Based on the assumption that educational research and development (R&D) requires the same technical managerial skills as any other business organization, this survey examined fifty management training programs for women and/or minorities in eighteen business, academic, and industrial settings. Information gathered on courses, workshops, and seminars especially designed for women and/or minorities is compiled by institution in Appendix A. The subjects of these programs are then divided into twenty-four categories in Appendix B, and three participant levels (interested, entry-level, and established) are indicated; this format is used to highlight the areas of need as well as the available sources. It was concluded that (1) management training programs rarely address the needs of women and/or minorities; (2) courses directed toward female managers are usually aimed at entry-level positions; (3) vital topics, such as finance and budgeting, professional development, power and management, managing time, and assertiveness training, are neglected in these programs; and (4) in general, management is a new and experimental field for women and minorities. MANAGEMENT TRAINING PROGRAM SURVEY

1. Introduction

This survey of management training program for women and minorities was compiled as part of the RBS Project for Increasing the Participation of Women and Minorities in Education R&D. The project is intended to accomplish this goal through the identification of a new recruitment pool and the design and conduct of a program to provide training in the management of R&D functions. The primary target audience is students in the Wharton M.B.A. program at the University of Pennsylvania.

An internship model joined with academic training addresses the particular needs of women and minorities for leadership role models, for supportive environment, and for access to leadership experiences.

The purpose of the survey is found in the Documentation and Dissemination Component of the project: "to identify currently available programs designed to address those needs related to the application of management skills to future education R&D work." The reasons for this objective are twofold.

First, the project is directed toward the specific problem of expanding opportunities for advanced levels of training in education R&D, with special emphasis on women and members of minority groups.

Several assumptions were made in writing the first major document of the project. The first of these reads as follows: "Educational R&D requires the same technical managerial skills as any other business organization." This survey is the second major document of the project, and is based on the same principle. Thus, in order to determine the specific needs of women and minorities in education R&D, the project examined management training programs for women and minorities in other business, academic, and industrial settings.

Second, the project is directed toward developing and utilizing effective institutional approaches in the recruitment training and utilization of women and members of minority groups within R&D organizations. In particular, RBS hopes to employ project goals in terms of addressing its own institutional posture and staff development needs in regard to these issues. An analysis of these selected topics, then, as found in the survey, was expected to serve as a source of ideas for project staff. In addition, the survey was to be instrumental as a management training program resource for the project interns.

3 RBS has a special interest in promoting management training, experience, and a supportive institutional climate for women and minority groups.
II. The Survey

Part 1: Program Summaries

The first part of the survey consists of concise summaries of approximately fifty management training programs for women and minorities sponsored by eighteen different institutions (Greater Philadelphia industries are not included in the above figure). This information was gathered primarily by the project director's inclusion on appropriate mailing lists over the last several years, by keeping abreast of management training program literature and sending for relevant materials, and by referral. Programs date from 1973, though most were offered in 1975 or later. The largest percentage took place in 1977.

Because RBS is located in center city Philadelphia, it was decided that the investigation of management training programs, in terms of the particular staff development needs and interests of RBS, would be facilitated if the search was centered in, though not necessarily confined to, the metropolitan and suburban Philadelphia area. Together the programs comprise a comprehensive survey of management training programs for women and minorities in Philadelphia colleges and universities, and in a variety of major local business and industrial settings. Also included are selected programs offered by colleges, universities, and various management training associations (i.e. the American Management Association) throughout the nation (See Appendix A).
Aside from the gathering of previously accumulated material, initial inquiries took place in the summer and fall of 1977. Letters were written to various schools and management training institutions requesting information about courses, workshops, and seminars especially designed for women and minority groups (See sample letter on page 18). All programs were included in the survey except those designed for a general male/female audience, and those offered at a non-executive management level. "Managerial Skills for Executive Secretaries and Administrative Assistants," for example, would not be included.

Sponsor Code

The program survey (Part I - Appendix A) contains vital information about each program. (See exhibit 1, p. 6). Appearing on its own separate form, each program has been compiled by sponsor, all programs offered by a particular sponsor being listed together under a sponsor code letter. NTL Institute for Applied Behavioral Science (NTL), for example, has been given the code letter A. Therefore, all NTL programs will be found together in the "A Section" of the survey. A listing of all code letters can be found at the beginning of Appendix A.

Program Code

In addition to being listed by a sponsor code letter, every program is listed by its own program number. The program title "Women and Management," for example, is accompanied by the code Al.
This means that "Women in Management" is number 1 of the NTL (or "A") programs. Directly following the collection of NTL programs (A1-A5) the reader will find all programs listed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (B1), Dartnell Institute (C1) and so on.
PROGRAM TITLE:

OBJECTIVES: The goals that the participant is expected to have achieved upon completion of the program. In most cases these are taken directly from the information sent by the program sponsor. When not specifically listed, the objectives are inferred from whatever data are available.

