ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book is the product of the authors' interest in promoting the understanding of collective bargaining as it relates to media/library professionals and the students and teachers they serve. The authors were supported enthusiastically during the development of this manuscript by Dr. Howard B. Hitchens, Executive Director of the Association for Educational Communications and Technology.

The data collected for the book were the result of the excellent support provided by Mr. Donald Walker, Manager of Research Services for the National Education Association. Mr. Walker provided the opportunity for Dr. Rolland G. Billings to examine each of the National Sample contracts in the National Education Association Research Office in Washington, D.C. He also provided valuable insight into the collection of the sample contracts and their importance to professional negotiations.

The authors would also like to acknowledge the assistance of Mr. Thomas White, Labor Relations Consultant for the Oregon School Board Association; Mr. Gary Collins, Labor Relations Consultant for the Grand Blanc School District, Grand Blanc, Michigan; and Mrs. Margaret Hinz for her work in typing and preparing the manuscript for submission to the publisher.

The two final acknowledgments are the most important. First, Mrs. Joyce Billings, who edited the manuscript and without whose aid and support none of this would have been possible. Second, the authors are grateful for the support and assistance of Mrs. Eileen Goldman.
PREFACE

Professional Negotiations for Media/Library Professionals: District and School is designed to promote the individual welfare of media/library professionals, and to improve the quality of media/library programs in K-12 education in the United States. Among the issues explored in this book are:

1. An overview of collective bargaining,
2. The collective bargaining process,
3. Strategies and preparation for collective bargaining,
4. Negotiating the collective bargaining agreement,
5. An analysis of existing contracts that have provisions relating to media/library professionals and their programs,
6. The impact of the media library professional on media programs through the collective bargaining process, and

It is hoped that the information presented in this book will promote the welfare of media/library professionals, and will enable them to develop effective media/library services for quality K-12 education programs in the United States.
INTRODUCTION

The recent trend toward increased negotiations in American education has produced a number of changes in the operation of school districts and schools. School media/library professionals must adjust to reflect the changing environment in which they operate. Therefore, the application of Media Programs: District and School, which "delineates guidelines and recommendations for media programs and resources essential for quality education," must take into account negotiations within school systems. The American school system today is influenced by the non-economic development of professional negotiations, and will continue to be influenced by the actions which take place at the bargaining table. Therefore, if the media/library programs in each district or individual building are to achieve their goal of being one of the essential elements for quality education, the media/library professional must understand the negotiating process and be able to influence it effectively. This publication focuses on professional negotiations and their relationship to the media/library professional and his/her programs within the district or the school. The key non-economic elements of negotiated contracts are identified as they relate to media/library professionals and their programs. These elements are analyzed to see what effect they have on the delivery of media services at the district and school level. The nature of the professional negotiation process is also explored, as is the process as it becomes part of the institutionalization of American education.

This book is divided into a number of phases. Chapter I is an overall view of the negotiating process. Chapter II deals with the elements of effective negotiations. Chapter III deals with the process of negotiations. Chapter IV presents an analysis of existing current contracts. A national sample, as well as a state sample, are used to identify provisions that now exist to promote the welfare of media/library professionals and their programs. Chapter V presents a design for the use of Media Programs: District and School, in preparation for negotiations. Also included are a glossary of terms and a selected bibliography. Professional Negotiations for Media/Library Professionals: District and School is designed to be used by media/library professionals, school administrators, Boards of Education, and colleges and universities that prepare individuals for the media/library profession.

CHAPTER I
COLLECTIVE BARGAINING: AN OVERVIEW

This book is an attempt to provide an understanding of the collective bargaining process, so that media/library professionals will be able to affect the negotiations process to their particular advantage. Note that this is not a "how-to" book. The best method of learning the intricacies of collective bargaining is by getting involved in the process with your representatives.

Collective bargaining is an ongoing process. The primary components are preparation for negotiations, negotiations, and contract administration. All three phases are important in the overall process, and each has an effect on the others.

Prior to collective bargaining, a union must be recognized by the employer. Following recognition, negotiations usually begin on an initial contract. Media/library professionals in K-12 education are normally part of the public sector of the economy. In states where there is no public sector collective bargaining law, the union must seek recognition directly from the employer. The difficulty of attaining recognition in a state with no law is compounded by the right of an employer to refuse recognition, which would prevent negotiations with no recourse by the employees. In states where a public sector collective bargaining law exists, there is normally an Employee Relations Board, which accepts petitions for an election conducted by this Board to determine which union will represent the employees. Each state has a different law, as shown in the summary of collective bargaining laws.

I. RECOGNITION

Many of the media/library professionals who read this book will be included as part of a larger bargaining unit, consisting primarily of classroom teachers. With this in mind, it is important for media/library professionals to understand the various relationships, both among the bargaining unit members and with their negotiating team, so that effective influence can be exerted and achievement of the goals of media/library professionals can be attained.

Media/library professionals who teach in the K-12 area are usually a minority of the larger bargaining unit of K-12 teachers. This bargaining unit is based on the community of interest of the recognized group. In education, a typical recognition clause will include certified teachers, media/library professionals, special education teachers, etc. The community of interest of this bargaining unit is that of certified professional educators. Excluded from this bargaining unit, because of a lack of community of interest would be bus drivers, custodians, and non-certified employees who do not have a community of interest with certified professional teachers. These excluded groups will usually have their own bargaining unit that will include employees within their own community of interest and exclude all others. However, it is possible to include all employees in one bargaining unit similar to the C.I.O., which has the many jobs of an auto plant grouped into the same bargaining unit with special provisions in the contract to deal with particular needs. Media/library professionals can fall within this category. The advantages and disadvantages must be carefully weighed when considering an appropriate bargaining unit.

1 Community of interest is the typical method of determining the appropriate positions in the bargaining unit. In most cases, K-12 media specialists are grouped with K-12 teachers because of the emphasis of their jobs in educating students.

Following negotiation of a contract in which few gains are made for a particular group, the question often arises of how a particular faction of a bargaining unit can withdraw from that larger unit and form its own bargaining unit. Once a faction is considered part of a bargaining unit, it is very difficult to have that faction removed. The bargaining agent (union) may voluntarily agree with the employer to exclude a faction from the bargaining unit, but this is highly unlikely and may not be in the best long range interest of the particular faction. Formation of a smaller splinter union could create a weaker union and result in a less favorable bargaining position.

If the faction previously mentioned happened to be the media/library professionals, it would be very difficult to become excluded from the bargaining unit. The formation of a smaller bargaining unit composed only of media/library professionals would not be in a strong bargaining position.

The best way for a group such as media/library professionals to achieve contractual changes is to get involved in the negotiation process and make the concerns of the particular group known to their bargaining representatives. The more involved the group becomes, the more influence can be exerted on the process. Media/library professionals from both management and unions must make a point of influencing the negotiation process in order to affect changes in the contract provisions in the media area.

gaining law, the rules are modeled after those established by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). However, the NLRB does not regulate public sector collective bargaining and, as a result, each state that has a Public Sector Labor Relations Law can establish its own rules and procedures.

In states that have collective bargaining laws, among the items usually regulated are:

1. Which issues are mandatory topics of bargaining, i.e., what issues must be negotiated by the union and management if raised by either party. The general rule is that all items dealing with wages, hours, and conditions of employment must be negotiated. Questions regarding mandatory types of bargaining are issues based on what is meant by a condition of employment. Clarification must, therefore, be made as a result of this "gray" area.

2. The rules within which negotiations will be conducted and the penalty if either party violates these rules. These rules are interpreted in light of the totality of conduct of the parties and whether the parties have been bargaining in "good faith." Most states with a collective bargaining law have provisions to hear allegations regarding unfair labor practice charges. An unfair labor practice charge is an allegation made by one party that the other has not been bargaining in good faith. These allegations are filed with an Employment Relations Board, which usually has administrative law judges who conduct a hearing and rule whether the charges are founded, and, if so, decide the appropriate remedy. The definition of good faith bargaining, therefore, undergoes continual review and redefinition by administrative law judges and the courts. Through this process unfair labor practice and court decisions provide a more detailed definition of good faith bargaining, what is permissible in the negotiations process, and mandatory topic of bargaining.

3. The method for resolving issues the parties are not able to resolve through the negotiation process and on which the parties are said to have reached impasse. The negotiation process requires a good faith effort to reach agreement on mandatory topics of bargaining. The laws governing this process do not require that either party make concessions on any issue. In some cases, the parties may drop demands that are not high priorities when it is realized no gains can be made on those issues. Impasse usually will be reached on issues that are high priority when no agreement resolving the issue is achieved. It is, therefore, important that the parties be aware of their priorities and that not all issues be identified as priorities, since all proposals and/or goals cannot be realized. Negotiation is a give-and-take process. Very often the compromise reached to resolve an issue is not the solution originally sought by either party.

