This book, a project of the Montana Arts Council Poets and Writers in the School program, is a collection of poems written by students in elementary and secondary schools of Montana. In addition to the poems, the book contains an essay on motivating and guiding students to write creatively, a list of resources for creative-writing teachers, an index of contributors, and a list of participating schools. I'm sorry
I came to school without telling you

I bet you think I am at home
skipping school

But you are wrong I am in school
skipping school

Music happens
Music happens
when life drags down on you as you hang onto the edge of reality
music happens
man uses music
music uses man
happiness happens when people make music man makes music
music makes man
loneliness creates music more than the life itself
music happens
use it

WHO ARE YOU?

i am the one who dances in the sunlight
i am the one who smiles at just the right time i am the one who laughs at nothing
i am the one who will answer when you call i am the one who will shine when you need me i am the one who will kiss away the dew drops
i am the one who cries in the night
i am the one you will never know i am the one who wants to ride the sky
i am the bumblebee at the bottom of the jar
i am cinderella when the clock strikes 12
i am the one who dreams of living

I SHOW YOU PICTURES IN THE NIGHT

I am a dream
I am nice when you are asleep
I show you pictures in the night
a roaring bear
a white horse guarding its mates
a black mouse in its hole sleeping on its side
a Welsh Corgi with its mate
I am never a bad dream
I never make you cry when you're asleep.

COLD

I am the one who is wilting away
I am the one who is blocked up
I am the one who is a long tube filled with bright red pain
I am the one who feels needles poking
    at my brain
I am the one who talks with a strange voice.

Lorna Nagengast

I am a thermostat
    I am so cold and lonely sometimes until someone comes and turns me on I grow warm, spreading comfort and security until I run out of fuel and strength
    I need someone

I am my man or I am my young man or I am just my father’s small boy or I am my father’s son.
I am my own supporter or I am my spouse’s supporter or I am my spouse’s partner.
I am my father’s son.
I am my spouse’s partner.
I am my own.

Take me for what I am.
Take me high,
take me to castles.
Take me low,
take me to cabins.
Take me for granted.
Take me for everything I’ve got.
Then take off.

I'm the one who can make you happy.
I'm the one who would sit by a brook and wonder.
I'm the one who would watch a fire.
I'm the boy who can make you wonder as long as you can remember.
I'm the boy who can stop the bad and come back with the the good.
I'm the one that likes to run and jump and to be free with nothing to stop me.

My Chant

I can’t do what I don’t know.
I can’t make you see it if you don’t want to see.
I can’t make you get it if you don’t want it.
I can’t read it cause I don’t want to read.
I can’t do what I don’t know.

THE WEIRD WORLD OF MY BODY

I came home from school and played my ear drums
but my mother got mad at me for playing so loud so I went
and climbed in my chest and fell asleep
then I woke up and heard my mother
tell me it was time to go to school.
On the way to school
I found an adams apple and gave it to my teacher. At recess
I was bouncing my eye balls and after
I went in to the room and saw a pupil in my chair
after school I went to sail with my uncle on his blood vessel
and pounded finger nails in to a nose bridge for my uncle.

When
I came home my toys were all over the floor so I put all my toys
in my voice box and went to hunt for a mole.

My waist is skinny and my head is big
I got a flinch in my eye
My bath is bumpy and I am square
My jokes are weird and so am I I have no berries to pick but I do have apples and plums
No one believes me except for my family, friends and teachers
Whenever I pull a trigger I blow it
My silver buckles bring up a light
The magic penny is always mine

MY HAIR
My hair is as straight as the stem on a tree.
It dances on my head.
It’s as blonde as the sunset in the night.
My hair is so beautiful.
It looks like butterflies flying all around.
I love my hair.
I can put it in tails as long as my legs.
It whispers in my ears.

MY HAND
My hand moves like the river deep.
My hand moves like a turtle.

My hand can feel a cat’s soft fur.
My hand can feel your hard bald head.

My hand has veins yellow blue and red. My hand has veins like a crow’s head. My hand’s veins yell like fire.

I live for everyday.
I live beyond the worn night.
I live in despair.
I live in joy.
I live while man dies inside.
I live when all else fails.
I live to make mistakes.
I live to face the facts.

