In response to a need voiced by a number of English teachers for new materials that discuss the censorship problems of the 1970s, this book presents articles that analyze the current climate regarding censorship, define the issues and pressures that surround the subject, and suggest ways to handle censorship when the problem arises within the school context. The articles discuss censorship from a variety of perspectives that include: reasons why censorship is on the rise at this time; the historical, social, educational, and human dimensions of censorship; the risks and chance element involved in taking censorship issues to court; and the characteristic rhetoric of censorship and anticensorship groups. The articles that present ways to deal with censorship suggest such approaches as preparing a model policy and rules for selecting instructional materials and preventing censorship crises by preparing detailed written policies and rationales and by communicating with parents. The book also includes a bibliography of books, journals, and pamphlets on censorship and on procedures for establishing policies for material selection. (MAI)

Censorship is certainly not new in this country. The earliest censors proscribed sacrilege at least as strictly as obscenity. In Massachusetts in 1664 Thomas a Kempis's Imitation of Christ was declared papist and therefore proscribed. Obscenity cases in the colonial period generally were based on legal precedents in the English courts, although the Massachusetts Bay Colony Act recognized obscenity as an offense even before it was recognized in English common law. The criteria of intent of the accused and corruption of youth were present from the very beginning. The first federal legislation was the Customs Law of 1842—aimed against the importation of indecent and obscene prints, paintings, lithographs, engravings, and transparencies. Printed matter was not included. In 1865 Congress enacted a law declaring that the mailing of obscene publications was a criminal offense.

The man who is credited with leading the fight for the censorship of literature in the United States in the nineteenth century is Anthony Comstock. With the help of a powerful, wealthy supporter, Morris K. Jessup, president of the Young Men's Christian Association and founder of the American Museum of Natural History, Comstock formed the YMCA Committee for the Suppression of Vice. Law enforcement officials were very cooperative. In 1873, when Comstock became secretary of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, he was even empowered to make arrests. He was made a special agent of the Post Office and in that office engineered the passage of a more stringent Federal obscenity bill. Comstock was later directly involved in the formation of the New England Society for the Suppression of Vice. He was very harsh in his methods, once boasting that he had caused fifteen suicides and had destroyed 160 tons of obscene literature.

It is no accident that an increase in censorship in the late nineteenth century coincided with an increase in literacy. Although magazines were still by and large under the influence of the "gentle" tradition, other materials were becoming available for the common people. A broader field of concern was thus opened up for the censor. The common people long had been assumed to be particularly susceptible to the, "evils" of obscenity, so a work was far more likely to be attacked once it was reprinted in an inexpensive edition. Many judicial decisions since that time have reflected this distrust of the common people.

In the twentieth century practically every decade has had its several writers decrying "increasing incidents of censorship." But censorship incidents in the schools in the seventies seem to represent something new in both degree and kind. The great benchmark incident occurred in the midseventies in West Virginia. School board member Alice Moore raised objections to parts of the three hundred different language arts textbooks which the Textbook Selection Committee had submitted to the five-member Kanawha County (Charleston) School Board in April 1974. She began a censorship campaign which would be heard about throughout the country. Moore failed in her effort to get the board to veto the books, but this did not deter her. With the help of various fundamentalist religious groups and an organization called Christian American Parents (CAP), she began a crusade against the books, which she said ridiculed a child's faith, called Biblical stories fables, and implied that the Bible was not to be taken literally. She also objected to the use of four-letter words, to moral relativism, and especially to questions and activities that tended to invade the privacy of the home and to "subvert family relationships." The protest spread, with hundreds joining in marches and demonstrations. Three ministers were arrested for demonstrating on school property.

The various anti-textbook groups decided to boycott the opening of the schools in September. Their picketing and strikes led to the closing of the public bus system, a trucking terminal, mines, and several stores and factories. A compromise was offered by the Superintendent Kenneth Underwood the stop the violence. Under his plan the texts would be removed from the classrooms and reviewed for a thirty-day period. The anti-textbook leaders would accept nothing less than permanent removal. The extent to which these leaders believed in the righteousness of their course is revealed in a September 20 news item in the Charleston Daily Mail in which the Reverend Charles Quigley is reported to have said, "I am asking Christian people to pray that God will kill the giants that have mocked and made fun of dumb fundamentalists. I know of several Biblical incidents where men tried to stop the work of God and died."

Objections seemed to fall into the following categories: (1) anything which might be construed as ridiculing faith, (2) calling Bib-
Preface

Historical stories, fables, or myths, (3) use of four-letter words, (4) any selection or question implying moral relativism, (5) any techniques or procedures in teaching that might involve invasion of privacy, (6) treating God as human, (7) anything that would tend to subvert family relationships, (8) any treatment of sex, (9) any anti- or un-American stance, (10) nonstandard English, (11) anything that might show disrespect of questioning of authority, (12) cruelty and violence in stories, (13) unhappy endings and pervasive sadness in stories, and (14) over-concern with minority, racial, and ethnic groups.

In the face of growing agitation of the anti-textbook group a pro-textbook group called Citizens Concerned for Quality Education was formed. Two ministers were its leaders, James Lewis (Episcopal) and Ronald English (Baptist). Lewis accused the anti-textbook groups of breaking the very laws they pretended to uphold. The West Virginia Council of Churches, also aligned with the pro-textbook faction, warned against any attempt to impose religious ideas on public institutions as against the fundamental concept of religious freedom.

Following the explosive opening of school, further demonstrations, strikes, boycotts, and violence continued through the fall. An elementary school was bombed, cars were bombed, board members were attacked, and fear reigned. In November the School Board voted by a vote of four to one (Alice Moore alone dissented) in a televised meeting to return most of the controversial texts to the classroom. Parents who objected to their children using the books were given the right to request that others be substituted. Some of the most controversial books were placed in the library to be checked out only with written parental permission.

The Kanawha County crisis was the most violent, far-reaching, long lasting, and surely the best publicized of the censorship cases of recent years. But it was by no means the only one, nor was it at all isolated. Some of the same national groups—the Ku Klux Klan, the John Birch Society, the National Committee on the Crisis in Education, Carl McIntire's Christian Crusade, Citizens for Decent Literature, Citizens for Decency Through Law, the Heritage Foundation, and the National Parents League—involving in Kanawha County were active as well in cases in Oklahoma, Texas, Georgia, Indiana, and other states.

Censorship protests are on the increase, as are the number of people involved in a single protest and the amount of violence in the protests. This might reflect the frustrations of people who feel they are a part of a society over which they have little influence. Many seem to sense that society has moved in the wrong direction. Their tendency is to lash out at institutions over which they feel they still have some control—instinctive like the schools which are emblematic of the whole system. Thus protests nowadays are likely to involve issues that go far beyond textbooks.

The National Council of Teachers of English and its state and regional affiliates have long been concerned with matters related to censorship and the teaching of English. Their record of publication verifies this. English Journal regularly publishes articles on censorship, and NCTE has published such works as Obscenity, the Law, and the English Teacher (1966) and Meeting Censorship in the Schools: a Series of Case Studies (1967). The Students' Right to Read has been around for many years, with its most recent revision, by Ken Donelski in 1972. Another extensive revision is in process. State and regional affiliates such as Wisconsin (1963), New England (1969), Arizona (1969 and 1975), Iowa (1975), Southeastern Ohio (1976), and Indiana (1978) have devoted entire issues of their publications to censorship.

But at least since the well-publicized outbreak in West Virginia and the reporting of that conflict at the National Council of Teachers of English convention in New Orleans (1974), there have been increasing requests for new materials on how English teachers may cope with censorship. With incidents of censorship spreading all over the country, the requests for help have accelerated even more. When the NCTE Committee on Censorship was reconstituted and recharged in the fall of 1976, with Edward B. Jenkins as chairperson, one of its first decisions was to publish helpful materials for English teachers to use in solving censorship problems. Dealing with Censorship is the result.

I. The Current Climate

Many English teachers have not had to deal with censorship, and they need to know what is currently happening in case they do face censorship in the future. Those who have faced or are facing censorship need to know they are not alone. They may also get some helpful ideas from knowing what others have done.

Jenkinson’s introductory article hypothesizes that censorship is on the rise. He offers four reasons for this rise, identifies prominent censors and what is being censored, and expresses his major fear—that students might lose the right to learn through exploring ideas. Burress points out that surveys of censorship and the English teacher have been done on a fairly regular basis at least since 1968. His 1977 NCTE survey affirms that censorship in the schools is accelerating. Glatchorn’s 1977 article points out that the wave of censorship has not yet crested and offers suggestions on how the profession should respond. Small concentrates on some dimensions of censorship that he thinks do not usually get enough attention—the historical, social, educational, and human. Small says that we must attempt to understand censors and work not to alienate them. After all, we do not want to lose their interest in schools. Donelson’s article alerts teachers and others to some of the basic issues and problems involving definitions of obscenity and how these relate to school censorship. There is no unambiguous definition of obscenity, as his survey of legal decisions reveals, so the teacher must learn to gauge community standards to some extent, while, at the same time, trying to keep those standards from limiting too severely what is offered in schools. Books cannot fight for themselves. The section concludes with Rhodes’ characterization of court cases as a game of chance, which the English teacher may or may not win. The game is risky, but it can be won if teachers play well and do not make the mistake of thinking that the opposition is less than able.
1 Dirty Dictionaries, Obscene Nursery Rhymes, and Burned Books

Edward B. Jenkinson
Indiana University

When parents complained that "seventy or eighty" words in The American Heritage Dictionary were obscene or otherwise inappropriate for high school students, the school board ordered the dictionary removed from the high school in Cedar Lake, Indiana. In Eldon, Missouri, when twenty-four parents filed a complaint noting that thirty-nine words in The American Heritage Dictionary were objectionable, the school board voted to remove the dictionary from a junior high school.

The dictionary protesters obviously ignored nearly all of the 155,000 words in the 1550 pages of the AHD and focused only on the so-called dirty words. One parent in Eldon was reported as saying: "If people learn words like that it ought to be where you and I learned it—in the street and in the gutter." A board member in Cedar Lake noted: "We're not a bunch of weirdo book burners out here, but we think the one [the AHD] goes too far." One of the more frequently criticized words in the Cedar-Lake controversy was the word bed. "Among the nine definitions listed are 'a place for lovemaking' and 'a marital relationship with its rights and intimacies.'"

After registering an initial response of outrage upon hearing about the fate of the AHD, a lover of language might dismiss the bannings as the acts of school boards in small towns. Many people believe that most censorship activity takes place only in small towns. Such is not the case. A recent study indicates that "censorship disputes are twice as likely to grow up in large cities (with over 100,000 residents) than in small communities having fewer than 2,500 residents. Large cities are also 50 percent more likely to spawn such cases than are either middle-sized or small urban communities."

In 1976, the AHD joined four other dictionaries on the nopurchase list for the entire state of Texas. According to the Newsletter on Intellectual Freedom:

Education Commissioner Marlin Brockett halted an expected protest against five dictionaries (American Heritage Dictionary, The Doubleday Dictionary, Webster's Seventh New Collegiate Dictionary, The Random House College Dictionary, and Webster's New World Dictionary of the American Language) by stating that no works would be purchased that "present material which would cause embarrassing situations or interfere in the learning atmosphere of the classroom." Complaints were expected against definitions for "bed," "knock up," "faggot," and other expressions with sexual meanings.

Commissioner Brockett's announcement was reported in various Texas newspapers on November 12, 13, and 14, 1976. Four months before his announcement, Brockett received bills of particulars from various groups of citizens about the dictionaries that had been submitted for adoption by the State of Texas. One of the letters called attention to these objectionable entries in Webster's New World Dictionary of the American Language:

1. bed - p. 81 vt, bedded, bedding - 3. to have sexual intercourse with, bed and board 2. the married state
2. fag - p. 341 2. slang, a male homosexual; term showing contempt, also faggot.
3. horny - p. 439 4. slang, sexually excited; horniness, n.
4. hot - p. 460 3. d) having strong sexual desire - lustful
5. knock - p. 529 (knock up) 2. slang, to make pregnant.
6. queer - p. 785 slang, homosexual; term showing contempt
7. rubber - p. 838 3. c) slang, a condom
8. shack - p. 881 shack up with (slang) to share living quarters with (one's lover)
9. slut - p. 908 1. a dirty, untidy woman, slattern 2. a sexually immoral woman • sluttish adj. sluttishly adv. sluttishness n.

Calling attention to two items in a Texas proclamation about textbooks, the dictionary protesters stated:

After reviewing the above referenced dictionary, we are of the opinion this is in violation of both sections 1.7 and 1.8. According to the protesters, this is the wording of those two sections of the Texas proclamation: 1.7 "Textbooks offered for adoption shall not include blatantly offensive language or illustrations." 1.8 "Textbooks offered for adoption shall not present material which could cause embarrassing situations or interference in the learning atmosphere of the classroom." Many of the words listed on the attached list could not be printed in a newspaper or said on television or on the radio. We find the words very offensive and embarrassing and feel many people would agree. Every word on the attached list violates the Proclamation as stated above and we respectfully request these words be deleted or else this book be turned down for adoption.

The removal of the dictionaries from the purchase list in Texas was hailed by Norma and Mel Gabler, the self-styled textbook analysts who operate Educational Research Analysts. The Gablers wrote:

God gave parents a number of victories. In Texas alone, the State Textbook Committee did a good job of selecting the best of the available books. Then, the State Commissioner of Education removed 10 books, including the dictionaries with vulgar language and unreasonable definitions.

When many parents and teachers with whom I have spoken hear about the banning of the dictionaries, they begin asking questions about censorship activity in the United States. Their questions provide a useful framework for the rest of this article.

Question: Is Censorship Activity on the Rise?

In my estimation, there are more attempts at censorship now than ever before. There are more than fifty state and national organizations that are concerned about all the educational materials used in the schools. And I believe that the work of such organizations is prompting many citizens to protest textbooks, library books, films, and homework assignments. I have read several recent surveys of teachers of English in which the researcher attempted to determine the scope of censorship activity. When the researchers compared the results of recent surveys with previous surveys, they noted that teachers are now reporting more incidents of censorship.

Question: Why Is Censorship Activity on the Rise?

I think there are at least four major reasons for the increasing attempts at censorship. First, many parents do not recognize the subject matter we now call English. They think that English is diagramming sentences, writing humorous themes, and reading Silas Marner. When some parents do take the time to look at their children's textbooks or to talk with them about homework assignments, the parents do not always understand what their children are doing, nor do they understand why students are being asked to read certain contemporary works of literature. Consequently, the parents may become upset after they read sentences out of context or after they try to compare what they did twenty or thirty years ago with what their children are doing today.

Second, some parents neither read nor like contemporary literature. They object to seeing four-letter words in print, and they also object to any stories that show conflict between teenagers and adults. One familiar cry of the censors is that today's literature is anti-Christian, anti-parent, anti-government, immoral.

A third reason that censorship is on the rise is that more organized groups are involved in attempts at censorship. On the one hand, we have groups frequently calling themselves "Concerned Citizens" and frequently obtaining materials and advice on censorship from specific organizations—who object to books that they call anti-God, anti-authority, and so forth. On the other hand, we have groups that object to books that they label sexist or racist. I have heard this latter kind of censorship referred to as "good censorship." But to me, censorship is censorship whether it be labeled good or bad.

A fourth reason for the rise in censorship is that the schools are a convenient target for unhappy citizens. Many people feel that they cannot fight Washington, the state capitol, or even city hall. When they become unhappy because of inflation, federal or state laws, the so-called moral decline, or anything else, they want to lash out. But they don't always know how to attack the problems that really trouble them. So they vent their spleen upon the schools.

Whether elected or appointed, school boards must conduct public meetings. Citizens who feel that they cannot fight Washington can complain to school boards because they are accessible. And the schools themselves are open every weekday, at least nine months out of the year. Parents can go to a school and demand an audience with the principal, and he or she can't refuse to see them. Not even a classroom teacher can refuse to see parents.

Because the media have given the schools so much publicity since the student protest movement of the sixties, taxpayers have a tendency to feel that almost everything that's wrong with society stems from the schools. So the schools have become a target for irate taxpayers, and censorship is one of their weapons.
Question: Who Attempts to Censor Materials in the Schools?

Note how that question is phrased. The word "attempts" is significant since only a person in authority can actually censor materials. But anyone can bring sufficient pressure to bear on a person in authority so that books will be censored.

People and organizations who attempt to censor school materials can be classified as follows. First, we have the students. Some take books home and show their parents a few four-letter words or controversial ideas, knowing that the parents will explode. Other students honestly object because the language or ideas offend them. But some students would find such books for themselves and would ask for them.

Second, we have those parents who are concerned with the language their children are reading or with the ideas they are being exposed to. I think parents have a legitimate concern about what their children see and hear. But the question that always arises in my mind is this: As a parent, do my rights of censorship or selection of materials extend to the children of others? I believe the answer to that question is no.

Third, there are some teachers who censor books. Sometimes teachers censor books for the same reasons that parents and students do; other times, I think teachers censor books out of fear. For example, in one very large school I know well, one parent objected quietly to Of Mice and Men. The teacher quit teaching that novel and removed it from the classroom shelves. When I mentioned this incident at a conference, a teacher from another school talked with me afterward and reported that the same thing occurred in the school in which she teaches.

The fourth group of censors is school librarians. Many librarians, like many classroom teachers, fight any attempt at censorship. But others, perhaps out of fear of losing their jobs, quietly remove books from the library shelves.

Fifth, we have those school administrators who censor books sometimes without reading them. In one case, that was reported to me, a superintendent demanded that classroom teachers stop teaching Flowers for Algernon because a "leading citizen" objected to the book. The superintendent admitted that he had not read the entire book, but he ordered his teachers to stop teaching "that filthy book." In a second case, the superintendent in Oakland, California, ordered Daddy Was a Number Runner removed from the junior high school library shelves on the basis of one parental complaint and over the objections of her personally selected panel of experts. The grand irony in that incident is that the superintendent had been the director of the National Right to Read Program.

The sixth group of censors is school board members. In Island Trees, New York, the newly elected school board censored at least a dozen books. That case is in the courts. The school board in Strongsville, Ohio, lost a case after removing books from the schools. Other school boards throughout the country have ordered books removed from classrooms or library shelves. Some have been successful; others, fortunately, have failed.

The seventh group of censors is the clergy. Several incidents have been precipitated by clergy. Probably the most famous is the Kanawha County, West Virginia, battle that was ignited by a school board member who was the wife of a minister and then was supported by several ministers. On the other hand, ten clerics in Kanawha County fought attempts at censorship.

The eighth group of censors is the organizations that precipitate censorship incidents. Appendix 8 of James C. Helley's Textbooks on Trial gives this information about Mel and Norma Gable's Educational Research Analysts, Inc., in Longview, Texas: "As the major textbook clearinghouse, the Gables have thousands of textbook reviews in their own plus reviews from many other states. Most are by page, paragraph, and line, prepared by parents for parents, and consider the age level and knowledge of the students. They concentrate on pointing out questionable content."

Other organizations that supply reviews for concerned parents are America's Future in New Rochelle, New York, the John Birch Society, PONYU (Parents of New York Unite), and the many concerned citizen groups that are springing up across the country. Organizations actively involved in attempting to remove books that are racist or sexist are the National Organization of Women (NOW) and the Council on Interracial Books for Children.

Question: What is Being Censored?

It is tempting to answer that question with one word: everything. And that single word answer would not be an exaggeration nor would it be misleading. But to be more specific, I usually cite these fourteen targets of the censors:

1. Novels for adolescents. The organized censors do not approve the subjects that novelists today select for treatment in stories for teenagers. Parents prone to censorship books do not think their children should be reading S.F.
Hinton's The Outsiders, John Donovan's I'll Get There, It Better Be Worth the Trip, Nat Hentoff's I'm Really Dragged But Nothing Gets Me Down, Paul Zindel's My Darling, My Hamburger, or his The Pignian, Judy Blume's Are You There God? It's Me Margaret, and dozens of other popular books. Many protective parents do not want their sons and daughters reading books about student conflicts with parents, drug use and abuse, sex, homosexuality, teenage violence, the horrors of the ghetto, teenage pregnancy, and so forth. Such parents seem to remember the books they read when they were young, and they want the school to focus attention on those books. The irate parents would have the schools remove the works of such authors as Judy Blume, Nat Hentoff, and Paul Zindel and replace them with the novels of Betty Cavanna, Anne Emery, Rosamund Dajardin, and John R. Tunis.

Realistic dialogue. Proponents of the back-to-basics movement do not want their children reading sentences that are not grammatically correct. They object to stories in which authors have characters speak substandard English. In other words, some censors believe that all characters in all books must speak standard English at all times. Otherwise, the censors contend, their children will be taught to use substandard English, since they will imitate the language of the characters in books.

3. The works of "questionable" writers. The organized censors have a tendency to label authors as "questionable" if the censors do not agree with the ideas of the writers. The organized censors decry anthologies that contain stories, poems, and essays by such writers as Langston Hughes, Dick Gregory, Ogden Nash, Richard Wright, Joan Baez, and Malcolm X. Such writers are also often labeled subversive.

The literature of homosexuals. Here is a portion of a message distributed by members of a Save Our Children group:

Save Our Children wishes to thank those members of your community who with their contributions helped sweep us to victory in Florida. The battle has only begun, however, and soon we will carry our campaign all over the nation. For years homosexuals have kept hugging the news with their demands for equal rights, and it is time we pushed back. It is time that, along with thieves and murderers, they be branded for the crimes they are and removed from society. . . . You can fight to eliminate homosexual literature from our schools and libraries. This includes works by such homosexuals as Emily Dickinson, Gertrude Stein, John Milton, Willa Cather, Virginia Woolf, Hans Christian Andersen, Tennessee Williams, Walt Whitman, Marcel Proust, Oscar Wilde, Andre Gide, Horatio Alger, Jr., T. E. Lawrence, Jean Cocteau, Truman Capote, Jean Genet, Gore Vidal, Rod McKuen.

5. "Trash." Books that are frequently labeled "trash" include The Catcher in the Rye, Flowers for Algernon, Soul on Ice, Forever, Black Boy, Laughing Boy, Go Ask Alice, and most contemporary novels for adolescents.

6. Ideas, teaching methods, and books that are examples of "secular humanism." In the foreword to James C. Hitt, Textbooks on Trial, Congress states: "Textbooks on Trial, the author indicates that secular humanism is a religion running rampant through America's schools.

Ethnic studies, drug education, and so forth. Concerned parents can obtain petitions that they can present to an administrator or teacher that call for the removal of their children from classes in which a variety of topics are discussed or a variety of methods are used. This petition, or a variation of it, was presented to teachers and/or administrators in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in 1975, in Culver, Indiana, in 1976, in Defoe, Minnesota, in 1977, and in Austin, Texas, in 1977.
criticism of family life, "sensitivity training," "magic circles," Human Development programs, social awareness, self-awareness or self-understanding, situation ethics, value judgment, values clarification, moral value alteration, Behavior Modification, Reality Therapy, ethnic studies, "Humanities," the philosophies of the Humanist religion, the Occult, or any combination or degree thereof, without the consent of the undersigned by express written and signed permission.

That petition virtually rules out the teaching of English as we know it. Any theme assignment could be construed to be attempts at "self-understanding" or "personal development," and some theme assignments without an examination of social and cultural aspects of family life. Literature can also be so construed. So that leaves the diagramming of sentences which, I was told, teachers of English in a heavily censored school system found to be the one safe activity they could assign to students.

8. Role playing. In Park Rapids, Minnesota, parents attending a meeting of concerned citizens received a set of guidelines for the selection of public school material that included this statement: "Classroom materials, textbooks, etc., must not use psychodrama (role-playing) as a teaching tool." A bill was introduced into the Indiana State Senate that called for the abolition of role playing as a teaching method for "the purpose of classifying, controlling, or predicting behavior." The sponsor of that defeated bill introduced another bill that would have prohibited teaching materials that presented "sadistic or degrading behavior," that invaded "the privacy of the pupil, the pupil's home and parents," and that contained "either profane statements or disrespectful statements or pictures regarding the religious or ethical beliefs of others." Many people could subscribe to the major tenets of the proposed bill. However, the critical questions are these. Who decides what is "degrading behavior," for instance? Would a novel be rejected because of the "degrading behavior" of one of the characters? Who would enforce the bill? Would the enforcement of this and similar bills lead to a police state atmosphere?

The absence of common core. Item 1 of "A Policy Statement of the Kanawha County Board of Education" states that textbooks "used in the study of the English Language..."
shall teach that traditional rules of grammar are a worthwhile subject for academic pursuit and are essential for effective communication among English speaking people."

The same rule is a part of the Texas adoption requirements which James C. Heffley notes were proposed by Norma and Mel Gabler when they were called into Kansas City in 1974.

Statements about parents...

11. Phase-elective English programs. Proponents of the back-to-basics movement are calling for the abolition of phase-elective programs. People who cannot describe phase-elective programs are blaming them for the declining SAT scores, for the failure of Johnny to write well, and for the failure of Susie to read well.

12. Sex education. Long a target for the censors, courses in sex education are still prime targets for unhappy parents.

13. Sexist stereotypes. Members of the feminist movement are objecting to school materials that stereotype women.

14. Racist statements. The Council on Interracial Books for Children has objected to books that contain racist plots. The Council has actively campaigned for fair treatment of all races in textbooks, but it has also listed books, including novels, that should be removed from school shelves.

Question: What Are the Results of Attempts to Censor Books, or Other Teaching Materials?

It is impossible to say exactly what might come from censorship incidents. But, based on an analysis of several censorship incidents, here are some possible results.

1. A community tends to be polarized. Teachers, with the censors or with the community, often adopt a neutral position.

2. Teachers and administrators are frequently demoralized when they become the target of an attack because they teach certain materials or because taught in their schools. Some leave our suffer breakdown and refuse to accept incidents; and so on. We never to teach anything that might be construed to be controversial.

3. Teachers frequently find that they have lost stature in the community.

4. The books under attack become the bestsellers within the community. Students who would not ordinarily read the books under attack make every attempt to do so. Thus, the censors frequently succeed—unwittingly, of course—in encouraging students to read books that the censors don't want them to read.

5. When the censors call for teachers to use felt-tip pens to black out objectionable words in books, the results are frequently not what the censors wanted. For example, a passage with a damn or hell in it might take on an entirely new meaning if the offensive word is deleted. The imaginative mind can substitute many words for the deleted one. Consider the effects of the felt-tip pen on the following!

Mary had a little ______.
Its ______ was ______ as ______.
And everywhere that Mary ______,
The ______ was sure to ______.

A successful censorship attack leads to more attacks within the same community, and it also leads to "censorship fallout." In other words, a book that is banned in one community will certainly become a target for censors in another community.

Question: After Studying Censorship for Several Years, What Do You Fear Most?

I fear that students might lose the right to learn the right to read, the right to explore ideas. Whenever I see petitions and guidelines like those mentioned in this article, I shudder. I certainly hope that my children will not have to grow up in a society in which they are denied the right to study any subject, to read any book they deem worth their attention, and to speak out on any topic they think worthy of discussion.
Dirty Dictionaries

I fear the mentality that would lead to the burning of books. When school boards order the destruction of books (by burning or shredding), I wonder if the school board members have read history. I wonder if they have considered the consequences of their acts. I worry about the consequences of the board of directors in the Line Mountain School District in Pennsylvania ordering the destruction of Go Ask Alice, Bonnie Jo, Go Home, and The Cheese Stands Alone.

I hope that American children will not have to witness nor read about the burning of more books; rather, I hope that they will grow up free to read.

2 A Brief Report of the 1977 NCTE Censorship Survey

Lee Burress
University of Wisconsin—Stevens Point

Beginning at least as early as 1963, the National Council of Teachers of English or its affiliates or individual members of NCTE have attempted to assess censorship problems encountered by English teachers in their use of learning resource materials. The term "censorship" is a shorthand term that implies more exactness than perhaps is the case for the variety of problems that teachers may have encountered. To quantify complaints or their results is difficult. The statistics that follow in this report should be regarded as indicative rather than as absolutely conclusive. However, since approximately the same population has been questioned several times with approximately the same set of questions, the patterns that have emerged suggest the survey has some degree of dependability, if for no other reason than its consistency.

In February 1977 the NCTE office mailed out 2,000 questionnaires to a sample of secondary school teachers who were members of the council. After a reminder letter was mailed out, a total of 30 questionnaires were returned, or slightly over 30 percent. This was a somewhat lesser return than the 1966 survey sponsored by NCTE, which produced a return of 38 percent of 1600 questionnaires. The questionnaires circulated for the same length of time in both surveys. But the 1977 questionnaire was nine pages in length and asked several more questions than did the six page-1966 survey.