B. Dynamics Involved in the Process

During the negotiation process, numerous relationships develop. Aside from the obvious relationship between the employee representatives and the employer at the bargaining table, there are also other relationships that develop within the union and management groups.

Relationships in which the employee representative (union) become involved include:

1. Various committees that are formed to direct the negotiating team, such as the committee formed to analyze the particular contract provisions, the public relations committee, etc.,
2. General membership of the union, to keep them aware of the negotiations and up to date, and
3. Outside influences including the public and various community support groups, should community support become necessary as negotiations begin to reach a critical stage.

The employer representatives must deal and interrelate with:

1. The chief administrative officer (superintendent), who may or may not be present at the bargaining table,
2. The policy making body (Board of Education) which provides the overall parameters for negotiations,
3. Specific members of the management team who would be directly affected by a particular proposal, to determine the impact of a proposal and feasible ways of resolving a concern without limiting the individual's operation,
4. Outside influences, to keep the community informed of the issues and reasons for taking a position should negotiations reach a critical stage and the community need to be alerted. This would occur as the parties approach an impasse situation.

5. The political aspect of an elected body, providing overall direction to their representatives while maintaining the necessary political amenities for possible re-election.

The dynamics of the negotiations process become extremely complex in that there is ongoing communication among these various elements, affecting the interaction and negotiations at the bargaining table.

C. Outside Forces

Additional outside forces that must be recognized by both parties include federally mandated programs and state and local statutes, which must be complied with, but which can drain the local district.

In the public sector, the outside forces provide the greatest amount of uncertainty in the negotiation process. Specifically, public opinion must be kept in favor of the education programs. This requires credibility for the administration (management) in order to secure the required funds to maintain an appropriate program and avoid cuts. In addition, reasonable wages must be provided to enable continuation of competitive salaries and attrition of qualified and desirable personnel. The balance between benefiting education and providing reasonable competitive wages must be maintained, while being open with the public and maintaining a credible position.

D. How the Principles and Dynamics Affect Negotiations

The relationship between the principles and dynamics of collective bargaining is what makes negotiations a multi-faceted process. The principles provide a framework in which negotiations are expected to take place. The dynamics influence the means by which each party attempts to achieve its goals. The relationship between the principles and dynamics is what provides the unknowns to negotiations in the public sector and affects the eventual outcome. These are the tools and constraints within which a contract or specific provisions must be proposed, modified, and eventually resolved by the parties.
III. Summary

The collective bargaining process in the public sector is defined by specific rules dictated by state laws. These state laws draw from the National Labor Relations Act in defining the rules under which collective bargaining is to be conducted. Each state may use the NLRB as guidelines and may make changes in them to meet the needs of the state.

An additional level of dynamics must be considered when reviewing the collective bargaining process in the public sector. These dynamics consist of the relationships that develop between the representatives at the bargaining table and all other forces and factors impacting on the collective bargaining process. These interactions often will affect the eventual outcome of negotiations in the public sector and must be considered in the process.

The principles and dynamics in each particular locale will vary depending on the experience and approach of the parties to collective bargaining. The relationships have been identified, but the reaction to these relationships by the parties will vary in order to meet the particular needs of management and the union.
CHAPTER II
PREPARATION FOR NEGOTIATIONS

I. INTRODUCTION

Preparation is a key component of successful negotiations and often can make the difference between achievement and non-achievement of a goal. Preparation for negotiations includes the selection of the bargaining team and chief spokesperson, collection of data, and identification of priorities for both union and management.

If appropriate time and effort are put into the preparation for negotiations, the management and/or the union will be well on its/their way to a successful round of negotiations.

A. Selection of a Bargaining Team

Each side in negotiations uses its own method for determining who will be on its bargaining team. Unions often choose to elect their team representatives. Management will either have an “in-house” negotiator, who may also handle administration of the contract, or it may bring in an outside negotiator or attorney who will head up the management team. The most important goal for a bargaining team is unity. This unity must be maintained at the bargaining table. Any disagreements must be discussed by the team in a caucus and not at the bargaining table. Following the selection of a bargaining team, roles can be assigned to team members including a second in command to the chief negotiator, who assists the chief negotiator both at the table and during the caucus, and an individual to take notes for the team. Delegation of assignments should be left to the chief negotiator based on his/her needs.

It is at the point of preparations for negotiations where media/library professionals should become involved in the process, in order to increase the possibility of realizing their concerns. Placement of a media/library professional on the negotiating team further increases the opportunity of achieving the media goals. By having a media/library professional on the negotiating team where final decisions are to be made regarding the status of each proposal, a minority member of the overall bargaining unit can have a major role in determining what will be incorporated into the contract. To strengthen the position of a media/library professional who is on the negotiating team, the internal decision making process of the bargaining team can be used to provide additional leverage to a minority member of the team. The method of decision making which would best serve the media/library professional who is a member of a bargaining team is to require that consensus be reached within the bargaining team when concessions and agreements are made. This will provide the media/library professional veto power regarding settlement or withdrawal of all issues. This method of decision making does have pros and cons. A negative aspect of consensus decision making is that if the team can not reach internal consensus on major issues, progress in negotiations will be very slow, with each individual on the bargaining team representing a faction of the bargaining unit and holding out for his/her respective provisions. A positive aspect is that within a negotiating team, a minority member of a bargaining unit can have a significant impact in the outcome of negotiations.

The requirement of consensus is an enormous responsibility for each individual of the team that uses this decision making system. A result of disagreement within a bargaining team could be a work stoppage. While a veto is possible when consensus is required, the ability of the other bargaining team members to persuade the holdouts on the team is the best method of achieving agreement within a negotiating team. This is where preparation by each individual team member on all issues will best serve the internal process of the negotiating team as well as negotiations overall.

B. Chief Spokesperson

The position of chief spokesperson is a crucial position in negotiations. This individual controls what is to happen within the bargaining team in hopes of controlling what takes place at the bargaining table.
Impact of Consensus

With consensus the impact by each individual bargaining team member on negotiations = 100%

Media Library Specialist 4% of Bargaining Unit, 10 of Bargaining Team, 100% impact with Consensus
The chief spokesperson is ultimately responsible for all aspects of the team during the negotiations process including:

1. Submission of demands,
2. Conducting the negotiations for the team at the bargaining table, and
3. Maintaining team discipline at the bargaining table.

Among the characteristics of an ideal chief negotiator are:

1. Leadership to guide the team with confidence, and the ability to make decisions under pressure.
2. Integrity to build up a trust between the parties. This integrity can make the difference in how the negotiations will end up, based on what is conveyed at the bargaining table and how well promises are kept.
3. Verbal ability in conveying the respective position of the team he/she represents in persuading the other side to his/her position.
4. Ability to read the other team, by both watching and listening to what is said and done by all members of the other negotiating team, with assistance from his/her own team members.
5. Ability to work well with others, including his/her own team, the other negotiating team, the people the teams represent, and any outside forces.

While an ideal chief negotiator will possess some aspect of these attributes, he/she must also be part of the negotiating team, which includes taking part in caucus discussion and any ensuing irritation, anger, and frustration. The chief negotiator will be able to leave these negative emotions in the caucus room and return to the bargaining table fresh and with a clear open mind. The chief negotiator must remember that the ultimate goal is a settlement that will benefit the people being represented.

It is essential for the chief negotiator to be present at discussions with the decision making groups and to be included in strategy sessions and priority determination. In order for a chief negotiator to appropriately represent his/her constituents, he/she must know the priorities and goals of the constituents so that a plan can be devised to arrive at that point. In failing to provide the chief negotiator with this information, the constituents are doing a disservice to the chief negotiator and a disservice to the groups being represented, as it is impossible to provide the best job with inadequate information.
Chapter II

C. Collection of Data

As previously stated, a key to successful negotiations is preparation. The parties must be familiar with the issues, the events that caused them, and why they are issues. Proper preparation before the onset of negotiations is the surest way of defending and ultimately achieving a high priority issue.

It is a common practice for unions to establish committees to deal with major issues. These committees may be chaired by a negotiating team member who will collect input from the bargaining unit members. If appropriate, language for an initial demand will be drafted. This is another key area for media/library professionals to become involved in the process. Involvement at this level could lead to a committee recommendation of a key media issue and submission of recommended language to the negotiating team and eventually to the other side. Once the information is collected, the committee composing and reviewing language for initial demands will review each issue and determine whether it will be included in the initial submission of demands.