I feel man's errors,
I feel my mistakes.
I feel the storm brewing.
I feel the pressure building.
I feel the heart's wanting.
I feel the cutting wind.
I feel your flesh.
I feel your need.
I feel the breaking of strengthened bonds.

I look at the worlds
as they go drifting by.
I see the passing travelers

Kingdoms rise

I stay in my orbit
and watch them fall.

When I'm excited I get dangerous, nobody gets near me. When I go through the town everybody shuts their windows. Even when I go to buy something the storekeeper does the same thing. Even the police lock their doors and windows. Even the cows and horses lock their barns. Chickens too even faint and fall down. Even the whole gang is scared of me. They run away with their Hondas and cowboys ride their horses and go by me and they look like dummies.

I AM

A snowflake falling from the deep blue sky.
A bird sitting in a tree.
A car zooming around town.
An old creaky rocking chair.
An old lion with somebody's hand running through my mane.
A hot red sun but in the night.
I'm a moon.
An old stick that someone found.
An old bone that a dog is burying.

ELEVATOR

I am an elevator.
People make me laugh when they press my buttons.

I am kept awake all night.
When I go down to floor one twelve people or more get on and it's hard to push them all up to floor two.

People get free rides
and nobody says thank you.

I am water
I define pretty rocks under me
I am water
I freeze in winter
I am water
You can drink from me
I cool you in summer
I am water
Snow melts into me
I am water
I run down the mountain
I am water
I run through the rivers
I am water
In the ocean I am salt water
I am the water
Children wade in me
I am the water
The sun shines on me
I am the water
Clouds make rain fall into me
I am the water
Little snails climb through me
I am the water

THE BEGINNING OF A NEW DAY

in the crab colored dawn
is a silver silk spider's web with tiny beads of water dripping from it.

FOREST

A whisper in the dusk, the gentle wind began. A water buffalo is swimming across the silent lake, ripples spread.
A feather slowly slides to the ground. As the mellow hum of dusk grows. I hear the gentle swish of dusk bushes, hush.

Every night when the last rays
of the sun leave the blue sky
and disappear behind the purple mountains,
the stars slowly creep out to light up

The stars look as white as a dove's wing

Everywhere you look there are groups of stars, yet the sky is not crowded.

THE GORGE

Things are calm here. The language recommends rain. The sun as a magnet draws us toward the highest peak, to gather pine nuts. The wind is blowing cones. I wonder.

Together living on cliffs opening into nothing. Goshawk claws a flickertail.
The ground sponges blood and we do not find the shadows of the black bear before they find us.

The mustangs gallop, kicking dust across the prairie. Newborns sandwiched into the herd, leaders shield their young.
We search for more. Night is coming on.

Always we are linked like chains.
The bandit raccoon roams across green blades. Tumbleweeds fall off the edge. We can remember, but never go back.

THE MAGIC OF SILVER GLENT

The trees shiver and bend
As if suddenly humble,
The grass weaves
Bending in and out,
My steps are deliberate
My arms swing back and forth
The gate creaks
In loud protest.

Like stepping into another world
Smells of sweat, hay and manure rise.
I step lightly and quickly trying not to stir
More dust in the air,
And yet reach that other door.
The latch turns hard,
Suddenly releasing
Against my stiff red fingers.

On the other side
The darkness of four walls
Surrounds me.
Blindly I stretch out for a small switch Left of the door and Lights blare into every corner.

The sound of whistling air...
I reach out for a bridle
Stiff and brittle
Gleaming with a dull luster.
I walk over to the tattered stall
And find him,
Gentle with the inner spirit of fire.
His nostrils flare and his eyes widen
As I put the silver between his teeth.

I lead him to another door,
Each hoof lifted high.
Lands gentle and careful
As though afraid
Of shattering the still air around us.

I climb on his strong back,
His skin is warm under my hand,
His muscles move
Under my legs in perfect rhythm
As he starts cantering on my low command.

We travel across bare fields
Through pastures of brown grass,
Where deer with their young
Had been.

We reach the barn again.
I close the door loudly behind us.
The smell of sweat is stronger now
As I hang the stiff bridle
On its rusty nail.