The majority of returns was from east of the Rocky Mountains—therefore regional comparisons for the entire country are somewhat incomplete. Nevertheless, those regional differences that did show up are similar to the patterns shown by other studies. Also, the survey succeeded in reaching a fair cross section of the types of schools found throughout the country. Enrollment totals in respondents' schools varied as follows:

In the 1977 survey, there were four basic questions: Have you or teachers in your department, since September 1, 1975, had objections to (1) a book or book title? (2) a magazine? (3) a film or AV material? or (4) the school newspaper or creative writing publication? The form of the question was the same in 1966, except that items (3) and (4) were not included. Following each of these basic questions was a detailed set of questions asking about the objector, objections, and results of the complaint. The questionnaire also included a list of one hundred books composed of fifty innocuous titles and fifty controversial titles. The list served as an instrument for comparing the holdings of the respondents' school libraries.

Because the 1977 survey expanded the number and kinds of questions, the willingness of respondents to answer the total questionnaire was tested heavily. For this reason the total responses to several of the questions is less than 630, the number of questionnaires returned. Tabular summaries of data relating to book censorship, periodical censorship, AV censorship, and censorship of student publications are included in respective sections below.
Statistical analysis of information obtained from the questionnaires was performed by the Academic Computer Services of the University of Wisconsin, Stevens Point. The survey questionnaire is appended to this article.

I. Books

Approximately 49 percent of the returns indicated some kind of attempted or completed censorship, when all four basic categories are considered (see Table 1). If book censorship alone is considered, the 1977 survey showed that slightly over 30 percent of the returns reported book censorship pressures. In raw numbers, 188 respondents reported objections to books used in their schools; 427 respondents reported no objections. In contrast, the NCTE survey of 1966 showed just over 20 percent of the returns reporting censorship pressures on books. The 10 percent increase seems a significant difference.

The northeastern part of the United States reported the highest incidence of censorship pressure on books—34 percent of reporting schools; the south reported the lowest incidence of attempted

...censorship 28 percent; the midwest and great plains states were in between—32 percent. The regional variances seem partly explainable when related to factors of school size and number of books in the school library. These are the factors uncovered by the survey as most clearly influencing the incidence of book censorship.

There were 145 titles that appeared as the object of complaints in the 1977 report, 142 in the 1966 report. A number of the 1977 titles appeared in previous surveys, and the objections are quite similar in nature and distribution to those of earlier surveys.

While quantifying the objections presents some difficulty, it appears that the most common objection was to the language of the books (see Table 2). This objection is ambiguous; it sometimes refers to the grammar or dialect, or it may refer to profanity, or to so-called obscenity. (It is the belief of the author of this report that none of the titles objected to would be found obscene by a court. The complete list of titles is below; readers may decide for themselves.) It appears that to many objectors grammar has a moral connotation; bad grammar is equivalent to bad morals.

Next in frequency to objections to language were objections to sex, or erotic qualities in the books. The two sets of objections, to language and to sex, tend to overlap; taken together, they make up about 75 percent of the total number of objections. That is quite similar to previous surveys on this subject. If the books objected to for sexual matter are examined, it seems a reasonable conclusion that any reference to sex or any presentation of erotic qualities in a book, or for that matter in periodicals, is objectionable, to some persons. It is not obscenity that is objectionable; any presentation in literature of sex or sexuality may be objected to, no matter how decorous the reference.

It is noteworthy that relatively few objections of an ideological sort appear. Two possible explanations may be offered. One is that many persons in our society accept the notion that the school or the library should present a complete spectrum of ideas. Complementary to this is the notion that obscenity is not protected by the Constitution, and should not be presented in the schools. Therefore it is proper to object to a book or magazine for its obscenity, not for its ideas. It is also quite possible that many persons direct their objections against language or obscenity, when actually they may be objecting to the ideas in a book.

There were some objections to books because of racial matters, or because of religious references, but relatively few persons explicitly objected on these grounds. However, when the list of titles... that have been objected to is examined, it is noteworthy that books with racial implications appear relatively often: Manchild in the Promised Land, Down These Mean Streets, Nigger, Native Son, I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings, and Anne Frank, the Diary of a Young Girl.

On the other hand there are few objections to books on the grounds of violence. Only about 4 percent of the objections cite violence as the grounds of complaint. This is similar to previous surveys. However, to anticipate the discussion of objections to films and AV materials, violence appeared relatively often as grounds for objection to those media. Apparently violence in books is not as provocative as violence in films.

An examination of the answers to the question “Who objected?” (see Table 2) shows that in 1977, 78 percent of the objections to books was by parents; 19 percent was by members of the school staff—teacher, principal, superintendent, librarian. This is in marked contrast to the 1966 report in which 48 percent of the objections were reported by parents and approximately 42 percent were reported by members of the school staff. If the 1977 report is correct, then the increase in school censorship pressures would seem to have come from parents, not from the school staff. Perhaps the efforts that various professional groups have made in the last ten years have resulted in greater awareness of the need to act in professional ways on the part of members of the school staff.

It must be noted however that, as previous surveys showed, when parents complain, more often than not the attempted censorship does not occur. Thus according to the 1977 survey only about 34 percent of the parental requests to censor a book were carried out. However, when members of the school staff complained, in about 71 percent of the cases the book was censored. The school staff is apparently much more effective than parents in getting materials removed.

So far as this survey shows, most censorship pressure on the schools is from parents or school staff members. Rarely does a clergyman, or some other professional person, or member of the community complain about book use in the schools. The survey failed to ascertain what may have motivated the parent or school staff member to complain. In this respect, this survey is similar to previous ones. Only infrequently have the surveys reported that some organized group that monitors the use of school materials has been the source of objections reported on the questionnaire. The 1977 survey specifically asked a question concerning such groups, but the respondents apparently did not perceive that their difficulties emanated from such groups.

To the present writer no characteristic of censorship seems more evident than its capriciousness. There is however a tendency in schools and libraries to believe that by "careful book selection" censorship may be prevented. This term is very close to euphemism for self-censorship, or pre-censorship. Several respondents did not hesitate to say that they did intend to censor the materials used in the schools. One respondent from North Dakota wrote that "Teachers, principals and superintendents have a perfect right to censor books used in the schools."

In order to test the proposition that book selection practices in school libraries—such as excluding controversial books—were in fact influencing the incidence of censorship, a list of one hundred titles was included in the questionnaire. Half of the titles were books that had been reported on previous surveys as the objects of complaint; they were therefore considered controversial. The other half were considered innocuous. Both lists were taken from sources that would suggest a strong possibility of their being in a school library. The lists were combined in alphabetical order.
Respondents were asked simply to indicate which of the titles were in their school library. A ratio of controversial titles to non-controversial titles was then determined for each of the respondents' schools. A statistical analysis of these ratios showed that the differences were not significant in comparing schools reporting censorship with schools not reporting censorship. The ratio of controversial titles to non-controversial titles for schools reporting censorship was 36:40; and for schools not reporting censorship the ratio was 35:39.

The questionnaire also asked for the total number of books circulated in the school library. This question, like the previous library related question, required special effort from the respondent, and understandably elicited fewer responses than other items in the questionnaire. Nevertheless, given the data received, a statistical analysis by use of a T test showed that it was significant at the level of .035 in comparing schools reporting censorship with schools not reporting censorship. The average number of books in the library of schools reporting censorship (from 116 reports) was 1,812, while the average number of books in the library for schools not-reporting censorship (from 251 reports) was 9,252.

The volume of books in the school library may be related to school size. The survey established that there is a highly significant relationship between school size and the incidence of censorship. The larger the school the more likelihood of censorship. This relationship, on the basis of a Chi square test, was significant at the level of .00. The survey therefore supports the hypothesis that the larger the school and the greater the number of books in the school library the more censorship pressure.

Apparently censorship is a phenomenon that may occur anywhere, and is not particularly characteristic of the so-called backwoods communities of the country. In fact, data from the survey question identifying the area served by the respondent's school—whether metropolitan, suburban, urban, or rural—turned out to be inconclusive. Furthermore, the survey fails to support any presumption about the kinds of material likely to provoke censorship. In concurrence with previous surveys, it gives evidence that the censorship phenomenon is capricious. Any book, it seems, may become a focus for objection.
In addition, it should be noted that while a few titles receive much attention from the would-be censors—The Catcher in the Rye, books by Steinbeck, Brave New World, 1984, and a few others—the great majority of titles receive only one complaint. Of the several hundred titles reported as the object of censorship since 1963 on various surveys, probably 70 percent were the object of a single complaint. Thus if a librarian is to be free from complaints, a typical library would have to remove hundreds of titles, since we know that many books have characteristics that arouse the sensitivities of censorious persons. On the current survey 75 percent of the titles were the object of a single complaint.

Readers may wish to examine the list of 145 titles included below and ponder the qualities of the books for themselves. As Nyla Ahrens pointed out in a 1965 doctoral dissertation that examined the same population as the present survey, the main objects of attack are contemporary books by American authors that examine the problems of our society realistically. It seems safe to conclude that the most careful pre-censorship will not protect the schools or libraries from complaints or attempted censorship, unless the pre-censorship goes so far as to preclude all recent American literature as well as a substantial body of English literature, including Shakespeare and the Bible.

What effect do these censorship pressures have? No easy answer can be made to this question, but it does seem the effect must be very depressing, at least from the standpoint of attempting to achieve the most effective education. In this survey no teacher was reported to have lost a position as a result of book selections, though there was one report of a person who came close to being dismissed over a complaint. The national media have reported dismissals in North Dakota, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, and Indiana recently, as many teachers are aware.

It is clear from the survey that on a number of occasions teachers have been prevented from using their best judgment in the selection of books and films. As the chart beneath shows, in more than a third of the cases, when there was a complaint, the objectionable book was censored in some way—removed from classroom use, the title taken from a list of recommended books, the book removed from the library, or put on a closed shelf. There are sixty-six titles or books that were censored as a result of complaints. Some of these books are clearly ephemeral, Semi-Tough, for example. But if teachers cannot select ephemeral books that they believe may interest a particular student or class, or may fit into a particular curricular unit, then the educational process is severely handicapped. Among the books that were censored are many of the greatest books of our literature, including The Scarlet Letter, A Farewell to Arms, The Sound and the Fury, and The Grapes of
It is hard to understand a school system that prevents high school students from reading these books.

There are, however, some grounds for optimism. Though the number of reported complaints is higher than on previous surveys, the ability of the school system to deal with the complaints seems improved. 296 respondents reported their school systems had a planned procedure available, while 276 reported they had none. On a related question, 395 respondents' school systems apparently have a planned procedure for selecting resource materials; only 181 do not. This survey shows more rejections of censorship attempts, and more offers of alternative assignments (see Table 3), than were reported in 1966. Perhaps the school systems are learning more effective ways of dealing with parental complaints. It is somewhat hopeful to note that of the 145 titles objected to, only 66 were in fact denied to students in various schools throughout the land. It would be much better, of course, if none of those titles had been censored, but that the schools were able to withstand the degree of censorship pressure that currently exists, as well as they apparently did, gives hope of continued improvement in dealing with this problem.

II. Periodicals

An examination of the censorship pressures occasioned by periodicals supports some of the conclusions arrived at concerning book censorship. Complaints were reported by forty-eight respondents; 540 reported none. Thirty-one popular magazines were the object of attempted censorship. It is noteworthy that the objectionable titles are not titles that could be conceivably the subject of obscenity trials; they are the popular magazines of our time. Time was reported most often as objectionable; in fact, of the eighty-nine objections reported, thirty were to the popular news magazines—Time, U.S. News and World Report, Newsweek, and Sports Illustrated.

It is a striking evidence of the power of these censorship pressures that twenty-six out of thirty complaints resulted in some form of censorship of these news magazines. Sometimes the subscription was ended; occasionally a page was torn out; often magic marker was used to delete so-called offensive material. Apparently magic marker is an indispensable tool in some libraries for censoring objectionable periodicals (see Table 4).
The data on censorship of periodicals seem to indicate a strong desire to protect young people from knowledge of the grimy, gritty, unpleasant realities of the world outside the schoolhouse. It seems another form of the old tendency to kill the messenger because he brings bad news. The data also support the finding with books that censorship is capricious and irrational. Why prevent students in school from reading magazines which must be in the homes of many of the students?

III. Films and AV Materials

Reports of censorship pressure on films and AV materials were fewer than reports on the other media surveyed (see Table 7). Perhaps the schools use relatively less such material; or more likely, access to films and AV material is largely limited to students, so that the constituency most likely to complain—parents—do not see the material, and so do not complain. For whatever reason, there were only forty-five reports of censorship pressure against films. It should be noted also that the questionnaire went to English teachers, a fuller report might have been obtained if the questionnaire had been addressed to speech or communications teachers. As it was, there were forty reports of objections to AV material; 545 respondents reported no objection. The largest number of objectors was parents, followed by members of the school staff (see Table 5).

Objections are similar to those encountered with regard to books and periodicals (see Table 6). References to sexuality lead the list of complaints. As previously suggested, violence is found much more objectionable in films than in books. Objections to films because of their ideas seem to appear more often than is true for books. Are people more willing to accept the notion that the function of a library is to present a wide range of ideas in books than they are to accept a similar philosophy for films? It should be remembered too that national policy does support legal constraints on films and television. Many cities or states have film censorship laws or agencies; very few such laws or agencies exist for the print media. Moreover, the Federal Communications Commission has extensive regulations concerning television. These precedents may account in part for the different attitude toward the use of films in the schools, as compared with the attitude toward the use of books. This subject calls for further thought and investigation.

IV. School Publications

The questionnaire asked about both creative writing publications and newspapers published by the school. Reports of both items are included in this discussion, since there was little difference in the nature of objections. There were very few reports concerning school creative writing publications. In total, there were 171 reports of pressure against school publications; 367 respondents reported no incidents.

This material is more difficult to deal with, since an analysis of the responses cannot be verified by examining the material objected to, as is the case with the other three media discussed in this report. The conclusions therefore must be more tentative, since there is no way of knowing, for example, whether or not a given publication dealt in a biased way with the material it supposedly reported on. Nevertheless a number of interesting implications do emerge.

It is noteworthy that censorship pressures on the school newspaper seem a prominent part of school life, second only in frequency of report to censorship pressures on books (see Table 10). There were 170 questionnaires that reported censorship pressures.

There were significant differences in the sources of complaints and in the nature of complaints. The newspaper is the only school media that does not arouse much parental complaint. Of the 227 complaints reported only 33 were from parents, slightly over 14 percent, markedly in contrast to the source of complaints about books or films. The school staff provided the great bulk of complaints 58 percent of the complainants were teachers, principals, superintendents. Many others complained, including members of the Board of Education, businessmen, janitors, and others. The list beneath is worth examining in detail (see Table 8).

The reasons for objecting differ also in significant ways (see Table 9). There were very few objections to sexual references in school publications—only seven in all. But there were many objections to the tendency of school newspapers to be critical of the school, its administration, of teachers, of local businessmen, and of school activities athletic or musical. There were many complaints like the following: “The principal objected because it made the school look bad.” In another case both a teacher and a principal objected because a reporter “expressed a personal opinion about the lack of service from guidance personnel.” Another objection was to printing "information about how to change your schedule without getting caught." Local businessmen objected to criticism of the bus service, of supplies furnished the school, and other services. Janitors complained because the school paper did not support the janitors' strike. Do school newspapers have the same right to be critical of institutions that other newspapers have? Many school staff members and interested citizens apparently do not think so.

There were relatively few objections to the content of the paper of an ideological sort. More serious was a large group of complaints based on allegations of bad journalistic practices. No judgment could be formed from the questionnaires about the validity of these charges. Sometimes the respondents themselves believed the charges correct; sometimes they did not.

There were relatively few charges based on the use of language; here one finds the same ambiguity that appears in the objections to books. Is bad English immoral? Less than 10 percent of the charges were based on this objection; apparently the processes by which school papers are prepared result in generally conservative language.

Conclusion

A major conclusion of this report is that censorship pressure is a prominent and growing part of school life. Why this is so is a subject that needs further thought by interested persons. Academic freedom is rather well established in the institutions of higher learning, though even there occasional violations may be observed. But there is not as yet general acceptance of academic freedom for students or teachers at the elementary or secondary level of education. A few recent court cases suggest a growing body of law that may ultimately support the belief that academic freedom and the Bill of Rights apply as well to the lower level schools as they do to the institutions of higher education. The Supreme Court case of Tinker vs. Des Moines Independent School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969) and the case of Minarcini vs. Strongsville City School District, 541 F.2d 577 (6th Cir. 1976) offer some encouragement for the belief that the courts may yet protect teachers and students from the capricious threats revealed in this report.

A question that has concerned professional associations is whether the kind of material reported here should in fact be published. Some persons fear that these lists will be used to identify books and other learning resource materials for pre-censorship. In the opinion of this writer, that danger is negligible. Those inclined to be censors will find ready assistance from a host of organizations that do not believe in academic freedom. Publishing the actual lists of attempted or completed censorship cases will, we may hope, alert the general public to what is happening and arouse support for the selection by teachers and librarians in the schools of those books and periodicals they deem most useful.

Mark Twain observed that laughter is the human race's best weapon. The lists published above seem laughable indeed to this writer. Let us publicize these lists in the hope that the laughter they cause may blow away the humbuggery of censorship.

3 Censorship and the Classroom Teacher

Allan-Glatthorn
University of Pennsylvania

We are in the midst of a wave of censorship and educational controversy that has not yet crested. The vicious battle in West Virginia, the Congressional attacks on Man: A Course of Study, and the large number of local conflicts over textbooks and curricula are sure indications that the phenomenon is widespread, not localized, and long-lasting, not temporary.

And the effects of such controversy, of course, pose serious problems for all of us. Individual teachers and administrators have been attacked. School systems and communities have been torn asunder. School boards have adopted much more restrictive policies. And publishers have reacted, predictably, by imposing their own brands of prior censorship. We therefore cannot dismiss the problem airily or wish it away with tolerant smiles. We need to understand its roots and consider our response.

Where does the new censorship come from? Some of the would-be censors are political opportunists who will ride any wave that promises to carry them to victory. Many of the critics attacking school textbooks and modern curricula are also attacking the federal bureaucracy, school busing, and any other target that might capture the attention of a bored constituency.

And part of the censorship movement, obviously, is a specific and pointed attack on questionable material. Parents who are not captive of any given ideology are simply unhappy with the books being studied. And I, for one, think such concerns are in part justified, for we have made some bad choices. The new freedom granted by elective courses has led to a kind of curriculum anarchy. And our genuine concern for finding books with a high appeal for TV addicts led us to choose some books better left on the drugstore rack. (A young man carrying a copy of Fear of...
Flying recently assured me it was required reading for an elective called "The Literature of Flight.")

So there are some questionable books and a few political mountainbanks. But we would be ill-advised to consider the problem local or the issue specific. There are larger forces at work that need to be examined.

Some of the censorship, of course, is a thinly disguised racism, a counter-attack by whites unhappy with the current concern for black culture.

Some of the censorship is simply a manifestation of a vague malaise that affects us all. These are difficult times. The bills pile higher, children become more sullen, the traffic gets worse, and we all go about muttering "things fall apart, the center cannot hold."

In times like these, people need a scapegoat. But there aren't many scapegoats left these days. We don't have Mr. Nixon to kick around any more, the law won't let us lynch black folk, and the Arabs are too remote and too powerful to attack. But schools and teachers are handy and defenseless targets. So many of the attacks of the censors are an attempt to hold the schools and the teachers responsible for the problems of our society. Kids use drugs; it's the school's fault. Young people are bored; the classes have turned them off. Teenagers act immorally; so it must be the textbooks.

Censorship becomes one more form of scapegoating.

But perhaps the most important source of all is an ideological warfare of which censorship is only one battle. The working class people of middle America are convinced that they are a beleaguered minority who have been systematically attacked for the past fifteen years. First the blacks demanded power; then the young revolted. Next, women marched in the streets; and then homosexuals demanded equal treatment. The results were predictable. For, in years gone by, to be white, middle-aged, and manly meant that you demanded instant respect; now, in the seventies, it means only that you are immediately suspect. So we are experiencing a white backlash as middle America decides it can survive only by fighting back. And the battle over textbooks is, I believe, the first in a series of confrontations yet to come. To the coal miner in West Virginia, I am the enemy.

So what response do we make? I think three answers are called for—dialog, change, and resistance. Let me speak briefly about each.

Obviously, there is a need for a new dialog between schools and the communities. But such dialog needs to go far beyond the patronizing condescension and manipulation that too often pass for school public relations. There is a need first of all for a new humility among us educators. We don't know all the answers. We don't know what is best for all teenagers. We aren't sure about the effects of pornography. We don't know which books might be too disturbing for that troubled adolescent. We are trained teachers—but most of us are not experts in adolescent psychology or juvenile literature. And such a humility should lead us to respect our saner critics. Except for a few deranged individuals, most of the parents attacking textbooks are sincere people who are aching to be heard. But we aren't listening very well. Some of the textbook defenders in West Virginia certainly inflamed the controversy by describing the critics as Hiders... and by seeing in this grassroots protest a sinister conspiracy.

But there is also a need for firm honesty in such dialog. To a troubled community, we need to say, “We are all accountable—our young people are in trouble and we are to blame.” The school has no problems that are not those of the larger society. Young people are in trouble—and the school is only the place where their sickness becomes epidemic. The schools have no drug problem; young people are still using too much alcohol and drugs. The school has no race problem; our society is racist and young people have caught that disease. The school does not breed permissiveness; young people have become spoiled by indulgent parents.

Such honest dialog should not result simply in more blaming, but should lead instead to a sense of shared responsibility and an open admission of our own failings. Such an admission will then move us to the second step of changing. For I truly believe that the rash of attacks suggests to us that some changes are needed.

For one thing, we as English teachers need to show more acceptance and respect for values other than our own. Most of us are intellectuals who see ourselves as liberated; but too often such intellectual independence becomes distorted into a smug conviction that the traditional values of church, country, and family are childish aberrations that must be corrected. So we set about to indoctrinate with our own brand of humanistic relativism. Sometimes the indoctrination is subtle, as we choose books that reflect only that perspective. And sometimes the indoctrination is explicitly direct in the case of the radical teacher who meets his ego needs by ridiculing the faith of a troubled adolescent. And you don't need to be very smart to make a sixteen year old look foolish. We do need an open English classroom, an open forum for the

Expression of all ideas—even the most traditional and the most religiously fundamental.

I think a second change we need is a new respect for the privacy of the young. Here again a legitimate concern to help the young know their values and discuss their feelings has too often become an insistence driving into the recesses of their own hearts. The critics have justifiably attacked those English classes that more closely resemble sensitivity groups. It seems to me that self-realization always involves a dynamic tension between the private and the public, the open and the closed, the engaged and the withdrawn. And we should make the English class a place where silence is valued, where openness is given its time, where privacy has room.

Amiel's Journal should heed this advice of Amiel, the French diarist:

"Let mystery have its place in you; do not be always tilling up your whole soul with the ploughshare of self-examination; leave a little fallow corner in your heart for any seed to spring in, and reserve a nook of shadow for the passing bird. Keep a place in your heart for the unexpected guest, an unknown God. Then if a bird sing among your boughs, do not be too eager to tame it. If you are conscious of something new, thought or feeling—wakening in the depths of your being, do not be in a hurry to let in light upon it to look at it; let the springing germ have the protection of being forgotten, hedge it round with quiet, and do not break in upon its darkness; let it take shape and grow, and not a word of your happiness to anyone. Sacred work of nature as it is, all conception should be enwrapped by the triple veil of modesty, silence, and night.

Amiel’s Journal.

I think we need finally to do a better job of self-censorship. And here we need to keep firmly in mind that the classroom is not the newstand, the English textbook is not a girlie magazine, the teenager is not the adult. My own bias is that the society can tolerate almost absolute freedom as to what is published for private consumption by mature adults. But I become more and more convinced that a required book studied by all students in the English classroom must meet very different criteria. We make a grave mistake if today's best-seller list becomes tomorrow's exclusive required reading.

For one thing, we see Gresham’s law of literature developing—with the bad driving out the good. We have only so much time and so many dollars, and every period, every dollar spent on The Godfather is one less for Shakespeare.
A second concern is that our lusting after the most recent fad book means that we often spoil the fun of reading with the drudgery of studying. Vonnegut is to be read, not analyzed. Watership Down is a personal book that makes its own private connections and should not be twisted with the heavy hand of the symbol-hunter. Or as one teenager complained, "Every time a good book comes along, English teachers spoil it."

A final concern, of course, is that some of our choices seem just not appropriate for all the young adolescents in our classes. I do not subscribe to the belief that there is a direct connection between what we read and how we act, but I do know that we are subtly influenced by all powerful books, and that the teenage mind is easily impressed. Consequently, I believe that books that reek of violence, that flaunt sexual perversion, that perpetuate ethnic stereotypes, or that preach occult nonsense may be entitled to two weeks on the supermarket rack, but do not belong on anyone's required reading list.

Just in case I might be misunderstood, I would like to make it clear that I do see the need to use books that are contemporary and that help young people understand the reality of an evil world—but I do think that some of us have made some foolish mistakes in the hope of finding relevant literature. We need to develop some reasonable guidelines that will protect us from the attacks of our critics and save us from our own foolishness. If we don't develop our own guidelines, then others will develop them for us, and we will be working under restrictions like those imposed by the Kanawha County School Board.

But finally, I believe, we must take a stand. After all the dialog has been held and after the needed changes have been made, we must at some place draw the line. For the battle has been joined. We are locked in a struggle over the fundamental principles of freedom and liberty. It is not simply the struggle to defend our professional freedom to choose books. It is the larger struggle to ensure that the public school classroom remains a forum for free inquiry. If angry parents can turn the public school into a closed system for inculcating their narrow vision, then surely we are all in trouble.

In such a struggle, surely the National Council of Teachers of English and its local affiliates must play an active role. Help is needed by the classroom teacher besieged by angry critics. We need help in developing good selection policies, in finding better materials, in beginning the dialog so sorely needed. And there are two areas where the power and influence of NCTE can especially be brought to bear. One is to lobby against any legislation which would result in unduly restrictive policies. And the other is to create a legal defense fund for those teachers who find themselves in the courts over issues of censorship.

Perhaps an even more important role can be played by teacher associations that are more astute about the politics of power. Such associations seem all too ready to strike for selfish ends but have been conspicuously absent in the censorship fray. Perhaps new leaders will have the vision to realize that academic freedom is truly a non-negotiable demand.

But at the last, the battle is a lonely and private one; one which individuals, not organizations, can only fight, and I would not presume to tell you where you take a stand. I can only remind you and myself that people are measured by the battles they fight and certainly no case is greater than what Jeffers calls "the cold passion for truth."

So we call ourselves teacher and the classroom is our world. It is there that the battle is joined. In our own way we must struggle to guarantee that the English classroom most of all remains a place where all issues can be examined, all voices heard.

Surely the risks are great. We will be pilloried and slandered. We may suffer physical violence. And we may lose our jobs.

But the costs of remaining silent are even greater. If we capitulate to the forces of censorship, the foundation of liberty will have been eroded. And in the process we shall have lost our souls.

Ortega reminds us that "to live is to feel ourselves fatally obliged to exercise our liberty, to decide what we are going to be in this world."

So the choice is clear. We can exercise our liberty by speaking out, not remaining silent—by protesting, not acquiescing—by defying, not capitulating. Some of us will fight to eliminate sexism from books. Some will struggle to extirpate all vestiges of racism. Some will be in the forefront of the public battle over censorship. Others will work quietly in the less glamorous arena of the classroom. But each of us in our own way will join in the defense of freedom. So at the end, it can be said of us, "While others talked about liberty, they struggled that it might survive."
4 Censorship and English: Some Things We Don’t Seem to Think About Very Often (But Should)

With all of the publicity censorship receives, it would seem that every dimension of the controversy should already have been explored thoroughly. Yet, there are several major aspects to which few writers have given very much attention. A careful review of hundreds of the articles on censorship which have appeared in the journals included in the Education Index during the past twenty years has revealed that writers about censorship and the schools have usually dealt with one of the following:

1. the details of specific censorship cases and their causes, including discussions of the types of materials or subjects under attack (the specific dimension);
2. arguments against censorship and a defense of the “freedom to read” (the freedom dimension); and
3. advice to teachers and schools about how to prepare for censorship attacks and what to do when under attack (the professional dimension).