SELECTED TOPICS: The specific topics to be studied during the course of the program. These are taken directly from the source of program information. If no topics are listed in the program data, the reader will simply find “Not Specified” under that heading.

SPONSOR:

The “target audience” of the program. Tells whether the program is intended for women, minorities, both groups, or other special groups.

Part II: Program Analysis

The second part was designed to examine the types and levels of programs that have been offered to women and minorities. This section was intended to provide some insight not only into available sources and levels of management training programs, but to reveal some areas of needs where proper training and guidance have been lacking. It was anticipated that by using these programs as a knowledge base, and by attending to the "gaps" or particular shortcomings in existing programs, the RBS internship model could better accommodate the needs of women and minorities preparing for careers in education R&D.

Subject Categories

Initially, selected topic titles (as found in Appendix A) were divided into general groups answering similar needs. Eventually these broad categories were further broken down into more specific categories until finally the sorting resulted in the following twenty-four categories with their accompanying definitions:

Affirmative Action - topics having to do with affirmative action laws as well as the implementation of these laws. Also includes the Future of Women in Business and Women in Non-traditional jobs.

Assessment of Manager-Employee Performance - self appraisal for the manager and his/her employees, standards of performance, methods of evaluation, and considering women for non-traditional jobs. Also includes assessment in terms of career goals and planning as opposed to evaluation of on-the-job performance.

Building Effective Support Systems - building effective support systems both "in-house" and from the outside.
Career Goals and Planning - topics which are designed to assist women in planning for the future with realistic goals.

Communication Skills - subjects deal with improving writing and verbal skills that will lead to more effective business communication. Also includes communication skills which lead to improved manager/employee relations.

Concepts of Management - topics deal with Management Theory and with the functions and philosophies of management in terms of the corporate structure.

Decision making and Problem Solving - techniques and methods of making decisions and solving problems quickly and effectively.

Delegation - topics are concerned with the delegation of authority and responsibility within the corporate structure.

Finance and Budgeting - topics deal with managing the financial matters of a corporate structure.

Interpersonal Skills - topics specifically marked
"Interpersonal Skills" or "Interpersonal Relations."

Legal Consideration - deal mainly with such courses as
"Legal Considerations for Women Supervisors."

Management as a Woman - deals with special difficulties and problems unique to women in management.

Management Skills (General) - deals with management skills in general. Topics have such titles as "Increasing Management Skills," "Developing Managerial and Organizational skills."

Managing People - how to manage employees effectively.

Managing Time - how to manage time effectively.

Miscellaneous Management Skills - specific management skills listed together because there is not enough of any one skill to provide separate categories.
Motivation - methods of motivating employees to work productively.

Organizational Response to Managers - how the employee responds to managerial behavior.

Power and Management - topics deal with power from a management perspective.

Professional Development - self-development on-the-job as opposed to career goals.

Staff Development/Finding and Training Employees - methods of choosing and developing an efficient and effective staff.

Style and Technique - The Effective Manager - styles and techniques for improving managerial effectiveness; helping the manager to develop his/her personal management style.

Teamwork - team building and work group skills.

Participant Levels

Each of the above subject categories is listed at the top of a form (form #2 as found in Appendix B -- See exhibit 2, p. 10). The form is subdivided into the three participant levels of "interested," "entry-level," and "established." This permits the reader to see what types of courses under a particular heading are offered and on what levels. The course titles and corresponding levels are taken from the program forms in Appendix A. Under each of the levels is a listing of the appropriate code letter-title number (a), followed by a second number (b), which signifies the number of the selected topic (course title) of that program which belongs to that subject category (c). To save the reader from constantly referring to Appendix A, the selected topic titles appear alongside every coding in Appendix B. Where no selected topic titles have been listed, the appropriate program objective is used (d). In cases where further information about a particular program is required, simply refer to the correct program survey in Appendix A.

RBS Women and Minorities Training Project 12/77
III. Findings

The search for management training programs addressing the management training needs of women and minorities was begun with the following expectations:

1. there would be a substantial number and variety of management training programs addressing the needs of women and minorities in management.

2. there would be a number of specific courses geared for women and minorities on all three participant levels.

In reality, however, management training programs disappoint both these expectations:

1. Rarely are the training needs of both women and minorities addressed in management training programs. (Indeed, rarely are the needs of minorities alone addressed in management training programs.)