Then turn to face him,
Gently touching his warm neck.
I turn again and find
The switch by the door.
The latch turns easier now
And I walk out into the cold air.

The horse is a volcano of steam
Running free as a thousand insects.
The mane flowing softly like a covering of fresh snow.
The pounding of its hoofs on the grassy prairie is the sound of birds flapping their wings.
The horse is strength and power as the wind blowing across a desert plain.
The horse is a friend on a frosty bitter night.

DUSTY’S SMOOTH BARE BACK
I am on Dusty’s smooth bare back cantering swiftly across the field.
I can feel her muscles work
as she jumps the spring
her mane whipping in my face.

She gallops like a tornado slows to a walk in the alfalfa near the corral gate.
Laughing I throw my arm around her neck
as we walk together to the barn.

I curry the dust & weeds
out of her beautiful bay coat.
I brush her until she glistens like frost on the silver maple.
She thrusts her face toward me & kisses my cheek gently.
I give her the sugar lump & whisper
See ya tomorrow, K.

IN A PASTURE BY THE RIVER
ON A CLOUDY NIGHT

It is dark,
there are no stars or moon,
the ghostly shadows of cottonwood
hang overhead.
Snow on the ground,
sage brush peeks through,
here and there.
Below, a small creek, ice covered,
under the ice the water is alive.
Our light searches
the undergrowth.
Two sparks of light
paralyzed with fear, appear.
Shots ring, it sounds like a war.
The lights disappear,
the smell of crisp powder.
And the light searches on.

DREAM

Winter is all around.
It’s gray and white and it is getting me down.
It’s cold and it’s getting colder.
It’s gray and white winter all around.
Old and I’m getting older.
Lying here when everything is going by.
My teeth chattering into the night.
There is a fire in the corner slowly dying away.
It feels like everything is coming down on me.
I feel like I am slowly sinking into the mattress.

SPRING

Spring is in the air, birds are flying North and though trees are bare now, they’re putting forth leaves. The fields are green.
Sun is getting higher.

and in the swamp are peepers.
Men discard their vests.
Eggs are getting cheaper.

A LOVELY DAY

The wind softly blew
the waves in the river
as a dove whispered to its love.
I was swinging
when I saw a swan swimming with her little one behind her.
A flock of birds were flying above
a deer slipping
among the bushes.

Silence is all around when the rodeo is over.
The losers come to the place which might have made their end.
The wind blowing in their faces thinking how nice it would have been to win.
Famous I could have been and saw the last of these things—the losers say.
They hear the wind blow.
They see the dust fly.
They say
Why should I worry I could never quit this life.

small poems

How long does a poem need to be? Depends. Once in a while a line or two will do it. But not just any lines. Small poems have a special power. They are different from good beginnings to longer poems. They sound whole, loaded with energy: coal compressed into diamonds. There is nothing small or easy about the feelings they hold. These poets speak quickly and know when to be silent.

PLACE OF FANTASY

I find myself in a glass palace.
I hear a voice calling from behind a spire.
A walking candle appears.
It astonishes me.
The candle calls to me,
come, come and light me.
The lighted candle takes a different form.
It is an ugly troll.
I try to run.
I am filled with fear.
I feel myself running.
I am fleeing through a glass forest.
A doorway appears.
It is in the middle of a mirror.
I open it. I see a tree dripping blood from a wound in its trunk.
I run to the tree
I touch it
It says to me
Peel my bark off
Put me out of my misery.
I do as it requests.
The tree disappears.
I leave and go home to meet the world of reality.

EYES IN THE DARK

I see large, clear crystals which are perfect and infinite.
They get farther away and are covered by purple clouds of cold wetness.
The purple clouds turn red with blood and fire.
My hands clench. I look at them.
They are stretched and I see through my skin.
I turn liquid and flow through glass tubes.
I flow like a river. I trickle like a stream.
I fall and run into a black forest. I'm scared and breathless.
I splash into a sea of green frothy emeralds and drown softly into my mind.

ERIC
The breath of tomorrow was heavy upon us
The moon was bowing away to the brilliant sun
The morning was wet with a warm mist
And the wind was playing tag with the clouds.