In a similar fashion, many teachers of English seem limited in their awareness of the many dimensions to the topic of textbook censorship. They can discuss specific cases and are often familiar with the details of such cases, especially those that seem absurd. They can present arguments against censorship, often with references to Milton and Jefferson. Finally, they can make a case for themselves as the appropriate selectors of English school materials and laud themselves as defenders of the school against censorship attacks. Like the articles just mentioned, they can deal effectively with three dimensions of censorship: the specific dimension, the freedom dimension, and the professional dimension. Each of these is an important aspect of any school censorship crisis.
Each of these dimensions is familiar to us all. We have heard each one expounded by colleagues and by experts. We have read about each. We have discussed each. But missing from the articles reviewed and the teachers' discussions is an awareness that schools, and therefore, censorship in schools, have an historical background. Such discussions of censorship fail to recognize that schools have a relation to the society that causes them to come into existence and that schools have an educational purpose, the direction of which is not absolute but rather a matter of opinion. Also lacking in discussions among those of us who are English teachers is an understanding that questions of the purpose and worth of the study of works of literature are not answered merely because English teachers have developed their own answers. Finally, and most sadly for a discipline that prides itself on its humanism, there has usually been missing from discussions of censorship and the schools an awareness that those who would censor are human beings of as much value as any other human beings. Thus to the three dimensions of censorship usually dealt with one must add three others of equal worth but, unfortunately, rarely considered: the historical and social, the educational, and the human.

The Historical and Social Dimension

First, it seems important for educators to realize that schools have traditionally been places where students were, at least officially, protected from many aspects of the world, not exposed to them or prepared for them. Certain clear, generally agreed upon notions about what was right and good and clean and, thus, what was appropriate for children governed the curriculum of American schools for most of their history. Although much has changed in American society and in the make-up of the school since those early days, these general notions about the appropriate have probably changed little, at least among parents. Traditionally, then, moralistic concepts about the suitable have dominated education and still dominate popular thinking about it. It is only in recent years that schools have not been more or less the willing servant of such ideas. At the same time, the historical role of the school has been to uplift and improve. Revisionist historians may argue whether schools did, in fact, ever fulfill that role. Achieved or not, however, that is what generally was seen as the role of the school. What the students read and studied and discussed in school, it was believed, should be better than what they might encounter elsewhere, not a reflection of it, certainly not an examination of the worst life had to offer. School studies should present an idealized view of life, not deal with the less than ideal lives the students lead.

In such an historical context, any material in textbooks which was not idealized, aimed at perfecting, uplifting, and free from the sordid, ugly, or unpleasant aspects of life was obviously poorly chosen. It was, in fact, clearly inconsistent with the historical aims of the school. When citizens of a community march upon the school to demand removal of stories with coarse words, novels that are partly about the sex lives of characters, and poems that show America to be less than perfect, they do so, therefore, in, not against, the historical tradition. Nearly every general curriculum text deals with the relation of society to the school. Saylor and Alexander, for example, have stated in Curriculum Planning for Modern Schools:

> The school is an agency established by a social group to serve a group purpose. The society has certain ends in view for the development of the individual. These ends in view become the basic factor in the determination of the aims of education (p. 84).

Admitting that the school thus owes a duty to society, they point out that “...the fundamental obligation of the school as a social instrumentality is to achieve the goals that the citizens have in mind as they establish and operate the schools” (p. 89).

What then can we make of teachers who act as if such an intimate connection between society and the aims of education does not exist? Seen from one point of view, professional control of the curriculum may obviously be right and proper. Seen from another, however, it is an arrogant seizure by teachers of that instrumentality of society that Saylor and Alexander mention. “We pay for the schools,” citizens say; “we send our children to them. We should be able to say what can and can’t go on there.” Crudely put, perhaps, but such comments say what Saylor and Alexander also have said. In the view of many parents, teachers have come more and more to see the schools as places where their children are not improved, but changed to fit a model the teachers see as better; and more and more that model only partly resembles the parents’ ideal, if at all. At a time when many citizens dislike the changes which they see in the country, when attitudes and behavior which they have always thought were to be condemned are now at least accepted and perhaps praised, such citizens wonder why the schools do not redouble their efforts to counteract such trends. Instead, they detect those same elements present in their own schools, and they rebel.

Inarticulately and, unfortunately, with violence, such citizens are voicing real and profound, but difficult, questions about education that philosophers have struggled with for ages. Unfortunately, they are questions that many of us, concerned with what we will do tomorrow, with the latest curriculum gimmick, with each new, shiny teaching toy, have refused to be bothered with. Try to philosophize about schools and society and the duties of each to the other, try to examine the historical role of the school, and you will be labeled a fuddy-duddy out of touch with the reality of the school and of no practical help—too "theoretical," as the saying goes.

But we must all consider and reconsider these vital questions. How much control should the citizens of a community have over what the schools teach? How much selection should they do? How far from the beliefs of those citizens should the school stray? How much should the school, in fact, conflict with those beliefs? Should teachers see their roles as missionaries bringing the truth (by which is meant their truth) to benighted people? Society sees the schools as preserving and improving on the cultural heritage, inspiring students to success and reasonable virtue. It does not, I think, see the schools as attacking fundamental beliefs, even if those beliefs might, in fact, be seen as prejudices by many professional educators.

The Educational Dimension

"Why study literature in high school?" How that question devils English teachers: enjoyment, insights into self and others, broadening of horizons, etc. Currently, the cultural refinement goals of literature study are not very fashionable among "with it" English educators. Passing on the cultural heritage, exposure to the great creations of the literary art, improving taste, making students into cultured ladies and gentlemen, contact with the great thoughts—theese are rarely spoken of with favor these days when individual response, relevance to life, having a good time, and something to talk about seem to be the reasons given for bringing literary works into the classroom. Yet we should not fool ourselves. There is not general agreement that the purpose of literary study in the schools should be to provoke questioning of values, to cause students to think about their lives, other people, and life in general, and to have students enjoy themselves. Many parents, in fact, may not see any excuse for literature study in school. It is something for them that somehow seems to have to go with those things of practical value such as training in reading well, writing well, and speaking well. Most of those parents who do see a reason for literature study, however, probably to a very large extent see it as making cultured people of their children.

Consequently, when teachers or textbook editors use as their criteria for selection the fact that a particular work provokes a response or stimulates critical thought or is relevant to the students' lives, they really should not be too surprised that this purpose conflicts with the educational purpose believe in by parents. Nor should they be surprised that this conflict in purpose results in a conflict in fact. More than any other single piece of evidence used by critics to condemn certain contemporary literature textbooks has been the comments by the editors that the selections

(a) are not all great works;
(b) do not illustrate a literary tradition;
(c) raise questions but do not necessarily answer them, especially as many questions may not have answers;
(d) challenge accepted notions;
(e) are not all meant to be liked by everyone; and
(f) were chosen because they are about adolescent concerns.

Now you and I might not see any problem with these six standards. But they are exactly the opposite of both the historical and, as far as many citizens are concerned, the current reasons for selecting works of literature for school study. Most parents would feel sure that all the literature used in school should

(a) be great works;
(b) represent the (largely Western) literary tradition;
(c) provide the answers to human questions found by the great minds;
(d) support accepted American social, cultural, and moral values;
(e) result in improved taste, so that students come to like all these great selections; and
(f) be mature thoughts about mature concerns.
What we have here is a clear and probably unresolvable clash of ideas. Sometimes we act as if our opinions about the values of literature study are true and these others false; but we must remember that by rejecting cultural heritage for critical thinking, greatness for relevance, the truth for each reader’s truth, answers for questions, we reject the main reasons why society has put us there to do what we do.

In addition, when censors condemn some literary works as morally corrupting, we often treat those claims with ridicule. No one was ever corrupted by a curse word, we say. Just because that story contains a character’s argument against the existence of God doesn’t mean students will stop believing. A story about sex doesn’t provoke students to sexual activity. Is that right? Can we be the same people who maintain that literature can give readers insights into life? That literature can change people’s lives? That the pen is mightier than the sword? We have been caught in our own inconsistencies and should admit it. It makes no sense to believe that literature can make people better but that it cannot make them worse. Either it has power, or it does not. And if it does have power, it must be feared as well as admired.

We have had to admit that our former students were all to believe that great works contain great truths and that masterpieces are such because of their power to influence. Why should it now be so surprising that parents, discovering curse words, scenes of sexual relations, arguments against the current American social order, questions about the existence of God, believe that we are now pushing those ideas as we formerly pushed the ideas in Silas Marner and Julius Caesar?

The Human Dimension

We have usually tended to react to censorship efforts by treating the people involved as if they were either foolish or evil or both. That is, to misunderstand the human dimension. It is all too easy to dismiss the censors as strange and isolated “kooks” causing trouble way out of proportion to their numbers. Such a situation is certainly not true in my part of the country. Indeed, wherever I go I meet people—police, reasonable people—who, finding that I have tried on several occasions to defend literature books which are under attack, reveal themselves to be disturbed by material which they have discovered to be in those texts. Such people speak from a genuine concern for their children, but they also speak from a deep frustration. And we must respect their frustration as we do that of blacks or native Americans hostile to what America has done to them.

In his book, Future Shock, Alvin Toffler pictures the depression and frustration that result from a society which is changing more rapidly than many of its people can adjust to. Where wholesome integration of the schools has taken place against the wishes of many parents, for example, racial hostilities and a sense of powerlessness in the face of governmental force do produce frustration. When the textbooks used in English classes contain works written by minority authors and in a form of English containing, as a casual part of the dialect, words and expressions considered blasphemous or obscene by many parents, a target is produced for those parents' frustrations.

Other conditions also produce frustration, of course, and thus a climate for censorship of school texts. Peaceful, rural areas have turned into suburban and urban areas in recent times, and with this change has come a rapid creation of new social and environmental problems. For people thus caught in a trap between life the way they want it, to stay, and a rapidly developing situation radically different from their wishes, the intrusion by the real world into the schools, particularly in the concrete form of materials in a textbook, can become a target which is both clear and unambiguous.

Then, too, many people look around America and see and read reports of people earning large incomes, leading exciting lives, and possessing power, fame, and prestige. Their own lives they see as much less, and much less than they may have hoped for when younger. Bored with the dullness of a repetitious job and a limited style of life, such people may turn to an attack on textbooks as a way of attacking those who write and publish such texts—those who are seen as representing a sort of social and economic elite of the successful. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal sympathetically analyzed this point of view:

> The deeper motive of the protest seems to be resentment against the schools, the bureaucrats, the upper classes in general. Even millionaires have civil rights, and one sign the immediate protest was aroused by what appeared to them as an especially condescending attempt to raise their cultural outlook by what was in fact an insidious means and thus all the more condescending attempt to raise their cultural outlook (7 October 1974, p. 20).
Most important, that sign, "Even hillbillies have civil rights," should shake us out of our narrow view of the people whose protests have caused current censorship crises. As I have written elsewhere,

The dissatisfaction of the Appalachian protestor is no less than the dissatisfaction of the civil rights militant. The Appalachian protestor is no less proud and protective of his culture and way of life than are members of ethnic minorities. The Appalachian protestor may at times give way to extreme statements and violent actions, as have members of other groups asserting their rights. While condemning the violence, the bigotry, and the foolish remarks, we must give the Appalachian protestor's basic beliefs and feelings the same respect we now seem willing to give those of other protest groups. Modern experience makes clear that, if we do not, there will be more Kanawha Counties. Worse, it is easy to predict that, in the end, the schools will suffer the most (English Journal 65 [March 1976]: 19).

When Charles Silberman blamed the flaws of American education on "mindlessness," he meant many things; but it is clear that our approach to textbook censorship efforts contains an element of the mindless. We have generally failed to try to understand it in its more complex, abstract, and philosophical dimensions and have concentrated instead on the immediate (the specific dimension), the practical (the freedom dimension), and the self-respecting (the professional dimension). Thus it is that resolutions are made and passed condemning censorship with almost no understanding that protesting citizens are to a very considerable extent fulfilling the role assigned to them by the historical development of the American school. Thus it is that English teachers argue for the free selection of literature for reading and study in school without knowing why or examining the assumptions implicit in the reasons they may give. Finally, teachers who regularly maintain that books can change lives reverse themselves seemingly without realizing that no one was ever corrupted by a word or a scene in a book.

What happens, it seems to me, when we emphasize the specific, the freedom, and the professional aspects of censorship is that we concentrate not merely on parts of the problem, but on parts that give a false appearance to that problem. By examining the silly actions of censors, their foolish charges, their misunderstandings, their violence, we are led to conclude that there is nothing of substance in what they say. We decide that they are merely stupid or self-serving. By concentrating on the issue of freedom, we envelop ourselves in self-righteousness while twisting the protective attitude of parents into Hitlerite book burning. Finally, by looking exclusively at our professional rights, we lose track of who we are and what we are for. These three dimensions have in common the fact that they do not include the world beyond the school and the duty of the school to that world. Without the historical and social, the educational, and the human dimensions, censorship efforts aimed at the school appear to result from the folly and evil of the human race; with these other dimensions added, they become something else entirely, they become a part of the great philosophical debate about the purpose of education, which began before today's crisis and will go on long after it is forgotten.

Legal Decisions and Censorship: A Game of Chance

Robert T. Rhode
Indiana University

Today, America may be experiencing one of the worst waves of censorship this country has known. Well-meaning parents often are disturbed by textbooks or by teaching methods that they feel are anti-American or anti-Christian. They ask that objectionable texts be removed from schools, that controversial teaching methods be discontinued, and that offensive books be removed from school library shelves. The courts have generated a confusing record of decisions regarding parental intervention in the operation of the schools. A review of these decisions indicates that a few courts have upheld parental rights to intercede for their children while other courts have supported teachers' claims to have academic freedom—to teach what they decided to teach.

A look at previous court cases, combined with speculation about future court cases, can resemble a game of chance in which a teacher may or may not win. Let us take a few moments to play this risky game.

Round One

Situation. You are a teacher in a junior or senior high school. One day a parent group complains that the textbook you are using is obscene and does not uphold the virtues of America. What can you do? Choose Card A, Card B, or Card C.

Card A You tell the parent group that, according to existing law, "Whatever the agency which is given authority in a particular jurisdiction to select textbooks, the action of the agency designated is conclusive, so that the pupil and his parent or guardian have no voice in the matter." ("Schools," American Jurisprudence 2d 68 [1973] 607). You refer them to the 1877 case In re Exercice of Minority in People v. Illinois 1877 9 Ill. 303 which sets that precedent. Then you...
argue that the textbook you are using was selected according to the approved method for your state; therefore, the parent group has no legal right to complain.

Card B. You argue that the U.S. Supreme Court has upheld a First and Fourteenth Amendment guarantee for an American's right to know. You explain to the parent group that the students in the school have a constitutional right to hear views to which their parents may be opposed. You cite the U.S. Supreme Court case, Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408 U.S. 753 (1972), to back up your point. (In that case, the U.S. Supreme Court said that an alien without a visa had to be allowed into the country because citizens had a right to hear him.) You conclude that the textbooks cannot be removed because students would be denied their constitutional right to know.

Card C. You contend that you, as the teacher, have academic freedom to decide what you will teach and how you will teach it. You cite two recent federal decisions which have upheld academic freedom. The first case, Keefe v. Geanakos, 418 F. 2d 359 (1969), held that "The Young and the Old," an article in Atlantic Monthly, was not obscene and that the teacher who had used the article in class did so for educational reasons that could be demonstrated. The second case, Parrucci v. Rutland, 316 F. Supp. 352 (1970), held that "Welcome to the Monkey House," a short story by Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., was not obscene. The court applied the test formulated in the case, Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, 393 U.S. 503 (1969), that, when no disturbance is caused, teachers and students have First Amendment rights to freedom of speech. Applying the Tinker test, the court in Parrucci decided that, in the absence of a disturbance, the teacher had academic freedom to teach whatever she decided to teach. You conclude that the textbook has not caused any substantial disruption to the normal operation of your school; you explain to the parent group that you have, therefore, an academic right to be free to teach from the textbook.

Results. If you chose Card A, you may have chosen a weak argument. Parents have a legally recognized political right to interfere after textbooks have been duly adopted. Parents have the right to bring pressure to bear against curricula, teaching methodology, and other educational systems or policies. Stephen R. Goldstein, in "The Asserted Constitutional Right of Public School Teachers to Determine What They Teach," University of Pennsylvania Law Review 124 (June 1976):1293 357, has said, "Moreover, in a democratic society it would seem desirable that politically responsive groups have the power to effect the public will concerning the structure and content of public education" (p. 1356). There are a number of court decisions (cited in footnote 94 in the Goldstein article) to back up this parental political right to complain. Furthermore, in the case, President's Council, District 25 v. Community School Bd., No. 25, 457 F. 2d 289 (1972), the U.S. Supreme Court, in denying certiorari in November 1972, held that there was no obvious court precedent for refusing, on constitutional ground, to remove books from a library. In other words, any parental group complaining of library books could have them removed by school authorities (thus exercising their political right to pressure school authorities). Translating that into the classroom, your textbook can be removed by school authorities reacting to parental pressure. Legislatures in some states have recognized a parental right to affect school policy decisions. These states have statutes permitting parents to serve on local textbook adoption committees. The 1877 Illinois case that you cited, while still on the books, is not a vital precedent anymore; it is being ignored by present-day courts.

If you chose Card B, again you may have chosen a weak argument, although no specific court cases have outlined beyond the shadow of a doubt whether or not teachers have a constitutional right to academic freedom. You may have that freedom. However, Goldstein (above) has said:

> the freedom of expression justifying for teacher control is premised on an analytical model of education which views school as a marketplace of ideas. There is no historical or precedential basis, however, for concluding that the marketplace of ideas model is constitutionally compelled over the traditional value imputation model. Thus, in the final analysis, teachers' constitutional rights, in and out of the classroom, do not extend beyond the first amendment rights of all citizens (p. 1356).

Case law backs up Goldstein's point. A student's presumed right to know is built up in freedom of speech doctrine. If the teacher is perceived as teaching values which are objectionable to students or to parents, then that teacher may have no constitutional protection for what he or she is teaching. On the other hand, applying the Tinker test (above), the teacher may be within his or her rights so long as no disturbance results. The area of law surrounding academic freedom is so inchoate that it would be difficult to decide whether you have a viable argument once you claim a constitutional right to academic freedom.
If you chose Card C, you may have a viable argument for the same reason as in Card B—no court has said you do not have academic freedom. However, your argument may be weakened by the decisions you cite. In the Keefe case, the court never explained the “grounds on which a teacher’s curricular decisions take precedence over those of the school board or other school authorities superior to the teacher under state law” (Goldstein, p. 321). If the parent group in your situation would enjoin the school board from putting into effect any offensive-policy decision, then the Keefe decision would no longer hold precedent. The Keefe decision did not look at the chain of command from school board to teacher, with the teacher at the bottom. You might be in danger of being fired, if your school board were not solidly supportive of its teachers and if enough pressure (such as “enjoining”) were brought upon the school board by the parent group. Goldstein points out many flaws of reasoning in your other case—Parducci. With the flaws that Goldstein indicates, a court today might not consider the Parducci case to be a firm precedent. Another case may be more to the point, Mailoux v. Kiley, 436 F. 2d 565 (1st Cir.), after dismissal, 323 F. Supp. 1387 (D. Mass.), aff’d, 448 F. 2d 1242 (1st Cir. 1971). Limited academic freedom by the “tests” already set forth in Keefe and Parducci. In other words, the Mailoux case would not go beyond Keefe and Parducci to state an undeniable constitutional guarantee of academic freedom. Rather, the court concluded that academic freedom is more an “interest” than it is a “right,” as Goldstein points out.

Some of your arguments in Round One might hold up in a court proceeding, however, these are mildly areas of law, and you might get stuck.

Round Two

Situation: The parent group in your school district has asked the school board to remove from the library the textbook objected to in Round One. The school board agrees to remove the offensive textbook as well as two or three other books that the parent group also has found to be objectionable. The school board has ordered you to stop using the textbook in your classes. You want to preserve your right to teach what you want to teach. What can you do? Choose Card D or Card E.

Card D: You decide to use the school’s old and worn-out textbooks in your classes. Card E:
argument is that you have the academic freedom to use the duly adopted textbook which has been found objectionable by parents who are not professional educators. Also, you urge the librarian to keep the textbook shelved in the school library, along with the other "offensive" books. You instruct the librarian to respond to parental attacks by citing the recent Ohio case, Minarcini v. Strongsville City School District, 541 F. 2d 577 (6th Cir. 1976). In that case, the court decided that books could not be removed from the library simply because someone found the books to be offensive. The court reaffirmed U.S. Supreme Court opinions which held that students have a constitutional right to know and to hear opposing points of view. This right to know would be denied by removal of books from a library.

Card C. You argue that the textbook is not obscene and does not conflict with the Judaeo-Christian morals and values of the community. You go against the school board order and continue to teach from the disputed textbook. You also talk the librarian into keeping the textbook shelved in the school library, along with the other objectionable books. You and the librarian decide to use as your argument "academic freedom."

Results: If you chose Card D, you may have chosen an unwise course of action, although your argument involving the Minarcini case may be one of the best arguments available to teachers today. The school board is enjoined by the parent group to back up its order to remove the book from the curriculum and from the library (as well as the other "offensive" books). Despite your references to legal precedents that have stated that textbooks after being duly adopted must be used and cannot be discontinued ("Schools and School Districts," Corpus juris Secundum, 79 [1932]:414; and "Schools," American jurisprudence 2d. 68 [1973]:407), the court decides that old laws are not precedential in this case, and it gives the decision to the parent group. The school board has the right to remove objectionable textbooks, according to the court. The court follows the thinking of Goldstein; that is, academic freedom is a constitutional interest but not a guaranty of right, particularly in cases where a teacher can teach objectionable material to impressionable young minds, thus infringing the students' rights. Furthermore, the court holds that the books should be removed from the library. The court refers to the decision in Prune Alley, 105 U.S. 758 (1887), which held that books could not be at "the heart of the library," that is, at "the point of intellectual exchange."
Legal Decisions and Censorship

On the other hand, the court might accept the Minarcini argument and award you the decision. The court in the Minarcini case upheld the students' right to know. The court said, "Here, the court is concerned with the right of students to receive information that they and their teachers desire them to have. Recent Supreme Court opinions firmly establish both the First Amendment right to know involved in this case and the standing of the students to raise the issue." The Minarcini case may be one of your strongest cards.

The court might take yet another path in this situation. First, you might be in danger of being fired, particularly if your school board is not solidly behind its teachers. Your refusal to acknowledge the school board's order to stop using the disputed textbook could be read as insubordination. Secondly, if you signed a group contract when you began to teach at your school, then you may have signed away your rights to academic freedom. Many group contracts have clauses that sign away a teacher's right to academic freedom. In the case, Bob's Gary, David Nyerek, Glenn Reed, Laurel Stoneaker and Lee Bridgemian v. Board of Education of the Adams Agaphe School District 28-J, Aurora, Colorado, discussed in an article by Claire Cooper in the March 5, 1977, edition of The Rocky Mountain News, a district court judge said that teachers could surrender their academic freedom through group contracts.

Also, in another situation, the board might decide to fire the librarian. Robert M. O'Neill has pointed out in Human Rights, Spring 1975, 295-312 and in University of Cincinnati Law Review, 12, (1973), 209-52 the librarian is caught between several legal constraints. Had the librarian removed the book (as the school board ordered), other parents in the community might have complained. A librarian's rights have not been clearly spelled out, and it is difficult to predict the consequences of a librarian's actions.

If you choose Card E, you may have arrived at a sound argument. The parent group may have received advice from Educational Research Analysts, the complaint public foundation of Mel and Sheen Galbraith of Houston, Texas. You may have glanced through a book about the Galbraith called Textbooks on Trial, by James C. Holley (What's in the Book, Victor Books, 1976). You may have realized that the Galbraiths have long contended that America was founded on certain principles which your textbook allegedly rejects. You may have noted a look into the 1990s, as referred to in Appendix B, p. 209, in the Back of the Galbraiths' text.
the Gablers refer to may be Holy Trinity Church v. United States, 143 U.S. 457 (1891); the Gablers contend that this 1890s case stated that America was founded on Christian principles. You may have noticed that this case states that America is a “religious” country, not necessarily a fundamentalist Christian country. You explain this to the parent group, and they have no argument. You may also have a right to academic freedom (as discussed in the Results to Round One).

In Round Two you have fared somewhat better. You have developed a strong argument against removal of library books, based on the Minarcini case. You have also made a plea for academic freedom, which may be a constitutional right (as long as you have not signed a group contract waiving that right). Also, you may have been able to argue rationally with the parent group by contradicting statements in Textbooks on Trial.

Round Three

Situation. The parent group gets a great deal of newspaper space to attack textbooks, library books, and teaching methods in your school. The parents also secure radio air time and television commercials to the purpose of attacking offensive books and methods. The attacks are filled with references to “secular humanism,” a religion being taught by the teachers in the school, a religion contradicting the Christian principles on which this country is based. The ads and commercials point to two U.S. Supreme Court decisions which held that secular humanism is a religion. Therefore, with separation of Church and State in this country, secular humanism cannot be taught. What can you do? Choose Card F, Card G, or Card H.

Card F. You decide to research the U.S. Supreme Court decisions making secular humanism a religion. You discover that the Court, in Loreano v. Watkins, Clerk, 367 U.S. 488 (1961), referred to the religion of secular humanism in a footnote to that decision. In addition, you find that the case, United States v. Segreg, 380 U.S. 163 (1965), never mentioned the term “secular humanism”; rather, the case footnoted the Loreano decision. The research you are doing leads you to the case, Fellowship of Humanity v. County of Humboldt, 153 Cal. App. 2d 673 (1957). In that California Appeals Court case, the court discussed secular humanism—a religion that “not at regular intervals, much like other denominations. After all, in the New Catholic Encyclopedia and other books on...
American religions. You discover that a religion of secular humanism does exist; but you are far from being a member of that religion. You do have a belief in a Supreme Deity (secular humanists do not, ordinarily), and you are not on the membership roster of any church of "humanity." Suddenly you realize what is happening; the parent group is confusing the religion of secular humanism (which cannot be taught in the schools, due to separation of Church and State) with "humanism"—a philosophy of teaching or with humanities programs. You decide to counter the parent group arguments with an explanation of what constitutes secular humanism, followed by a denial that you are a member of a secular humanist church.

Card G. You go to your department head and ask that a philosophy of what you are teaching be prepared at once and put into writing. You speak to your school administrators to see whether they will back you up. Then you organize a group of parents and teachers (parents not in alliance with the complaining parent group) to hold regular meetings and to publish reports in local papers, thus airing your side of the argument.

Card H. You do nothing and wait for the storm to blow over.

Results. By your clear demonstration that humanism, the educational philosophy detailed by such writers as Carl R. Rogers and Carl Wernberg, and secular humanism, the religion or movement allegedly begun by Dr. John H. Dietrich, Unitarian pastor (Charles Samuel Braden Tho. Also Believe [New York: Macmillan Company, 1963], p. 168) are two different philosophies, you have taken the main thrust out of the parent group's argument. In this situation, one of your best defenses may be to define accurately the differences between secular humanism and the words that sound like that/humanism or humanities program, for example. Card H is a good choice of cards.

If you chose Card G, you may have made a wise move—but you are a little late. Before a controversy ever arises in your community, you must have a written philosophy for what you are teaching. And you should know in advance of any disturbance whether or not your administrators will back you up. The idea to use the tactics of the parent group—getting newspaper space, and so on—is a sound idea. Fight the fire with logical argument and try to get equal coverage.

If you chose Card H, you chose a poor card. You should not think that the storm will blow over in times of national distress such as the Watergate. Millions of millions of people become frustrated. They would not want another Watergate.
that place seems far away and unreachable. The schools often become the target for criticism. It is true that the pendulum may swing back; parents may gradually cease to object to textbooks and to teaching methods as the national sociopolitical climate changes. But keeping an alert mind is to be preferred over waiting for things to change. Be prepared to act. Know your cards and how to play them.