2. Although a number of courses have been offered to women in entry-level management positions, there are few courses offered expressly for either the prospective managerial candidate or the manager on a more advanced level. Most programs are directed toward no specific audience, but to a rather nondescript "any and all women in management."

Thus, it is clearly implied that if, indeed, women are considered to be managers at all, they are considered to be so on a low and elementary level.

As revealed in Part II of the survey, the subject areas most frequently offered include such subjects as Management as a Woman, Concepts of Management, and Decision Making and Problem Solving. Among those on the opposite end of the scale are such areas as Finance and Budgeting, Professional Development, Power and Management, Managing Time, and Assertiveness Training. It is evident, therefore, that although management training programs do address many important areas, many vital topics are largely neglected.

It is also noteworthy that "established" does not necessarily mean "advanced." Many times, for example, it refers to a position in management for an extended period of time. Apparently it is often presumed that women in management do not advance to high level positions. It is perhaps also noteworthy that an "advanced level" program in a sponsor's terms could be a significantly different level in the view of the management trainee. This might particularly hold true in programs which urge women on all three levels to attend.

On the whole, management for women and minorities, particularly in light of their special problems and needs, is a somewhat new and experimental field. There is much to be learned before adequate training programs can be provided. The current trend, nevertheless, as revealed in the majority of training programs in both university and industrial settings, is to establish no differentiation between men, women, and minorities in management training. Affirmative Action laws, indeed, now require the admission of candidates to such programs without regard to sex or race.

Upon the completion of the survey, all sources were again contacted and thanked for producing whatever information as provided. Project information was reiterated, and sources were requested to continue sending "updates" of their program information. Those who had been personally contacted received such letters as found on p. 15.
Those who had been dealt with by written communication only, received such letters as found on p. 16.

Finally, several major metropolitan and suburban Philadelphia industries were informed of project plans and asked for pertinent information about their particular management training programs. See sample letter, p. 18.

To date, RBS has not yet received replies from a number of these industries. When sufficient time has passed for all such sources to reply, the results will be compiled and placed in an addendum to the survey.

Circumstances for women in the world of management are slowly improving. At the very least, they are now permitted to enter a traditionally male (indeed, white male) society. Many programs, though not specifically geared to women and minorities have been opened to them, largely because of the heretofore mentioned affirmative action laws. Progress has also been made simply in that several programs for women in management have been made available.

Availability of programs, however, should not be considered evidence that the underrepresentation of women and minorities in top-level management is on its way to total rectification. Quality is also an important factor when appraising the overall situation. Although several programs are available, they do not necessarily meet the special needs of women/minority groups. Perhaps now it is time to begin some evaluation process to examine these programs and ascertain just how worthwhile they really are.
Based on the specific data given in the Management Program Survey, one could conclude that the majority of existing management training programs do address many of the needs of women in entry-level positions, they rarely address the needs of minorities at all. Furthermore, there are relatively few programs, courses, seminars designed for women who express an initial interest in management careers. Most lacking, however, are programs for women in top-level management positions.
Having spoken to you some time ago about management training programs sponsored by , in reference to our experimental management training program at RBS, I wish to thank you for sending information about.

As I explained in our conversation, the RBS program consists of the development of an internship model for M.B.A. students at The Wharton School, focusing on the special needs of women and minorities. Because it is an experimental program, we are finding it helpful to examine management training programs such as yours, in other business, school, and industrial settings - particularly programs which are geared toward the special needs and interests of women and/or minorities. Eventually, this information will be compiled in a survey of recent and currently available management training programs for women and minorities.

I thank you again for the information you have kindly sent. Any similar data on other workshops/seminars/courses currently underway or in the planning stages would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

Meredith Aul

In response to an RFP presented by the National Institute of Education, Research for Better Schools (RBS) has written and received funding for its proposal addressing the general problem of women and minority underrepresentation in educational Research and Development. The RBS proposal is directed specifically toward expanding opportunities for advanced levels of training in educational Research and Development, particularly that of promoting management training, management experiences, and a supportive institutional climate for women and minority members.

RBS, in conjunction with the Wharton M.B.A. program, is developing an internship model for M.B.A. students. This model will bring Wharton students into RBS as managerial interns and will address the particular needs of women and minorities for leadership role models, for supportive environment, and for access to leadership experiences.

Because it is an experimental program, and because it is the first of its kind in RBS, we are finding it helpful to examine management training programs in other business, school, and industrial settings. I have been most interested in information I have received from

Eventually, this as well as information from various other sources will be compiled in a survey of recent and currently available management training programs for women and minorities.
For this reason, I would appreciate any additional information both now and in the future, on other workshops/seminars/courses currently underway or in the planning stages.

Thank you for your assistance in our endeavor.

Sincerely,

Meredith I. Aul
