school; (2) to help students and teachers develop improved interpersonal relations; and (3) to improve students' level of academic achievement.

The School of Urban Studies maintains 100 students each in the seventh, eighth, and ninth grades; the school has its own administrative personnel, teaching staff, and schedule. The 300 students in the program are housed in an annex, which is separate from the main school building but close enough to allow Urban Studies students to intermingle with the rest of the Memorial student body.

THEMATIC CURRICULUM

While a human relations emphasis serves as the foundation for the School of Urban Studies, the day-to-day working of the program is based on interdisciplinary studies developed by the staff. A survey of student needs and interests, taken before the School of Urban Studies began, suggested that three subject areas were particularly important to students. The school’s curriculum centers on the three themes suggested by this initial survey. The seventh-grade theme is "A New Dimension"; eighth and ninth graders choose from two themes, "The Personal Side of Living" and "The World of Work."

Each of the three themes has a different focus. In "A New Dimension," seventh graders are introduced to the School of Urban Studies and its approach; students are encouraged to see themselves as decision-makers as well as participants in the program. In addition to a study development in each academic area, the theme area attempts to develop a sense of responsibility, self-discipline, and citizenship in participants.

SPECIAL FEATURES

The basic plan for the School of Urban Studies students...
The staff has not stopped with these innovations; the School of Urban Studies includes several unusual features—features which may well be responsible for much of the program's success.

One important extra in the School of Urban Studies has been the human relations resource teacher. By having a staff member whose primary function is dealing with human relations, the school has been able to focus on developing the psychological and social sides of its students. The human relations teachers often serve in a crisis intervention role, he also uses "preventative" methods—seminars, workshops, simulations—to forestall crisis situations. Group experience for teachers and students has been especially important in promoting better relations. One student notes, "I think that the students have a better opportunity of participating in learning because teachers are easy to get along with."

The human relations teacher is also responsible for promoting community and parental interest in the School. Parents are encouraged to become involved in the program by participating in planning workshops and accompanying students on field study trips. Last year nearly 50 percent of the parents did accompany students in such activities, a much higher percentage of parents than normally participate in Memorial school functions.

Student motivation is considered a key element in the School of Urban Studies; again, the problem is not left to chance. Each team has developed a specific system of incentives to encourage students to participate in activities and to improve their classroom performances. Some techniques include self-selection of curriculum materials, student tutors, parent motivation and use of study trips to reward appropriate behavior.

The School of Urban Studies' staff is making an effort to involve students in the development of the program. Students are rewarded for participating in workshop sessions, committees meetings, and class discussions on program planning and role development. The staff has found students unaccustomed to direct participation in the educational process, but feel the opportunity is important in improving feelings of efficacy.

Initially teachers in the School of Urban Studies received few benefits from participation in the program; now they have an additional planning period each day and an opportunity to participate in summer planning workshops. They are aided by the human relations teacher in solving behavioral problems and receive help in finding new materials and teaching techniques from the resource teacher. The support and flexibility offered Urban Studies' teachers seems to have paid off. One teacher writes, "The teaching staff has a positive attitude toward teaching and their students: I think this is generally taken for granted but does not exist for the most part in the rest of the school. Anyone who doubts this should go sit in the lounge and listen."

NEW HORIZONS

In 1975 Memorial Junior High School will move into a new physical facility. In preparation for that move, the School of Urban Studies staff is planning program changes for the new open-space building. At this time the staff plans to combine the seventh... and eighth grades into a single unit and expand the number of students served by 50 percent. The ninth grade will be maintained as a separate unit.

Curriculum expansion will occur on two fronts. The teachers are presently preparing a series of Learning Assistance Packets which will provide more individualized instruction for students in basic skill and content areas. The human relations aspect of the program will be expanded by developing two six-week seminars—one in human relations and one in values clarification—in which every student will participate.

Adapting the school to the students, rather than the students to the school, is not the traditional approach in education. In the School of Urban Studies the untraditional approach seems to be working where other approaches have failed. While the students directly involved in the program have shown the most improvement, the Memorial population as a whole has demonstrated significant gains in the past two years; observers believe the gains are at least in part a result of the impact of the new program.

The results produced by the School of Urban Studies have firmly committed the staff to the program's concepts. As summarized by Durham, "In our opinion the program now being developed in the School of Urban Studies is the junior high program that will be the standard ten years from now."