There is hope for teachers, but there are dangerous pitfalls as well. One such pitfall would be to assume your opposition is uneducated or kooky. As you can see from this game of chance, the parent group depicted here is well-organized and willing to work hard for its goals. To dismiss complaining parents as kooks is to lose the game. The game is risky, but it can be won.
II Issues and Pressures

In many ways the second section is an extension of the first, but with a more specific focus on issues and pressures that are influencing teaching generally and especially influencing the teaching of English language arts. Hogart uses the inflated rhetoric with which censorship battles are currently being fought and proceeds to paint an emphatic picture of the censor. He shows that in many of our anti-censorship activities we simply further alienate the already alienated. He considers ways in which we are all censors and ends by suggesting that English teachers become more involved in the community, including the media of the community. Park's article focuses on right-wing groups and concludes that a new right-wing coalition is emerging which may be politically very influential. Jenkinson's article concerns what some view as the ultimate in pro-censorship groups—the Gahiers. He shows how organized censors combat textbooks they deem objectionable all over the country. He also delineates what they object to. Rhode attempts to explain secular humanism, as it is defined by certain groups and individuals who oppose it. Even though these groups have confused humanism with secular humanism, they are causing problems for teachers who espouse humanistic approaches. He encourages teachers to write rationales for everything they teach and to improve their communication with local communities. Berger's essay explores further the problem of defining obscenity, especially of applying community standards. She summarizes landmark legal decisions and the difficulties many of them have caused. Beach's article on research into the effects of and response to reading points out that at the heart of most censorship is the assumption that reading certain works has a negative influence on the reader. As might be expected, the research Beach surveys does not give definitive answers, but it does provide counter-evidence against claims about reading experiences that appear to justify censorship.
Some Thoughts on Censorship in the Schools

Robert F. Hogan
National Council of Teachers of English

In these tense times we often fight our battles with rhetoric. Whichever side calls the other the strongest name and invokes the highest principles in defense of its position lives with the illusion that it is winning the battle. Consider the rhetoric of the book opponents in recent times: they are fighting against atheism, godless communism, filth, corruption, and social and familial disintegration. And they are motivated by their commitment to a belief in God, democracy, the family, law and order, fundamental Christian values, private as well as public decency and purity, and clean language.

We teachers are in no place to throw stones. If our houses aren't made chiefly of glass, most of the newer school buildings seem to be. We invoke the First Amendment often without having read the text of it; we shrill about academic freedom in a case in which a teacher seems to have exercised academic license. We strain to make a parallel between book burnings in Nazi Germany and the effort of parents to remove a book they regard as distasteful, subversion if not violation of one or more of the Ten Commandments. A not uncommon question among educators these days is “Censorship: What is the nature of the Beast we are facing?” Beast—now that’s a strong word. It ought to be worth at least six points in the contest. But let’s consider one emanation of this Beast.

He’s a blue-collar father and if he graduated from high school, it was a small one that wasn’t very good academically and has since been consolidated with others to make a large high school, probably integrated culturally and racially. His children are or soon will be in that high school. He claims fundamentalist reliigion and conservative morality in an increasingly pluralistic and secular world.

He knows (or believes, and that's about the same thing operationally) from what he hears in church and reads or views in the media that juvenile crime is up; that, except among girls who are on the pill, teenage pregnancy is up; that among all adolescents, venereal disease is approaching epidemic proportions and society's response to that is the condom; that use of marijuana and alcohol by adolescents is up; that opportunities to go wrong are up. He also knows that the Supreme Court has banned from the public schools those religious or other devotional exercises that might reinforce what he tries to teach at home.

Now he's told by someone he respects, either by his minister, or by someone his minister vouches for, or by a public official he has voted for, that there is a movement afoot in the schools called "secular humanism" or "scientific humanism" which is designed to (1) destroy any belief in the God he believes in; (2) undermine parental authority; and (3) call to question and thus erode those moral and ethical values he has been hoping to inculcate in his children.

Is it any wonder he panics? His panic troubles us, but would we be reasonable to expect any other response? Wouldn't it actually surprise us if he shrugged all this off, saying, "Well, the hell, times are changing; I guess"?

If he or any of his friends gets in touch with the school to complain about what's happening, they learn there's a complaint form they have to fill out in order to have their complaint acknowledged and acted upon. Then he learns that in order to fill out the form, he has to read all the books that trouble him. The problem is not only that he has to read books he is already convinced are harmful, but he knows he doesn't read easily or well. It's not that he doesn't value some kinds of reading; he reads maps, blueprints, instructions, headlines. But he reads mostly to "read out"; he doesn't read to "read." Maybe he simply doesn't understand, he mistrusts those who do, he feels threatened by those who do, by those who read to "read." Besides, if his children sit around reading to "read," when will they get their chores done? Before we make a middle-class judgment about that concern over chores, let's remind ourselves that in many marginal-income, blue-collar families, chores do not signify what they do in our homes: In his home, chores are not a set of tasks to make the child learn "industry" and "responsibility." They are a set of tasks which, only if they are performed, will keep the family from tripping over the poverty line.

But that's not the end of it. When he has read all the books and filled out all the forms, the next step is the confrontation. It's the hearing with a group of college-graduated, verbal educators who seem always to pepper their talk with phrases like "anticipatory socialization." Yes, after the reading and the writing, there is the talking. And that doesn't come easy either, not with us as antagonists. Is it any wonder he seeks some other channel through which to express his concern? Are there some new ways for relating to this parent? Can we find any human relationship other than intimidation for dealing with this honest, confused, scared, caring father?

Behold the beast!

The uncomfortable truth is that we are all censors. The difference is that when English teachers practice censorship, we call it "book selection." We are protected by skimpy budgets from directly confronting that uncomfortable fact. When we make selections for classroom use or recommendations for library acquisitions, we take several variables into account. We think about: (1) the budget, the available funds; (2) the level of difficulty and/or sophistication of the materials; (3) the accuracy, the scholarly and professional respectability of the materials; (4) the narrowness of focus vs. the breadth of appeal; (5) the transactional relationship that obtains between our schools and the communities that support the schools.

Let's try some of these considerations on for size. Budget: As intrigued as I am by the Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary, in a tight year I couldn't recommend its purchase by the department or library. There are too many other ways of distributing $90. Level: Even though some teachers of English and language arts are worried about what they regard as the deterioration of the language, it would be impossible to justify the purchase of an expensive, hard-to-find, durable copy of Webster's Second International Dictionary (as an antidote to the earlier third edition) for the library in an elementary school. Focus: If I were recommending some special-interest, supplementary periodicals for school libraries in southeastern Ohio, I would be hard pressed...
Censorship in the Schools to justify a subscription to a periodical concerned with surfing or skin diving. And so it goes. But we escape any, or much, sense of the other considerations because, by the time we get to them, we are usually out of money.

But let me bare my soul. If someone gave me $1,000,000 to be spent entirely in getting books to supplement the school library and my classroom library, I'd have to confront my censorious self. Even if money were no object, I still would not purchase the complete works of the Marquis de Sade, nor the Kama Sutra, nor the American update of that second title—the Joy of Sex. Nor would I subscribe to Penthouse or other magazines like it. It would not be just because I was confident the community might rise up in storm, although it probably would. I would avoid those publications because I think they're inappropriate for a public school library. What else is there to say: I am a censor.

If someone willed his or her entire library to me for inclusion in the school library or, as a classroom library and accompanied that gift with funds sufficient to catalogue and shelve the books, I would still go through the collection title by title, volume by volume, sorting, selecting, and yes—censoring. If I really believed in the universal application of the First Amendment, I'd put the entire collection on the shelves without checking any of the titles.

But I can conclude only that I believe in censorship and the only difference between my and the censor's the one I'd brand as "censorship" is that his or her stack of rejections would be higher than mine. When I look at my choices, I concentrate on the ones I mean to include in the library; when I look at the other person's stack, I focus on the books he or she wants to keep out of the library I select; they censor. Our criteria blend: the books I reject are ones I don't think the children are ready for; the ones they censor are books they don't think their children are ready for.

III

With respect to the frequency and intensity of censorship, my profession asks: "Why is this happening to us? What have we done to deserve this?" To be sure, external forces beyond our control, and influence have helped create the situation. But we have helped, too, and in a variety of ways.

First, we have unionized, collectivized, and insisted on binding arbitration in disputes over salary increases, reduced class loads, and better working conditions. We had depended for so long on our own individual authority, on what only we knew with confidence, real or pretended: the six acceptable ways of spelling "parakeet," the correct form of "whoever" and "whomever," the distinction between trash and literature; how Moby Dick finally turned out (hardly anyone else ever finished it). When we found ourselves at the limits of our authority and still underpaid, we set aside our particular authority and banded together with other teachers also willing to set aside their particular authority—the table of elements, the distinction between rocket propulsion and jet propulsion, the formula for solving quadratic equations, etc. We all banded together and set out to exert power that would force where authority could no longer persuade.

Don't misunderstand: I know what salaries are like in places where teachers still choose to or have to depend on their scholastic authority. But what some of us didn't foresee clearly was the consequence of that shift. Authority depends on—and when it's well applied, it evokes—respect. Exerting power elicits antagonism. It assumes or creates an adversary relationship. To be sure, the successful exertion of power elicits a kind of respect (Nobody messes around with or otherwise takes lightly Albert Shanker), but it's a different kind of respect.

What I, at least, failed to foresee was the inevitable consequence of teachers' collectivizing. It's happened: parents have collectivized. They've gone national, too. The frameworks were there already: fundamentalist churches, ethnic special-interest organizations, political special-interest groups. All that remained lay people had to do was take advantage of the channels that had already been dug and levied. This stunning truth came home to me when the National Council of Teachers of English met in New Orleans in 1974; teachers I'd worked with in a workshop at the University of Alaska in 1973 told me that parents in Kanawha County, West Virginia, were in regular phone contact and correspondence with parents in Anchorage, Alaska.

One of Woody Allen's zaniest lines is that "Albert Shanker has the bomb." Like it or not, we have to accept the fact that the parents now have it, too.

Second, we English teachers have asserted our proper facts and further than we have prepared the rest of the community to accept. Again, this has been an exercise of power. Our position—in fact, NCTE's official policy—is that English teachers are the experts. We know children and how they develop, we know literature and the choices available; we know what it is that children need to know. Therefore, we are in the best position to choose the books. That's our right. When we moved from "The Lady of the Lake" to Slaughterhouse-Five, we didn't lay any groundwork in the community. After all, it was within our rights to do that. We were the experts. We found ourselves out on a limb and our first line of defense was our "authority." We forgot that we had yielded our authority and found ourselves caught in a power struggle. When our authority failed and our power proved insufficient, we retreated to our possessive pronouns—this is my subject, these are our classrooms, these are our students. The trouble is, our students are their children.

According to Hugh Prather, I think (but it could have been someone else), there is an oriental language which doesn't accept the construction "my children" or "my dog." That kind of degree of possessiveness doesn't "compute" in the language. One has to say something like "the children who live with me" or "the dog who stays at the house I live in." The more tightly the myness is affirmed, the more control the affirmer claims; the less circumscribed is his or her authority. The thing is: if I say "English is my subject" and "these children are my students" and "this is my classroom," and if the parents say, "yes, but these children are my children," we've retreated to the American West and to disputes over mine claims. The heavy question is this: Which ones, the parents or the teachers, are claim jumping?

They're both claim jumping. Neither side "owns" the children. But the parents think they do and the teachers often assume they do. Our problem is to work out a strategy that genuinely persuades parents that while we are teaching the children that live in these houses, we are not jumping their claim, a strategy that might even so gently lead them to wonder if they have a claim, either, or make them less likely to assert that claim if they think they have one.

Third, we have failed to take into responsible account the rest of the media. As a profession we have consistently, if not unanimously, supported the more generous interpretations of the perimeters of the First Amendment. We have not with equal responsibility supported the constraints which properly ought to accompany increased liberalization. The more we advocate freedom of access, the more we should advocate protection from affront. We have argued that consenting adults should be free to read or view anything they want to read or view. By the covers and contents of recent periodicals and motion pictures, we might assume that we—and others whom we have joined in supporting this position—have been more or less successful, but more rather than less. Movies and the magazines are "dirtier" than they used to be. But we haven't taken, so far as I know, a single stand with respect to the blatant advertising and display of those products which invade the attention of nonconsenting adults. Even though some of us are nonconsenting adults, we've taken no professional stance. Consequently, by default we have aligned ourselves with the libertarians.

Frightened parents don't see subtle distinctions we see. The language of The Catcher in the Rye, the visual content of Deep Throat, and the window displays of the typical "adult" bookstore seem, to frightened parents, all of a single piece. To them, these are simply different fragments of the same mosaic. We haven't done enough collectively, except defensively, to clearly distinguish between the first, second, and third. The Catcher in the Rye is defendable not despite its language, but because of its language. The "dirty" bookstore is defendable not because of its window display, but in spite of it.

Since we have committed ourselves to a power struggle and since the "other side" has also seized power, it's too late to abandon that state of affairs. In matters of salary and working conditions, we probably have no choice but to stay committed to or become committed to national and local unions (the American Federation of Teachers or the National Education Association). In matters peculiarly related to English, we have no choice but to stay committed to or become committed to NCTE and its affiliates.

A healthy NCTE means continued publication of annotated book lists, so that an individual teacher or librarian, questioned about the recommendation of a particular book, can argue and document that the choice was not just an individual one, that the book has been recommended and endorsed by a committee of professionals from across the country. NCTE can continue to provide, as it has provided, tailored letters in moral and professional support of teachers caught up in individual situations. NCTE can continue to cooperate with such groups as the Office for Intellectual Freedom of the American Library Association, the National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship, and the Freedom to Read Committee of the Association of American Publishers, etc., in coordinated national efforts to counter censorship. NCTE can continue to recommend professionally professional procedures for book selection. NCTE can continue, through official resolutions and individual publications, to illuminate the problem and call for help from other segments of communities who oppose censorship. But none of this by itself is sufficient.

So far I have been dealing in the past and the present, in case history and diagnosis. That's useful and necessary, but not by itself ultimately productive. As we deal with our troubles and our agonies and their roots, we are tempted to wish things had been different before and were different now. That's thinking in the subjunctive mode. The lesson of the moment is that the subjunctive has no future, either grammatically or operationally.

Our resolutions and solutions must be positioned in the future, in our responses to three questions: (1) What do we want to happen? (2) What will it take to make that happen? (3) What and/or how much are we prepared to pay to make that happen—to pay in money, time and effort, and sharing of sovereignty? If our answer to the third question is "not very much," we might as well stop fussing and accept the present dreary state of affairs. If we concentrate on how we wish things were, instead of how we want them to be different, and what we are willing to do to make them different, we are mired in the subjunctive. We're stuck in a mode that keeps us from dealing in any responsible way with the future.

Obviously, what we want to happen is that the community will accept our selections of books and nonprint works for basic texts, supplementary texts, library acquisitions, and supplementary reading and viewing lists. What will that require? Heightened credibility and confidence in us and, therefore, in the choices we make. As I noted above, we have however unthinkingly yielded our authority. Maybe we didn't mean to, but we did. It's too late to say, "Oh, but we didn't mean that..." We did it, and probably for understandable if not always conscious reasons. Moreover, in the present climate, the exercise of power won't work. "They" have it, too. We are at a standoff, what's left as a means for gaining heightened credibility and confidence? And are we willing to pay for them?

It may seem, at first glance, ridiculous to suggest that English teachers are members of the privileged class. But we share at least one advantage with the privileged members of this society. We have moved into social and intellectual ghettos of our own making. These ghettos are not like those of Spanish Harlem, Black Harlem, or the barrios of Los Angeles and the Southwest. Our ghettos are not places where society has consigned us to live. They are more like medieval walled cities, meant not to keep people in, but to keep "the others" out. We live less and less under the scrutiny of the community. We have moved farther and farther from living under the constraints that surrounded Caesar's wife. We may not enjoy Caesar's status yet, but at least we don't have to be above all suspicion. Well, maybe that's not quite right; but at least we are no longer under a limelight. If what we do is suspicious, fewer people see it and suspect.

What we must do now is come out of our closets, to come out from hiding, to renegotiate our social contract with the community. Our heightened credibility lies in personal diplomacy. In rapidly increasing numbers we must join and take an active part in community groups; invite parents to sit in on book selection committees; organize speaker bureaus for community and civic groups; and not just on censorship (and if we're short of good speakers, let's first agonize over and then do something about our poverty); establish stronger links with public librarians; meet the press (like coming up with one extra brown bag lunch for a local editor to join the English department for lunch); go to church (unless that would be hypocritical, in which case for God's true sake stay home); write a short, clear letter to an editor. It's shuttle diplomacy, to be sure, and we're all on the bus. Let's just sort out the best stop for each of us.

I know, it takes time and we don't have extra time. But what will it profit English teachers if they get all the papers marked, but lose the books? Or worse, their subject.

Part of our plight stems from the fact that in protecting our ghettos, only under pressure do some of us admit our profession. And it comes out in the end as a confession. Let's resolve never again to confess our profession. Rather, let's proclaim it from the outset. If people ask us, "What do you do?" let's say it right out: "I teach English," or "I'm an English teacher." No cop-outs. Never again, "I'm an educator," or "I'm a high school teacher," or "I'm into education." No, and for one very good reason. The inquisition won't stop there. They'll want to know what we teach. Even if we sidestep and say, "Eighth grade" or "Mostly juniors and seniors," they'll barge in. "But what do you teach?" All that prior evasion drives us inevitably into confessional cowering. However we word it, the message comes out, "Please accept/tolerate/forgive me, for I teach English."

Let's brave it out. At the very beginning, before ever running for cover, let's tell the truth. Then, when we hear the stock response, "Well, I guess I'd better watch my grammar," let's reply in fundamental truth, "Look, if you promise not to watch your grammar, I won't have to watch mine. Why don't we talk, not watch?"

The last line of our defense under present circumstances may become, in time, the first line of our offense. It won't be the First Amendment. It won't be the fortress of a profession. It won't be the wall of a discipline. It won't be the fence around "our" classrooms. It will rest on your credibility and mine. What it will probably be is an open door. Through the door the parent will come and ask, "Why did you let or ask my son or daughter to read this story or poem?" And the one of us who's asked will say, "Do you really wonder why? Then I'm glad you asked. Let me tell you."

If the parent feels free to ask us and not a national wire service, and if we feel confident about the answer, we're all home free. If they won't or we don't, it will come to be Kanawha County on a national scale.
Fed by increased taxes, union militancy, liberals in power, and godlessness in the public schools, a number of ultraconservative, far-right, and fundamentalist groups are showing remarkable success in developing a grassroots political structure designed to restrict social legislation, reduce spending, elect like-minded persons to public office, and turn America back to the basics. During a time of distrust of government, public apathy at the polls, and conflicting results of educational programs, the conditions are ripe for a well-organized group of true believers to exert influence far beyond their numbers.

As of this early 1978 writing, it appears a new right-wing coalition is emerging in American politics: a coalition led by seasoned political ultraconservatives with sufficient funds and grassroots support to influence the 1978 Congressional election. Widespread apathy, on one hand, and deep-seated dissatisfaction with the social advances of American education, on the other, can be expected to move some citizens to support the growing campaign to elect ultraconservatives. Whether we like it or not, American education can never be entirely removed from the political process. Educational support is a function of public opinion, and we are caught in the web of changing, diverse, and conflicting debate about the future.

Ultraconservatives and the New Right

Evidence of the growing organizational support for ultraconservative politics may be found in a recent report from the National Committee for an Effective Congress. It notes that unlike campaigns of the past, the new evil is not a communist conspiracy; the new evil is liberalism. It also calls attention to the ability of The New Right to influence public opinion and sees this as constituting a source of concern for educators and for the future of public schools. A partial list of the more significant New Right organizations includes the following.

The Committee for Survival of a Free Congress (CSFC), established through the money of ultraconservative Joseph Coors, and now headed by Paul Weyrich, past president of the conservative Heritage Foundation. The Committee plans to raise over three million dollars to elect ultraconservatives to Congress in 1978. In 1976 the organization spent over two million dollars to elect ultraconservatives.

The National Conservative Political Action Committee (NCPAC), associated with the growing influence of Richard Viguerie, political fund-raiser and coordinator of the Wallace campaign, hopes to spend over four million dollars for the election in 1978.

The Gun Owners of America, headed by John Birch leader H. H. Richardson, plans to support candidates opposing gun legislation but in practice supports only arch-conservatives.

The Council for National Defense, a new entry from the far right, plans to defeat senators and congressmen who “believe we should take our national defense dollars and spend them on social-welfare programs.”

The Conservative Caucus (TCC), director Howard Phillips claims, is “going after people on the basis of their Hot Buttons.” The hot buttons Phillips describes include, among others, gun control, capital punishment, Panama Canal, ERA, and taxes. TCC is credited with offering assistance to Anita Bryant in helping her campaign go national.

Key figures behind the New Right appear to be Richard Viguerie, Ronald Reagan, Joseph Coors, and Phyllis Schlafly.

Richard Viguerie, a major engineer of the New Right complex and fund raiser for a number of conservative and far-right groups including the Wallace presidential campaign, claims, “There is new strength in the conservative movement, a strength that comes from single issue organizations joining forces with broader conservative groups to defeat legislation. A coalition politics, as practiced by conservatives for the first time in recent memory, is having a profound impact on the Congress, the press and the country.” Viguerie estimates his organization has collected between twenty-five to thirty million dollars to support ultraconservatives through 1977 and predicts his organization will yield over forty million during 1978. Out of distrust of the liberal media, Viguerie has emerged upon a massive direct-mail campaign. Viguerie's headquarters near Falls Church, Virginia, contains 3,100 computerized mailing lists from conservative and right-wing contributors. It is estimated that Viguerie sends an average of five million pieces of mail a month. Terence Smith, in the New York Times, reports that leaders in the New Right regularly meet with Viguerie to coordinate and forge an effective far-right coalition. Unlike campaigns of the past, the New Right is prepared to accept partial victories that the old Right would have rejected. Viguerie's target in 1978 is to replace as many liberals of both parties as possible with leverage conservatives, men who can influence policy and help elect other conservatives.

Ronald Reagan supporters, and ultraconservatives to the right of the traditional Republican party, are pressuring to establish a continuing base for political power. Reagan's Citizens for the Republic continues to provide money to defeat candidates for the House and Senate and to elect those supporting his program of conservatism. Supported by a radio show and newspaper column, the Citizens for the Republic have been receiving funds at the reported rate of $400,000 per month and have access to over one million dollars from the last presidential campaign. During an off-year election when traditional voter turnout has tended to be light, the Republican party is at a forty year low in membership, it would appear we are in the beginning stages of an interesting political development.

At a meeting of moderate Republicans called by Michigan Governor William G. Milliken to discuss fighting the takeover by the New Right, Congressman John B. Anderson, the third ranking leader of the Republicans in the House, charged that "extremist fringe elements who claim membership in our party seek to expel the rest of us from the GOP using their own arbitrary philosophical purgative." Saul Friedman, a writer for the Knight-Kicker papers, has observed "in legislative battles in Congress, in political fund raising, in mobilizing support on controversial issues throughout the country, in winning key off-year elections, and in sheer intellectual energy and talent, the New Right has overwhelmed the traditional Republican establishment."

Underscoring the strength of the New Right is the list of legislative winners in the John Birch Society voting index for this session of Congress. In the House: Steven Symms, George Hansen, James Collins, Robert Stump, Robert Bauman, Eldon Rupple, and Phillip Crane and Larr McDowell, a member of the Birch Council, have scored 100 percent. In the Senate: Orrin Hatch, Paul Laxalt and Jesse Helms along with Carl Curtis and Jake Garn are given high scores of from 100 to 96 percent. Such conservative influence and support of rightist principles would have been undreamed of ten years ago when Birch headlines drew strong opposition from conservatives such as William F. Buckley and Russell Kirk.

Joseph Coors, an ultraconservative multimillionaire, was appointed to the Board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting the day before President Nixon resigned. He was not confirmed, due in part to a conflict of interest resulting from his television News Service, which was reportedly designed to counter the liberal media. Coors is reported to have financed or contributed to a number of conservative and right-wing causes such as the John Birch Society, Americans for Agnew, and the Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress (CSFC). The CSFC was designed to defeat liberal candidates at the national level and the prime mover was Paul A. Weyrich, Coors' man in Washington, aide to Senator Carl Curtis. With the assistance of Richard Vague, a top political organizer for the Wallace campaign, funds were directed to such ultraconservative candidates as C. R. Lewis, a member of the Council of the John Birch Society, who tried unsuccessfully to defeat Alaska's Senator Mike Gravel. Although Coors' TV news has folded, it appears that Coors is experiencing success in a new and potentially significant organization designed to sell ultraconservatism to the American public.

The Heritage Foundation, created and funded by Coors, was formed in 1973 as a tax-exempt Washington-based think tank to support conservative ideology, free enterprise, individual liberty, limited government, and strong national defense. Paul Weyrich, the Foundation's first president, reported initial internal correspondence was loaded and sent to Coors for review. During the last few years, the Heritage Foundation has grown significantly in funding sources and influence, comprising over thirty full-time staff members, ten research assistants, and an annual budget of over one million dollars. Principal activities of the Heritage Foundation include:

- Resource Bank, to assist like-minded groups in developing issues and timing for impact on national legislation;
- Communication Network, a speakers bureau which includes ideology from conservative to far right; Lawrence McDonald, of the Birch Council, and Phyllis Schlafly, have been advertised as speakers;
- Washington Briefing series, designed to inform legislators of key matters before Congress.
Model Citizens Program . . . designed to assist persons in their local community to study their local school board, legislature, etc.

Education Update . . . newsletter to individuals and organizations reporting current issues in education.\(^\text{18}\)

Education Update, edited by Dr. Onalee McGraw, appears designed to establish communication between conservative and fundamentalist private school organizations regarding funding, curriculum content, and educational issues at the state, local, and national levels. McGraw, an active opponent of the Mondale-Braden Child Care Bill and Man. A Course of Study (MACOS),\(^\text{19}\) and an endorser of the Conlan Amendment, which would have denied federal funds to support so-called atheistic secular humanism in public schools, is the coordinator for the National Coalition for Children.\(^\text{20}\) Her booklet Secular Humanism in the Schools: An Issue Whose Time Has Come, published by the Heritage Foundation, argues that the cause for the precipitous deterioration of learning achievement in our schools is humanistic education.

Children are . . . being taught at school that moral and social beliefs and behavior are not necessarily based upon Judeo-Christian principles being taught by most families at home, but should be fashioned instead to suit the wishes and convenience of the majority of society as a whole.\(^\text{21}\)

The Heritage Foundation will be remembered by some educators for its active support of school critics in Kanawha County.\(^\text{22}\) However, later developments suggest their influence will become more pervasive: the Board of Advisors and staff are politically experienced and capable of influencing issues. Examples of the emerging style can be found in its campaign to stop big labor, launched by a fund-raising letter signed by Senator Jake Garn of Utah. And, in Education Update, the names and addresses of committees reviewing federal funds for education were circulated to subscribers in an effort to reduce federal funds for educational projects. With a current mailing list of over 70,000, the Heritage Foundation program and political expertise should continue to be a source of educational interest.

The American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC), whose board of directors includes the last three presidents of the Heritage Foundation,\(^\text{23}\) publishes a booklet intended for conservative state legislators throughout the nation. The booklet includes, word for word, legislative bills that can be introduced on a number of topics, including education.\(^\text{24}\) Among the bills affecting education, the 1977 edition of Suggested State Legislation included items on free enterprise, parental rights, teacher proficiency, school discipline, and a bill prohibiting forced busing. A quote from Onalee McGraw, whose degree is in government, is included in the booklet's introduction to legislation on values of education claiming that:

Humanistic education is the latest manifestation of the 'so-called progressive life adjustment philosophy' that has dominated our schools and teacher education for decades. Humanistic education places all emphasis on the child's social and psychological growth, 'instead' of on the learning of basic reading, writing, thinking, communicating skills, and factual knowledge.

In June of 1977, ALEC invited conservative legislators to submit bills to be included in the next edition of Suggested State Legislation. The chairperson of the evaluation committee for review of bills to be included in the 1978 booklet is Donna J. Carlson, a member of the Arizona legislature and of the American Opinion Speakers Bureau, which promotes a John Birch Society viewpoint. It is likely that the results of ALEC's booklet will have an impact on state legislators and education.

Phyllis Schlafly and the campaign against the Equal Rights Amendment continues to gain headlines and impact in state legislatures across the country. Phyllis Schlafly, a frequent speaker at a number of conservative and right-wing gatherings including the John Birch Society, includes a potentially significant feature in her organization's membership leaflet, the Eagle Forum. In the statement of purposes is a reference to education which declares a belief in the right of parents to insist that schools permit voluntary prayer, teach the precepts of holy scriptures, use textbooks that do not offend the religious and moral views of parents, permit children to attend schools of their neighborhood, and use textbooks that honor families in which the woman's role as wife and mother is primary.

In December of 1976, the Phyllis Schlafly Report circulated an address by Jo-Ann Abrigg, president of the Committee for Positive Education, in which she claimed, "We parents are indeed paying taxes to school systems that hire teachers and purchase educational programs that fill our children's minds with garbage and utilize psychological techniques to condition our children to anti-Christian judeo philosophy and religion."