Other means of input into the preparation for negotiations include the review and analysis of grievances, and arbitration awards that occurred during the life of the expiring contract. These issues have already proven a problem, and it can be expected that one of the parties will submit revisions to these areas as part of the initial demands. In addition, contracts from neighboring areas or districts, including items that may not be pressing, but would be beneficial to the respective parties, should be reviewed. A determination is then made as to whether a proposal should be submitted.

Management will use similar methods of preparation for negotiations. A significant amount of input for management will be provided from the level of management that must work day-to-day with the provisions of the contract. It is these individuals who provide the bulk of the input to management, alerting their representatives to problem areas.

Following collection of the data, the bargaining teams can review the concerns and language submitted by the committees. From this input, language can be drafted into a total package of proposals for submission to the other team.

By taking the time to review and prepare for negotiations, the demands of the other side should become apparent. This anticipation of demands to be submitted by the other party will allow for development of a strategy and rationale regarding the anticipated proposal, and allow for better preparation if the demand is submitted.

After the data indicating the concerns of the individuals being represented is collected, key issues should be isolated. These key issues are those that are of particular concern to the represented party and that will be among the final issues resolved or dropped during the negotiations.

The process of identification of key issues does not have to be done at the outset of negotiations. It is a process that will become apparent as the negotiations proceed and key issues are not resolved, but left on the bargaining table for future resolution. In the case of media/library professionals, key issues may include aides, student ratios, release time, etc. It is very important that when key issues are finally isolated that it is understood by all concerned that these issues may not be achievable. It is important that an honest effort be made at solving problems, but eventually a decision will have to be made as to whether the issue is obtainable and/or whether concerted action is warranted and will secure the desired resolution. If the negotiating team has been measuring the discussion and position taken during the negotiations by the other side, it should be apparent whether a last minute solution will be achieved or whether the issue will not be satisfactorily resolved. If it appears that an issue will not be resolved, and it is an issue on which the team has been directed to find a resolution, a decision will have to be made regarding the best means of settling the issue. It is important that a team not become "locked in" to a particular item too early in negotiations. Since collective bargaining is a give-and-take process, a more important item may be achieved in exchange for a less important item. Flexibility must be maintained.

For media/library professionals there is an additional factor in achieving a key issue. Since this group is usually a small segment of the bargaining unit, additional pressure must be brought on their representatives, urging them to resolve their concerns successfully. To the bargaining team, it is but one faction that must be made content. The bargaining team must appease a majority of the bargaining unit made up of the numerous interest groups, while considering whether a demand can be achieved and at what cost.

During the process of collecting input for the negotiations, many an impassioned plea will be put forth explaining why a particular provision must be changed. Not only the impassioned pleas should be considered, but the less dramatic requests should be reviewed, with particular emphasis on the rationale for the needed change. This rationale will serve the bargaining team at the bargaining table and also will assist in compromising on an issue. In many cases, the particular solution sought by a bargaining unit faction will not be achievable, but an alternative solution to the problem will be within reach through compromise. If the issue and rationale are known, the bargaining team can work toward alleviating the problem.

Following a thorough collection of data and issues, demands are prepared and presented in one of the two following ways:

1. A list of issues is submitted with negotiation of the specific provisions and language to follow; or

2. Proposed language is submitted covering the provisions and issues where change is desired.

Both methods require negotiations on the issue itself, as well as language. Method 1 attempts to identify and isolate the concerns of the parties and eventually reach agreement on an intent to resolve the problem. Once this is completed, language can be drafted by the parties reflecting the intent of the resolution. This method is indicative of a relationship based on trust and very often the major pitfall of this method is avoided because of that trust. The problem with this method arises when the parties end up in dual negotiations; one to agree on the intent of the resolution, and a subsequent negotiation on the actual language to be in the contract. Depending on the language used, the intent of the resolution could be altered. This will not occur when the parties know each other and will honor their commitment.

The second method allows the negotiation of intent and language to occur simultaneously. While this may prolong negotiation on a particular provision, once an issue is settled it does not have to be negotiated a second time. The language and intent are resolved simultaneously.
Professional Negotiations

Whichever method is used, the draft of the proposal should be reviewed by the appropriate parties for corrections, editing, and any changes which may be necessary prior to submission. This should be done by the entire bargaining team and may include committee representatives, bargaining unit members, or any other group which could provide insight into the proposal and verify its intent and accuracy.

The preparation for negotiations is an ongoing process and should not be started only around negotiation time. Input from the union members or administration is of utmost importance. These are the individuals who must work with the contract. Their input is crucial if appropriate changes are to be made in the working agreement between the parties.

II. PRIORITY ISSUES

Priority issues are those provisions that the union and management feel they must have in the contract. Union priorities include provisions that deal with its security. The union must also attempt to secure provisions that protect the individual rights of its members, such as seniority provisions. Management, on the other hand, should attempt to specify and protect its rights. Finally, there are provisions that will assist media/library professionals in their job performance dealing with various areas.

III. UNION

A union, as an entity, has provisions that it must secure in order to operate as a union and assure its continued existence. Unions need to be sure a contract has:

A. A recognition clause, which identifies and defines the bargaining unit and specifically states which positions are included and excluded. This is usually determined by an employment relations board election process in states that have a public sector collective bargaining law. Voluntary recognition may also be granted by the governing body of the employer. However, if the governing body of the employer agrees to voluntary recognition, specific language should be developed that clearly identifies inclusions and exclusions in the bargaining unit.
B. Union security encompasses several provisions aimed at assuring the continued existence of the Union. Included in this area are:

1. Union shop or agency shop provisions, which require an individual included in the bargaining unit to join the union (union shop) or pay up to the equivalent of union dues (agency shop) after a stated period of time, as a condition of employment.

   The proponents of this type of provision take the position that if an employee is benefitting from a union negotiated contract, that individual should pay his/her portion of the cost of negotiating that contract. Opponents view this type of provision as a violation of an individual's right to join or pay a fee to an organization he/she does not support. There are states that have "right to work" laws, which prohibit union shop and agency shop provisions. States that allow union security provisions have upheld termination of employees who refuse to comply with union security provisions.

   The result of union security provisions is that the union will have money available to represent its members. In states where union security provisions are not allowed, a union may have been selected as the bargaining agent, but cannot convince enough of the bargaining unit to pay dues. This could lead to a union having to represent a local union and not having money to carry out this responsibility, which, in turn, discourages unionization.

2. Dues deduction requires the employer to deduct union dues or agency shop fees from a bargaining unit member's paycheck automatically and forward the dues directly to the union, after authorization is given by the individual. This authorization is usually in the form of cards that provide the legal requirements needed to deduct money from an employee's paycheck. These authorization cards, provided by the union, must be signed by the employee. Like all other bill collectors, a union may have trouble collecting fees from unhappy or disgruntled members. An automatic dues deduction provision eliminates the problem of dues collection for the union.

3. Duration section, which stipulates the date the contract will expire.
IV. INDIVIDUAL SECURITY

Several provisions of the contract are directed at the security of individuals making up the bargaining unit. Individual security provisions are meant to establish individual rights and set forth procedures that will affect individuals. Among these provisions are:

A. Seniority provisions are strictly a product of a contract. Seniority provisions are used in conjunction with other appropriate provisions for such things as promotions, transfers, and layoffs. A seniority provision specifies when and how seniority is calculated. Seniority usually is based on the length of time an individual has been with that employer. The advantages of using a seniority system are that it is easy to determine and administer, and rewards longevity. It does serve to prevent rapid promotion within a bargaining unit or rewarding outstanding achievement, if promotion is based solely on seniority. In many recent court cases, a strict seniority system has been questioned since it may be a means of continuing past discrimination when the economy tightens and layoffs become necessary.

B. Individual security is often a specific contract section which covers concerns unique to each locale. Often it is necessary to incorporate specific concerns of the local bargaining unit in this area of a contract.

V. MANAGEMENT PRIORITIES

In conjunction with the demands and concerns of the union as an entity, and the individuals it represents, management also has provisions it feels must be included in a contract.

Among the primary objectives of management are assuring flexibility and maintaining the right to run its operation. The situation often requires management to agree to provisions that give away some of its right to manage, but are necessary in order to achieve an agreement. Proposals and counterproposals are made in an attempt to meet the concerns of the union without requiring management to surrender its prerogatives totally.

In keeping with this general philosophical approach, management will attempt to negotiate provisions that will prevent reopening of the contract during its life, guarantee the residual rights of management, and prevent a walkout during the life of the contract. Methods of accomplishing these goals include provisions such as:

A. An "entire agreement" clause is a provision that states that the parties have made all their proposals and the contract is the only document binding the parties. A properly written entire agreement clause will negate any requirement to negotiate an issue during the life of the contract, unless the parties mutually agree to do so.