I walked along the vast ocean sands
And I pretended to be a great explorer
Searching to fulfill a perpetual dream
The dream to which there is no answer.

I drifted all day in and out of reality
I discovered what being alone really was
It wasn't a bad thing, but a thing of wonder
A time to find myself.

As the moon rose again in the sky
I walked again this time to find friendship
Because being alone is something to marvel for a time
But without companionship all mankind would be lost.

People's faces were flying through the sky. I saw my friend's face and as she went by she yelled
"Come on" in an echoing sound.
I stood there and yelled "Where?"
to everyone who flew by but there was no answer.
Suddenly it was no longer faces that flew by but animals and I was confused
so I just stood there gawking
and then I heard a noise,
"You must come too."
I realized I also
was going through the sky.
I think it was the end of the world.

Walking along the ocean, I hear the clams talking about their pearls.
Running along, leaving footprints in the water, I open the door to the Devil. I let go of a rope and fall all the way down into a pile of snow.
I stand up, dripping with orange juice, slipping on milk, and tripping over my shoelace. I fall on my nose, but break my back. My fingers are tied in knots as I bite a bee. My heart beats an egg into a singing bird as he flies away into the light. The sun comes up, sings the clouds and melts the water.

DREAM HORSE

(A mistranslation: After Caballo De Los Sueños, a poem in Spanish by Pablo Neruda)

Unnecessary. Watching the mirror like a great movie, big and perilous. Arranged in my heart all captured in hell establishing clammering sad tales.
I drift in uneasy sleep and old absorbing ideas, conversing in the nest of the tailors—hearing voices within the frightening cold. People singing throughout the land.
Deep hazy lines run the length of the sky with the magical colored carpets of the rainbow—with the horses getting wild in my dream.
I no more think of the stillness of the ground, the removal of the spade until all is still. The dream ends in a bedlam of confusion. The tremendous set off by lasting persistence, this jubilant festivity that claims my dreams.

THE ANIMAL'S CLUBHOUSE

Two beavers cut trees. A woodpecker drilled holes with his beak. A badger dug a hole. The bear dropped the log into the hole. A porcupine climbed the log and used his quills as nails. Chipmunks laid leaves on the roof. The porcupine bit deep into a pine. The oppossum caught sap in his pocket and spread the sap over the leaves. Squirrels pushed mud into the cracks between the logs.

As I left, I was as proud as a mother.

THE READER OF THE LOST DOOR

The night is like eyes in the dark.
The night is like a dog waiting in the doorway.
The night is a ball of fire.

The night is a panther screaming without a tongue.
The night is like a hand without a body.
The night is a pile of bones in the backyard.

The night is a lightning star.
The night is like spider blood on the table.
The night is a crack in the glacier.

As the people got out of their graves
the wind began to howl.
The people were dancing in the moonlight
to the music of Pink Floyd.
God was at the party as a special guest.
He was doing the boogie with Patricia Hearst.
The Devil was waltzing with Mary.
And as they danced the world was still.
There was peace all over because God stopped time to have a party for my birthday.

Long ago the horses were painted all colors.
Long ago there were tepees in circles
like a round fire.
Long ago there were Indians that fought the white man.
The Indians were painted white and yellow.
Long ago the buffalo ran off the cliffs and died.
Long ago the Indians lived in tepees
and they had made the tepees.
Today we live in houses other people made,
the government made.
Today we drink out of glasses
that are clean.
Long ago we drank with our hands
from the Big Horn River.

Literal translation of the Crow

If I were Old Man Coyote
I would make two clans.
One would be named Hands-not-Idle,
I say this because they are always working with their hands,
always beading,
The other would be After-Long-Time Lodge,
I say this because they keep things, and after a long time they still don’t give them away.

The first time I wake up
my eyelids are 100 pound bags of dried snails
and I'm not awake yet.
There are chocolate covered ants crawling on my eyes and I'm a machine Someone turns me on and the reel of tape spins frantically and slow music plays soft and the sound vibrations in the air
are brushing my hair
like the wind.
Bells ring and cymbals crash!
Dynamite powder explodes
and the snails are gone.
Two big brown circles peer through open eyelids are boring holes in the ceiling
I'm awake and I'm not a machine
I'm alive and energy surges and I'm sixteen and fire flies
and the morning is beautiful.

