A survey of 278 students who completed at least one of six telecourses offered by Lane Community College (LCC) from Fall 1978 through Winter 1981 was conducted to determine: (1) background information on how students learned about the course, their reasons for enrolling and for selecting a telecourse rather than an on-campus course, and their LCC enrollment status; (2) course delivery information related to students' contact with the instructor; the appropriateness of the level, pace, and format of the programs; and the students' tendency to view the modules more than once; (3) course material information about the use and value of study materials, "after watching" activities, and videotexts; (4) general course information about the value of the course, temptation to drop the course, and particular features liked and disliked by the students; (5) general telecourse satisfaction and suggestions. Students were given the option of answering questions about their age, sex, and employment status. Selected findings, based on 222 responses, reveal that most of the students (56.3%) learned about the courses through LCC mailings, and that 44.1% of the respondents took the course to earn credit. 33.3% had a general interest in the subject, and 14% viewed the courses for professional improvement. The survey report briefly describes the telecourses and summarizes findings. The instrument is appended. (JP)
TELECOUSE SURVEY RESULTS

Introduction

Since spring term 1979, Lane Community College has been offering televocourses on a regular basis. The Consumer Education course was the first course using television as the primary instructional delivery mode to be offered to community residents. As this was Lane's first venture into televocourses, a study was conducted to gather information and opinions relative to the use of television as an educational delivery system (Alvergue et al., 1980). The results of this pilot venture were positive, and Lane continued to offer courses by television each subsequent term.

The televocourses were promoted by radio public service announcements, brochures, ads in local newspapers, articles in the student newspaper, and word-of-mouth. The "TV Week" section of the Eugene Register-Guard contained brief descriptions of each course module. The courses could be viewed on television or on the LCC campus.

Each course contained 18-30 modules of 30 minutes in length. A workbook containing a vocabulary section and pre- and postwatching activities was available for each televcourse. An orientation session was scheduled for each course in which instructors provided suggestions on how to take a televcourse. Students were expected to come to LCC 3-4 times during the term for test-taking. The instructors were available for office visits or student telephone conferences throughout the term.

From fall 1979 to winter 1981, LCC has offered 5 televocourses. They are:

- Introduction to Business
- The Drama of Child Development
- Consumer Education
- Your Health, Your Choice
- Mathematics for Modern Living

In addition, Cosmos, a television series presented on OEPBS, was aired fall term 1980 as part of the televcourse offerings. This course was composed of 13 one-hour video modules.

During this period, a total of 278 students completed courses in which the televcourse survey was distributed. This group represented 77.9% of the total number of students completing televcourses between spring 1979 and winter 1981. Each student in the identified courses was asked to complete a Televcourse Survey (attachment 1) which sought information on the student's reaction to the course content, its delivery, the instructional materials, the pacing of the course, and the instructor's role. Information was also gathered on how the student learned about the course, why the student decided to enroll in a televcourse, and general suggestions or concerns that the student had about televcourse offerings. Of those completing televcourses during this period, 222 (77.9%) responded to the Televcourse Survey. Table 1 (page 2) presents information on the response rate for the courses offered from fall 1979 to winter 1981.

Final number of students completing the course.
The remainder of this paper presents the composite results of student responses to selected core questions on the Telecourse Survey. All of the survey items were not included in this complete study due to the differences in course materials and course content between the six telecourses. Complete survey results for each of the individual telecourses are available in the Office of Program Evaluation or from the Telecourse Coordinator.

Background Information

The students were asked to volunteer information on their sex, age, and employment status. Of the respondents, 77.5% agreed to provide all (or part) of these data. Approximately 45% of these respondents were women and approximately 48% were 30 years old or less. Almost one-half (47%) of these students were full-time students at the time they completed the telecourse.

Of the 278 students completing the telecourses, 222 (79.9%) responded to the Telecourse Survey. Of these people, 197 (88.7%) had taken other classes at LCC. The majority (90.9%) of these students were enrolled in another LCC course during the term in which they took the telecourse.

The students learned about the telecourses in a variety of ways. However, the majority of respondents (56.8%) indicated that they first learned of the course through the college's mailing efforts (e.g., college catalogue, brochures). Table 2 presents data on the sources of information used by the students.

Various reasons were given by the students for enrolling in the telecourses. These reasons are presented in Table 3.

The telecourses were offered at times when other courses would have been available to the students "on-campus." Therefore, we were interested in finding out why students chose to enroll in a telecourse rather than a more traditional "on-campus" course. Table 4 shows the reasons given by students for selecting the telecourse offering.

</table>

The timing of the telecourses appears to be a major factor in selecting these courses over the "on-campus" offerings. This includes both the scheduling of viewing time on the television, as well as the ability to be flexible in viewing the modules on campus and in studying for the course.

Course Delivery Information

Almost all (93.2%) of the respondents said that they had direct contact with the telecourse instructor during the course. The types of instructor contact varied, but most of the students had "multiple" contacts with the instructor (e.g., both telephone contact and office visits). The types of instructor contact are shown in Table 5.

The modules were available for student viewing at the LCC Library. For some courses, they were also available at the Eugene Public Library and the LCC Math Resource Center. Also, the modules were often aired more than one time on the local television channels. This allowed students to view specific modules more than one time if needed. Of the respondents, 51.3% viewed a module more than one time. Often this was done to review specific information or to "pick up" parts that they had missed during the first viewing. The students liked being able to repeat a lesson in this fashion.

General Course Information

Of the respondents, 84.2% reported that the telecourse contained information which was of "higher-than-average" value to them. Only 14.4% of the students said that they had ever considered dropping the course. These students most frequently cited personal reasons (e.g., illness, job or home responsibilities) or difficulty with maintaining a viewing schedule as their major reason for thinking about dropping the course.

The students tended to watch the television modules both at home and at LCC. Table 6 shows information on where the students generally viewed the course.

</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

As reported earlier, approximately 89% of the students had taken other classes at LCC. Of the respondents, 53.2% stated that the telecourse, when compared to "on-campus" courses, was better. The reasons most frequently given for this feeling dealt with the flexibility of the scheduling of their viewing and studying, as well as the individualized nature of the course.

Conclusions

The majority of the students (86%) said that they would recommend a telecourse to a friend. This response appears to reflect the positive reactions that the student had toward the telecourses.

The majority of the students liked the flexibility provided by the telecourse format. Of particular appeal was the ability to progress at their own pace and to repeatedly view individual modules if needed. The students also felt that the telecourses were offered at convenient times and that ability to learn "via television" helped ease some of their transportation, home, and child care problems.
Most of the students enrolled in the telecourse to earn credits toward a degree or because of general interest in the subject. Since approximately 89% of the students had taken another LCC class, the telecourses have not yet reached a significant number of "new" students. However, this does provide the telecourse students with a basis for comparison.

The majority of the students felt that the telecourse contained information of value to them and that the telecourse was better than "on-campus" courses because of the flexibility it provided the student.

TELECOURSE SURVEY

Course: ___________________________  Term: __________
Instructor: _________________________

Directions:

We are asking your reaction to the TV course you took. Your answers will be added to those of other students so that you will not be individually identified.

A. For each item, check [✓] or circle the answer which best states your opinion.
B. Answer all the questions as completely as possible.
C. Return this survey to the instructor in the attached envelope.

Thanks for your help!

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

1. Have you taken a course by TV before?
   [ ] Yes  [ ] No

2. How did you first hear about this course? (Check only one response)
   [ ] Mail (college catalogue or other district information)
   [ ] TV