B. Management rights provisions are statements in the contract that confirm that all rights belong to management, except those items specifically granted under the contract. As a result of decisions that have been handed down, some management representatives have taken to incorporating an extensive list of management's rights by way of illustration and not limitation. However, it is more difficult to secure this type of provision, and therefore it is not always obtained. This type of extensive list is an attempt to specifically list the residual rights of management that have tended to become eroded over the years by incorporation of a general blanket statement and arbitration interpretation.

The residual rights of management is the understanding that all rights not specifically given away by management in the contract remain with management. Over the years, this has been the dominant understanding regarding the rights of management. However, the residual rights doctrine has become eroded by various rulings that indicate that certain mandatory topics of bargaining must be negotiated prior to any action being taken.

As a result of this erosion of management rights, provisions are required to guarantee this right contractually.

C. No strike clauses are directed at preventing any type of concerted activity, i.e., work stoppage and slowdowns. This is a protection that guarantees the continuation of services during the life of a contract. In many states, it is illegal for public sector employees to strike and a no strike clause in the contract will also make concerted activity a contract violation, as well as an illegal act, in those states where strikes are prohibited.

D. Save harmless provisions are usually coupled with union security provisions. When a union is successful in negotiating, for example, an agency shop and dues deduction provisions, management agrees to deduct up to the equivalent of union dues for the union as a condition of employment. As a result, a save harmless provision indemnifies the governing body of management from any lawsuits that result from agreeing and enforcing the union security and dues deduction provisions, i.e., termination of an employee who refuses to comply with this provision. A save harmless provision will require the union to defend or reimburse management for any defense should a lawsuit be brought by an employee or group who disagrees with the actions taken.
Professional Negotiations

VI. GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE

The grievance procedure has been separated from the other key issues because of its extreme importance. The grievance procedure is important to all parties, as it is the enforcement provision of the contract. When there is alleged violation of a provision of the contract, the grievance procedure is the means of peacefully resolving the dispute. When there is an alleged violation of the contract, a grievance would be filed as the vehicle to determine the validity of the allegation and determine whether the issue can be settled prior to the final step.

A. Definition

The definition of a grievance is of utmost importance. In most cases, a grievance is an alleged violation, misinterpretation, or misapplication of the contract. This applies only to the negotiated contract and does not apply to the personnel policies or provisions, as long as those policies do not conflict with the contract. In addition, the definition will specify who may file a grievance, and whether the union may file a grievance when there is no complaint by an individual.

B. Timelines

The grievance procedure should specify within what period of time a grievance can be filed after an employee has become aware of the alleged contract violation. From the filing of the grievance, specific timelines should be incorporated and followed in an attempt to determine a resolution.

C. Steps of the Grievance Procedure
The first step of the grievance procedure should be the submission of the grievance in writing followed by a discussion with the grievant's immediate supervisor. If no resolution is found at that level, the grievance will then proceed through the grievance steps. In appealing an unsatisfactory response, timelines should be followed as specified above.

D. Final Step
In many cases, the final step of the grievance procedure is binding arbitration. This process involves an impartial third party who is selected by the two parties involved in the dispute. The third party will receive evidence and testimony in an arbitration hearing and make a decision binding on the parties as to the merits of the grievance.

Binding arbitration, as a final step, has its pros and cons. It provides a method of resolving contract disputes without going to court. Arbitrations can be presented by the parties, thereby reducing possible court and attorney fees. A negative point is that arbitration requires that the parties, particularly management, abrogate their rights by turning the issue over to a third party. In some states, abrogation of this responsibility may not be legal.

VII. GRIEVANCE FORM
The grievance form should contain certain specific information so that both parties fully understand the issue. The grievance should contain:

A. The specific provision(s) that has(have) allegedly been violated.
B. The date of the alleged violation or when the grievant first became aware of the alleged violation.
C. The signature of the grievant.
D. Any remedy requested by the grievant as a means of resolving the dispute.

Additional items can also be included on the grievance form depending on the particular circumstances in your area. For example, the building/employment site and name of the supervisor may also be included on the grievance form.

The grievance procedure assures that contract provisions are enforced, as written and intended by the parties. A contract is as strong as its grievance procedure.

VIII. SUMMARY

This chapter has dealt with preparation for negotiations. It is this preparation that often determines how negotiations will end.

The selection of the bargaining team will differ for the two parties. Often the union will elect its team, while management will appoint its representatives. The chief spokesperson should have traits which will allow for leadership of his/her own team, as well as the ability to achieve the designated goals.

Data collection is the key to drafting proposals and anticipating demands from the other side. Collection of data for management can come from such places as:
- grievances and/or arbitration cases
- front line supervisors
- language analysis
- anticipated and existing problems
- the public.

Input for the unions may come through a committee structure and from such places as:
- grievances and/or arbitration
- rank and file
- language analysis
- anticipated and existing problems
- demands similar to those of other unions in the area.

Once the data is collected, language can be drafted for proposal. In addition, demands from the other party can be anticipated and preparation can be made for expected proposals.

Finally, priority issues, which are usually incorporated in a first contract, can be expected if not previously selected by either party. Subsequent language protecting management and the union can also be secured when it is understood by the parties why the provisions are necessary.

Media library/professionals should get involved as much as possible in order to secure their demands. By assuring a consensus among their team members in making decisions, veto power and additional leverage will be achieved. In addition, early involvement by media/library professionals will provide credibility and respect, adding credence to the proposals of media/library professionals and assuring support from the other team members when the negotiations begin to heat up.
CHAPTER III
NEGOTIATING THE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENT

I. INTRODUCTION

Upon completion of the preparation the parties are ready to begin meeting to negotiate a contract. Collective bargaining has placed a shroud of secrecy on the negotiations process, so the procedures and actions at the bargaining table are not known to the novice negotiator. The parties do not usually sit at the table pounding their fists and shoes. Rather, there is a general procedure used in negotiations which will vary from district to district.

The collective bargaining process in which media/library professionals are involved is usually well established, although deviations will be used in an attempt to gain an advantage.

This chapter will attempt to explain the procedures used in negotiations, including what is involved in ground rules, what takes place, uses of a caucus, what good faith bargaining is, making package proposals, reaching tentative agreements, and what happens if the parties cannot reach an agreement—impasse.

II. GROUND RULES

The initial session of negotiations is usually used to establish ground rules for negotiations and the introduction of the negotiating teams.

Ground rules are voluntarily entered into by the parties to set a framework for conducting negotiations. In most cases, ground rules are not required and either party may refuse to agree to any and/or all ground rules. Among the issues usually discussed in the ground rules are:
A. When negotiation sessions will be held and where,
B. Submission of initial proposals,
C. Notification of who is chief spokesperson,
D. If appropriate, issuance of press releases by either party or jointly,
Professional Negotiations

E. Taking of official minutes or taping of sessions, and
F. Meeting schedule.

In many cases, certain ground rules are beneficial to the negotiations process. Ground rules may be used as a means of starting off negotiations on a positive note. However, the ground rule proposals should be carefully reviewed and rejected if they appear to be detrimental to your position, regardless of the goodwill.

The sessions following the establishment of the ground rules are usually spent discussing the initial proposal(s) and getting the rationale for the proposal(s). It is important that the proposal be questioned to determine the specific problem the proposal is meant to remedy. In many cases it will be necessary to question a proposal several times to get to the real purpose of the issue. This questioning will also serve to help determine the priority of the issue and its importance to the proposing party, by how strongly it is defended, physical actions of the explaining team, and other idiosyncracies.

It is important that throughout the negotiations, both parties keep their respective policy making bodies/committees informed of the progress of negotiations. This can be done by setting up a communications system whereby the negotiating teams update the people they represent. Such a system will be helpful as directions and parameters are needed.

III. CAUCUS

During negotiations, it will become necessary for the teams to call a caucus in order to discuss proposals or issues among themselves. A caucus is a meeting consisting of a single team by themselves. Some of the practical uses of a caucus are:

A. Clarifying, for the chief spokesperson, a particular issue which has been raised by asking and discussing the issue with other team members.

B. Discussion of a proposal to determine the ramifications of the proposal on the overall operation of the district and/or the union membership.

C. Determining whether a compromise should be made on the issue and when that counterproposal should be made.

D. Drafting language in response to a previous proposal.
A caucus can also have strategic value. Among the strategic uses are:

A. To allow a significant point to have an impact by calling a caucus immediately following a discussion.
B. To provide either team the time to deal with individuals'/problems within the team.
C. To allow your own team members to make a comment where a note to the chief negotiator will not suffice.

