This introductory guide to sex role attitude measures used in the United States was designed to aid researchers in finding items for surveying sex role attitudes. Measures devised or published after July, 1976, or those used only in foreign surveys are not included. The compendium focuses on measures of peoples' attitudes rather than their behavior, and covers sex roles in specific institutional areas (including the family, the labor force, the educational system, the political system, and the military). Items are categorized by the way in which women vs. men should behave or be treated within the institution, perception of actual treatment of men and women within the institutional context, and respondent's action orientation towards, or recommendations for change in, the institution. These categories are also used to organize items having a general sex role reference rather than an institutional one. These items encompass attitudes towards general norms about the behavior of men and women (with a focus on primary group situations), sex trait stereotypes, discrimination, and the women's liberation movement. References to at least one study or article in which the measure is used are given for each item. (Author/JAC)

INTRODUCTION

This volume presents a number of sex-role attitude measures used in sample surveys in the United States. Its main purpose is to aid researchers interested in sex roles or sex-role attitudes in finding items for their surveys. The measures devised and used by past studies do not cover all aspects of sex roles, sex differences or sex inequality. Most of these measures, moreover, are without known formal properties and have at best "face" validity. For these reasons, students of sex roles who are about to field their own surveys may wish to devise new measures. It is hoped, however, that this compendium will help them decide whether extant items are sufficient for their analytic purposes, and will as well encourage them to replicate items so that time series on sex-role attitudes are created.

The reader is warned that the compendium is by no means exhaustive. First, it deliberately focuses on measures of peoples' attitudes rather than on measures of their behavior. Specifically, it includes measures that touch on normative support for particular sex-role arrangements, on perceptions of sex differences or stereotypes, on perceptions of how women and men are differentially treated in various portions of the social system, and on support for particular "remedies" for sex inequality.
or discrimination. It does not include items or scales measuring how individuals conduct their own lives, nor those measuring whether they have personally experienced sex discrimination or have personally engaged in activities oriented toward remedying discrimination.

Secondly, the compendium is also less than exhaustive in the sources it relies upon. As part of a larger project investigating recent sex-role attitudes, we reviewed a number of publications and unpublished data sets, keeping records of the particular items or scales they contained. We made little attempt, however, to extend our search of literature and data archives beyond what we deemed necessary for the analytic goals of the larger project. Thus, some unknown number of sex-role attitude measures used in past studies are not included below, though many are. Because the items used by national polling organizations have been systematically assembled elsewhere, our compendium probably has covered most of these measures. It probably covers as well most of the measures reported on in major sociology and social psychology journals. It does not, however, contain any such measures newly devised or published after July, 1974, and does not contain measures used only in foreign surveys.

Finally, the compendium is less than exhaustive in a third respect; namely, it is descriptive rather than evaluative. For this reason, it is intended as an introductory guide to sex-role attitude measures rather than as a final source of them. We did not keep a systematic record of the samples on which particular items or scales were used, nor any record of author's attempts to assess reliability or validity. Thus, what appears below is the wording of individual measures plus a reference to at least one study or article in which the measure is used. Persons concerned with the quality or potential availability of base-line data, or with the known reliability or validity of particular measures, will need to use these references to obtain further information.

A word on the arrangement of the measures. An effort has been made to organize individual items and scales according to their apparent substantive content. Items referring to sex roles within specific institutions—the family, the labor force, the educational system, the political system, or the military—have been kept separate from those referring generally to sex roles or differences. The former are presented in Section I. By far the largest set of these refers to sex roles vis-a-vis the family, and an attempt has been made to categorize the items in this set in some detail. Items dealing with women's or men's obligation to assume adult familial roles have been kept separate from those dealing with conflicts between familial and other roles. In turn, both of these have been kept separate from items referring to the obligations of husbands and wives vis-a-vis each other, household chores and children, and from those describing prescriptions for the differential socialization of female and male children. The particular place where a given item or scale is presented is often somewhat arbitrary, and readers interested in any of these aspects of sex roles vis-a-vis the family should probably examine this entire section of the compendium.

For the remaining institutional areas, we have attempted to employ a more consistent method of categorizing items (not used when the number of them is small). Here, items are divided into four categories:

(1) Those tapping norms about the way in which women vs. men should behave or be treated within this institution; (2) those tapping beliefs about how men and women actually differ in their behavior pertaining to this institutional...; (3) those tapping perceptions of the ways in which the sexes actually are treated by others in this institutional context; and (4) those tapping the respondent's action orientation towards, or recommendations for changing, the ways in which women and men are treated in this institutional context. Again, precisely where an individual item or scale is classified is often somewhat arbitrary.

These same four categories also are used to organized the items having a general sex-role reference rather than an institutional one. In Section II, we first present items tapping general norms about the behavior of men and women, especially in primary group situations. Section III then presents measures of perceptions of how women and men actually differ from each other (sex trait stereotypes); Section IV, measures of perceptions of the ways women and men are differentially treated by others (discrimination); and Section V, items tapping respondents' attitudes and orientations towards the women's liberation movement.

In all sections, if the complete wording of a measure is known to us, it is presented in quotation marks (with response categories listed below it). Where precise wordings are unknown, the content of the item is described in brackets. The numbers in parentheses following each item refer to the references found at the end of the volume. As you may recall, if you don't feel particularly warm or cold toward a candidate, then you should place him in the middle of the thermometer, at 50 degrees.
