This directory of Middle Eastern resource materials in or near Connecticut is designed for use by educators, librarians, media specialists, and the general public. The Middle East is defined as the part of the world known as Southwest Asia/North Africa (SWANA). The information is organized under ten major categories: associations and organizations; college courses and centers; curriculum materials and published information sources including materials for teaching about Iran, Afghanistan, and Turkey, two study units entitled "People and Places," and "Water in the Middle East," and a seminar outline on "Culture and Education in the Middle East;" films, filmstrips, slide sets, and artifact kits; national holidays in Middle Eastern countries; museums and art galleries; religious institutions that have Middle Eastern roots; representatives of Middle Eastern governments; restaurants and food shops; and specialty shops. The directory concludes with two articles--"The Lebanese Community in Hartford," and "Correcting Stereotypes about Middle Eastern Peoples." (RM)

DEDICATION

Middle East Studies is written for young people like our own four children who share in the Middle Eastern heritage. It is for David Taner, who was born at Gaziantep, Turkey. For Ruth Sevim who came to the world in Ankara, Turkey. For Beth Alev who was born in Beirut, Lebanon. For Priscilla Gülen who is our native born New Englander but who has still been inducted into much that is Middle Eastern. And for Kevork Esayan, who is the Armenian part of our extended family. It is also an expression of affection for their mother, Barbara M. Stone, who I courted on the shores of the Bosphorus and married in the city of St. Paul, Tarsus.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This catalogue could not have been compiled without much assistance from my colleagues at The University of Connecticut and graduate students who have shared ESTM 448: Seminar in International Education - Culture and Education in the Middle East. I particularly thank the Reference Room and Special Collections staffs at The University of Connecticut Library.

INTRODUCTION

A Catalogue of Middle East Area Studies Resources in or near Connecticut has been designed for use by educators, librarians, media specialists, and the general public who may wish to obtain knowledge about Middle Eastern affairs. It is to be a companion to Asian Studies: A Catalogue of Asian Resources in Connecticut compiled by Colleen A. Kelly and issued by The I.N. Thut World Education Center in 1980.

The definition of the Middle East has been widely drawn for the purpose of selecting materials to be included in this catalogue. Geographically, we are concerned with the part of the world known as SWANA, South West Asia/ North Africa where there is considerable cultural and topographical affinity. SWANA stretches from Morocco on the Atlantic to Pakistan. It goes from Greece and Turkey, and the islands of the Aegean Sea to Sudanic Africa. It includes minority peoples such as the Armenians, Copts, Druze, and Kurds.

Our aim has been to provide a compendium of information organized under ten major categories. In a work of this nature it is never possible to be totally inclusive or absolutely correct. There will certainly be mistakes and omissions in this first edition, for which we apologize. If suggestions, corrections and additional data can be sent in to The I.N. Thut World Education Center they will help us to improve when a second edition is prepared. We hope, however, that even with its flaws this catalogue will be a practical assistance to anyone who is interested in Middle East Studies in the State of Connecticut.

A SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY OF RECENT BOOKS ON THE MIDDLE EAST

These titles have been chosen as suggested background reading for instructors and students. A number of textbooks for various ages of learners are cited, and there are some children's books.

Scholastic World Cultures Program THE MIDDLE EAST. New York: Scholastic Book Services, Inc., 1972. 1832 pp., glossary, index. Middle and high school level.

IRAN (PERSIA)

The purpose of this short sketch is to help teachers and students acquire a basic knowledge and understanding of the people, culture, customs, geography, history and Islamic Revolution of Iran. To this end, four types of materials are listed.

FILMS

IRAN 16 mm., color, 18 min. 1972. Pyramid. This is a beautiful portrayal of pre-revolutionary Iran that shows the old and the new. The sound track contains authentic conversation, music, and street noise.

IRAN 16 mm., color, 11 min. 1964. Coronet. Although older, this film shows the great Empires of Cyrus and Darius, the splendid palaces of the first "world state" at Persepolis, historic roads, gold coinage and the government by Satraps. We see famous sites such as the Hellespont and Thermopylae and the Bay of Salamis where power shifted from the Persians to the Greeks in 476 A.D.