If, as some suggest, the ERA movement is doomed to failure, it is quite possible that the opposition political organizations and grassroots systems created through Phyllis Schlafly will find education an attractive target.
The Evangelical Right

During the last few years significant growth has occurred among religious fundamentalists, estimated as high as forty million voters. Some segments are clearly associated with far-right interests in opposing public education and establishing private schools devoted to a return to basics. The growth of fundamentalism and private fundamentalist schools should raise serious questions regarding increased pressure on public school financing and curricula. The Institute for Creation Research, Inc. (ICR) is devoted to "a revival of belief in special creation as the true explanation of the origin of the world." ICR will send free materials to any person who will present them formally to their school board. Among the publications that have generated controversy is Biology: A Search for Order in Complexity. In Indiana, Texas, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and California the text has raised debate. In Indiana, the text was adopted by the state textbook committee, but later ordered removed by Judge Michael F. Duggan, who asserted, "The book's claim that it presents a balanced view is a sham that breaches the separation between church and state voiced by Thomas Jefferson." ICR has grown considerably as a result of renewed interest in evangelical fundamentalism. The implications for future growth and influence upon school curriculum and financing should not go unnoticed.

Third Century Publishers offer materials designed to mobilize a conservative Christian political base. The materials, written for the most part by Rus Walton, a former campaigner for Barry Goldwater and Ronald Reagan, include One Nation under God. Walton's thesis suggests, among other things, that God is an ultra-conservative who is against coercing persons into joining unions, against having to pay for public school material that is offensive, and against forcing children to attend school. Chapter 6, "Are Public Schools Ruining Our Children?" suggests the root evils are compulsory education, curriculum, and financing (taxation). In the study guide, Walton's students are asked to "consider the parents in Kanawha County, W. Va., and other school districts. Are there similar problems in your area?" Later they are asked, "Have you audited the materials used in your local school?" In its In the Spirit of 76: the Citizens' Guide to Politics, Third Century Publishers provides details on how to organize a political campaign.
Third Century Publishers should not be easily dismissed. This publishing company has been closely linked to Bill Bright of the Christian Embassy and Campus Crusade for Christ. Ultraconservative interests are aware of the potential. Richard Viguerie has been quoted as saying, "The key area of growth for the conservative ideology and (political) philosophy is among evangelical people. I would not be surprised if in the next year you did not see a massive effort to involve them, utilizing direct mail and other techniques."

The Old Right

The John Birch Society includes a speakers bureau, a publishing company, and a number of front groups capable of exerting pressure through some four thousand Birch chapters controlled and directed by Robert Welch. In March of 1977 Welch called for a major effort to establish five hundred Tax Reform Immediately (TRIM) Committees in each congressional district to lower taxes through less government. "We are confident," writes Welch, "that pressure will continue to grow if thousands of TRIM bulletins are distributed throughout each and every congressional district."

Birch involvement in the anti-ERA movement appears to be much stronger than the general public may recognize. In a series of close state decisions, it appears the Birch influence has in some cases made the difference. "We wish we had space," wrote William Dunham of the Birch staff, "to describe in detail the fantastic effort put forth by so many Birchers." An example from North Carolina, where the ERA bill was defeated by one vote, is instructive. A Birch section leader comments, "Though the JBS was never publicly mentioned, the leadership positions were filled, and the movement's success was made possible by our people, and I am sure the enemy knows it."

Birch effectiveness in influencing public issues and candidates has, in some instances, been crucial. Referring to the election of Birch Council member Lawrence McDonald, Welch writes, "...as early as we could, in 1975, we assigned an excellent full-time coordinator to work in that [Georgia] Congressional district alone." And, in the Birch petition drive to get the United States out of the United Nations, more than eight million signatures were submitted to selected congressmen in 1976.
Should the Birch efforts to influence the growing anti-tax movement be successful, educators can anticipate a move to reduce funds for public education at the local, state, and national levels. Liberty Lobby, a Washington-based organization with several publications, front groups, and their own publishing firm, has devoted considerable attention to the anti-tax movement. The circulation of The Spotlight, a major lobby publication, has grown from 40,000 in 1975 to over 100,000 and is actively advertising the aims of similar groups across the country. Martin A. Larson, a staff writer, has published a number of books encouraging persons to refrain from paying their income tax. One such book, How to Defeat Yourself against the IRS, includes the promotional remark, "If several million taxpayers would follow the advice and techniques offered in my manual, IRS operations would soon become impossible." Aulie McBrearty, indicted by a federal grand jury for tax evasion, received the Lobby's Liberty Award, as head of the United States Taxpayers Union. Citizens, including some members of Congress, will feel the influence of Liberty Lobby. The radio message of Liberty Lobby is heard on 340 stations daily.

Conclusion

The climate for a resurgence of political ultraconservatism is reflected in recent polls of American public opinion. In one Gallup public opinion poll, some 47 percent of the respondents described themselves as "right of center," 32 percent as "left of center," and only 10 percent as "middle of the road." Although the figures can be variously interpreted, it is clear that ultraconservatives hope to draw strength from the prevailing mood of discontent. At a time when the "traditional coalition for social legislation composed of the civil rights, labor, and liberal Democrats appears to be dissolving, the chances are good that the next election will be a key factor in determining the future direction of state and national programs.

The future of public education is a function of public opinion. As such, we are well advised to consider the recent strength of the new right and consider the probable consequences for education. If, as seems predictable, we are on the verge of another round of ultraconservative pressure, what might educators expect for the future?

Although it may be too early to predict the specific issues that may surface in education, it would appear that taxes, progressive social curricula in the area of human relations, busing, and federal funding for educational projects will become prime targets. So too, we might expect to see increased concern regarding program development in the area of women's treatment in textbooks, specifically, a review of text materials related to the traditional role of women. Such a review has already been suggested by Phyllis Schlafly to anti-ERA groups across the country. A related matter regarding godliness in the school can be expected to surface as we witness the growth of fundamentalist organizations, some of which are quick to accept the claims of the far right. It is likely this pressure will occur under the guise of attacks on secular humanism in the schools.

At issue here is not the right of persons within society to express their views regarding public education. Rather, at issue is the capability of educators to effectively respond to organized pressure from the New Right. To be competitive in the marketplace of ideas requires tools and strategies that are effective in molding public opinion. In this regard, a significant element in recent moves by the New Right is the organized ability to influence public opinion using organizational tools that most educational organizations cannot match at present.

Today a disparate but growing grassroots support system is ripe for coalescing into a politically effective campaign against public education costs, curriculum development, and liberal education. During a time of public apathy at the polls and withdrawal from concern with social problems, the climate is very favorable for right-wing, ultraconservative, and evangelical rightists to influence legislation, funding, and curriculum. "The New Right is moving," claims Viguie, "They're organized, they've got talent in spades, and they're going to have an impact." Educators would be wise to consider the warning clouds; we would be in for a major storm.

9 How the Mel Gablers Have Put Textbooks on Trial

Edward B. Jenkinson
Indiana University

Norma and Mel Gabler have turned their Texas home in Longview into "the nation's largest textbook review clearing house." As the founders of Educational Research Analysts, they "help the educationally underprivileged." As a service organization we are dedicated to helping parents who are concerned about what their children are being taught.

In the mimeographed and printed materials made available to concerned parents by Educational Research Analysts, the Gablers make statements like the following:

Until textbooks are changed, there is no possibility that crime, violence, VD, and abortion rates will do anything but continue to climb.

Textbooks mold nations because textbooks largely determine how a nation votes, what it becomes and where it goes.

Since they started reviewing textbooks in 1961 and protesting what they consider to be objectionable content, the Gablers' efforts have paid dividends. For example, in one of the printed sheets they distributed to interested parents in 1977, they noted that last year "God gave parents a number of victories. In Texas alone, the State Textbook Committee did a good job of selecting the best of the available books. Then, the State Commissioner of Education removed 10 books, including the dictionaries with vulgar language and unreasonable definitions."

According to a printed sheet distributed by Educational Research Analysts in November 1977, the success of the Gablers has not been limited to Texas. "Mrs. Gabler has travelled much this year, including six weeks by invitation in New Zealand and Australia."
during July and August. A nationwide impact has been felt in New Zealand because of her visit, and a similar impact was made in one of the largest states of Australia.\footnote{3}

The Gablers' "ongoing battle to oust objectionable textbooks from public schools—and to urge publishers to produce better ones?" has been reported in Textbooks on Trial.\footnote{4} James C. Hefley's account of the Gablers, which was first published late in 1976, was in its fourth printing by early 1978, and it was the June 1977 selection of the Conservative Book Club. The Gablers now distribute the book through Educational Research Analysts, their nonprofit organization.\footnote{5}

Through Educational Research Analysts, the Gablers have made available "thousands of textbook reviews—their own, plus reviews from many other states. Most are by page, paragraph, and line, prepared by parents for parents, and consider the age level and knowledge of the student. They concentrate on pointing out 'questionable' content. .."\footnote{6}

A concerned parent who requests a set of reviews receives this advice:

There is much that you as a parent or concerned teacher can do, but you must observe some important "do's" and "don'ts." Among them, never protest any textbook until you have personally examined the "questioned" portions in the book (or books) involved. To do this, our reviews can be of great help to you.

Always try to make your case to key leaders and one or more board members before confronting your school or making a public protest. To educators you are an "outsider" who is "infringing" in "their" area—when you question, or even examine, school subject matter. Thus, because of professional pride, even good, concerned educators will feel professionally bound to defend what they are using.\footnote{7}

Included in the packet of reviews that one concerned parent received from Educational Research Analysts is a copy of a twenty-seven-page letter from the Gablers to the Texas State Commissioner of Education.\footnote{8} Dated August 9, 1974, the letter requested the Commissioner not to accept the Ginn 360 Reading Series for use in Texas. The Gablers made 163 objections to ten of the readers for grades seven and eight. In their letter, which they provide to parents who request reviews of the Ginn series, the Gablers cite specific paragraphs and page numbers in the student's or teacher's edition and quote the 'questionable passage before giving their
Here are thirteen representative objections, grouped according to the title of the book in the series:

Conflicts

P. 77, question 3, “What are some other commonplace experiences that cause fear in people? How might people deal with them? Choose one of these experiences and tell how you think you would deal with it.”

Objection: Invasion of privacy.

P. 128, question 1, “What is the meaning of long hair to those adults who might object to it? What do you think might be the reason for this? What does long hair mean to you?”

Objection: Puts adults in bad light.

Awakenings

P. 60, par. 8, lines 5 and 7, “Oh, God.”

P. 61, par. 3, “Oh, God.”

Objection: Not showing respect to God. Profanity.

P. 67, par. 2, last sent., “Schoof was such a bore.”

Objection: Depreciates school.

P. 69, par. 6, lines 4-5, “It was so false, so pointless. How could they sing of the land of the ‘free, when there was still racial discrimination?”

Objection: Majority of people are free. Only people in jail are not free.

Pp. 67–75, story titled “The Fan Club,” relates girl’s struggle to be accepted by the artificial, cruel in-crowd. Is accepted at the expense of another girl’s dignity.

Objection: Vicious, cruel, demeaning story. Not suitable for 7th graders. The teacher is pictured as intolerant.

P. 78, poem, “Corners on the Curving Sky,” lines 2-5, “... that means that you and I can hold completely different points of view and both be right.”

Objection: No definite standards—situation ethic.

Pp. 81–86, title, “What Are the Doldrums?”

Objection: This story is silly and a waste of time except for pure amusement.

Changes

P. 17, par. 4, line 3, “... the day apricots were ripe enough to steal.”

Objection: Implies that there is nothing wrong with stealing.
Textbooks on Trial

P. 48, last par., "But it was always China that we were taught was home. In those days we were all immigrants. Whether we were born in America or not, we were all immigrants."

Objection: This does not foster patriotism toward America and is somewhat of a derogatory statement about our country.

Failures

P. 19, par. 3, lines 2-3, "Besides Aunt Mo's too dang noisy."

Objection: Implies profanity.

Speculations

P. 39, question 3, "Muraco asks, 'Can an instrument have 'second sight' or respond to forces that are beyond our reckoning? What answer would you give...? Do you think that the events in this story could happen in real life?"

Objection: What does this have to do with literature?

Questions

P. 57, first teacher's note: "The title (Luther) has allusive force, recalling Martin Luther and Martin Luther King, Jr., both reformers."

Objection: These two men should not be put in the same category. Martin Luther was a religiously dedicated, non-violent man.

The Gablers' objections do not go unnoticed in Texas. According to stamped comments on the copy of the letter of objections, 26 of the 163 objections were honored by the Texas State Commissioner of Education. The twenty-six objectionable passages or offensive words were deleted, or an entire story or poem was replaced in the Texas version of the textbooks.

The Gablers do not write all of the textbook reviews they distribute through Educational Research Analysts. Instead, they invite concerned parents to write reviews for them. To provide a degree of uniformity in the reviews, the Gablers send their followers a three-page outline that lists these ten categories the reviewers should use for summarizing objectionable content in textbooks:

The Gablers do not write all of the textbooks distribute through Educational Research Analysts invite concerned parents to write reviews for them, the Gablers screen a three-page outline that lists these ten categories should use for summarizing objectionable content: (1) Attacks on Values, (2) Distorted Content, (3) Anti-Institutionalizing, (4) Violent, (5) Academic Inexcellence, (6) (Communism, Socialism, Internationalism), (7) Incoherent, (8) Behavioral Modification, (9) Humanism, O or Religions Encouraged, and (10) Other important Aspects.
After reading and rereading the reviews that the Gabblers mailed to a concerned parent who was interested in the Ginn 360 Reading Series, I followed the outline to find representative objections. Ten typical objections are recorded below as they appear in the reviews. If an objectionable passage is cited by the reviewer, that is noted here. The objections are also recorded according to subheadings in the outline.

Attack on Family, Home, and Adults

In Ginn 360, stories are presented which depict parents as stupefying and idiotic, such as in "The Reluctant Dragon" (Level 12), where the son knows more than the parents; and, again, in the story "Curtains for Leop" (Level 12), where the antics of the children save the parents from looking stupid. To further have children doubting parents, stories where children solve adult problems are presented, such as "The New Fence" (Level 6) in which the objective is clearly stated: "Understanding that children can help adults solve problems."

Attack on Bible and Christianity

P. 138 (col. Man the Myth Maker), question 1, "How is Deirdre like Pandora and Eve?"

Objection: This last comparison between Pandora and Eve misleads the student into erroneous beliefs that Eve's story was mythical.

Attack on Morality: Stealing

I.E. (col. To Turn a Stone) p. 300, col. 2, 26, "There are some people who would censor the tales of Robin Hood, for they do not seem to support an outlaw and make the life of crime seem glamorous. It is shown in this story, however, that Robin Hood felt he did not have recourse to justice."

Objection: Stealing and highway robbery is [sic] wrong anyway you look at it. The end does not always justify the means.

Attack on Fixed Values Censored

Questions with no firm answer

P. 39 (col. Speculations), topic 2, "Plan a panel discussion based on the following topic: Computers are incapable of creative thinking and cannot replace man."

Objection: Refers [sic] that there can be more than one answer.

Distorted Content: Errors of Fact

P. 224 (col. Man the Myth Maker), SF (pseud.), "No one I've ever known is what he appears to be on the surface. Could Charlie's statement suggest that lit. consists of many kinds of metamorphoses?"

\[\text{\textit{\textcopyright}}\]
Objection: The text is trying to stress change as being the major thing in life. This is not true. Change has no reliability; it causes the personality to be shattered. Remember that the word used in this assignment is "metamorphoses." 19

Negative Thinking - Prejudicial

Student Textbook page 72, "There was a riot on our block, and there were a lot of whites doing most of the shooting. Sometimes some blacks would come by with guns, but not often; they mostly had clubs."

Objection: Infers that whites are bad and blacks are good. Talk about discrimination! There is no story in this series that depicts the reverse. 20

Negative Thinking - Skeptical

T. E. (of To Turn a Stone) p. 106, col. 1, para. 4, lines 1-2, "There's a sucker born every minute."

Objection: The P. T. Barnum philosophy is skeptical [sic]. This is a depressing thought. 21

Academic Unexcellence

Inappropriate content and pictures

21-29 (of Questions), pictures

Objection: Pictures with no identification. This is an eighth grade reader; not just pictures. 22

Isms Fostered: Communism not treated realistically (too favorable)

T. E. (of To Turn a Stone) p. 187, "... Of An Organization" concentrates on the promotion of UNICEF.

Objection: UNICEF is a known Communist front. See "Fact Finder," Oct. 16, 1969, Vol. 27 Number 23 from Phoenix, Arizona. 23

Humanism

Teacher's Manual Page 147 (for On the Edge) Part II, 4, "Humanism is an attitude about life that centers on human values."

Objection: Constantly throughout the stories, situation ethics which is the morality of the religion of Humanism is offered. Now we even find the definition of Humanism. Nowhere is the definition of Christianity given. What ever happened to "equality"? 24

The nearly two hundred pages of reviews that I examined contain many more objections that could be classified according to the outline's subheadings and that I did not use in listing sample objections. However, additional sample objections would not provide... any more insight into the nature of the complaints about literature textbooks and basal readers.

In a one page announcement in which they call themselves "your consumer advocates for education," the Gablers urge their supporters to "exchange and share reviews." They note that they need a copy of every review possible. We welcome textbook reviews primarily, but also reviews of films and library books. Rest assured that your reviews will be sent nationwide to help others.25

Shortly after I accepted the chair of the National Council of Teachers of English Committee against Censorship, I learned that the Gabler reviews are indeed sent nationwide. Gabler reviews and/or other materials about objectionable texts have obviously been used by concerned parents in the process of challenging textbooks and courses in at least thirty-five states: California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

The Gabler-distributed reviews of Man's A Course of Study (MACOS) have been used by a number of citizens' groups to protest that social studies program, which was developed with funds from the National Science Foundation. Reviews, comments, reprinted editorials, and suggested petitions from Educational Research Analysts have also been used to challenge courses and specific textbooks that deal with values clarification, the new math, science courses (especially those that do not include the creationist theory), role playing, sensitivity training, sex education, and nearly all innovative educational programs. Finally, the Gablers distribute a great deal of information on secular humanism, the religion that they believe is being taught in the schools. They obviously hope that their work to rid the textbooks and the schools of secular humanism will pay dividends.

In the meantime, they continue to fight for basic education. As Norma notes in Textbooks on Trial, "I think the pendulum is swinging our way. If the movement keeps gaining strength, we'll be going back to the basics—reading skills, traditional math, phonics, morality, patriotism, history that is really history, science that is science, and fair play for free enterprise economies."26

The Gablers are obviously convinced that they know what is best for America's children, and they have the dedication, the drive, and the spirit to achieve their goal. Apparently they have hundreds of dedication followers, too, since the number of censorship incidents in which Gabler-distributed materials are used is on the rise.
There is little question that the Gablers and their followers have put public education on trial. The question facing public education now is this: Can teachers and administrators throughout the country unite long enough to put the Gabler thinking on trial?

Is Secular Humanism the Religion of the Public Schools?

Robert T. Rhode
Indiana University

"What do you mean by 'secular humanism'" the principal asked. He looked bewildered.

"A religion that teachers in this school are teaching to our children," replied the spokesman for Parents Watching the Schools (PWS), a local organization whose goal is to rid the public school of objectionable textbooks. "Your teachers are Secular Humanists who are causing our children to become anti-God, anti-Christian, and anti-American."

"You have to be kidding," the principal said with a smile.

"Not at all!" shouted a member of PWS. "Have you looked at the books used in your school? Take the English books, for instance. The stories in them are violent, filthy, completely lacking in morals..."

"Stop teaching from these Humanist books," another PWS member demanded. "Don't our children have any rights? Situation ethics cause our children to believe there are no absolute morals."

The PWS spokesman said, "Get rid of this false religion."

"But what is 'secular humanism'" the principal asked, looking from face to face in the crowd of PWS members.

Parent groups, like PWS, and special interest groups dissatisfied with the public schools for a variety of reasons, are calling many teachers "secular humanists" particularly those teachers who teach within humanities departments or who follow the educational philosophy of humanism. These highly organized groups apparently are confusing terms which sound alike but actually have widely different meanings. "Humanities" sounds like "humanistic education," and both sound like "secular humanism," which one critic of education defines as a religion that "believes man is God and rejects biblical standards of living."

In spite of the confusion of sound-alike terms, the parent groups and special interest groups can make the label of secular humanist stick—at least long enough to tie up schools, school boards, and administrators in a series of time-consuming confrontations.

Teachers within the field of humanities are not the only targets for attack. In one state, the schools of many cities and towns around a large metropolitan area came under widespread attack in the following areas: sex education, sociology, values clarification, science fiction, science courses with emphasis on evolutionary theory, and, of course, humanities. The complainants called all of these areas examples of secular humanism.

State and national groups are spreading their literature across the country. Their books, brochures, pamphlets, and letters seem to include nearly all public school teachers under the label of secular humanist. Apparently these groups are willing to launch an attack on the schools.

Appalled at the secular humanism attacks on our moral fabric, they seem to fear that the family unit will be destroyed if secular humanism is rampant in the schools. The Barbara M. Morris Report, June 1974, states,

Based on the philosophy of Godless Secular Humanism, Humanistic education is designed to promote and inculcate the principles of Humanism. . . . The Humanistic child rejects his Christian heritage, his Christian parents, Christian belief and our Judeo-Christian culture.

According to the above quotation, secular humanism causes children to become anti-Christian; they no longer believe in God after they have been exposed to secular humanism in the schools.

According to The Heritage Foundation, organized groups of complainers are seeking an end to the teaching of secular humanism, which is considered a religion, by urging that both the courts and statutory laws be used against it.

Parents, teachers, and citizens across the nation, concerned with the drift in the tax supported schools toward humanistic education and academic decline, are confronting the question in their local communities, in the Courts, and in the halls of Congress.
The public is growing more aware of the inequity of using tax dollars for the support of nontheistic religion. Secular humanism in the schools is indeed an issue whose time has come.

It seems that parent groups and special interest groups are ready and willing to fight against secular humanism, which is often made synonymous with "atheism." In a Christian Mother's View of the Religious Education Program, a concerned parent writes.

This article is a call to battle, to bring it out in the open that all who love God may believe it is right now or forever lose the opportunity to save their children and this nation from going irreversibly the route of atheistic, one world collectivism toward which the government, psychologists and educators are pushing them.

It
Now the public school is making a frontal attack on Protestant ethics. And they make their attack by using our children; the young are grist for their mills, and the young come from us. They use our children to form a secular-humanist America.

The above quotations seem to indict the public schools with waging an “attack” on Christianity.

If all of these quotations are valid.

...and humanism as critics of education define it—can be formed. According to state and national groups decrying the teaching of secular humanism in the schools, a secular humanist is:

Anti-God. The secular humanist wants to tear God down from His throne and make Man the sovereign of the universe.

Anti-democracy. The secular humanist hopes to do away with present governments and make the world one huge, totalitarian state.

Anti-family. The secular humanist undermines the family concept, denigrates Christian values that are taught in the home, and preaches to the youth of America that there are no absolute morals.

Anti-Christian. The secular humanist preaches the religion of Secular Humanism through textbooks and by means of the following teaching techniques: values clarification, moral education, human development, family life and human relations, affective education, and psychosocial learning, to name a few.

That is the nature of the label that is being applied to teachers, librarians, administrators, and publishers across the United States today. That is what is meant by being branded a Secular Humanist; the person so branded is anti-God, anti-democracy, anti-family, and anti-Christian.

The literature frequently refers to the terrifying effects that secular humanists have on children. An example from The Barbara M. Morris Report, June 1974.

The “success” of Humanism Education can be seen in the prodigious numbers of young people who are alienated, confused, skeptical, cynical, aimless, suicidal and just plain unhappy.

How do teachers allegedly produce such “unhappy” young people? By teaching values clarification, situational ethics, family life and human relations, and so on. All of these subjects are bound together in the package labeled secular humanism. Secular humanism takes many forms, from humanism to psychology, to all of affective education.

The complainants of such organizations are primarily recognized by values clarification and situation ethics. One critic of education expresses concern that secular humanism in the form of situation ethics may lead children to reject Christianity.

Christian children are constantly bombarded with stories of situation ethics (it's all right in certain circumstances; or, in other words, the Humanist philosophy that any ethic must be looked at and decided upon by the “situation” from which that ethic is viewed). How long will it be, under this kind of bombardment (from the textbook and the teacher's manual) before children begin first to question and then to doubt the very foundation of his own Christian-Judeo morality the Ten Commandments.

The same source then concludes:

Christianity, is based on a belief in God and His absolute laws, the Ten Commandments, are the moral code by which to live. On the other hand, secular Humanism states that there is no God and bases its morality on situation ethics, thus denying that there is a right or a wrong or any absolutes.

According to the above quotations, situation ethics is helping to erode the Christian beliefs of children. Secular humanism seems to deny the absolute authority of God.

What recourse is available to teachers under attack? Are teachers to blame for the attacks? The second question has a definite answer: teachers have brought several of these attacks on themselves. The problem begins in a lack of communication; teachers frequently have not made it clear why they were teaching something or what it was that they were teaching. Teachers have not always communicated effectively with students or with parents, and the lack of dialogue has produced misunderstandings of monstrous proportions.

The first question, “What recourse is available to teachers under attack?” is more difficult to answer. Once misunderstandings between teachers, students, and parents have reached the altercation stage, it may be difficult to solve the problem. There are, however, ways to prepare for an eventual confrontation. One way is for the departments within a school to develop written philosophies for what their departments teach. An English department, for example, should have a written philosophy that answers the question, “Why teach literature?” Also, schools should develop a written set of procedures for dealing with complaints. Thus, every complaint directed against a school could be handled along clearly delineated channels of communication. Also, departments within a school should write rationales for the books those departments use. It is not enough, however, to have philosophies, procedures, and rationales in hand; teachers and administrators must also be able to explain those rationales to any parent or concerned citizen. Teachers must have good reasons for what they teach. After all, academic freedom may soon be a thing of the past. Already, in some instances, the shield of academic freedom has been pierced by victorious opponents of certain textbooks and teaching techniques.

A teacher under attack could explain that he or she is not a secular humanist. If one traces the origin of the term "secular humanist," one finds that it is the name of a specific religion, but that religion is not defined as critics of education define it. Only by a rather large stretch of the imagination can one assume that nearly all teachers are actual secular humanists. The literature from state and national organizations that are critical of the schools often cites a U.S. Supreme Court decision that proclaimed secular humanism a separate religion. In June of 1961, the high court, in the case Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961), termed "secular humanism" a religion but only in a footnote to that decision. The footnote referred to a decision by the First District Court of Appeals of California. There is indeed a church of secular humanists, and one congregation was involved in litigation in California. This church is rather Unitarian in outlook and does not deny God's existence; the church simply does not deal with God in an overt way. Rather, the church focuses on human life at the present moment.

To say that all or nearly all teachers are members of this church is to say that teachers are not Protestants, Catholics, Jews, or members of any of the large number of religions that are allowed freedom to worship in this country by virtue of the Bill of Rights. Clearly, the definition of secular humanism, a specific religion, is not the definition that critics of public education are using. These groups have seized upon a term that sounds like "humanities" and "humanistic education," and they are bent upon labeling teachers across the country with a term defined by their own standards.

How did critics of public education arrive at their definition of secular humanism? In 1933, the famous educator John Dewey signed the "Humanist Manifesto I," a document that looked optimistically toward America's future and tried to project what life would be like then, in 1973, the famous educator B. F. Skinner signed the "Humanist Manifesto II", a document that, like the 1933 version, gives projections about America's future. The critics of public education see a link between these "humanist" documents and the religion of secular humanism, as they define it. A number of the critics of public education assume that nearly all teachers are followers of Dewey and Skinner, and they feel that these men (and others like them) are representatives of secular humanism.

Under the influence of such ardent advocates of humanistic education as John Dewey, Jean Piaget, Carl Rogers, Lawrence Kohlberg, Abraham Maslow, William Glassner, Jerome Bruner, and others, professional educators have made "socialization" of the child the main purpose of education.

The above quotation points out another misunderstanding on the part of state and national groups organized to rid schools of secular humanism: They confuse the terms "secular humanism" and "humanistic education." If teachers are advocates of an educational philosophy of humanism, then they appear to critics of education to be dyed-in-the-wood, card-carrying secular humanists.

Thus, the definition of secular humanism as critics of education have defined it differs widely from the definition of the specific religion of secular humanism. The critics have applied the term to nearly all teachers by an ingenious method of confusing sound alike terms, and their censorship of textbooks and teaching techniques affects nearly all areas of the school, from English to health, from sociology to home economics.

It is time for teachers, administrators, librarians, and publishers to become fully informed of the threat of being labeled secular humanists. Also, it is time for schools to improve their communication with local communities. Again, it is time for schools to develop written rationales for what they teach. Armed with effective communication and written rationales, the schools should be better able to defend against the attacks that are to come.