A caucus is a primary tool in the negotiations process. There are very few limits on a caucus, most of which are made during establishment of ground rules. A caucus should be used to its fullest extent, as it is a time for gathering information, preparing proposals, and planning strategy regarding particular issues.

Depending on the rules used to govern your own team, a caucus is the place where any team dissention should be voiced. Each team should present a solid front at the bargaining table; the caucus is the place for resolving any internal team disputes.

IV. NEGOTIATIONS

The various facets of negotiations have been reviewed, but when and how are negotiations actually conducted? What is the procedure for conducting negotiations?

There is no single way to conduct negotiations. Many of these questions may be answered in the ground rules. The negotiations process at the bargaining table consists of discussion of proposals and/or issues. These discussions will lead to a counterproposal or a rejection by the other party. Each side attempts to conduct the negotiations from its own proposals, in an attempt to persuade the other party as to the wisdom of agreeing to its particular proposal. Persuasion is one major form of achieving a concession in negotiations. This method is based on rational discussion, sound reasoning, and the ability to point out the problems that will be detrimental to both parties if the contract is not altered. Needless to say, this is a difficult method of bringing about change in a contract provision.

The second way of achieving a gain at the bargaining table is by giving the other side something in exchange for getting what you want. These types of proposals are submitted contingent on getting something in return. A proposal granting a concession in return for receiving a concession is a contingent proposal, which is either accepted or rejected as proposed, by indicating it is a package proposal. Package proposals usually consist of numerous issues that may be difficult to resolve by themselves; by putting together the appropriate items, several issues are resolved at once. For example, the union may have five issues and management may have five issues on the bargaining table. A package proposal may include the union dropping or withdrawing three issues, compromising one issue, and demanding one issue as originally proposed. In addition the package will contain the contingency that management drop two issues, and compromise three issues. If the union proposes such a "package," management must either accept this proposal in its entirety or reject it. If it is rejected, management could resubmit a package similar to that submitted by the union, containing the same ten issues, with minor changes, as part of a counterproposal. In all cases, proposals should be indicated as package proposals.

A major problem with package proposals is that they are often started too early in negotiations. If your particular district starts with hundreds of issues, the proposals cannot be sifted and narrowed at the onset as readily if packaging of proposals is started too early.

V. GOOD FAITH BARGAINING

During the course of negotiations, the parties are expected to engage in good faith bargaining. Depending on how this phrase is written in your public sector collective bargaining law, good faith bargaining is usually interpreted by reviewing the desire of the party(ies) to reach agreement or strive toward a common ground. In determining whether a party has been guilty of bad faith bargaining, the reviewing body will look at the totality of conduct of the party accused of the violation.

Totality of conduct illustrates the general attitude of a party during negotiations. It has been determined that good faith is lacking if an employer/union refuses:

—To meet with the union/employer upon request,
—To clothe representatives with authority to bargain, and/or
To enter into a written agreement those items agreed upon. Other practices which denote bad faith bargaining are:
—Deliberate hampering of negotiations, i.e., stalling and/or dilatory tactics, —Granting of concessions to employees while negotiating with the union; and/or —Rejection of all union demands without offering some counter proposals.

These points refer to a portion of the NLRB Standards and may differ according to the law in each state. If any one of the points is alleged against an employer or a union, the determining agency will review the totality of conduct of the party being charged.

VI. TENTATIVE AGREEMENTS

As negotiations progress, agreement will be reached on various issues, thereby reducing the total number of unresolved issues. As agreement is reached on an issue, it is recommended that a tentative agreement be acknowledged. This is usually done by finalizing the contract language and having the two chief negotiators sign and date the language. This will, under most circumstances, resolve that issue and remove it from further discussion.

When all issues are resolved, it is said that a tentative agreement on the contract has been reached. This agreement is tentative pending ratification by the Board of Education and the designated union group, usually the rank and file governed by the contract.

VII. IMPASSE

There comes a time when certain issues are not agreed upon by the parties and further discussion/proposals are not forthcoming. When this situation occurs impasse is said to exist between the parties.

VIII. MEDIATION

When impasse is reached on all outstanding issues, the first step in attempting to resolve the dispute is mediation. Mediation is a process where a third party, usually an appointed impartial individual, attempts to bring the parties together. A mediator will be left to his/her own devices and will usually meet with the parties in a caucus session and try to find ways to bring the parties together. A mediator will act as a "go between," taking informal offers and discussions to each side in order to narrow the differences and achieve an agreement.

A mediator cannot order either party to accept a proposal. Rather, the mediator's major tools consist of his/her persuasive ability and position as an impartial third party. Another tool rarely used by a mediator, but which could have a significant impact, is a mediator's recommendation. This type of recommendation comes about after a mediator has become familiar with the issues and cannot bring the parties together. At this point a mediator's recommendation, which is a non-binding recommendation, can be made. It consists of a resolution to the issue, as perceived by the mediator. While not binding on the parties, this recommendation could serve as an impetus to the parties, given the public reaction generated should the mediator's recommendation become public.

Despite the efforts of the parties during mediation, settlement is not always achieved during this process. This will bring about the second step in the impasse procedure.

IX. FACTFINDING

Depending on the impasse procedures in your state, factfinding is usually the next step in the impasse process. Factfinding is the process by which a neutral third party or panel is presented with testimony and exhibits by both parties, regarding the unresolved issues. Each side presents its exhibits, illustrating why the factfinder should recommend the position of that particular group. Exhibits are used to illustrate such items as budgets, similar issues in a comparable labor market area, and ability to pay. Following the hearing, the parties may submit post-hearing briefs. Following receipt of the briefs, the factfinder panel will make an issue-by-issue determination on the outstanding issues.

This method of impasse resolution is preferred by many groups as it provides an opportunity for a neutral party to hear the issues.
and make a determination that will become a public document. In addition, the factfinding results are non-binding recommendations. This allows the negotiations process to remain with the parties and prevents the imposition of a settlement on the parties. A drawback of this procedure is that either party may refuse to adopt the factfinder’s report. There is no way to require acceptance short of public pressure.

X. INTEREST ARBITRATION

Interest arbitration is arbitration of unresolved contract provisions by an impartial third party or panel. The difference between interest arbitration and factfinding is that interest arbitration decisions are binding on both parties, whereas factfinding reports are advisory.

There are two major approaches to interest arbitration. The first requires the arbitrator to make a determination on each issue by deciding for the position of one party or the other without compromise. This method may lead an arbitrator to divide the awards in an attempt to give each party an equal number of positions. A second method requires an arbitrator to review all outstanding issues of both parties and make an award based on the final overall position of one party or the other.

The advantage of interest arbitration is that it provides a solution to a negotiations impasse and allows both parties to save face in resolving the dispute by turning the issue over to a third party. It will usually avoid strike/lockout by the parties. The disadvantages of interest arbitration are that it may impede the negotiations process when either party feels it can do better in interest arbitration than through the negotiations process. In addition, interest arbitration removes the settlement from the parties involved and allows a third party to impose a settlement on the participants.

The two methods of interest arbitration also have their individual advantages and disadvantages. Option One allows an arbitrator to investigate and rule on each outstanding issue. The arbitrator, therefore, is allowed to make a determination on each issue on its merits. One drawback to this method is the tendency to split the issues. A second major drawback is that at the point of impasse, the parties have given as much as they feel is possible. An arbitrator may feel that by splitting the issue an equitable settlement is reached when, in fact, the parties have already given to the limit and entering into interest arbitration is an attempt to get a little more that could not be achieved at the bargaining table.

Option Two allows the arbitrator to rule on the overall total packages of the parties. This will tend to bring the parties closer together in their proposals, so that an arbitrator will not find the offer of one of the parties so outlandish as to sway all the issues to the other side. The final offer, total package approach, does prohibit a determination on an issue-by-issue basis, and an arbitrator will be required to weigh all the facts in each package when deciding for a particular party.

Interest arbitration has been used in an attempt to avoid an interruption to essential services and provide a means of settling a dispute, such as in the case of police and fire departments. As stated previously, interest arbitration takes the negotiations away from the parties. However, without interest arbitration, concerted activity would be the alternative used by unions to bring about a desired result.

XI. STRIKES
A strike, including lockout, slowdown, "chalkboard flu," or any type of concerted activity, represents a breakdown in the negotiations process. A strike/lockout relegates the discussion aspect of collective bargaining to a secondary position and brings to the forefront the power relationship of the parties.