I REMEMBER WHEN

I remember when my cousin, Laura was adopted and the time she almost died.
I remember when I used to go to my friend’s house and we’d eat peanut butter and dance on the table.
I remember when I taught my classmates how to make a Joshua’s Ladder instead of having reading.
I remember the time when there was a student-father paper drive and I couldn’t go because I didn’t have a dad.
I remember the hurt and anger I felt when my mother didn’t let me be her flower-girl.
I remember the time my step-brother and I fell asleep watching Horror, Inc.
I remember the Christmas I got Dorothy May, my baton, ate a huge dinner and my sister gave me a bloody nose.

Sweaty palms against slippery pencil.

When the scent of pine came tears came to my eyes. As I walk down the path to where they were putting her grave
I remembered her sweet tooth,
the way she used to cherish
chocolate, the way her tender fingers would hold that chocolate.
In that old house down
in the valley so far away,
so green
how she would make me hide behind the mirror when anyone would come there!
How she would make me stay hidden until they were gone.
Then she would take me over to her favorite chair under the big lamp and tell me a story about the rain.

SLEEP
I wasn’t born,
but I was alive down deep inside.
We were on our way to a city that was far away.
We were to stop and rest, but no time or money.
We got past the site where we were to stop, when I was awakened from my womb sleep.
It was old mother earth turning over in her bed as she rumbled and growled in her forever sleep.
She was nice to us for she didn’t swallow us
when she opened her mouth.

BEARER
Here is my letter,
so promised.
It was lost;
maybe on the shelf
the river sweated
this morning,
and in time.

With rainswept years and clouded days
my tears grow dry
like drying
the wind.
Those years passed trembling hands;
now calm; filled
with blood like night.

The weight fades
from day.
A deepened dusk,
it rests inside
as I rest behind glazed eye.

I DO SOMETHING BY MYSELF IN THE NIGHT

Sometimes when everybody is asleep
I go to the kitchen.
When I am hungry
I always eat some cookies and sometimes I get some ice and a glass
and put the ice in a cup then I put some water in and when I am going to bed
our baby is crying so I pretend that I am asleep.
When our baby went back to sleep I went back in the kitchen and when I can't sleep I stay awake
till it is school time.

Remember the look on her face when you were finished.
Remember the sweet taste on your lips.

Remember how you ran from them.
Remember when she came back for another kiss.
Remember giving it to her.

LETTER TO STEWART FROM MAY

Dear James: I'm stuck for thoughts. Don't know whether to laugh or cry. I'll be graduating soon. Nineteen days to go and a step higher. The big door out there scares me. Mom says to believe in God. God says to see a mirror. Art is sun. It helps clear my head and give me a touch of confidence. I don't think I want to stay and live with your folks. Their minds are computered different. It's good I hide my fears. My slides came in. Maybe I'll get a scholarship, maybe not. At least I'll graduate. But that door is getting heavier to peep through. Wouldn't it be neat to cease to exist without death. I'm coming to your graduation. Have you got your suit yet? I miss you. The steps seem to be in reverse. Love, Doughnut.

MOMMY, MOM, MOTHER AND I

I am three
I ask each morning what day it is Mommy says
a different thing each day
It doesn't form a pattern
I think and think then ask what is this?
I am nineteen
I have a letter from Dad
Mom is not well
I feel bad
I go to the dorm and call Mom on the payphone
and she sounds sad
I am thirty
Mother is a memory.

We tried to walk to town one day.
We lived on a farm about five miles out at Gennsville, in a five-room shanty where it was very cold in the winter.

We got to the city limits and got tired of walking, so we tried to thumb a ride.
It didn’t work, we are

I am tired of men judging me

TRY

I ask you now you turn away
I implore you you laugh
I try to be a friend
you try to be indifferent
I try to be there you make me invisible.

I try to forget you you've forgotten
I try to phone you
you hang up
I know you're far away
you don’t know where I am I keep your picture
you never ask for mine.