11 Hester Prynne and Linda Lovelace, Pure or Prurient

Gertrude Berger
Brooklyn College

The June 21, 1973, Supreme Court decisions on obscenity, Miller and Paris' Adult Theatre, placed the two heroines, Hester Prynne and Linda Lovelace, in equal jeopardy. In both cases, the decision as to who is pure or prurient rests in the hands of "contemporary community standards." There are communities where the vehicles in which the two superstars are featured have been declared obscene. According to Ken Donelson in "Censorship and Arizona Schools: 1966-1968," (Arizona English Bulletin 2 [February 1969]:13-22), two complaints were recorded against The Scarlet Letter. In both cases, the book was judged "filthy." The school principal in one case asked the English teachers in his school to refrain from using it since the book arouses controversy, and in the other case, the book was retained. As for the film Deep Throat, Linda Lovelace plays the role of a woman, unable to achieve sexual pleasure through the normal course of anatomical events, who searches for fulfillment. In a ruling handed down by the Criminal Court of the City of New York, Judge Joel J. Tyler in the People of the State of New York Against Mature Enterprises banned the film from public viewing. Judge Tyler, describing the explicit scenes involving many and varied forms of sexual activity, concluded with these words, "Justice Jackson says he knows hard core pornography when he merely sees it [Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184] ... We have seen it in Deep Throat and this is one throat that deserves to be cut. I readily perform this operation in finding the defendant guilty as charged." In this act Judge Tyler, in order to preserve public morals, is surgeon, judge, film critic, and arbiter of community taste.

When the Supreme Court used the word "contemporary" in describing community standards, it recognized that the passage of time is a significant factor in the determination of obscenity.

The sins of Hester Prynne have passed into respectability as well as obscurity, but Ms. Lovelace's transgressions are, at the present moment in history, unforgivable.

In 1933, the United States Customs authorities sought to exclude James Joyce's Ulysses from importation because of pornographic content and the use of four-letter words. In order to make a test case of the book, which was being smuggled openly into the country, Bennett Cerf of Random House arranged for the book to be seized by the port authorities. Morris L. Ernst, counsel for Random House, argued the case. He said:

Judge, as to the word "fuck," one etymological dictionary gives its derivation as from facere, to make. The farmer fucked the seed into the soil. This, your honor, has more integrity than a euphemism used every day in every modern novel to describe precisely the same event.

The case was decided by Judge Woolsey who rendered the decision in an eloquent example of fine literary criticism.

In writing Ulysses Joyce sought to make a serious experiment in a new, if not wholly novel, literary genre. He takes persons of the lower middle class living in Dublin in 1904 and seeks, not only to describe what they did on a certain day early in June of that year as they went about the city bent on their usual occupations, but also to tell what many of them thought about the while.

Joyce had attempted - it seems to me, with astonishing success - to show how the screen of consciousness with its ever-shifting kaleidoscopic impressions carries, as it were on a plastic palimpsest, not only what is in the focus of each man's observation of the actual things about him, but also in a penumbral zone residual of past impressions, some recent and some drawn up by association from the domain of the subconscious. He shows how each of these impressions affects the life and behavior of the character which he is describing.

What he seeks to get is not unlike the result of a double or, if that is possible, a multiple exposure on a cinema film, which would give a clear foreground with a background visible but somewhat blurred and out of focus in varying degrees.

Judge Woolsey declared that Ulysses could be admitted into the United States because reading the book in its entirety "did not tend to excite sexual impulses or lustful thoughts, but that its net effect on them was only that of a somewhat tragic and very powerful commentary on the inner lives of men and women." United States v. One Book Called "Ulysses," 5 F. Supp. 182 (S.D. N.Y. 1933).
Since the courts act for the public good, it is well to see if the public has been served by legal actions against obscenity. Judge Tyler, in March of 1973, removed Deep Throat from circulation in order to prevent impinging on the privacy of any adult willing or unwilling to pay the five dollar admission price. Has the banning of the film deprived any consenting adult with such cultural proclivities from finding an object for his or her fancy? According to a survey conducted by the New York Times in October of 1973, four months after the Supreme Court ruling in June, it was still possible to see blue movies and purchase graphically explicit books in all major cities, including Washington, D.C., where there were six theaters showing hardcore films. However, while the Supreme Court decision has not diminished the production of pornography, it has influenced reputable book publishers, movie makers, librarians, and teachers in schools and universities.

The burning of novels and short story anthologies by a North Dakota school board was reported in the New York Times, 11 November 1973. When a sophomore student complained about the language in Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.'s novel Slaughterhouse-Five, the five-member school board of Drake, North Dakota, met and agreed that the book was profane. They ordered all thirty-two copies burned. Other books scheduled to be withdrawn or burned were Deliverance, by James Dickey, and Short Story Masterpieces, an anthology which included short stories by Ernest Hemingway, William Faulkner, and John Steinbeck. An English teacher at the school said in defense of the books, and the four-letter words used in them, "All I can say is, the author is trying to tell his story like it is, using language as it is being used today out there in the real world." None of the school board members had read the books in their entirety that they had ordered destroyed.

Was the North Dakota school board acting under the mandate given it by the June 21, 1973, Supreme Court decision which places the determination of what is or is not obscene in the hands of the "community"? If contemporary community standards appear to be the criteria for such a determination, does "community" mean state, city, neighborhood, or a local school board? The courts have made no decision on this matter, and the effect has been a struggle between vocal groups concerned with pornography and its alleged ability to provoke antisocial acts, and teachers, librarians, publishers, and movie makers concerned with the First Amendment guarantees of free speech and free expression.
This was the struggle in School District 25 in Queens, New York, when the local school board banned the book Down These Mean Streets, by Piri Thomas. Those members of the school board who voted for removing the book from the library shelves—and it was not a unanimous vote—objected to the language and depiction of deviant sexual behavior.

District 25's Local School Board believes, as do all anti-obscenity groups in the country, in a causal relationship between exposure to pornography and the onset of antisocial acts. There is a clear unwillingness of the Supreme Court to confront this behavioral connection. The courts contend that, in the absence of clear proof, States have the right to assume that there is a causal connection between crimes of a sexual nature and exposure to pornography.

In 1967, President Nixon and the Ninetieth Congress authorized a Commission on Obscenity and Pornography and empowered it to study the effect of pornography upon the public and its relationship to crime and to recommend legislative action. The findings of the Commission Task Force took three years to develop and when published were publicly rejected by the President and many members of Congress. Senator Eastland of Mississippi funded and authorized a subcommittee to investigate the sources of information used by the Task Force. What were the conclusions rejected? Among the forms of obscenity, the Task Force cited advertising to which all citizens were a captive audience: “... even more serious than the overt sexuality in advertising is its ability to exploit the psychology of subliminal perception.” It appears accurate to those who view airline and stocking advertisements that a message on television need not be overly pornographic to carry an erotic message to viewers. In addition, the Task Force rejected a punitive and narrow approach to the elimination of obscenity. The report reads, “Consumption of obscenity is really a symptom of social ills that have become endemic in our society.” ills such as unemployment, welfare, and poor housing are mentioned. The Ninetieth Congress was not exuberant at hearing that the problem of pornography was tied to programs supporting job training, a welfare program that does not contribute to social disorganization, and a greater commitment to a federal housing program. Those who desired a less complex, “law and order” approach were greeted with a sociological explanation which they promptly rejected.

However, the Task Force did support the establishment of local juries to assess each allegedly obscene book, film, or play. The idea was attributed to Senator Everett Dirksen and was highly recommended by the Task Force.
While communities may be granted jurisdiction in obscenity rulings, the courts have given them a test to be applied which itself has proven capricious and impossible to apply. The test is prurience. Does the average person, applying contemporary community standards, find that the interest in the material as a whole is prurient? Matter appealing to prurient interest arouses sexual desire or impure thoughts. Judge Brennan in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 467 (1957), cites a dictionary definition of "prurient" as "itching, longing, uneasy with desire." The result of such an elastic definition is that not only are both The Scarlet Letter and Deep Throat open to such a charge, but so is virtually any other literary work as well (there are individuals who can even be aroused by turning the pages of a profusely illustrated seed catalogue).

Because of the lack of clarity in the legal definition of obscenity, the Supreme Court has spent a considerable amount of time viewing allegedly pornographic films and reading allegedly hardcore books. The Court has wondered whether their frequent deliberations in this area have been fruitful. The public may wonder whether they are served by having nine robed male judges retire for a private viewing of a film and then emerge with a decision. The Court has never revealed whether they wait for Judge Brennan's "itch" to come upon them as a sign that a prurient interest is present. Does the age of the viewer determine susceptibility to such visceral reactions? Certainly the sex of the viewer will alter the reaction. Since all of the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court on obscenity have been arrived at by males, it is possible to question whether one half of the contemporary community standard—the female half—has been fairly represented. In the June 21, 1973, decision, Judge Burger says, "Woman is degraded." Since no woman has ever participated in a decision involving the higher court judgments on obscenity, such a statement can be viewed as paternalistic. The Court has never posed the question of prurience by applying the test to women as well as men. The fact is that, whatever the decisions made by the Supreme Court, they were made on the assumption that what is of prurient interest to men can be assumed to be of prurient interest to women as well.

To summarize, the Supreme Court in its June 21, 1973, ruling yields jurisdiction in matters of obscenity to communities. Communities will now have to make decisions on questions of morality in sexual behavior, standards of what is art and what is pornography, and judgments about the relationship of books and films to behavior.

There are clear indications throughout the country that an assault on intellectual freedom will accompany the search for the obscene.

"Issues of Censorship and Research on Effects of and Response to Reading," by Richard Beach was removed due to copyright restrictions.
The third section of this book is probably the most important. It concerns what teachers seem to want to know most about. It begins with Donelson's very practical article that still contains many useful suggestions for dealing with censorship, though it was written in 1974. Suhor comments on the capriciousness of censors and then describes a districtwide censorship problem that became statewide and explains how it was dealt with. He also offers some suggestions about how to change the climate by adopting the activist state of mind. Berkley describes one very good way of communicating with parents—teach them the controversial books in adult education classes at night. Shugert advises that teachers prepare written, detailed policies and rationales. She outlines how to handle a complaint and advises intelligent anticipation of possible problem areas. Her article provides suggestions for writing rationales and several examples and formats. Bartlett tells how a state department of education (Iowa) developed a model policy and rules for selection of instructional materials; he outlines the essentials of the model. In her second contribution, Shugert writes about people and organizations that may prove helpful to those trying to prevent censorship before it happens and also to those actually involved in cases. Finally, the bibliography provides a very selective list of books, procedures, and policies, entire issues of journals, articles, pamphlets, and portions of books for further amplification of the material in Dealing with Censorship.
13 Censorship in the 1970s:
Some Ways to Handle It When It Comes (And It Will)

Kenneth L. Donelson
Arizona State University

During the past couple of years, I have witnessed censorship attacks on many books, films, and periodicals—everything from the "filth" of Satis Marner to the "controversial matter" of I'm Really Dragged But Nothing Gets Me Down to the "anti-Christianity" of Slaughterhouse-Five, from the "subversive elements" of some early Charlie Chaplin short films to the "un-Americanism" of High Noon to the "communist sympathies" of Why Man Creates, from the "pornography" of the National Geographic to the "leftist propaganda" of Scholastic Magazine to the "right-wing trash" of the National Observer. Such attacks continue today, and to many English teachers and librarians they seem not merely to continue but to increase in number and fervor.

I believe we can expect to see even greater pressures for censorship exerted in the remainder of the 1970s. School taxes are rising, students "can't spell the way they used to," and innovative programs often irritate parents who do not understand why the programs were introduced in the first place. That magically nebulous word, "accountability," has caught the fancy of a public all too eager to find fault with an educational system whose products, the students, do not always happily accept the "traditional values" or "good old-fashioned American goals" of their parents. For years, Americans have maintained a somewhat uncomfortably ambivalent feeling about schools, an almost superstitious reverence that somehow education is good for everyone mixed with a fear of intellectualism and a dread of teachers. I suppose it comes out as a kind of "education is good if you don't take it and its consequences seriously" syndrome. This fear of education and the inquiring mind and the search for truth is most obviously manifested for English teachers and librarians in attacks on books that are the most likely to relate to kids' lives and their world, today and tomorrow.
The 1970s will likely see little diminution of student enthusiasm for reading real books about their very real world or parental questioning of this student enthusiasm. Indeed, an article in the November 1972 Saturday Review of the Arts (Patrick Merla's "What Is Real? Asked the Rabbit One Day," pp. 43-50) made clear that as adults head more and more toward fantasy, literature written specifically for adolescents and children heads more and more toward reality and the many unpleasant faces of our world.

Okay then. If censorship in the 1970s is likely to continue and possibly increase, what can English teachers and librarians do to prepare to meet the censor? What can they do when the censor actually comes to the school door? I would like to propose six assorted things they might try.

First, each English department should develop its own statement of rationales for teaching literature. Whatever its title, it ought to include realistic goals based on the needs and interests of specific students in a particular school. Teachers might consider Alan C. Purves's How Porcupines Make Love: Notes on a Response-Centered Curriculum (Lexington, Mass.: Xerox College Publishing, 1972) with its four objectives for a student response-centered literature curriculum.

An individual will feel secure in his response to a poem and not be dependent on someone else's response. An individual will trust himself.

An individual will know why he responds the way he does to a poem—what in him causes that response and what in the poem causes that response. He will get to know himself.

An individual will respect the responses of others as being as valid for them as his is for him. He will recognize his differences from other people.

An individual will recognize that there are common elements in people's responses. He will recognize his similarity with other people (p. 31).

English teachers intrigued with the student response-centered literature program who are concerned that the English teacher will have little work to do should take notice of the teacher's responsibilities as itemized by Purves.

The teacher must provide each student with as many different works as possible.

The teacher must encourage each student to respond as fully as he is able.

The teacher must encourage the student to understand why he responds as he does.
agreement and disagreement (p. 37).

I would hope that any statement about literature would present a number of convincing reasons in support of literary study: that literature allows young people to see themselves and their problems perhaps a little more objectively; that literature provides vicarious experiences beyond the possibilities of any one person's life; that literature frees students to meet other peoples in other places and other times, to see similarities and differences between people, and to meet a multitude of human moral and physical dilemmas; that literature exposes young people to value systems and ideas and practices different from their own, which can lead to an assessment of both the student's values and those of other people; that literature allows students to discover the world as it was and as it is, a world neither all good nor all evil, but a world all human; and above all, that literature provides deep enjoyment and satisfaction.

Second, each English department should establish a committee which will recommend books for possible use by the department. The purpose of this committee is to bring new titles and little-known or little-used older titles to the attention of their peers. I would think it helpful if a part of every departmental meeting were given over to discussions of various titles. Additionally, any discussion of books should take up the problems involved in using them with a specific class, problems of style or plot structure or censorship or student interest.

Third, each English department should work hard to win community support for academic freedom and to win that support before censorship strikes. Any community has former English teachers, librarians, and readers who may feel as strongly about censorship as the English department, but English teachers too rarely make any attempt to win friends before they need them desperately. One such group was formed shortly after a censorship episode in the Phoenix area. Named "Freedom for Readers," the group has given considerable moral support to teachers who are now aware that they do have friends outside the teaching profession who will come to their aid if censorship strikes. Perhaps similar groups can be developed in other cities.

Fourth, each English department should try to communicate to the public what is going on in English classrooms and why it is going on. Parents do have a right, even a duty, to know what English teachers are doing. Parents and other citizens will inevitably hear something about English teaching, but what they will hear is likely to be inexact or inaccurate. In any case, parents and citizens are likely to hear only what goes on, not why. And many people will be horrified to learn that their children, or any children, are reading Soul on Ice or The Scarlet Letter or The Catcher in the Rye or any of a number of books that have been censored by someone, someplace, sometime, for some reason. English teachers should not delude themselves into believing that they can teach any book and keep everything quiet. Surely an English department can do better than simply maintaining silence. Perhaps a discussion of “controversial” or “contemporary” literature could take place during Education Week or at some school function. Even better, an English department can set up a series of evening programs devoted to explaining why certain books are taught. In fact, going one step further, the English department might teach one of the “suspect” books to a group of adults, showing them how various problems could be handled in a classroom for high school students.

Fifth, each English department should establish and implement a formal policy to handle attempted censorship. Without some policy and form, the department is open to criticism and its members are likely to be vulnerable to censorship from any source. Obviously, a censor should be treated politely and fairly, and his objection considered carefully by a committee (presumably composed of at least the teacher in question, the English department chair, and the principal). Ultimately, a meeting should be arranged with the questioning citizen and the committee, and the results of that meeting should be forwarded to the superintendent and the school board, the legally constituted agency which must approve the decision. Because the school board must support teachers if the formal policy is to have any possibility of success, the English department should work closely with the board in devising the form and the policy in the first place. Any policy about censorship is only as good as the school board backing it. It may be true that formal policy statements about censorship have not always saved books or teachers; but any school without a policy statement is even more vulnerable. A school which has a statement and still gets clobbered is at least trying to fight censorship. That’s a lot better than a school which doesn’t even make a pretense of fighting.

Sixth, each English department should expect its members to prepare rationales for any book to be taught in any class. English teachers should be expected to defend their choices of books on grounds other than simple intuition or the word of some literary or pedagogical critic. In other words, English teachers should approach their choices as though they were reading them for the first time and should attempt to discover the problems involved in teaching the books or in interesting the students. While there are many things that could go into a rationale for a book, I believe that such a rationale should include answers to at least five questions: (1) Why would a teacher consider using this book with a specific class? (2) What particular objectives, literary or psychological or pedagogical, does the teacher have in mind in using this book? (3) How will the book be used to meet those objectives? (4) What problems of style, tone, or theme or possible grounds for censorship exist in the book and how will the teacher plan to meet those problems? (5) Assuming that the objectives are met, how will the students of this specific class be different because of their reading of this book?

These rationales should be written for every work to be read in common. That includes modern books and standard classics—it might be salutary for teachers to be forced to write rationales for Macbeth or Great Expectations or Our Town to find out just why teachers are using those works. These rationales should be presented both orally and in written form to the English department for approval, and they should be in the departmental files and openly available to the public. I strongly favor all demonstrations of English teacher competence in writing and speaking, thus encouraging English teachers to write and comment on rationales should be beneficial to the department and its students.

It is not true that kids are too insensitive, stupid or unresponsive to reach out and feel and hear and see the world. But it is true that kids are often too sensitive and bright and responsive to reality to waste their time on the world explored or experienced in some English classrooms. Literature worth the students' time tells the truth as one writer sees it. Literature worth the name does not lie. As Yevushenko wrote in his poem, "Lies," the young are not fooled by adult reticence about the hard facts of life. Our only acceptable approach to them must be to refuse to gloss over the wrong we know exists, or else it will repeat itself, increase, and afterwards our pupils will not forgive in us what we forgave.
If we are to have any chance as English teachers to tell the truth and to let our students explore as many visions of truth available in literature, we have to fight the censor. To fight the censor with any hope of success, we must prepare carefully before censorship strikes, not in the panic of battle. If we do not prepare in advance, or if we do not care enough to prepare, we will lose, and we will wind up losing everything, our books and our students and our freedom. And we will be forced to tell lies to the young. Perhaps they won't believe those lies, but the prospect that they might is a frightening possibility that ought to be reason enough for any English teacher to prepare to face the censor when he comes and he will.

15 Teach the Parents Well: An Anti-Censorship Experiment in Adult Education

June Berkley
Fort Frye High School, Beverly, Ohio

In the final scene of Harper Lee's To Kill a Mockingbird, Scout Finch tells her father about the town's "bad man," Boo Radley:

"An' they chased him 'n' never could catch him 'cause they didn't know what he looked like, an' Atticus, when they finally saw him, why he hadn't done any of those things ... Atticus, he was real nice...."

So, like Mr. Arthur (Boo) Radley, in To Kill a Mockingbird, are most of those "awful books"—when parents finally read them and get to know them, they can seem "real nice."

At Fort Frye High School, Beverly, Ohio, on the fringes of Appalachia—not more than a two-hour drive from Charleston, West Virginia—the English department and a nucleus of parents and citizens have opened up some refreshing and unusually hopeful avenues by sharing their concerns with the "Books Our Children Read." Those "awful books" don't seem so bad after all when parents finally give them a reading in the friendly atmosphere of a community education class. There, teachers who believe in the selections approach the books, as well as the parents, with optimism and goodwill. And the students are the real beneficiaries.

There is support now—where once there was mistrust—for teaching high school students books that encourage a broad, realistic view of this world and its possibilities and that affirm for the students a sense of themselves as reasoning and reasonable people.

To recognize in this community effort a response to the specter of censorship, we must know a little of the background against which the teachers of "bad books" and suspicious citizens finally emerged as good neighbors. Fort Frye School District serves a diverse community spread across a sixty-five mile span of lush river-bottom truck farms, small rolling hill farms, rich coal fields, and strip-mined hollows. The dozens of hillsides and hamlets are people by those who work in or manage the many industrial plants along the Muskingum and Ohio rivers. The high school serves some eight hundred students, grades seven through twelve under one administration. The English teachers collaborate and rotate their teaching in all six grades.

Here, too, people are caught up in the changing times. Occasionally they feel that the old forms of life are simply breaking up. Some of us— but not everyone—are ready to see in this moment our opportunity to build a new and better order. As teachers, this means we must worry a lot and work hard. But our experience with good literature tells us we cannot escape the eternal questions; we know there are no longer pat answers, if ever there were. We can offer our students only reflections in a time of uncertainties; yet, so often, their parents demand that the schools prescribe directions and answers, as parents have always preferred them, straight and simple: by the books. Instead, we give their sons and daughters books that provoke more questions, redefine human relationships, and cast doubt on the old order.

It is tempting to recall easier, simpler times, when conflict over books read in an English class was hardly conceivable. In those days we might have been ruffled, perhaps, by the smudges on a ninth grader's composition, but were quickly mollified by learning it had been written while the student tended a 4-H calf all night at the county fair. Even today, teachers sometimes have occasion to count their blessings and forget the difficulties. Once in a while a mother brings a giant tray of home baked food to the office and says, "It's for the teachers; they've been so good to work with all my children." But mostly we are on our guard, for so often in recent years our efforts have been called into question, the censor's ignorant demands having displaced the gestures of goodwill.

I am a veteran of twenty-one years in Fort Frye High School—and the survivor of an active movement on the part of a small, vocal group of parents to dismiss me during the late '60s. I had to defend my use of the New York Times Student Weekly—"definitely a communist publication," some parents avowed—to teach critical reading to seniors during the anti-Vietnam War demonstrations. I have seen apparently innocuous material set off a whole community against the schools. And I have participated in the recovery, slow and painstaking, still underway today.

Our English department includes a good cross-section of native, well-educated Appalachians (one is my former student, a survivor of both the Student Weekly conflict and Kent State) and well... traveled intellectuals who consider teaching their highest calling. We have devoted our efforts to bringing students, materials, and ourselves together in a way that will "create a higher sense of the possible." Ours is a program that considers the creation of lifelong readers a prime objective; consequently, our offerings are diverse, as we attempt to reach every student with something of interest and value.

We teachers are fully aware that ours is a broader view of man and society than that engendered or tolerated in the homes of many of the students we teach. To specify our belief in fostering a positive attitude toward a democratic, pluralistic society and global brotherhood, the teachers in our school even produced a written statement. We consider our idealism defensible. We have been tested by the censorship wave of the last decade.

Our Censorship Controversy

Our students have generally supported our inclusion of a broad spectrum of topics and treatments in our curriculum. To that extent we have considered them our allies in creating understanding and community support. Imagine the dismay of one class when they learned that their textbook, Scott Foresman's Perspectives, was under attack in Charleston. The sensitivity of these students to the growing trend of suspicion had already been sharpened by exercises designed to measure public opinion on such issues as draft evasion and the Vietnam War itself. I encouraged them to discuss the issues with their parents. This issue-oriented approach provoked no response from the community: no notes, no calls. A few parents came in, but it did raise the students' meaningful interactions with their community.

Meanwhile, signs of the censorship mentality appeared in the local community. Via the television and the newspapers, the public was apprised of censorship controversy in other communities and learned of the threat of "dirty books" in the classroom. That phrase provoked the inevitable. In our case the rumors circulated around Robert Newton Peck's A Day No Pigs Would Die, that bittersweet story of a Shaker boy's coming of age in rural New England, a story that moved our ex-Marine principal to tears (the weeping was unusual, the familiarity with the book was not the read nearly everything we taught).

Friendly parents warned us: telephones were hot with the news that "there was a dirty book in junior high English." By this time, a study was undertaken and the books recalled. The superintendent examined a copy; he had been duly notified of horrors on particular pages. These he had requested the young teacher to mark for his convenience. Wisely, the teacher sent the book unmarked, with the recommendation that a book should be read in its entirety if one is to judge passages fairly and in context.

And what could a good farm family find objectionable about Peck's glowing account of a Shaker boy's attempts to raise piglets and to help his economically (but not spiritually) deprived family? To come to appreciate and finally to mourn the death of a profoundly loving father? We theorized—half in outrage, half in despair—that it must be the realism of the sow's unsuccessful atttempts to mate with a neighbor's boar. Or could it be the frank description of young Robert's desperate attempts to deliver twin calves and save his neighbor's prize cow? In that effort he had sacrificed his homemade trousers to fashion a makeshift rope, then run (sans underwear) through the woods to bear glad tidings home and acquired in the process "prickers in his privates."

We were familiar with the methods advocated by the National Council of Teachers of English for dealing with parental complaints about printed material. We sent the proper NCTE form home, but the parent did not choose to respond. Instead, we soon learned that at a civic gathering of young mothers, one parent had issued the scandalized report that we were teaching a book about The mother actually spelled it out whether out of modesty or inability to pronounce the term, we could not learn. One newcomer to the community left the meeting in disgust; and announcing her intention to read the book, she challenged the offended parents to do likewise, and then to face the teacher in person. But no one came. A conference was initi-at ed by the teacher, but for one reason or another, the parent could not meet him face to face. (Perhaps by now she had read the book.) The fuss subsided; but the damage had been done.

Credibility is important, and in a small town, both appreciation and condemnation can flow quickly. We like the book; students who liked little else loved it, some people feared it. What can be done if challengers will not meet you face to face?

We felt, as many do, that discontent with printed material does not always come directly from the book itself; but rather, that it reflects some other dissatisfaction with the school or the teacher or the system in general. The book becomes only the focal point.
Something to seize upon. Obviously, the only antidote for the situation is something to counteract this narrowing focus of un spoken disaffection. But what? Somehow the school, the teachers', themselves, must re-establish confidence in their service to the community. They must make their good efforts understood.

"Books Our Children Read"

By five o'clock one winter evening, we teachers concluded our railing and lamentation with the observation that it was a pity we didn't have the parents in class instead of the students. We'd make believers of them, if only they'd read and discuss the way their children did.

"We ought to do it."

"We could invite them to come to a community education class and we could teach the books they hate—that they think they hate—and they'd see."

"We'll call it 'Books Our Children Read' and we'll invite everyone to come and discuss whatever they want—right out in the open."

"And they'll love it. They'll love the idea and they'll love the books, every one of them."

So we did. And they did.

We met with the community Education Director (Fort Frye had been chosen one of two pilot schools in the state to try community education projects), and she enthusiastically endorsed our idea. She reminded us that there were no funds available. We hadn't considered this, but we were hardly put off, since everyone was eager to share the workload. We'd begin with each department member's offering to teach one book used in the curriculum; we'd invite parents to request titles. We'd be sure to offer...1 Day No Pigs It'ould Die and other titles we felt might be suspect.

We announced the course in the daily and weekly newspapers, through the school newsletter, and in the community education publications, and we sent typed notes home with each student in the junior and senior high school. "Books Our Children Read," we determined, would be the best course title; they were our children too.

Although not all the "right" people came the first night, we presented our plan and our invitation with every member of the department present. We had a nucleus of people who were representative of a cross section of the community. Some had students in college, some had students in our classes, one was there because she loved to read and had no one to talk to about the books.
Later, cousins and sisters-in-law joined the little group. They read a book each week, and each Tuesday night we met to discuss their reactions and to comment briefly on our reasons for selecting the book. Not once did we lecture on our philosophical platform or pass out sheets of rationale; we offered this material only as we discussed and as they asked for it as they felt. There was often no need to explain or account for what, taken out of context, might have given rise to criticism.

We exhibited briefly lessons on writing, usage, mechanics, vocabulary—the basics—incorporated into the study of each book. We did not convince everyone that everything we did was right or sufficient; we shared our awareness that we have no final answers.

Critics of the elective system saw for the first time how it is possible to integrate the language arts. Every session ended on an optimistic note.

As the weather grew cold, we added coffee and tea and the group stayed past the appointed hour. They began to browse the shelves of the classrooms and to check out other titles, to muse on the possibility of reading a series of plays, or some poetry, or Shakespeare. We showed them our videotapes, our filmstrips, our bulletin boards, samples of writings, and artwork generated by the books. They asked us to give the course again.