MATERIALS FOR MIDDLE EAST STUDIES PROGRAMS

TURKEY

Periodicals:

CURRENT TURKISH THOUGHT, New Series Ilter Turan, (ed.) Redhouse Press, P.K. 142, Istanbul, Turkey. This is a quarterly, written by Turkish scholars in English, issued since 1969. Each issue is on a specialized topic such as politics, theater, economics, education, or literary developments. Subscriptions are $5.

PITTSBURGH TURKISH-AMERICAN ASSOCIATION NEWS. PTAA, P.O. Box 7576, Pittsburgh, PA 15213. Ten issues a year, mainly in English with some Turkish, general cultural articles and news of the Turkish American community. Membership is $15 for regular families, $1 for limited income students.

THE TURKISH STUDIES ASSOCIATION BULLETIN. Issued semi-annually, with short articles, abstracts of papers, book reviews, and announcements. Membership is $10 a year to: Prof. Margaret Hoell, TSA Treasurer, 1421 North Day Road, Tucson, AZ 85715

TURKEY TODAY. A monthly bulletin issued by the Turkish Embassy, 1606 23rd Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20008 Free on request.

TURKIYEMIZ (Our Turkey). Issued three times a year since 1973 by Akbank, a private Turkish bank, containing excellent color illustrations. The text is in Turkish, but English summaries are also provided. Each issue is 100 T.L. Order from Akbank Genel Müdurlüğü, Kültür Uzmanlığı, Findikli, Istanbul, Turkey.

UNITED TURKISH AMERICANS NEWSLETTER. This is a quarterly published by the United Turkish Americans, 407 South Dearborn, Suite 925, Chicago, IL 60605. It contains short articles on events and issues of concern to Turkish Americans, and the contents are all in English. $10 a year.

Books:

Aziz Nesin, ISTANBUL BOY, Part II (Yo1) Same translator and publisher. 181 pp. These are two collections of biographical sketches by one of modern Turkey’s most famous authors and humorists. They convey many insights regarding growing up in Turkey’s metropolis about fifty years ago.

Dodd, C.H. DEMOCRACY AND DEVELOPMENT IN TURKEY. Beverley, U.K.: The Eothen Press, 1979. Based on lectures given at the University of Hull, this is an interpretation of the Turkish political scene by a British scholar. It contains a good list of suggested works for further reading. Order from The Eothen Press,

An ethnographic field study of a Turkish town called Susurluk done by a Turkish speaking American anthropologist in 1969-70. The photographs and diagrams are useful. The study gives a good description of town life in western Turkey at a time when there was rapid modernization. Order from John Wiley and Sons, New York.

This village ethnography has become a classic. It was done by a British anthropologist who lived in Turkish villages for a year. Stirling interprets the structure of village life, describing the social groups and relationships that are as true of rural Turkey today as they were fifteen years ago. The book is also illustrated and contains graphs.

Films, Filmstrips, Slides:

A new filmstrip and instructional guide is being prepared in 1981 about the life and work of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, the founder of modern Turkey, as part of the recognition of the centennial of his birth. Designed especially for use in secondary schools, this material will present Atatürk to American students.

The I.N. Thut World Education Center Media Collection contains two slide sets:

EDUCATION IN TURKEY. 55 slides concern the Turkish educational system and show schools and other institutions of learning. Prepared in 1972.

16 mm., color, film

TURKIYE. By Claude Lelouch, copyright 1977. Sixteen minutes. Pyramid Films, produced for the Turkish Ministry of Information. See TWEC Film Study Guide, Number One, 1979, for a description of this film. It can be rented from the Center for Instructional Media and Technology, Box U-1, The University of Connecticut, Storrs, Ct. 06268.