When I'm back I don’t try you suddenly remember
I don’t listen for the phone you call me
I'm not trying to be there you ask for my picture
Now I try to be visible
Now you try to see me.

HOW TO MAKE A BED

Throw the pillows on the floor or against the wall depending on your mood. Then throw the sheets up to the head and remove all visible wrinkles. To do this you must move from one side to the other patting and smoothing. Next comes the blankets; do the same as with the sheets only this time you may flop down in the middle not caring about the wrinkles that will be born. Stare at the ceiling thinking what to say to your parents about the broken glass or anything else that hangs over you. Think of raindrops sliding off a daisy. Get up and straighten all the wrinkles. Pull up the spread. Pick up the pillows and place them on the bed. Finally pull the spread up covering the pillows. This should not last longer than an hour.

I HATE ONIONS

& OTHER POEMS

ONIONS

I hate onions
more than tomatoes or shrimp pizza
or any other thing I may be made to eat.
I hate onions,
the scent of them burns my contacts,
they feel weird,
they’re hard to raise in a garden.
May I make myself clear,
I hate onions.
One night long ago
I had a dream.
In my dream I was driving,
driving toward a dusty sunset
(I like to drive)
I almost like to drive as much as
I hate onions.
(God, I hate onions!),
there was a man along the road.
My mother always told me,
don’t give anyone a ride,
but I thought I’d better give him a ride.
He was the President.
He got in and I saw
in his right hand was a bundle of onions.
I hate onions.
But he was the President, so I let it go.
We were driving, it was dark now.
He told me to hold the onions.
I hate onions, but there I was,
onions in hand.
My car didn’t steer well,
(my real car doesn’t steer well)
we were going around a turn steering wheel in one hand, onions in the other.

I couldn’t keep in my lane,
another car came around the corner and we went off the edge.
The President, the onions, and I.
We were sailing through the air--
it was all the onions’ fault.
I woke up.
I suppose we crashed far down the cliff.
I suppose we were killed.
I woke up in jail.
I have killed the President.
They are feeding me onion soup.

LETTER FROM THE BABY SITTER

Dear Bob: Robbie kissed a girl today. She hit him in the mouth with an eraser. He told his teacher he fell. Michael wants a jockey strap for baseball. He doesn't know what it is. Neither does Mark. David is bringing home bad papers. His teacher says he's bright but daydreams. Yesterday Mark drowned the ants in his ant farm. Today he started collecting bugs, LIVE ONES. I've decided not to clean his room anymore. The boys had macaroni and cheese for dinner. I hope they sleep well. David can't sleep when it's light. He made a tent over his head. I hope he doesn't get stuck if he has to go. I just washed the sheets. Robbie wants to go out for dinner tomorrow. Last time he stuck his hot dog in David's root beer. Mark piled his french fries in the ash tray and set fire to them. Michael got sick on his onion rings and threw up on my Teen Burger. I hope you come home soon, I think the cat's dead. Love, Susan.

THE DOORS INTO WONDER
Glasses: window panes peering into the mind of the human body.
A Ring: a piece of metal holding your finger together.
A Barrette: a silver finger holding onto the last strands of life.
A Filling: a boulder holding the entrance to the death of your tooth.
The Cord on a Window Shade: a rope waiting idly for someone to choke.
An Eyelid: a cover for the fear and anxiety of your face.
Dice: rolling numbers going forward and backward, not knowing where to stop.

CRASH

I first saw Crash when he walked into my living room
His hair was bright red with streaks of yellow.
His face was constructed of broken glass and ashes.
He was enormous and clattered when he walked.
He smelled of burning houses and exploding cars.

He walked through my house destroying it,
putting his ugly hands through my walls.
The ceiling of the kitchen fell down.
The grand piano collapsed.

When he was gone, I was shocked to inspect the damage. I sat all afternoon staring at the gigantic hole in the bedroom wall
where Crash had made his exit.

FIVE WAYS TO LOOK AT A PERSON'S FACE

1. My person has eyes that look bright and colorful; like tiny lakes with trees all around them curling both up and down.

2. My person's nose looks very much like a bridge between these two lakes, going down and growing into a small mountain with two caves in it.