The second term it was even more difficult to choose the titles; they wanted to read so much. The small group increased, and we assured those who came that they were welcome to attend one, some, or all of the sessions. Most came regularly, and some even changed work schedules in order to be there.

At their request, on the final night, we showed them the two-volume curriculum guides which our teachers had written (all on their own time without additional pay) for the many elective courses we teach. They toured the book room, a converted classroom filled with files of student work, curriculum materials for teachers to share, and shelves of paperbacks and anthologies an accumulation over the years that gave mute testimony to devoted effort on behalf of the community's children. No article in the newspaper, no picture in our newsletter, no brochure could have better conveyed to those parents our honest commitment than that last night of shared experience with the "Books Our Children Read".

Even while we were the farewell date, we began to plan another term. We'd do "Spoken Rue" (it had been burned in Kansas), "hiroshima moved our students, we'd do it too. Some people had objected to doing the dog in "Our Town" we'd include it in "Man for All Seasons and Paul Zindel's books, along with Chaim Potok's Asher Levy, would offer variety. Black Boy and Laughing Boy, both banned in Long Island—their removal was the subject of lawsuits backed by NCTE—would interest the group. Together with the parents, we filled the blackboard with dozens of titles and then began to narrow the possibilities, partners now in the rush of life—and literature.

Today, we see every book as a bridge and we are optimistic. But we know that even this hard won confidence cannot stop irrationality. No doubt we will face it again and again. Now, however, things are different: if cries for censorship should come, the English department will not be obliged to stand alone; we have friends and parents who also know and love "Books Our Children Read."
16 How to Write a Rationale in Defense of a Book

Diane P. Shugert
Central Connecticut State College

"I know, I know. Everybody says that we ought to write a rationale for every book our students read in common. But saying is one thing, and doing is another. Nobody writes defenses for all those books. Too many other things to do. Thirty behavioral objectives must be sent to the principal by next week. Another conference about Harry’s pyromania for this afternoon—this one involves the psychiatrist and the probation officer as well as Harry’s hysterical parent. Don’t tell me what I must do. I must grade these required weekly themes, and all I want out of you is silence."

Thoughts like those must occur to most of us when presented with yet another exhortation to do something that we really “should,” but if you’ve read this far in Dealing with Censorship, you’ve read Ken Donelson’s article, “Censorship in the 1970s: Some Ways to Handle It When It Comes (and It Will)”; and you know already that one of the most effective ways of dealing with censorship is to have ready, prepared in advance, writtenjustifications, for teaching the books you are teaching. The teachers who have rationales in hand are able to show immediately that they have thought about what they are doing. Evidence of thought alone is sometimes enough to stop a censorship incident before it gets going. In addition, preparing a written rationale really does help us to think more clearly about the books we use and to resist more strongly any attempts to remove the books from the curriculum. It may be worth a little more effort if the effort helps us to keep our jobs and our academic integrity.

So, on the assumption that it’s worth a try, how is it done? For the last three years the members of the Committee on the Profession of the New England Association of Teachers of English and its chairperson (me) have been writing rationales for often challenged books and have been encouraging and assisting others to write them. Four of our rationales (two for Go Ask Alice and two for The Catcher in the Rye) are appended to this article as samples. And they required a lot, not just a little, effort.

Each rationale should include answers to the questions posed by Ken Donelson in his article:

1. For what classes is this book especially appropriate?
2. To what particular objectives, literary or psychological or pedagogical, does this book lend itself?
3. In what ways will the book be used to meet those objectives?
4. What problems of style, tone, or theme or possible grounds for censorship exist in the book?
5. How does the teacher plan to meet those problems?
6. Assuming that the objectives are met, how would students be different because of their reading of this book?

As part of the answer for each question, specific activities, methods, projects, and discussion questions should be delineated. If one prepares the rationale at the time that one plans the teaching of the book, most of the rationale is simply drawn from unit and lesson plans.

Two more questions should be answered, as well:

7. What are some other appropriate books an individual student might read in place of this book?
8. What reputable sources have recommended this book? What have critics said of it? (This answer should cite reviews, if any are available.)

The difficulties in writing rationales have to do with audience and tone. There I am, seated unwillingly at my desk, ready to write. I wouldn't be doing this if it weren't for someone "out there" whom I expect to criticize my choices, my methods, my professional competence. In addition, I may hold a most unflattering stereotype of the censor as a person of little learning and no sense, a person whose wishes and views deserve no respect. I may not have the slightest desire to justify anything to such a person. Indeed, I would probably prefer to "make him an offer he cannot refuse." It's not hard to write a short paper answering those eight questions, the problem is to do so without technical jargon, without revealing my discomfort at having to do so, and without communicating a tone of contempt for my audience.

How are those difficulties overcome? First, by acknowledging them and second by ridding myself of the attitudes that create them. Parents and citizens are rightly concerned that their children and the society's children be properly educated. Far worse than parents who object to a book are the parents who don't care about their child. I am a professional who can claim to be expert in matters of children's reading. As a professional, I defend my choices and support my actions as a matter of course. As a servant of the Republic I have an obligation to its citizens. Keeping ideas like these uppermost helps immeasurably in catching the proper tone for the intended audience. Third, I can overcome the difficulties by writing the rationale rather hurriedly, getting the essential answers down on paper. When I am done, I ask a friend—perhaps another teacher but even better—someone who is not a teacher—to read what I have written and to respond to its tone. I then revise, using my friend's response as a guide.

There are several ways to make the writing of many rationales more manageable. For sets of books that the department has approved or that several teachers use, the members of the department can share the work. Each member writes a rationale for one set. Others who will be using the books serve as editors and critics of the rationales. When an individual teacher assigns the book, he or she fills out a form which completes the rationale for that particular class as part of that particular unit. Department rationales are kept on file in multiple copies. The teacher takes a copy, adds the completed form, and keeps it handy during the time the book is being used. When the class has finished, both rationales are returned to department files as a record of what was done and as an aid to others. (Samples of completion forms for the department and for the individual teacher appear at the end of this article.)

Even easier (though less effective) is for department members to write one departmental rationale for each commonly used book. The department and the school administration make a policy that for all books recommended by the department the departmental rationale is enough. Any teacher who uses the book in any class has a priori approval for doing so.

Another way to share the work is to assign department members particular tasks. Several might be assigned to looking up, summarizing, and citing the pertinent book reviews. Others might cull various lists of recommended books from the National Council of Teachers of English lists, from lists in the English Journal and Language Arts and from the American Library Association. Still others might take on the job of finding alternate books on the same theme or using the same techniques as the recommended books. Though each department member might write his or her own rationales, much of the research would already have been done.
Finally, the department might ditto the eight questions onto two pages with plenty of space after each question. Groups of teachers (either small groups or the whole department; either during department meetings or in special group meetings) then brainstorm possible answers to each question and record those on the form. Any teacher writing a rationale uses the result to provide some of the content of his or her individual rationale. A department could do one book each meeting or could divide into groups of at least three people (more would be better), thereby preparing several each meeting.

A good book rationale:

1. Is well thought out and thoroughly understood by the teacher who will be using the book
2. Answers all the questions posed earlier in this article and answers them thoroughly
3. Avoids specialized technical jargon, either literary or educational
4. Is specific
5. Maintains a tone of respect for its audience

Once the department and/or the teacher has written the necessary rationales, the defenses for particular books can be strengthened immeasurably by involving students in the process. What better way to get authoritative comments than by asking students to respond to the first six questions? The questions must be adapted, of course, by adding the negative, (e.g., For what classes is this book especially appropriate/inappropriate?); by eliminating technical terms, (e.g., for question 2, What can be learned from reading and studying this book?); or by using the conditional (e.g., for question 3, What things could be done in class to help people learn those things?). Having students respond to the questions is also one technique for meeting the book's problems (see question 5). Students' responses can be placed on file with the teacher's and the department's rationales. For once, something that students write will have a real audience and a real purpose.

There are also some shortcuts to rationales. I call them short cuts because they're not much good. In fact, their only virtue is that they're better than nothing at all. One shortcut is to obtain some rationales that have appeared in print and to use a compilation form for them. Another shortcut is simply to respond to the eight questions with brainstormed phrases, specific ideas, sentences, type that up neatly for each book. Leave the connections, transitions, and decisions for the day after the censor comes. On the theory that only a few books will ever be challenged, leave the hardest work for those few.

Those two shortcuts fail on several counts to meet the test for good rationales. Especially they fail because they do not produce anything that is well thought out and thoroughly understood by the teacher who might someday need them.

Let us, as a last word, imagine the worst possible situation: Nobody has written rationales for anything. There is nothing on record to show that the teacher or department has done its professional preparation. One teacher is approached by a parent—"I want this book out of this class! Why is it here, anyway? It's disgusting, obscene, filthy, uneducated, and un-American!" When this happens, realize that the teacher's problem is the department's and the school's. Rather than leaving that teacher alone to survive or fall—and perhaps to take along the entire curriculum, everyone else's academic freedom, and the students' right to read—let the department spring to the teacher's aid. Let everyone cooperate in preparing the rationale. Even if the emergency tactic doesn't work, the loss of the book and the effort made to save it may serve to tie together the department members and to begin a process that will work next time.

Example Rationales

The following materials were prepared for the New England Association of Teachers of English, Committee on the Profession. The Committee publishes a set of rationales for the books most often challenged as revealed by Kenneth Donelson's survey in Arizona English Bulletin 17 (February 1975): 4. The set of approximately twelve rationales may be purchased at cost from Diane P. Shugert, Chair, English Department, Central Connecticut State College, New Britain, Conn. 06050.

Rationale for Teaching Go Ask Alice

When a friend, who has teenage children, recently said, "I don't see why a book like Go Ask Alice is included on my son's reading list for English," my immediate response was, "Why not?"

"Because the subject of drugs is so well—well, ah—sordid! I don't think kids should have to read about that when there's so many other good books to read," emphasizing "good."

Mumbling something about allowing kids to be exposed to all kinds of literature, I beat a hasty retreat to the bookstore and bought the book. After re-reading it, I'm convinced that Go Ask Alice is a good book that should be taught.

It is especially suitable to teach to seventh and eighth graders, even though many may have read it before. By discussing the problems that Alice has, kids this age can begin looking at themselves and understanding their own conflicting ideas and emotions.

Telling her story in diary form, Alice chronicles a little over a year in her life as a fifteen-year-old drug user and her desperate efforts to go "straight." Using her diary as the close confidant she apparently lacks, she confides her feelings of inferiority and insecurity. Her life takes a twist when her father accepts a new position in another state and the family moves. After what seems an eternity to Alice, she finally makes a friend, only to be plunged into despair when the friend goes to camp for the summer. Returning to her former town to visit her grandparents, Alice is asked to a party by a group that she had always considered THE crowd. Thrilled, she goes to the party and has her first drug trip. Continued parties, drug use and sex make her ashamed, fearful that she might be pregnant and scared of the whole scene. She returns home to another year at the new high school. When she is offered friendship, she accepts gratefully and, because they are "dopers," she begins her descent into the sordid depths of drug dependency.

Describing euphoric heights when she begins using drugs, Alice's entries quickly turn to despair and desperation, and express the guilt feelings about what she is doing to herself and her family. As her dependency increases, the changes in Alice's personality are evident in that her language becomes more and more vulgar and crude. Her life hits bottom when she is forced to become a prostitute in order to support her habit.

The descriptions of the drug scenes are accurately drawn and this is, no doubt, why kids like the book. However, it is this aspect of the book that parents must object to! I can't really believe that parents are so naive that they think that their children don't know what a prostitute is. And if they think their kids are learning new words by reading Go Ask Alice, ask them to monitor the language and listen to their kids' conversation! Unfortunately, drugs have become a part of today's culture, and if we want our kids to withstand the pressure to use them, we must provide them with the facts, pros and cons, so that they can make intelligent choices. As parents and teachers, we can't shield them from some of the unpleasant realities of life, and drugs are part of that reality.

Alice finds herself in drugs because of peer pressure, and it is these pressures that I feel must be addressed in discussion on drugs.

Peer pressure is a common problem to young teens. It is hard to know the right clothes to "go together," and to have lots of kids are too
How to Write a Rationale

Searching for a group to belong to, Alice gratefully accepts the first offer, even though they turn out to be "dopers." Threats, taunts and lies are used against Alice by her "doper" friends when she tries to go "straight." Meanwhile, the straight kids will have nothing to do with her.

Discussing what peer pressure is, what other types of such pressure exist, how do they handle it, and how do they feel about the ways that Alice handled it are topics for class discussions. Learning to accept one another as a person is very hard to learn, but kids can certainly begin.

Thirteen- and fourteen-year-olds experience terrible feelings of loneliness. Changing high schools can be devastating. The cliques are formed and seem to wear "No Admittance" signs. The "new girl" is ignored by everyone, except those who are willing to share their misery. Once you've been tagged as a member of one group, it's nearly impossible to erase that label. This is the situation that Alice found herself in. Trying to discover why kids ignore the "new kid" and asking them why it's so hard to move from group to group will help them become less fearful of new things and situations and, hopefully, set them thinking about friendship and reaching outside of themselves. At least they will learn that their feelings of loneliness are shared by others.

Real love is shown in this book. Alice writes about her obvious enjoyment of family gatherings, and although she sometimes resents her younger brother and sister (typical), she also appreciates their support when she's struggling to stay off drugs. She remembers her grandfather's loving admonition, after she has run away from home, the first time, "You have only yourself to forgive," and she takes great pride in learning how to make rolls with her grandmother. However, even with their obvious love, sympathy and support, Alice still finds herself unable to communicate her doubts and fears with them. If she had, then she may have had someone to confide in and would have been receiving some feedback to her questions, instead of having to confide her fears to an inanimate diary. Probably most of the kids in school feel this same way about confiding in their parents, and with good reason. However, learning to trust others is an important facet of maturation, and kids should be helped in learning how to do it.

One of the most poignant parts of the book concerns Alice's love for her grandparents, both of whom die during the story. She is haunted by dreams of their lying in the ground and being consumed by maggots and worms. She has many guilt feelings about her role in contributing to their deaths, yet she doesn't confide them to anyone.

Love and acceptance are also shown by her friendship with Joel, a hard working, straight, good kid. He and Alice really like each other and his friendship remains secure even after learning of her drug history. However, it doesn't seem to help her ultimately.

As she nears the end of her diary, Alice reveals her decision not to begin another one. With the help and support of Joel and her "super straight" friends, and her newly acquired inner strength, Alice faces another year in school, confident that at last she has licked the drug problem. Oh! how glad the reader is.

Three weeks later, her parents come home and find Alice dead, one of the thousands of drug deaths each year.

Perhaps the moral, if there is one, is that each person must develop his own inner strength. You can't depend on others to give it to you. In order to develop this inner strength, our kids must be exposed to life, its good and its bad. Literature is one of the many ways that this can be done, and Go Ask Alice is one of the many books that can help kids develop the needed resources to survive.

Rationale for Teaching Go Ask Alice

Go Ask Alice is either a highly edited or completely ghost written diary of a fourteen- to sixteen-year-old girl. Alice is unknowingly turned on to LSD at a party and from there experiments with all kinds of drugs, slowly becoming a pusher to support her habit. She becomes one of the doper's at school and runs away from her parents to start a boutique in San Francisco with Chris, a girl friend. She lives through the full range of sexual experiences, from homosexuality to being used for sadistic sexual purposes. Alice finally decides to go home, since she misses and loves her parents very much. She seesaws throughout the book from "reforming" to conforming. She wants to feel needed by her family (drug-free happiness) and she also wants to feel needed by her doper peers (drug high happiness). She runs away again, then returns, and again is unknowingly turned on to acid. This time she has a very bad trip and ends up scarred and battered in an insane asylum. When she finally returns home, she dies of a probable overdose at sixteen years old.

Self-control is the novel's overriding theme. An important problem for Alice was that she felt she couldn't control her reactions. Alice was aware enough to know what she was doing and to write about her own deterioration, but, she couldn't change what she did. Thus the book provides opportunities to discuss teenagers' needs for self-control.

Critics may object to Alice's conformity in the use of drugs and the practice of sex. But Go Ask Alice teaches adolescents about drugs and sex by showing them how negatively these experiences can turn out. The novel emphasizes Alice's continuous insecurity which leads her to want to conform and to want to banish all thoughts of insecurity from her mind through the use of drugs. Each drug experience, no matter how thrilling, is followed by a negative experience, such as having to sell drugs to nine year olds, or picturing the worms and maggots eating away at her dead grandfather, or being used for sadistic sexual purposes by her friend's employer. The emphasis is on how Alice is drawn into the habitual drug scene and on her lack of self-control that both causes involvement in and is fostered by drug use. Teenagers can see, then, that if Alice's first drug experience had not been positive, and if she were not so insecure, Alice would not have become drug prone.

Although sexual experiences are mentioned, they are never explicitly described in Alice's diary. She mentions a baby prostitute and comments on how lonely and turned out this girl was. When sex is mentioned, drugs have spoiled it. Though Alice enjoyed some of her sexual experiences, she bemoans the fact that all of them were under the influence of drugs. She wonders what a "real" sexual experience would be like, but she fears and avoids it.

Alice often writes about needing to talk to a responsible and friendly person who could help her analyze her feelings. Adolescent readers would find this desire all too familiar and real. The entries in the diary concerning drugs and sex provide a basis for the junior or senior high school teacher to lead discussions on the adolescent reader's own stand on drugs and his or her own values concerning sex.
Adult critics may object to Alice's negative comments about her parents: "Mother is always nagging at me," Unfortunately, this is the adolescent's reality: finding fault with his or her parents. Alice counters these negative days with overwhelmingly positive days where she writes about how lovely and wonderful her family is and about how much she loves them. Wanting to please her family and to be loved and accepted by them wins out over wanting to conform to the drug scene when Alice decides both times to return to her family and to give up drugs. Class discussion of adolescents' relationships with parents might focus on the difference between Alice's good days and bad days. Hence, although she does make some negative comments about her parents, her attitude is mostly positive.

Another set of classroom activities, might probe into the themes of drugs and sex and parents as they are written about in The Poetry of Rock by Richard Goldstein. Poems such as "White Rabbit" by Grace Slick deal with drugs and may stimulate values discussions. Another teaching idea is splitting the class into two groups to debate whether the diary is phony or real by finding clues in the novel. A discussion of how Alice's language changes throughout the book and according to whether she is on or off drugs might profitably follow the debate.

How will adolescents be different from reading Go Ask Alice? Adolescent readers will identify with the moral structure of the novel in reading about Alice's need for friendship and responsible role models. That need is countered by her desire to run away from parental guidance and from threatening school situations. Those readers previously enticed or tempted into drugs or those merely considering drugs will perhaps reconsider having read about Alice's negative experiences and about her death at the end of the novel.

Rationale for Teaching The Catcher in the Rye

Where will all the children go when Holden Caulfield can no longer catch them in the rye? Unfortunately, they will tumble heedlessly over the cliff into the adult world because they may have been denied the opportunity to meet Holden and to consider how he responded to those same questions which concern them—fear, loneliness, and disillusionment with the adult world. The Catcher in the Rye, although acclaimed by critics all over the world, has been criticized for vulgar and obscene language.

It is important to examine the language as a whole rather than to isolate specifically strong or offensive words. Holden's speech represents an accurate reproduction of teenage vocabulary in the 1950s. The use of expletives is typical of casual school-boy vernacular. This kind of speech appears frequently in the first third of the book, which is set in an Ivy League prep school. Any record of youthful male conversations spoken in an informal dormitory situation absolutely demands this type of language. No one can seriously contend that adolescent boys do not talk this way among themselves; indeed, the vocabulary of the 1950s seems rather tame in comparison to that prevalent in 1976. Modern adolescents will find Salinger's dictum neither unfamiliar nor shocking.

Like the vernacular of all sixteen year olds, Holden's vocabulary is filled with wild exaggerations ("One of those little English jobs that do around 200 miles an hour"), vague generalizations ("All I ever meet is witty bastards.")
“It was a terrible school”) and endless repetitions. The phrases, “and all,” “and everything” are contained in almost every statement Holden makes. “Phony” is his only word for expressing his strong anger at the cruelty and hypocrisy he detects all around him. The few things that do meet with his approval are inevitably described with the single adjective, “nice.” Both “phony” and “nice” are empty words, indicative of Holden’s inability to express his deep feelings and strong opinions. In a concentrated effort to counteract “phoniness,” Holden constantly affirms his own honesty by repeating, “It really was,” and “I really did,” The frequent use of stronger, but equally empty expressions such as “damn,” “goddamn,” “Christ,” and “For Christ’s sake,” is consistent with this pattern of meaningless repetition. The vague generalizations, the empty words, and the endless repetition establishes Holden not only as a typical adolescent, but also as a character who is unable to communicate with those around him.

The selective use of certain strong expressions is absolutely essential to the novel’s structure. In addition to the setting, certain situations and characters require vivid descriptions and reactions. Holden’s unsuccessful encounter with a sleazy prostitute and her repulsive pimp is a notable example. Only strong words can convey Holden’s fear and Maurice’s brutality in this scene. In like manner, offensive language is used to describe offensive characters, from Ackley and Stradlater to Maurice and “all those phony bastards who call the Lunts angels.” Since the novel is basically constructed as an interior monologue, a great number of the most vivid passages occur when Holden is simply talking to himself. There is no listener to be offended by his words. This is a key point, because in this novel there is no responsible human being to whom Holden can turn. There is no one to whom he can express his doubts and insecurities, a situation all too familiar to young adults.

The Catcher in the Rye is a chronicle of a young boy’s search for someone to talk to as he struggles desperately to discover honest values in a dishonest world, Holden is in the midst of a physical and emotional breakdown, and he is crying out for help. “All I ever meet is handsome bastards—when they’re done combing their goddamn hair, they beat it on you.” At the outset, Holden is alone on a hill, having failed to make friends at Pencey or at any previous school he has attended. His immediate roommates, Ackley and Stradlater, are too selfish and superficial to perceive their fellow student’s disturbing emotional condition. Of course, like many young people, Holden feels that he cannot communicate with his parents. His is a young idealist’s outrage at the corruption of the adult world. And Holden cannot talk to girls at all; witness his colossal failure with Sally in New York. He is so desperate for a listener that he turns to the prostitute for conversation instead of sex. Finally, none of the adults whom Holden meets proves helpful at all. The only people to whom he can express himself are his dead brother Allie and his nine-year-old sister Phoebe. He fails to communicate with the others partially because he cannot express his deepest feelings in words. Thus the vagueness, the empty phrases, and the meaningless repetitions also convey this character’s inability to communicate with those around him.

It must be remembered that Holden’s language provides valuable insights into his character—sensitive, idealistic, angry, fearful, and friendless. His is a type of character whom adolescents can readily identify with. Language is a tool which an author uses to build his characters. Salinger’s purpose here is not to shock or offend the reader; his aim is rather to further the development of character, situation, and setting and thus establish important themes for his reader to consider. Where strong language isn't needed, it isn't used. Holden never uses controversial words when speaking with teachers, women, girls, or children. His unbelievably high moral standards would never permit such behavior. Because of this, he even tries to protect innocent children from the corruption of the adult world by erasing a really offensive phrase from the walls of Phoebe's school. Because he knows what's ahead, Holden has cast himself in the rather heroic role of saving children from the adult world's decay, of becoming the catcher in the rye. Unfortunately, this is an impossible goal, and it is this realization that marks Holden's passage into the adult world. He finally understands that he cannot erase all the world's words anymore than he can prevent Phoebe from reaching out for the golden ring.

When a class studies The Catcher in the Rye, teacher and students together could discuss the nature of Holden's language and how it fails to express what Holden so desperately tries to say. By reading and talking about Holden's inability to communicate with adults and his hatred of and isolation from his society, students may learn to better understand themselves, to talk with adults in their (and our) world, and to solve their problems as Holden could not. They might also study how all of us reveal ourselves through our language and yet how difficult it is for us to share ourselves with others or to hear what others wish to share. Holden's language might be compared with Alice's (Go Ask Alice), with Geneva (A Separate Peace), with Huck Finn's or with that of any of the narrators in My Darling, My Hamburger.

Rationale for Teaching The Catcher in the Rye

Like Melville's Ishmael, Salinger's non-heroic hero of The Catcher in the Rye has embarked on a journey — not a three-year searching voyage but a sometimes tortuous, sometimes funny two-day excursion to New York which seems to last a year. (The journey of the soul will not be measured by time.) Like Ishmael, Holden Caulfield seeks truth and uncovers uncertainties. (Where do the ducks in Central Park go in the winter?) Like Ahab, the more ignominious hero of Moby Dick, Holden desires to strike beyond the "pasteboard mask." (For Holden, that mask is the pretentious veneer of social standard.) Like Ahab, Holden labors under the burden of his own misconceptions about reality and his inability to confront it.

The outstanding difference, however, is that Holden is as contemporary as he is classic. He follows in the best of the American tradition. His self-scrutiny is as intense as that of any Puritan. His initiation into the world of experience and his search for meaning and identity are not unlike those of Mark Twain's Huck or Stephen Crane's Henry Fleming. Yet, the young hero of The Catcher in the Rye unfolds his story in a subjective first person narrative which relates not only the individual traumas of Holden Caulfield but also the dilemma of modern adolescence coming to grips with itself and its world. It is not an easy dilemma for the adolescent to face, nor is it one that the academic environment ordinarily explores. Because Holden is so much like other American literary heroes, The Catcher in the Rye offers an excellent framework for exploring and possibly bridging the gap between the non-academic world of adolescent experience and the academic world of literary experience.

For the traditional curriculum, Catcher offers the study of recurring themes in American literature: the changing concept of the hero in twentieth-century fiction; American culture, its influence and reflection in literature; style, tone, and characterization in the interior monologue: the advantages and limitations of the first person point of view; and other literary concerns. Its greatest contribution, however, lies in the realm most difficult to teach: that of emotion and value. Here, too, is where Catcher's language and occasionally its subject matter raise questions and blood-pressure.

Attackers of The Catcher in the Rye focus primarily on the language, proclaiming it to be "profane," "obscene," and "unfit for human ears." These charges might be answered directly with a question: Would the reader accept a sixteen-year-old Holden Caulfield who talked like Old Spencer? Even though adults might like to think so, sixteen-year-olds just don't talk that way. The good adolescent reader recognizes a phony when he hears one. Holden Caulfield's language is typical of adolescents and, therefore, is necessary if Holden is to seem realistic. Furthermore, Holden's language is concerned with more than four-letter words.

Holden's manipulation of language is one area that might be explored by students. Holden may be unsuccessful at articulating his innermost feelings, but he is master of language manipulation. Conforming to the language of polite society, for example, Holden engages in inoffensive platitudes when conversing with Mrs. Morrow. He tells her what she would like to hear in the manner in which she would like to hear it. (Ironically, Holden is most phony here where his language is most polite.) Studying such situations can yield valuable insights into the conscious and unconscious manipulation of language. Role playing exercises designed to exhibit cases of language manipulation in the students' own lives would work well here.

Another possibility for language study involves Holden's inability to articulate feelings and to communicate with others. Repetition of words and phrases, like "if you know what I mean" and "and all," indicate Holden's failure to formulate strong opinions and to state his thoughts clearly and specifically. Excerpts with these vague phrases may be isolated by the teacher and scrutinized by the students in groups. Questions like the following should alert students to the need for specific language in communication: What is Holden saying? Do you understand what he is saying through his effective choice of words? Does he understand what he is saying by reading between the lines or from your knowledge of the character? Can you rewrite the excerpt to illustrate accurately what you think Holden means to say? Why do you think Holden is unable to communicate? General class discussion and group conclusions might follow with some broadening to include communication gaps in students' and teacher's everyday lives.

Second to language in the dispute over teaching The Catcher in the Rye is adolescent sex as subject matter. Sex in The Catcher in the Rye is basic to the theme of growing up and the initiation into experience. To many adolescents sex is often the rite of passage into adulthood, as superficial as the physical act alone might be. Holden, however, finds sex for sex's sake repulsive. His obsession with sex and his thoughts about whether Stradlater took advantage of Jane Gallagher in the back seat of Ed Banks's car reflect Holden's consistent abhorrence for the superficial. One might even argue that Holden's view of sex in relation to Stradlater and Jane is in keeping with his self-image of protector of the innocent and, in fact, downright moralistic. Holden is outraged, for instance, that Stradlater could have possibly had sex with Jane without knowing that she “kept all her kings in the back row.” His own relationship with Jane had been platonic but intimate (“You don’t always have to get too sexy to get to know a girl.”)