Artifacts:

There is an extensive kit of authentic artifacts and print media on Turkey that was assembled by TWEC for loan to schools and cultural groups. It may be borrowed for periods of two weeks from the Learning Resources Area, Room 119, School of Education. Contact Dr. Byungchae Cora Hahn, Director, to reserve the kit at 486-3080.
A MIDDLE EAST STUDY UNIT FOR YOUNG LEARNERS
"People and Places in the Middle East"

The aim of this unit of instruction is to become acquainted with the life styles of four children the same ages as the American students. Each of the four Middle Eastern children is living at a different site in the area. Each is part of a different family and social structure.

Objectives

1. Awareness that culture is learned and is different in differing environments and social situations.
2. Recognition that culture is a means of adaptation.
3. Realization that family and social structures that differ from ours may be effective in those situations.
4. Appreciation of the cultural heritage of children in another part of the world - their folk stories, food, games and music.
6. Sympathy for the problems and potentials of contemporary Middle Eastern children.

Content

The unit would be constructed around the experiences of four hypothetical children. (1) Ahmet of Balgat village in Turkey. (2) Shoshana of Kibbutz Kiryat Yedidim in Israel. (3) Mohammed of Cairo, Egypt. (4) Shahnaz of Shiraz, Iran.

Process

1. The children would collect pictures of the four Middle Eastern settings.
2. Maps would be drawn to show where the four children live.
3. Pictures of the children and their families would be drawn, showing typical clothing and social structures.
4. Using the artifact kits that can be borrowed from the Learning Resources Area, students would explore objects from the four settings.
5. Individuals who have actually grown up in places similar to these four would come and act as informants for the students.
6. The students would learn about daily life, holidays, and fine and folk arts from each place.

   6.1 They would prepare a meal with indigenous foods.
   6.2 They would learn songs in the four languages.
   6.3 They would learn to play games from each country.
AN INSTRUCTIONAL UNIT: AFRICA AND THE MIDDLE EAST
Ms. Colleen Kelly, Instructor
Roger Ludlowe High School
Fairfield, Connecticut

Rationale

In light of the present day American problems with "identity", focusing on Africa as a culture area with both unique and similar, admirable and reproachable aspects becomes necessary for our total understanding of humanity. Living in a society where we are exposed to many racial misconceptions, we may, by observing racially different cultures in their own terms, reassess our perceptions. The rich history of Africa is a starting point for many of the customs, habits and people of the Americas. It is therefore worthy of study by young people.

Sharing the African and Asian continents is another cultural entity, the Middle East. Rooted both in North Africa and in West Asia this area has been the source of much of western thought. From the Middle East spring three of the great religions of revelation: Judaism, Christianity and Islam. Traditional and contemporary Middle Eastern issues influence the past and the present of the entire planet. Both on the basis of its own worth, and also due to the impact of its cultures on the whole world, the Middle East demands our attention.

Learning new ideas, investigating how and why people do things, and seeing others from their own frames of reference are the processes that lead us to undertake this study of Africa and the Middle East. In addition, we may also learn more about ourselves, by finding out how and why we do things of a similar nature. We may acquire a new measure of awareness, understanding and tolerance in dealing with individuals who have cultural backgrounds that are different than our own. Other anticipated learnings include include continuing to develop the skills of reading, oral communication, listening, and writing that were begun in earlier years. New ways of working with the social sciences to understand life better will also be introduced. The cultures under study will be approached mainly through the humanities, with an emphasis on inquiry, critical thinking and the discovery method in the classroom.

In order to become independent thinkers and responsible citizens, student must have tools of investigation and acquire at least vicarious experience. Learning to work from primary sources, to generalize without stereotyping, to distinguish and to question are essential attributes of this program. Although the approach is humanistic rather than scientific, this does not preclude introducing and using social science methodologies. More questions will be raised than answers supplied. This is in accord with the realities of life and may act as a motive for lifelong inquiry.
Description

The themes to be included in the unit will focus on the why and ways of life: family, kinship groups, tribes, national governments, the arts and religion, as well as history. Chronology need not serve more than an incidental purpose. The individual interests of the students may be developed by project work which can delve more deeply into particulars.

   7. Non-alignment and the Middle East
Objectives

There are four affective goals of this course.