3. My person's mouth, when open, shooting out words like a geyser. When the mouth is shut, the tongue seems to float restlessly.

4. My person's hair is like blades of grass, bent down by wind and rain.

5. My person has eyebrows that are like dark clouds overlooking the whole face, keeping watch, guarding it.

MY DREAM

I had a dream about a man that could pull off his ears and nose and hands. He was like a toy after many years of play. He would take off his nose and people would laugh. He would walk in with no hands and people would cry. No one knew when he took off his ears. He had long hair. Sometimes he would walk and fall apart. He was a funny sad man.

MY DARLING AND I

My darling and I always bicker over who rides the train, stacks the pots, peels the potatoes, gathers the acorns, folds the sheets, cleans the pool, plays the fiddle, and, who turns on the air conditioner, but, when we get done we are funny, distant, brainy, weary and slow about bringing the jars in, when we are doing this we keep nudging each other about quitting.

THE DAM

I wish I was a dam.
I would have pipes running through me.
I would be the biggest dam of all.
You could ride boats on my water.
You could hear the waves hit me.
There would be a fast elevator to the bottom to see my pipes.
I make electric.
I make electric for your house.
I make water for your sink, tub, shower.
Many people work in me.
If you go to the bottom you can feed the fish by putting bread in the water.
When you are going up the hill, there will be a visitor center.
When you go inside there will be pictures of me.
There will be a big window.
If you look down you will see me.

PINK

Pink is in my pocket.
It moves around to be free
but its noises are unbearable.
Pink is the main part of supper.
It steams with much flavor

Pink is at the doorway to greet me at home.
It's in the water fountain to give everyone water.
Pink is in my mother's eye after she finds out
I've been up to no good.
Pink is the color my dog's feeling after he's lost a fight.
Pink is the taste of a good vanilla ice cream cone.
Pink is the color of my trees
after the sun's been shining on them all day.
Pink is a good rhythm in a Christmas song.

TONY

A guy with a leather jacket.
Slouching to look neat.
He swaggers as he walks,
Using slang words when he talks.

The street where he lives
is garbage lined.
His apartment a place where feelings are measured,
And a place where the happy times are treasured.

Below in the street a chopper awaits.
He uses it little.
Gas is expensive and so,
He walks a bit.

But,
Below that leather jacket
And beneath that grimey
T-shirt,
There is a heart and feelings
Which he keeps bottled up inside.

His feelings he thinks are dumb.
And his heart is just a machine,
So when someone he loves slips away,
He has nothing left to hurt but pride.

Peanuts remind me of army tanks camouflaged with leaves ready to bomb enemy tanks with the bombs inside.
Shooting its way out of the enemy traps, bombing, shooting, destroying, leaving a path of anything that gets in its way. It’s like a tiger hiding ready to strike any moment, killing its foe and barely making it through swamps and having many adventures. That’s what peanuts remind me of.

Helping another person learn poetry-writing involves two kinds of information. Because a poem is a thing, it requires shaping. To move from the moment when your imagination says: hmmm, that's kind of interesting, maybe there's a poem there... to the moment you realize the poem you've made is as complete and satisfying as it's going to get, it is good to understand a few basics about the craft. It's good to know that poems come in lines, instead of sentences, that lines are used to form stanzas. It's good to remember that poets care how their poems sound—because, after all, poems are human speech, meant to be spoken aloud—so they make sure the lines aren't flat-sounding or awkward. They create patterns in the language using various tricks: rhythms, words that rhyme (or, more often, partly rhyme), or simply words or phrases that repeat and capture the ear's attention. Because poetry is precise language, there's no room for extra baggage, so you learn to keep cutting back to the strongest, cleanest lines. You learn that even the best poems usually need some tinkering with before they're done. You remember that the best way to make your experience come alive for someone else is to avoid boring generalities in favor of specific images—pictures in words—and that comparisons—simile, metaphor—are often a good way to nail down the special feeling of a thing. Sometimes the emotions and ideas that trigger the writing are so tangled and mysterious that they cause you to write a line that defies everyday logic. You learn to trust your imagination's hunches, and you go ahead and write, like a 4th grader in Bozeman: The diamond is a drop of eagle's blood. You learn about emotional accuracy. Most of all, you learn to recognize the sound of your own voice.