Holden tells the reader that he is “a pretty sexy guy.” Yet, he continues to say he despises himself when he has spent the whole evening necking with some phony girl. Furthermore, he tells the reader that he always “stops” when the girl asks him to. Holden is not unlike many youths who find physical desire at war with a sense of right or propriety.

This conflict in Holden is most evident in the prostitute scene. Holden is feeling “pretty sexy” before Sunny arrives, but her banal entrance and businesslike manner turn him off completely. It is plain that Holden is not seeking physical gratification. His attempt to strike up a conversation with Sunny mirrors his need to know her as a person and to fulfill his own loneliness in more than a physical manner.

The subject of sex is therefore basic in showing vital aspects of Holden’s character and in delineating the dilemma of growing up to understand oneself and one’s world. Salingr never exploits the subject of sex but rather depicts what is oftentimes an excruciating trial of adolescence with both humor and pathos.

In the final analysis, Catcher’s strength as a teaching tool lies in its fulfillment of traditional literary objectives as well as its sensitive treatment of one adolescent’s journey from innocence to experience. If the student is able to generalize Holden’s plights and relate them to his own then he has not stumbled through Holden’s course in vain.

The Iowa Model Policy and Rules for Selection of Instructional Materials

boob that the press had made him out to be. I found him to be a very sincere parent, concerned primarily that his children receive the best Christian upbringing possible. I also found him to be very frustrated with the entire system of review. The focal point of his frustration was the local reconsideration committee which initially reviewed his petition and made a recommendation to the Board to retain the books. He felt that, from the very beginning, the committee was stacked against him and other concerned parents in the district and that there was no chance to obtain a fair hearing.

The Reverend Sec's appeal and frustration, the problems in West Virginia, and my experience as classroom teacher whose principal boxed up books and locked them in his office at the first sign of complaint in the community seemed to come together all at once and direct a course of action. One of my pet projects was, and is, the development of a series of model school board policies and rules, and the censorship issue certainly was an area in which school boards needed direction.

Development of such a model involves a relatively complex procedure. I normally take responsibility for drafting an initial proposal and then present it to a committee of my peers, whose judgment I respect and who exhibit an interest in the topic. After many hours of discussion and a minimum of three complete rewrites, a draft is sent to about a dozen lawyers and educators who represent a broad spectrum of educational and legal philosophy. Their valued opinions are solicited and strongly considered by the drafting committee in compiling a final draft. The final draft is reviewed by the state superintendent and his chief advisors and then is prepared for publication and distribution. The acceptance or rejection of any or all provisions in a model is left up to each district.

My first task in developing a model school policy for dealing with censorship was to determine what the Department had done previously in regard to the issue. For over ten years, the Department had actively advocated the establishment of educational material selection policies and rules by schools to aid in achieving appropriate assignment of selection responsibility and quality selection, and to guard against unwarranted censorship of materials. As an aid in this endeavor, Department staff distributed various materials prepared and published by other professional groups. The establishment of a committee to draft a model policy and rules was completely in line with the Department's previous position. The drafting committee consisted of myself; Betty Jo Bucking-
Larry Bartlett

The philosophy of our endeavor was established early. Our goal was to develop a model policy and rules which emphasized the ongoing nature of selection, the assignment of responsibility for selection, and continued evaluation by school staff members; and which provided for appropriate consideration and review of community concerns.

The result of our work was published as "Selection of Instructional Materials: A Model Policy and Rules" (Iowa Department of Public Instruction, 1975). The first point the model attempted to make was the important delineation between "policy" and "rules." Policy is a general statement of direction given by the governing board of a school to all concerned; and rules are the procedure developed by the school administration by which the policy is to be carried out. Rules detail the application of policy to specific circumstances. The two should not be confused nor intertwined.

The model policy statement is as follows:

Model Statement of Policy

The Board of Directors of the School District hereby declares it the policy of the District to provide a wide range of instructional materials on all levels of difficulty, with diversity of appeal, and the presentation of different points of view and to allow review of allegedly inappropriate instructional materials.

After establishing the responsibility for the selection of materials in the professional staff, the rules attempt to spell out criteria for the selection of materials. By implication, those criteria would also be the standards by which challenged materials are to be judged. Here follows selected criteria:

II. Criteria for Selection of Materials

A. The following criteria will be used as they apply:

1. Materials shall support and be consistent with the general educational goals of the district and the objectives of specific courses.

2. Materials shall be appropriate for the subject area and for the age, emotional development, ability level, and social development of the students for whom the materials are selected.

3. Materials shall be chosen to foster respect for minority groups, women, and ethnic groups and shall realistically represent our pluralistic society, along with the roles and life styles open to both men and women in today's world. Materials shall be designed to help students gain an awareness and understanding of the many important contributions made to our civilization by minority groups, ethnic groups, and women.

Materials shall clarify the multiplicity of historical and contemporary forces with their economic, political, and religious dimensions which have operated to the disadvantage or advantage of women, minority groups, and ethnic groups. These materials shall present and analyze intergroup tension and conflict objectively, placing emphasis upon resolving social and economic problems.

Materials shall be designed to motivate students and staff to examine their own attitudes and behaviors and to comprehend their own duties, responsibilities, rights, and privileges as participating citizens in a pluralistic, non-sexist society.

8. Biased or slanted materials may be provided to meet specific curriculum objectives.

B. The selection of materials on controversial issues will be directed toward maintaining a balanced collection representing various views.

The word "appropriate" in paragraph three may be the single most important word in the model. On review, challenged materials may be appropriate for one age level and not for another. The result under this model would be restricted use which would allow an age group for which it is appropriate to have access, but would preclude other age levels from similar access.

Paragraph six reflects the established policy of the Iowa Department of Public Instruction that schools make an affirmative effort to obtain materials which will reflect our pluralistic society. Paragraph eight recognizes the danger in too broad an exclusionary policy against discriminatory materials. There are valid reasons for using potentially offensive materials. An in-depth study of the racial problem in this country, for instance, would be incomplete without some of the pro-slavery literature and speeches of pre-Civil War America.

The selective weeding out of materials which are no longer appropriate for meeting the desired goals is an element often implicit in school rules of this nature. The panel working on the model felt that it was important to expressly authorize the process:

III. A. 4. Selection is an ongoing process which should include the removal of materials no longer appropriate and the replacement of lost and worn materials still of educational value.

In light of a recent court decision, which will be discussed later, an express authorization for regular "weeding" may be more significant than the panel originally recognized. Removal of materials judged inappropriate on a regular basis as part of an established weeding process is not as likely to draw attention or criticism as the sudden removal of materials which have achieved notoriety or which have become controversial.

The drafting committee had its most difficult time in approaching the problem of procedures involved in handling challenges to instructional materials, and that is where the majority of non-traditional features are found. All of the models the committee previously reviewed differed from each other in only a few minor respects. The committee was at first split between those who wanted to follow the earlier models and those who were concerned that the earlier models did not appear to be working smoothly. The committee struggled for several months and made little progress. Then in July, 1975, another panel member and I attended a workshop on censorship presented by Robert Foley, director of staff and curriculum for the Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Community School District. We were exposed to a philosophy and approach to censorship completely foreign to those we had been reviewing.

In the early 1970s, the Cedar Rapids schools had put a policy into practice that was a distinct departure from the others we had seen, and it had appeared to work well. Fully recognizing the uniqueness of Foley's views, we were at first skeptical, but by the end of the workshop, he had sold us, and nearly everyone else in attendance, on the non-traditional approach. Most of the persons present were ready to go back to their schools and try to develop a policy built around the Cedar Rapids approach; however, most were reluctant to tread unfamiliar waters. When they learned that some of us at the Department were working on a model policy and rules which would be widely distributed throughout the state, they encouraged us to utilize the Cedar Rapids approach.

The two of us came back to the committee resolved to do just that, but we were not sure that we would be able to persuade the other two committee members. As it turned out, the others readily accepted the concept and we set about to adapt the Cedar Rapids philosophy and bits and pieces of other models to some of our own ideas and blend them into a model that would utilize the best of each.

Here follows the section of the model, including committee comments, which deals with challenges to materials:
IV. Objection

A. Any resident of the school district may raise objection to instructional materials used in the district's educational program despite the fact that the individuals selecting such material were duly qualified to make the selection and followed the proper procedure and observed the criteria for selecting such material.

1. The school official or staff member receiving a complaint regarding instructional materials shall try to resolve the issue informally. The materials shall remain in use unless removed through the procedure in Section IV. B. 6. c. of this rule.
   a. The school official or staff member initially receiving a complaint shall explain to the complainant the school's selection procedure, criteria, and qualifications of those persons selecting the material.
   b. The school official or staff member initially receiving a complaint shall explain to the best of his or her ability the particular place the objected to material occupies in the educational program, its intended educational usefulness, and additional information regarding its use, or refer the complaining party to someone who can identify and explain the use of the material.

(Comment: The vast majority of complaints can be amicably disposed-of in the first stages when the school officials and staff are frequently reminded of the school's procedures. A quick personal conference can often-times solve the problem where a shift into a more formal procedure might inflate the problem. While the legal right to object to materials is not expressly stated, it is implied in such provisions as the right to petition the government for redress of grievances.)

2. In the event that the person making an objection to material is not satisfied with the initial explanation, the person raising the question should be referred to someone designated by the principal or person in charge of the attendance center to handle such complaints or to the media specialist for that attendance center. If, after private counseling, the complainant desires to file a formal complaint, the person to whom the complainant has been referred will assist in filling out a Reconsideration Request Form in full.

3. The individual receiving the initial complaint shall advise the principal or person in charge of the attendance center where the challenged material is being used, of the initial contact no later than the end of the following school day, whether or not the complainant has apparently been satisfied by the initial contact. A written record of the contact shall be maintained by the principal or other person in charge of the attendance center.

4. The principal or other person in charge of each attendance center shall review the selection and objection rules with the staff at least annually. The staff shall be reminded that the right to object to materials is one granted by policies enacted by the Board of Directors and firmly entrenched in law. They shall also be reminded of ethical and practical considerations in attempting to handle resident complaints with courtesy and integrity.

B. Request for Reconsideration

1. Any resident or employee of the school district may formally challenge instructional materials used in the district's educational program on the basis of appropriateness. This procedure is for the purpose of considering the opinions of those persons in the schools and the community who are not directly involved in the selection process.

2. Each attendance center and the school district's central office will keep on hand and make available Reconsideration Request Forms. All formal objections to instructional materials must be made on this form.

3. The Reconsideration Request Form shall be signed by the complainant and filed with the Superintendent or someone so designated by the Superintendent.

4. Within five business days of the filing of the form, the Superintendent or person so designated by the Superintendent shall file the material in question with the Reconsideration Committee for reevaluation. The Committee shall recommend disposition to the office of the Superintendent.

5. Generally, access to challenged material shall not be restricted during the reconsideration process. However, in unusual circumstances, the material may be removed temporarily by following the provisions of Section IV. B. 6. c. of this rule.

6. The Reconsideration Committee

a. The Reconsideration Committee shall be made up of eleven members.

(1) One teacher designated annually by the Superintendent.

(2) One school media specialist designated annually by the Superintendent.

(3) One member of the central administrative staff designated annually by the Superintendent. (This position will normally be filled by the supervisor or person responsible for the district's media services.)
(4) Five members from the community appointed annually by the Executive Committee of the Parent-Teacher-Student Association.

(5) Three high school students, selected annually from and by the Student Advisory Committee.

Comment: Subsections (4) and (5) represent a departure from the traditional approaches of handling challenging school materials and may well be the key to the success or failure of this model. A committee with a majority of lay members should be viewed by the community as being objective and not automatically supportive of prior professional decisions on selection. Much of the philosophy regarding the Committee structure was borrowed from the policy of the Cedar Rapids Community School District, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Use of the Parent-Teacher-Student Association in this model is merely illustrative. Whether the non-educators are selected from the P.T.S.A. or other groups interested in the community's schools is not important. The important thing is the establishment and maintenance of the Committee's credibility with the community through a majority of nonprofessionals. An appointed committee will generally be more objective than a voluntary committee.

The method of selecting students for the Committee will depend greatly upon the size and organization of the district. A district with several high schools may want one student from each on the Committee while a district with one high school may want one student representative from each grade. Student selection of the representatives to this Committee is very important. Any responsible student group or groups may be used when a Student Advisory Committee does not exist in the district.

b. The chairperson of the Committee shall not be an employee or officer of the District. The secretary shall be an employee or officer of the District.

Comment: It is vital to the operation of this model that a community member chair the Reconsideration Committee. Credibility is the watchword.

c. The Committee shall first meet each year during the third week in September at a time and place designated by the Superintendent and made known to the members of the Committee at least three school days in advance.

d. A calendar of subsequent regular meetings for the year shall be established and a chairperson and a secretary selected at the first meeting.

Comment: While many districts may not feel the need to hold regular, perhaps monthly meetings, it is important to establish a sense of continuity and regularity about the Committee. The notoriety and excitement caused by emergency meetings when challenges arise in a community may be the unnecessary fuel to cause an ordinary healthy situation to become distorted beyond proportion. It is wiser to cancel unnecessary meetings than to call unexpected ones. Lack of frequent challenges to school materials probably means that one or more of the following is present: (1) dissatisfaction with the selection process, (2) lack of community interest, (3) belief in the futility of communication with school district officials, or (4) undue influence on the selection and weeding processes.

e. Special meetings may be called by the Superintendent to consider temporary removal of materials in unusual circumstances. Temporary removal shall require a three-fourths vote of the Committee.

f. The calendar of regular meetings and notice of special meetings shall be made public through appropriate, student publications and other communications methods.

g. The Committee shall receive all Reconsideration Request forms from the Superintendent or person designated by the Superintendent.

h. The procedure for the first meeting following receipt of a Reconsideration Request form is as follows:

1. Distribute copies of written request form.
2. Give complainant or a group spokesperson an opportunity to talk about and explain on the request form.
3. Distribute reputable, professionally-prepared reviews of the material when available.
4. Distribute copies of challenged material as available.

At a subsequent meeting, interested persons, including the complainant, may have the opportunity to share their views. The Committee may request that individuals with special knowledge be present to give information to the committee.

The complainant shall be kept informed by the Secretary concerning the status of his or her complaint throughout the Committee reconsideration process. The complainant and known interested parties shall be given appropriate notice of such meetings.

k. At the second or a subsequent meeting, as desired, the Committee shall make its decision in either open or closed session. The Committee's final decision will be (1) to take no removal action, (2) to remove all or part of the challenged material from the total school environment, or (3) to limit the educational use of the challenged material. The sole criterion for the final decision is the appropriateness of the material for its intended educational use. The vote on the decision shall be by secret ballot. The written decision and its justification shall be forwarded to the Superintendent for appropriate action, the complainant and the appropriate attendance centers.

(Comment: The state open meeting law should be reviewed for its application to this provision.)

1. A decision to sustain a challenge shall not be interpreted as a judgment of irresponsibility on the part of the professionals involved in the original selection or use of the material.

m. Requests to reconsider materials which have previously been before the Committee must receive approval of a majority of the Committee members before the materials will again be reconsidered. Every Reconsideration Request Form shall be acted upon by the Committee.

n. In the event of a severe overload of challenges, the Committee may appoint a subcommittee of members or nonmembers to consolidate challenges and to make recommendations to the full Committee. The composition of this subcommittee shall approximate the representation on the full Committee.

o. Committee members directly associated with the selection, use, or challenge of the challenged material shall be excused from the Committee during the deliberation on such materials. The Superintendent may appoint a temporary replacement for the excused Committee member, but such replacement shall be of the same general qualifications of the person excused.

(Comment: The Committee should never be placed in the position of appearing to defend itself, its members, or the school staff. The Committee must maintain a nonadversarial position.)

p. If the complainant is not satisfied with the decision, he or she may request that the matter be placed on the agenda of the next regularly scheduled meeting of the board.

(Comment: These requests should comply with existing board policies and rules regarding the board agenda.)

While the comments provide the flavor of the philosophy of the model, a few additional points need to be made. Notice that paragraph A allows any resident of the district to raise an objection. By implication, this precludes nonresidents who have no ties to the community from utilizing the objection process. That paragraph also extimates good faith selection of materials by professional staff which may later be considered inappropriate. Hopefully, adversary roles will be lessened under this policy.

situation of professionals opposing parents should not be allowed to develop.

Paragraph A.1 provides that most challenged materials will remain in use until the challenge has been completely processed. This is designed to aid in the elimination of harassment. If materials are removed as soon as an objection is filed, a person merely needs to file an objection to achieve his or her goal of censorship. In one Iowa school district, the absurdity of the absence of such a provision was shown, when in retaliation for the immediate removal of a challenged book, residents opposed to censorship filed challenges to the school's dictionaries and encyclopedias.

The provisions of Section A.4 are very important in that every staff member should have at least a general knowledge of the rules provisions. Time after time, I have seen schools with infrequent challenges to materials start the objector down the wrong path. Most often, the objector is told to come to a board meeting, the opposite end of the procedure from which to start, to make his or her objection.

As the comments within the provisions of paragraphs B.6.a. and b. point out, the key to the success or failure of this model is the maintenance of a committee with a majority of lay members and a lay person as chairperson. Many persons, including the Reverend Sec, have told me that appearances before review committees dominated by educational professionals gives a complainer a feeling of futility. It is very important to establish credibility in the committee through a majority membership of noneducators.

It was intriguing to me that Bob Foley took the position, at his workshop on censorship, that the Cedar Rapids schools welcomed inquiries into the appropriateness of educational materials. He felt that lack of inquiries and objections in some school districts were more likely the result of a lack of community interest or a belief in the futility of communication with school officials than satisfaction with the selection process.

Paragraph B.6.c. provides the mechanism by which materials may be removed from use in a rapid manner. The committee intentionally made this procedure difficult to implement so that librarians and administrators could not arbitrarily remove materials from use after an objection had been made. In order to obtain the three-fourths vote of the committee necessary for immediate removal, the material in question will have to appear inappropriate on its face to a good cross-section in the reconsideration committee.

Paragraph B.6.k. is the only one in the model with which I do not personally feel comfortable. Its language was a result of a compromise in which I did most of the compromising. The paragraph allows the decision to be made in either open or closed session and upon a secret ballot. A closed session for deliberation appears to run counter to the general philosophy of openness and credibility threaded through the rest of the model. While the secret ballot also runs this contrary course, my objections are lessened by a recognition of community pressures which can be applied to reconsideration committee members. The provisions of paragraph B.6.m. are designed to eliminate repetitious reviews which may be the result of harassment.

As the final paragraph implies, the ultimate authority for a final decision on appropriateness of educational materials rests with the local school district board of directors. This was the basis of the ruling of the Iowa State Board of Public Instruction in the Reverend Seck appeal, 1 D.P.I. App. Dec. 82, and federal courts in President's Council v. Community School Board, 457 F.2d 289 (2nd Cir. 1972), and Williams v. Board of Education, 388 F.Supp. 93 (S.D., W. V. 1975). A third federal court ruled the same way in a case arising in Ohio, but was overruled on appeal in Minarcini v. Strongsville City School District, 541 F.2d 577 (6th Cir. 1976).

The Minarcini decision has important implications for the entire country, but especially for Ohio and the other states in the Sixth Circuit. The court in Minarcini found no constitutional problem with the local board of education controlling the curriculum and textbooks under Ohio law; however, removal of certain books from the library was a different matter. The court held that the Strongsville School Board violated the First Amendment to the United States Constitution when it removed books from the library which it found to be objectionable. Some of the language of the opinion found at pages 581 and 582 is instructive:

A library is a storehouse of knowledge. When created for a public school it is an important privilege created by the state for the benefit of the students in the school. That privilege is not subject to being withdrawn by succeeding school boards whose members might desire to "window" the library for books the content of which occasioned their displeasure or disapproval. Of course, a copy of a book may wear out, some books may become obsolete. shelf space alone may at some point require some selection of books to be retained and books to be disposed of. No such rationale is involved in this case, however.

Neither the State of Ohio nor the Strongsville School Board was under any federal constitutional compulsion to provide a library for the Strongsville High School or to choose any particular books. Once having created such a privilege for the benefit of its students, however, neither body could place conditions on the use of the library which were related solely to the social or political tastes of school board members.

The result of the Minarcini decision has been interpreted by some people to strengthen the need for a determination of appropriateness by the local board. This is not the correct interpretation, since the result seems to be almost foreign to most educators. The concept that books, once placed upon a school library shelf, cannot later be removed when found inappropriate flies full face into the concepts of professional judgment and local determination of appropriateness. For this reason, the committee that drafted the model discussed in this article has not seen fit to alter its provisions. Until the Iowa Board of Public Instruction or a court with jurisdiction in Iowa rules to the contrary, we feel that the proper criteria for such final decisions is, and must remain, the appropriateness of the material for its intended educational use, and the most appropriate body to make that determination, with input from the community and educators, is the local board of directors.
For the last five years I have hacked my way through the jungle of censorship and labored in the garden of intellectual freedom. Much of what I have done has been pure drudgery: plowing the stony soil of English teachers' indifference to their own responsibilities and their students' rights to academic freedom. For example, much has been disheartening and frightening. I have had a recurring nightmare in which I slash with my ax at the face of the English department head who once told me, "We have no censorship problems in my school. I simply remove any books I disapprove of from the book room." I have been pricked by the thorn of mysh and strangled with the vine of ignorance. But one part of the garden blooms luxuriantly, "a wonder of summer with apples, pears, and red currants" where "sweet singers suddenly come in the morning." For me, no part of my work with censorship has been more satisfying than finding out about and working with people who cultivate and nurture our freedom to teach, to write, to speak, and to learn.

Nothing gives one greater courage and strength to go on than having contact with others who care about the same things we do, and perhaps the best service we can offer to other English and language arts teachers is that of helping them see that they are not alone. One way of doing that is to make use of the information and people available through organizations that are concerned with First Amendment and academic freedoms.

At the end of this article is a list of such organizations, their national offices, and phone numbers. Rather than listing each one with an annotation I have decided to describe some ways to use the whole list, then to inventory some of the needs that various organizations can meet and name the specific organizations which best satisfy them, and finally to comment more thoroughly on a few of the organizations whose names are not self-explanatory or whose services are unusual or unique.

Using the List

To begin with, you might want to write to them all and ask them to send you their catalogs of publications and position papers concerning censorship and anything else that they will send you for free. Some of these groups publish little about censorship but have taken stands opposing it. Others publish so much that even their membership materials will give useful censorship information. By looking at authors listed in their catalogs and reading titles and annotations one can get a good idea of who is active in censorship matters and what each organization’s special interests are.

Another way to use the list is to refine it. All the addresses are national offices, and unless you happen to live in the organization’s home state, chances are that few people you contact there will be able to visit your school or talk to your legislator. It’s a long way from the executive secretary of a national organization to a citizen in your school district who can help you support The Catcher in the Rye before your school board. You might want, then, to use this list as a starting point, to ask those organizations which have state affiliates to send you the address of your state’s affiliate. Through the state affiliate you can get the names of people who are especially interested in censorship matters. (Another way of locating some state affiliates is to ask your state office of public instruction.)

You will want, too, to refine the list by supplementing it. One address you’ll want to add is that of your state office of public instruction or state board of education. Another whole set of addresses that is missing from the list is that of religious groups. Many religious organizations support intellectual freedom, and many ministers, priests, and rabbis are willing to assist in censorship controversies. In fact, so many are supportive that listing the organizations here is impossible. Some citizens and professional groups are also missing (League of Women Voters, American Orthopsychiatric Association, etc.). A letter to the National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship asking for the names and addresses of organizations which comprise its membership will serve as a beginning for all of these.
In all cases, if you want to reach someone who is local—who is from your state or your town—you will eventually have to reach local organizations.

Inventory of Needs

All the listed organizations provide many services. Under each service I list only a few of the most useful organizations for that purpose and sometimes the subject(s) that each one handles especially well. For local resources and consultants be sure to check with state affiliates also.

Publications. American Civil Liberties Union (teachers' and students' rights), American Library Association (all aspects of freedom to read), Freedom to Read Foundation (significant court cases), National Council of Teachers of English (everything particularly pertinent to the English classroom).

Speakers. Here, the problem is to get people who know something and who speak especially well. LAWYERS: American Bar Association, First Amendment Lawyer's Association. JUDGES: First Amendment Lawyer's Association. Your area may also have an organization of state judges or of federal judges. State supreme court judges' offices are listed, usually, in the phone book under the state government. DOCTORS: National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship for the names of the psychiatric associations that belong to the Committee. WRITERS: P.E.N. Writer's Guild of America, Inc. The publisher of a particular writer whose books are often challenged. PUBLISHERS: Association of American Publishers, National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship, the publisher of a textbook series which has been attacked. LEGISLATORS: local offices of the American Civil Liberties Union, National Education Association, American Federation of Teachers. Those groups keep track of state legislation and legislators' opinions. The chair(s) of the judiciary committee(s) (where most obscenity legislation is studied) of your state legislature. REPRESENTATIVES OF RELIGIONS: National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship, American Civil Liberties Union. TEACHERS OTHER THAN ENGLISH TEACHERS: National Council for the Social Studies, National Science Teachers Association, Speech Communication Association, American Association of School Librarians, Freedom to Read Foundation, American Library A sociation Office of Intellectual Freedom. BUSINESS PERSONS CONNECTED WITH PUBLISHING: (booksellers, theater owners, magazine publishers) Media Coalition, Inc. ENGLISH TEACHERS: National Council of Teachers of English. NCTE also maintains a list of speakers from other professions who have been especially helpful to English teachers.

Legal advice. First Amendment Lawyer's Association. American Civil Liberties Union. Local chapters of the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association.

Crisis help. Freedom to Read Foundation. National Council of Teachers of English. Your state affiliate of NCTE. Local chapters of the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association.

Preparing guidelines for selection of materials and for handling complaints. National Council of Teachers of English and your state NCTE affiliate for how-to-do-it information, for samples, and for consultants. American Library Association. For other points of view on the matter: American Association of School Administrators, National Association of Secondary School Principals, National Association of Elementary School Principals, and the National School Boards Association.

Lobbying: National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship.
Media Coalition. The American Civil Liberties Union. National Education Association. American Federation of Teachers. Through the Freedom to Read Foundation you can learn how to establish or join regional ad hoc lobbying groups. One publication must be mentioned here: Kenneth P. Norwood Lobbying for Freedom (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1975). Excerpts available free as a pamphlet from National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship.

Money. If you become involved in a court case, these organizations might provide financial and/or legal support, and/or they might file amicus curiae briefs which support your interests. Fredom to Read Foundation. American Civil Liberties Union. Asso-National Education Association. The publisher of the work which has been attacked might also file on your behalf.
Concerned with censorship in the schools. They keep active committees going all over the country, participate in most coalitions against censorship, maintain offices and staff, follow legislation and court cases, publish information, try to keep current lists of consultants, and try to help individual teachers who are embroiled in censorship controversies. A call to the executive secretary of the Freedom to Read Foundation almost always gives the caller some information and help. A call to the National Council of Teachers of English or to the chair of the Censorship Committee or president of your NCTE affiliate will also elicit good advice, publications, and a referral to someone who can consult on almost any problem. Nearly all the listed organizations have taken formal positions opposing censorship and favoring intellectual freedom.

The Media Coalition, Inc. and the National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship are loose affiliations of other organizations which have banded together to act more effectively against censorship.

P.E.N. is an international organization whose primary function is to bring pressure to bear on foreign governments to free imprisoned writers and artists and/or to permit them to emigrate.

The American Civil Liberties Union and the First Amendment Lawyer’s Association are interested in all forms of censorship and only incidentally in school censorship. The First Amendment Lawyer’s Association is a very informal, loose affiliation of (as of this writing) 102 attorneys from everywhere in the United States who specialize in First Amendment cases.

Lou Willett Stanek describes the activities of the American Library Association, the National Council of Teachers of English, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Media Coalition, Inc., and the National Ad Hoc Committee Against Censorship in considerable detail in Censorship: A Guide for Teachers, Librarians, and Others Concerned with Intellectual Freedom (free from Dell Publishing Co., Inc., 1 Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, New York, N.Y. 10017).

Unfortunately, we, unlike Darwin’s body of well-instructed men, have to labor for our daily bread. When I first began to work against censorship, I was almost overwhelmed by all the things that needed doing and all the people that I was told I “should” and “must” get to know. The effort is worth it, though, for there is great intrinsic satisfaction in the results. It all bears fruit, as in that talk I had with Jerzy Kosinski about countries where books aren’t banned because no one is allowed to print anything objectionable. And it bore fruit in the anti-obscenity law testimony.
given jointly with a dedicated First Amendment lawyer, with the owner of my favorite movie theater, and with the person who runs the bookstore I most admire. I hope you, too, will join us.