1. Drawing on the life experiences of the students in order to help them to empathize with various points of view.
2. Learning to value societies in their own terms.
3. Feeling into social customs and traditions by role playing, dramatizations, creative writing and conversations.
4. Appreciating a variety of artistic, literary and musical styles.

Nine cognitive purposes are stressed.

5. Analyzing concepts and situations on the basis of content that has been provided for this purpose.
6. Employing social science disciplines such as anthropology, economics, geography, history and sociology in order to interpret aspects of African and Middle Eastern cultures.
7. Distinguishing among extended family, clan, tribal and national boundaries.
8. Deducing life styles and cultural patterns from authentic artifacts.
9. Becoming familiar with African and Middle Eastern biography and literatures by reading and using audio-visual media.
10. Evaluating different historical accounts in order to identify the assumptions and point of view the account for the historians' perspectives.
11. Distinguishing enabling and limiting factors in economic development.
12. Learning sufficient historical background to understand contemporary situations.
13. Debating conflicting points of view on the basis of defensible evidence and well organized research findings.

Five psychomotor skill areas are also emphasized.

14. Constructing and interpreting cartoons, charts, graphs and maps.
15. Participating in activities, games, projects and other group processes.
16. Attending performances and lectures, and taking part in field trips.
17. Making use of library materials to organize a study project.
18. Handling and manipulating media resources.

Evaluation

The students keep journals to record their personal responses to class experiences and make comments on events that relate to the areas being studied. There are debates, mock trials, role playing and simulations of games that are indigenous to Africa and the Middle East. Class discussions are encouraged. Students make self-evaluations, and there are objective quizzes and essay tests. Individual study projects are varied out and reported in term papers. There are also class projects.
A SECONDARY OR COLLEGE LEVEL MULTI-MEDIA STUDY UNIT
"Water in the Middle East"
Prepared by Mr. Eliezer Manneberg

Aims in Teaching about the Middle East

"Learning is the process by which an activity originates or is changed through reacting to an encountered situation..."
E.R. Hilgard and G.H. Bower, Theories of Learning.

A good teaching method is to provide learning experiences through activities of inquiry that test the learner's knowledge of the methods of analysis, discovery and problem solving. In order to accomplish this basic aim, more specific objectives have to be formulated, because this process helps teachers to identify the instructional approaches that ought to be employed. Also, when they are shared with the students, well conceived learning objectives provide a basis for self-evaluation. Instruction also usually requires audio, printed or visual media in the curriculum design. This "software" can be intelligently selected only in light of affective and cognitive objectives.

Objectives

1. Recall major facts about the Middle East such as some dates, events, names and locations of places, names of various culture groups, and the names and actions of persons.

2. Identify dependable sources of information on specific Middle East topics such as the soil and water concerns in the region.

3. Make generalizations about particular Middle Eastern cultures and be able to support them with adequate evidence.

4. Interpret environmental and social data from specific Middle Eastern countries and the sub-regions that comprise this area of the world.

5. Distinguish among primary and secondary, accurate and biased sources of information concerning the Middle East.

6. Describe the nature, causes and dimensions of a broad Middle Eastern problem such as water.

7. Analyze the impact that the exploitation of their basic natural resources and industrialization has had on Middle Eastern societies.

8. Compare issues and problems in the Middle East with their counterparts in the United States and elsewhere in the world.

9. Predict the probable effects of changes in some key environmental factor in a Middle Eastern country, such as drought or the salination of existing water resources.
10. Recognize that there may be more than one defensible point of view regarding most aspects of Middle Eastern life.

11. Have greater sensitivity and awareness regarding the controversial development issues in the Middle East.

12. Have more responsibility in public policy discussions and actions that are related to Middle Eastern affairs.

Program

This instructional unit consists of four case studies, each of which is described in some detail. Teaching strategies are suggested for each case study and audio-visual media are identified and annotated.