There are numerous reasons for a strike/lockout including:
—Failure of either party to achieve previously set minimum goals at the bargaining table,
—Failure to complete negotiations before the strike deadline, i.e., the parties run out of time,
—Internal political problems within the union which result in a strike, i.e., lack of leadership, rank and file disenchantment.
Attempt by the other party to take away or change a previously negotiated right without offering something in return. The reasons for strikes are unique to each situation. A large part of the causes of strikes can be linked to a failure on the part of the negotiating teams. During the course of negotiations, both teams should be identifying their own and the other team's major issues. This can be done by learning the habits and reactions of the other team. These major issues should be communicated to the governing body/executive board, and a constant re-evaluation of the respective positions undertaken. If the ruling body decides that a strike will be necessary to achieve a goal, the negotiating team has its job. Identification of strike issues and a decision on compromise or outright denial should be made with an understanding of the ramifications in mind.

In making a determination on whether strike action should be taken, the parties must evaluate the following issues:

- Is the achievement of the objectives within the ability of the other party to grant?
- Will a strike be an effective tool to achieve the desired objectives?
- Does the constituency support the strike?
- Is there community support?
- Will the strike be successful?

These issues should be answered in the affirmative if a strike is to be undertaken. If a Board has a history of capitulation in the face of a strike, it would, on the surface, appear to be a good tactic. However, if the Board has a history of refusing to reward a strike, this type of action should be carefully reviewed. A strike is a tool of last resort. It may achieve financial and contractual rewards, but the potential damage and dissension is immense and will affect:

- students
- the community
- the rank and file
- the Board/ruling body
- the union

A strike represents a failure by the parties. It is used, illegally in many cases, when employees perceive an unfair situation and no alternative for changing it.
XII. TENTATIVE AGREEMENT

Following the weeks and months of negotiations, a tentative agreement is reached on all issues. The agreement is usually tentative, depending on the procedures of the parties, until the agreement can be ratified by the parties. Before leaving the bargaining table, all language should be signed off and confirmed. This could prevent possible disagreement later, which could jeopardize the ratification process.

It is often asked why two groups of people would put themselves through this lengthy and often tedious process. This question usually can be answered at the conclusion of negotiations, when the parties experience the exhilaration of reaching settlement. The time, frustration, and disagreements are forgotten and the parties can set about implementing the new contract.

XIII. SUMMARY

Negotiation of the collective bargaining agreement follows certain procedures which develop with each district. These procedures and the styles of the teams include:

- establishment of ground rules,
- use of the caucus,
- strategies and tactics of each party,
- drafting language during negotiations, and
- good faith bargaining.

If settlement is not achieved and impasse is reached, the impasse procedures which will be implemented include:

- mediation
- factfinding
- interest arbitration
- strikes/lockouts.

Throughout the negotiations process, the goal is a settlement within the parameters established by the governing bodies. It is the responsibility of the negotiating teams constantly to reappraise and inform their governing bodies of changes in the position of the other party which will require an adjustment in strategy and tactics in order to achieve the goals and objectives, knowing the power relationship of the parties.
CHAPTER IV
AN ANALYSIS OF EXISTING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENTS WHICH RELATE TO MEDIA/LIBRARY PROFESSIONALS

I. INTRODUCTION
The authors have made an analysis of current comprehensive teacher agreements representing K-12 education in America today. As a result of this analysis, one can see that organized teachers and media/library professionals have improved their working conditions and job security, and increased their professional autonomy. The major criterion used in making the analysis of these bargaining agreements is the presence or absence of contract provisions relating to media/library professionals or their programs. In order to secure a representative sample, the authors used a national sample selected by the NEA Research Office in Washington, D.C. The contracts in this sample represent 1977-79 comprehensive agreements. The NEA national sample for collective bargaining contracts represents 1,001 contracts. The design for the sample used was based on the following criteria:

A. The total number of public school districts with an enrollment of 12,000 pupils or more as of December, 1976, was 565. All of these school districts were included in the sample. Then, a selected sample representing the remaining 15,499 public school districts was used—with a permissible error of .05% at the 95 percentile confidence level (student enrollments from 1 to 11,999 students). The sample selected was 436 school districts. After the first school district was randomly selected, thereafter every 35th school district was chosen for inclusion in this sample. The total of the sample then represented 1,001 school districts. The authors then examined a sample of 100 contracts of the 1,001 contracts chosen by the NEA Research Office. The sample represented all geographical areas of the United States, including large and small districts. The authors read each of the sample contracts to obtain the data used in this book. Only those contracts that contained a particular provision relating to media/library professionals or their programs were quoted for the analysis. The sample indicates only whether a provision was in the contract, but does not evaluate the strength or weakness of the provision. The design was to determine what types of non-economic provisions have been included in teacher contracts that will have an impact on the media/library professional or his/her program.

B. The second phase of the analysis of teacher contracts was the request made by the authors in several national publications, asking media/library professionals to send sample contracts to the authors. They were of special interest if the contracts had provisions relating to media/library programs. During this phase, the authors had an opportunity to correspond with media/library professionals and discuss how they gained these provisions in their contracts.

C. The third phase was the examination of contracts collected by the Florida Association for Media in Education. These reflect county contracts in Florida, which have provisions relating to media/library professionals and their programs. Major findings from the analysis of the national sample, the contracts contributed by media/library professionals, and the contracts collected in Florida are examined here in relation to key provisions that have an impact on the media/library professional and his/her program. It is hoped that through the process of identifying key provisions, other media/library professionals will be able to use a similar approach in professional negotiations to strengthen their agreements, and, therefore, promote their welfare.

What are some of the major trends in teacher contracts that affect media/library professionals?
A. There is an identifiable trend in staffing requirements.
B. There is an increase in language relating to various aspects of the media collection.
C. There are implications for the management of media/library programs.

II. SELECTION OF THE MEDIA/LIBRARY PROVISIONS
The authors carefully examined the 100 national sample contracts in order to identify those non-compensatory provisions that pertain to media/library professionals or their programs. It is noted that, in the NEA "Negotiation Research Digest" of May, 1971, it was found that in 22.4% of the 978 contracts analyzed, media/library professionals were identified as a separate classification division. This classification identified them as members of the teacher contract bargaining unit. The authors have selected a few sample provisions relating to recognition for inclusion in this section. In most cases, the media/library professional was identified as a certified professional in the contract language. This is verified in the earlier NEA research of May, 1971. In many of these contracts, the program elements relating to media/library programs, special welfare benefits, or working conditions for media/library professionals were not identified. There is, however, a relationship between being identified as a media/library professional, and having the contract expanded to include a number of provisions which relate to media/library programs and other non-economic factors. The authors examined the current comprehensive contract provisions and selected the following provisions to be included in this book:

A. Recognition
B. Rights and privileges
C. Required media/library personnel
D. Work year and extra pay
E. Non discrimination
F. Assignments
G. Non-teaching duties
H. Duty days
I. Released time
J. Travel time
K. Clerical assistance
L. Instructional materials and equipment
M. Evaluation of materials
N. Media/library facilities
O. Library policies
P. Vacancies
Q. Use of substitutes
R. Reduction in force

The choice of these provisions within the negotiated contract is based on two important criteria: (1) they are linked to the concerns that media/library professionals have about working conditions, job security, and professional autonomy; and (2) they influence the ways in which media/library services are to be delivered to students and teachers.

III. KEY CONTRACT PROVISIONS

After examining the sample contracts, as well as the contracts supplied to the authors by media/library professionals and the Florida Association for Media in Education, it has become apparent that the recognition provision was the first step toward improvement of contract language relating to the improvement of the welfare of the media/library professionals.

Anne Arundel "Substitutes shall normally be provided for all teachers absent from their regular teaching assignment including art, music and physical education. Only after reasonable but unsuccessful efforts to obtain substitutes shall the principal assign teachers to other teachers' classes during their non-teaching periods."

Rights and Privileges Language
A. Sample Contract Language Relating to Rights and Privileges.

The contract language relating to rights and privileges is included in the area of teachers' rights. It was found that any section relating to the media/library professional must have lan-language stating that they are protected under the rights and provisions of classroom teachers. The most important provision of the contract relating to their rights is that of the grievance procedure, which, according to all professional labor negotiators, constitutes the heart of the contract. Without a strong provision on grievance, other contract provisions may prove to be unenforceable. Such provisions as non-teaching duties of media/library professionals, the area of supplemental pay for extra work, staffing arrangements, working conditions in the media center, the use of media aides, an increase or decrease in the use of student contact hours—all relate to the working conditions and general welfare of the media/library professional. Grievance procedures are included in the general contract and affect members of the bargaining unit. These procedures are often used to protect staff during periods of reduction in force or transfer of staff. The inclusion of good grievance procedures can lessen the demand by management to reduce certified media/library professionals and replace them with aides. The incorporation of the assignment of media/library staff may be considered one of the most critical areas of concern for media/library professionals, because this affects one of management's major rights. In some contracts the criteria of seniority and credentials have been the basis of negotiated contracts. Thus, all the provisions listed in a negotiated contract should be subject to the grievance procedures, and, therefore, the media/library professional must understand how to use these provisions.