The important thing to keep in mind about craft, especially for beginning writers, is that it's only a tool, not the poem itself. It is meant to help out, to give some useful choices when you're stuck. Memorizing a bundle of literary terms won't help a bit if you don't feel the spirit behind them. In the classroom, I am flexible about craft. I try to get beginning writers excited about possibilities in their language. I'm always saying things like: how would this poem work if you made it over with different kinds of lines... What if you threw this part out, would it change anything... Suppose... Experimenting, pretending the words are clay. John Holbrook puts it this way: "The poets program is designed to help kids learn the fun of expression, to learn that it's fun to play with words and to get serious with words. We're trying to say that writing a good poem can be like hitting a home run."

The other sort of information you use is less cut and dried, but probably more vital. It involves creating an environment in which students feel comfortable... enough to let their imaginations drift outside the normal boundaries of the classroom, and then to commit some of those thoughts to paper. The feeling has to be right, full of mutual encouragement. Without it, the poems won't even get started. So much depends on attitude. If a classroom teacher thinks: I don't really understand all this poetry but I guess we'll get through it somehow... students will reflect the reluctance and the experience will be painful, or simply boring, for everyone. Or if a teacher approaches poetry only as GREAT LITERATURE, it may end up seeming distant, just another school subject with right and wrong answers, not something alive and available. Talking about the best writing of other times is fine as long as you remember that those poems were once only moments old and the poets paused over them with uncertainty and excitement.

As a teaching poet I am most concerned with this week's literature.

While the idea behind Poets & Writers in the Schools isn't to magically turn everyone into a poet or writer, I think almost everyone can do a good piece of writing once in a while. In the schools, what a good piece of writing looks like is going to be different every time. Maybe it's kind of ragged or unfinished, but it has an honest feel to it. It cuts through the old same ways of seeing and talking and gets down to the place where each of us is one of a kind. Somehow it tells what's important at that moment. It convinces us. So the poem turns out to be a valid way of dealing with experience. It shows that our real and imaginary lives are full of moments worth remembering and exploring. And possibly no time in a person's life is as full of emotional discovery and change as school age. The poems in this anthology show some of this incredible energy captured in words. Take Rhonda Flake's beautiful love poem, SPINET, or the uncertainty of Donna Bott's graduation-eve poem, LETTER TO STEWART FROM MAY, or the bittersweet feel of these lines from Rosanna Bravo's poem about life on the reservation: Today we drink out of glasses / that are clean. / Long ago we drank with our hands / from the Big Horn River. There is Cindy's amazing one-line poem about life on the south-side of Billings: Out in Roundup the stars are all bunched together. There's the loneliness of Lori Left Hand's poem I DO SOMETHING BY MYSELF IN THE NIGHT, the humor of Doug Davis, the exuberance of Charlie Gelson's poem about waking up, which ends: I'm alive and energy surges / and I'm sixteen / and fire flies / and the morning / is beautiful.

So how do you prepare for writing? The best way is to come unafraid and open-minded, and the best way to achieve that is through exposure to lots of good recent writing. In the grade schools, I've found that students love to hear and talk about poems done by kids their own age. It's a great way to prime the pump. The same is true for older writers, but they also need to see and think about work by contemporary adult poets. I've run into many students who are literally starved for writing they can relate to, poems about problems and events they recognize as real-things that count. It's sad to watch a young writer fumbling around trying to copy the abstract speech of 19th century poetry. Some exciting poems often come from people who were convinced they didn't have any talent for it and who thought "you couldn't write about things like that."

To help get past the writer's worst enemy--the blank sheet of paper--we've included a list of creative writing resources we have either used and enjoyed ourselves or had recommended to us. It is partly adapted from the 1976 Directory of American Fiction Writers (published by Poets & Writers, Inc., 201 West 54th St., NYC, NY 10019). These publications are loaded with good poetry-starting suggestions, thoughts on teaching and learning the art of writing, and many include hefty selections of student prose and poems. Finally, of course, the only real way to learn to write is to jump in and start writing.