The following is sample language from negotiated contracts that offset the working conditions and welfare of the media/library professionals.

It shall be their professional responsibility to become knowledgeable concerning its use, source and availability, to integrate it into the teaching-learning experience and to provide encouragement and opportunity for their students to individually benefit from the use of a variety of such materials."

Article XIII

"The Board and the Association agree that an adequate amount of special instructional service is essential to the operation of an effective educational program. The Board will move toward the implementation of the following ratios of special area teachers to students in average daily membership:

1. MEDIA SPECIALIST ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS: One Media Specialist per four hundred students or major fraction thereof.

New Contract—(Unpublished)

MEDIA SPECIALISTS: ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS

1. One (1) Media Specialist per 400 students or major fraction thereof.

In no case will media inventory be taken during the normal 180 day school year or during the summer school program."

"Teachers are encouraged to meet frequently with local school administrators to expand and to develop optimum utilization of and care for audiovisual materials.

Each department and grade level shall have an updated list of current audiovisual materials in the district."

S. Professional Organizations

"Librarians shall be eligible for consideration for attendance at the annual meeting of the Washington State Association of School Libraries held in the spring and the State Librarian Workshop held on the state inservice day in the fall under the provision of Article IV, Section C, item 2 of this Contract."
Professional Negotiations

The analysis of these individual key provisions is grouped into those categories that will directly affect the media/library professional or program. It can be seen by reading the various provisions that, indeed, media/library professionals have been active throughout the United States in strengthening media/library programs through the negotiating process.

IV. SUMMARY

A. Major Trends

What are the overall trends of the individual contract provisions, and what do they imply for media/library professionals in local decision making in American public schools? Certain conclusions can be drawn from the analysis of the provisions of the sample contracts:

1. There has been a growth in influence of the media/library professional in the negotiating process.
2. Regulations of assignments, length of work year, and extra pay have now been included in master agreements, through a negotiated contract.
3. The use of clerical assistants has been recognized in a number of negotiated agreements, and the right to supervise a clerical staff has been negotiated.
4. Requiring professional substitutes in the media center when the professional is absent is a major achievement.
5. Through the collective bargaining process, media/library professionals have influenced contract language to include statements relating to the philosophy of the media/library program. They have thus secured the support of Boards of Education. This is probably the most dynamic aspect of the negotiating process, affecting a strong working relationship between the program elements and contract support by the Board of Education. These trends would seem to portray a somewhat limiting affect on the rights of management. They suggest that the rights of management in the area of staffing and policy have been reduced in some media programs, but have led to an increase in media/library professionals through the use of contract language and the grievance procedure. There is no doubt that those school districts that have strong negotiated contract language regarding media/library professionals have succeeded in improving their welfare. They have identified key elements that improve their working conditions and affect the services to students and teachers. Future trends will be influenced by the declining student enrollment and the emergence of the need for retraining the teaching staff through in-service programs. This trend will provide the media/library professional with an opportunity to have a key role in staff development. The process of professional negotiations will influence the role that the media/library professional will play in the reformation of educational programs. It has, in many districts, incorporated the goals and objectives of Media Programs: District and School, into a teacher contract with enforceable provisions.
CHAPTER V
COLLECTIVE BARGAINING FOR MEDIA/LIBRARY PROFESSIONALS:
DISTRICT AND SCHOOL

I. INTRODUCTION
Prior to negotiating contract language for media/library professionals, an understanding of a media/library professional program must be developed and communicated to the appropriate parties. This chapter will deal with integrating program goals of media/library professionals with negotiating a contract.

The book Media Programs: District and School is a key resource for preparation of information related to media/library professionals and their responsibilities. The primary task of media/library professionals is to inform the bargaining team of the needs of media/library professionals. This will enable the bargaining team to perform its functions more effectively. This task will involve communication, both oral and written, to the bargaining team and possibly at the bargaining table. It is, therefore, important that media/library professionals be informed about objectives, which may correspond to goals indicated in Media Programs: District and School. Many of the sections in Media Programs: District and School will be used to emphasize sections in this chapter relating to preparation of media/library professionals for negotiations.

II. FUNCTION AND DESIGN OF THE INFORMATION
An effective media program will reflect the design function, consultation function, information function, and the administration function. "The design function relates to the formulating and analyzing objectives; establishing priorities; developing or identifying alternatives; selecting among alternatives; and implementing and evaluating the system, the product, the strategy, or technique."1 "The consultation function is applied as media professionals contribute to the identification of teaching and learning strategies; work with teachers and students in the evaluation, selection, and production of materials; and serve as consultants in planning and reordering physical facilities to provide effective learning environments."2 "The information function relates especially to providing sources and services appropriate to user needs and devising delivery systems of materials, tools, and human resources to provide for maximum access to information in all its forms."3 "The administration function is concerned with the ways and means by which program goals and priorities are achieved."4

It is important to understand these functions of a media/library professional in developing special contract provisions for media/library professionals. The media/library professional must know how to relate this information in a form that can be easily understood by the teacher bargaining unit, by the teacher negotiating team, and by the Board of Education team. The next step in the negotiation process involves language related to the importance of the media/library professional in the collective bargaining agreement. The media/library professional must use language that is easily understood when developing the proposal. All proposals should speak to the needs of teachers, students, and the community. It is important that contract language reflect the general educational philosophy presented in the particular local school district. For example, if the school district is large enough to support a district-wide media/library program, these services are usually the responsibility of the media/library director. In developing contract language, the responsibilities of the media/library director should be taken into consideration. Such responsibilities as indicated on page 11 of Media Programs: District and School include the following:

Planning the overall media program, e.g., identifying criteria, purposes, procedures, and evaluation systems.

Developing and coordinating the budget for the total media program and creating and maintaining accountability techniques.

2 op cit, p. 7.
3 op cit, p. 8.
4 op cit, p. 9.
Applying instructional technology to curriculum development activities.
Selecting personnel for the district media program and providing for their ongoing professional development.
Orienting the district staff in all aspects of instructional technology.
Applying appropriate forms of telecommunications such as television, radio, telephone lines, computers, and random access distribution.
Developing district media selection policies that support the educational program and reflect principles of intellectual freedom.
Developing criteria for the selection of materials and equipment.
Maintaining or supervising the maintenance of media and equipment.
Producing materials and maintaining production facilities.
Selecting, distributing, and promoting effective use of district collections of materials and equipment.
Interpreting the media program to school and community and developing public information systems."

If it is a small school or a district in which the media program is extremely strong, it is very important that the needs of the media/library professional who operates at the building level be presented to the negotiating team. These are the key individuals who provide direct media/library service to students in the district, and can most easily explain the media/library concerns to the teacher members of the bargaining unit. The school media/library program should be identified as providing an important resource for the education of students, and contract language should protect these resources. The responsibilities of the local media/library program include the following:

"Defining the purposes of the school media program with proposed implementation and evaluation to achieve them.
Planning media program activities and integrating them with other programs of the school.
Participating in instructional design, course development, and the creation of alternative modes of learning.

\[\text{op cit. p. 11.}\]
Professional Negotiations

Developing budget criteria and budget as required by the school administrator and the district media director.
Developing and maintaining a balanced, relevant collection.
Providing maximum access to collections in the school, district, and community.
Operating the media center with procedures that further the goals of the school.
Reporting to the district director, school administrator, and to teachers and students relative to the school media program.
Conducting orientation and in-service education in media for the school media staff and teachers.
Providing production facilities and expertise in production suitable at the school level.
Developing flexible operations that encourage and support users in problem-solving, interest fulfillment, and creative expression.
Initiating and providing program activities that respond to curriculum goals on a day-by-day basis.
Providing opportunities for discovery and exploration independent of or beyond the stated curriculum.
Maintaining professional resources for teachers, informing them about new materials, and involving them in purchasing decisions.
Performing ongoing evaluations in the light of stated objectives and making program modifications as needed.
Building a public relations program that communicates the role of the school media program and its contributions to the goals of the school.

In many states, there is a trend toward the development of regional media centers. It is interesting to note that these units are beginning to negotiate collective bargaining agreements that affect their professional staff in delivery of services to students and teachers. Some of the responsibilities of the regional media center professional are as follows:

*Finding needed information on an appropriate level and in an acceptable format.
Selecting and using appropriate means for retrieval of information in all media formats.

* op cit, p. 13-14.
Chapter V

Obtaining resources from the media center, district center, local agencies, and networks.

Communicating in many modes, demonstrating an understanding of the structure and language of each mode.

Utilizing instructional sequences of tested effectiveness to reach personal and program objectives.

Designing and producing materials to achieve specific objectives, as well as using materials designed and produced for them by the media staff.

Employing a variety of media to find, evaluate, use, and generate information.

Enjoying the communication arts and gaining inspiration from them.7

The importance of preparation for negotiations cannot be underestimated. It begins by carefully preparing those involved in the process with a thorough understanding of the role of the media/library professional. This is known as information processing. If it is done correctly, it can influence the outcome of the negotiations. It will provide the opportunity to include special provisions within the negotiated contract that promote and protect the welfare and working conditions of the media/library professional.

III. STAFFING PATTERNS

The second phase is the recognition of the importance of media/library personnel. Because of the size of a school district and the scope and depth of the various programs, the staffing patterns will vary according to local needs. However, there are two basic staffing patterns which affect collective bargaining and should be noted.

Media/library professionals who are included in a teacher bargaining unit are usually required to possess a teaching certificate from the state in which they are employed. As members of the bargaining unit, it may be in the best interest of the media/library professional to attempt to secure a contract provision which specifies the number of non-certified individuals who must be in the media centers. Therefore, when providing information to the teacher unit, the negotiating team, and the Board of Education team, they must understand the difference between the certified professional staff and the non-certified staff in the media program.

MEDIA/LIBRARY PROFESSIONAL (CERTIFIED)

This is the person who "has broad professional preparation in education and media, has appropriate certification, and possesses the competencies to initiate and implement a media program." These are the individuals who also can provide leadership roles in the use of media and in the design of facilities. They are legally allowed to be members of the teacher professional bargaining unit.

THE MEDIA SUPPORT STAFF (NON-CERTIFIED)

These individuals are usually the non-certified staff working in media/library programs, such as clerks, technicians, and media aides. These people report to the media/library professional, but are identified in the contract provisions relating to media/library personnel and their working conditions. The support staff is essential if the general program is to function well. The need for adequate clerical assistants is the most commonly found provision included in the sample contracts examined. However, as additional provisions are included in collective bargaining agreements, other support personnel such as technicians, trained graphics artists, maintenance individuals, television communications individuals, and computer operators will be included in contract language as they relate to the media/library program. The expansion of the media/library program will increase the need for clerical assistants and technicians in the ongoing operations. However, because of the variables in size of school districts and schools, the specific staff needed will vary from district to district and building to building. It is important to prepare the contract language to reflect local needs. The materials included in Chapter 4 of Media Programs: District and School will provide an excellent source of information in preparation for the negotiating process. Note that often non-certified or support staff belong to other bargaining units and must prepare information for their own units to promote their welfare and working conditions.

IV. OPERATION OF THE MEDIA/LIBRARY PROGRAM

The modern media/library program should reflect the guidelines and recommendations outlined in Media Programs: District and School. These recommendations include information on budgeting, purchasing, production, maintenance services, and program evaluation. The relationships among the provisions, the collective bargaining agreement, and these recommendations can be seen in the sample contract provisions in Chapter IV.

Boards of Education are responsible for representing the community in setting educational priorities and goals. While both parties at the bargaining table may desire a specific educational goal, the means to that end often differ. Understanding this and realizing that collective bargaining involves negotiations of wage, hours, and conditions of employment will often help to maintain an even approach to specific goals.

Media/library programs should reflect both long-range and short-range goals. This planning process includes the financial aspect of the media/library program and the resources needed to be an integral part of the instructional program within the district. The need for facilities and collections that will improve the working conditions of media/library professionals are the objectives of a fine program. The purchasing and processing of media materials is also of vital concern to the welfare of the media/library professional in the operation of an effective program. The production aspect of a program can also be influenced by the type of facilities planned, and by the contract provisions relating to the nature of library/media facilities and their production capabilities. This would include graphics facilities, photography facilities, television/audio production, and special provisions dealing with the production of teacher-made materials. All of these relate to the delivery of services to students. Whatever the design, a total concept for the media/library program must be developed and prepared for dissemination to all of those who are immediately affected by the program. If this is done properly, they can be incorporated into key elements within the contract affecting media/library professionals.

The next area to be examined is that of the collection. The collections that support the media/library program at the district and the local school level are established to meet the needs of students and teachers. Therefore, special contract provisions that promote media/library collections are advantageous for the improvement of learning and for quality education of students. A number of master agreements surveyed included provisions relating to the collections. Important elements needed in each collection may be included, such as the size of the collection, the organization of the collection, the overall media/library materials for the collection, and the selection policy used. The collection element also supports the need for certified media/library professionals who have responsibility for the selection process. There is no substitute for the media/library professional in selecting materials to meet the needs of the students and teachers in the education program. An important aspect of a media/library program is adoption of an official selection policy that supports either the AECT Code of Ethics, or the School Library Bill of Rights for school media center. It is the collections and the use of professional media/library staff in the school media centers that provide resources needed for quality education.

V. MEDIA/LIBRARY FACILITIES

Media/library facilities are the support element that enhances the media/library program. Proper types of facilities can be designed and the equipment needed can be negotiated as a special provision within the contract. Facilities can be identified with the local educational objectives and goals, and often represent an area of community pride. Therefore, when preparing the information for negotiations it is important to recognize the need for facilities to enhance the collection, enabling the professional staff to influence the learning environment within the school. All media/library facilities should be carefully planned by the media/library professional. At this time it is important to have media/library professionals involved in such district planning. Plans for district media facilities should take into consideration the many characteristics of a fine media program as described in Media Programs: District and School.

"Areas devoted to staff development programs are designed as models of effective teaching/learning spaces. Adequate parking is provided for all who will attend workshops, training sessions, demonstrations, and meetings. Facilities are available for use during after-school hours and during vacation periods. Functional and aesthetically pleasing furniture, equipment, and supplies are provided. Provision is made for equipment associated with production, evaluation, and use of materials. Adequate electrical outlets, light control, telephone and intercommunication devices, air conditioning, and sound control are provided as needed. Temperature and humidity controls are provided to prevent deterioration of collections."

The information in the facilities chapter will help in the presentation of information needed for any program issues related to adequate facilities to enhance the local program.

In summary, it should be understood that media/library programs and negotiations are not always compatible. While the administration attempts to maintain flexibility, the media/library professional tries to build program goals and protections into the contract. A key approach to negotiations is to understand the media/library program goals and communicate the needs of the media/library professional to the appropriate parties.

A word of caution: The usual small number of media/library professionals in a bargaining unit may prevent media/library professional goals from becoming a high priority. It should be possible to achieve the particular goals of a group within the bargaining unit. Proper involvement, preparation, and communication of goals and rationale regarding the media/library professional are the best method of achieving the goals of media/library professionals in your district.

CHAPTER VI
SUMMARY

In order for a media/library professional to best effect the collective bargaining process, he/she must understand negotiations and media/library programs. This text has attempted to explain the many processes of the collective bargaining process as well as standard media/library programs.

The consistent factor throughout this text is that an individual must get involved in the process in order to affect change. In order for an individual to fully comprehend the collective bargaining process, he/she must take part in the preparation and negotiation of a contract, and understand the administration of the completed document. While this and other texts will assist in the conceptual understanding of collective bargaining, it takes a commitment of time and energy to become involved in understanding the issues and negotiating these issues to a conclusion.

We have attempted not only to provide an understanding of the collective bargaining process, but to give sample contract language and a basic understanding of media/library programs. We felt that this would provide the media/library professional with the knowledge to affect changes in working conditions through collective bargaining.

There are many changes being discussed in the area of collective bargaining. These future considerations include a national public sector labor relations law giving all public sector media/library professionals the right to bargain collectively. In addition, many states are giving public sector employees the right to strike and management the right to hire replacements and/or discharge strikers. A third future consideration includes bargaining open to the public. This would permit the community to be present during negotiations; some proposals include the public in tripartite bargaining consisting of management, union, and the public.

As indicated in the text, collective bargaining is an intricate process in which a negotiator is required to have numerous talents. Involvement and experience is the surest way for an individual to learn the process and become familiar with the intra-cacies, strategies, and approaches to negotiations. In addition, possible changes in the process as well as the ongoing interpretations of cases make labor relations in the public sector an ever-changing process, which will affect the wages, hours, and conditions of employment of media/library professionals.
Professional Negotiations