Case Study Number One - The Universality of Water Problems and America's Water Problems

Providing adequate water supplies and conserving water
Agricultural water uses and irrigation
Water as an energy source and in industry
Water transportation
Pollution, desalination and purification of water
Technologies for harnessing water resources
Water rights

Case Study Number Two - Water Problems in the Middle East

Cultivated land, precipitation and population densities
Middle Eastern irrigation methods
Agriculture in various regions of the Middle East
Climatic diversity in the Middle East
Middle Eastern river systems
Evidence that the lack of water resources is regarded as a problem in Middle Eastern countries

Case Study Number Three - The Nile River as a Source of Life for Egypt and the Sudan

Describing the contemporary irrigation system of the Nile
Comparing it with ancient irrigation systems
The Nile as an energy source
A historical survey of conflicts in which Nile water rights have played a factor
Comparing population growth with the Egyptian land and water supplies
Investigating the Aswan High Dam
Exploring the fellah culture of the Nile River Valley
Case Study Number Four - Reclaiming the Desert in Israel

Identify the fertile and desert areas in ancient times
On a map of modern Israel color the fertile and desert areas, and trace the route of the National Water Carrier Discuss Israel's current water problems on the basis of the data you collected
Imagine that you are a new settler in one of the Arava Kibbutzim and list the obstacles with which you would have to cope.
Study the agricultural development of Israel during the past two decades to see how water policies have affected crop production
Review the international problems that have developed concerning the equitable use of the waters of the Jordan River
Explore desalination in Israel as a solution to water problems
Compare the water problems of Egypt and Israel, Iran and Turkey Compare water problems and their solutions in the Middle East and the United States
Draw up a proposal for a comprehensive project for developing and using water resources in one region of the Middle East

This study unit is more fully described in an eighteen page curriculum guide on file at The I.N. Thut World Education Center. Eliezer Manneberg is a doctoral graduate of The University of Connecticut in the field of International Education. He is a graduate of the Middle East Studies program

A GRADUATE LEVEL SEMINAR
ESIM 448: Seminar in International Education - Culture and Education in the Middle East
Dr. Frank A. Stone, Instructor
Department of Educational Studies and Instructional Media
School of Education, The University of Connecticut
Storrs, Ct.

Rationale

The seminar is especially designed for educators who teach about Southwest Asia/North Africa, have an interest in Americans of Middle Eastern ethnicity, or are otherwise involved in this vital region of the world. ESIM 448 is one of several three credit, graduate level seminars in international education that focus on Africa, Asia and Latin America; as well as the Middle East. Usually one of these seminars pertaining to a major area of the world is taught each semester. Many of the students may have previously studied ESIM 407: Comparative Education and Society or ESIM 408: International Development Education.

Contents

Instruction concerning seven major regions of the Middle East is included in the program of this seminar.

1. The Arab Middle East - especially Egypt, Jordan, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria
2. The State of Israel
3. The Maghreb region of North Africa: Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia and Libya
4. Minority Peoples in the Middle East such as Armenians, Assyrians, Bècters, Copts, Druze, and Kurds
5. Cyprus, Greece and Turkey
6. The Islamic Republic of Iran
7. Afghanistan and Pakistan

Process

Each of the seven main focuses is approached by studying the cultural heritage of that part of the Middle East. This provides a framework for exploring the interfacing among educational processes and development objectives in that setting. The investigations then consider historic and contemporary educational systems that have been implemented in those parts of the region, such as the Muslim maktab and madrasah, Kibbutz education, and the Turkish Village Institutes. Middle Eastern educational organizations are also studied, as well as the experiences of Middle Eastern immigrants to the United States.
Informants who are specialists on the various aspects of Middle East Studies or natives of the region contribute their special knowledges to the seminar. Use is also made of instructional media such as films, slides, artifacts, and special print materials concerning each part of the Middle East that is studied.

Members of the seminar are expected to do extensive background reading in texts and supplementary sources. Those who have a reading knowledge of a Middle Eastern language will be requested to do some appropriate reading in original sources.

Each seminar participant is asked to prepare two major products as a result of this learning experience.

1. A proposal for a unit or course of instruction about some aspect of Middle East Studies that is appropriate for use with learners at an elementary, secondary or university level.

2. A report of a scholarly investigation or field study concerning some aspect of Middle Eastern culture and education, such as the Armenian Day School Movement, the modernization of higher education in a Middle Eastern society, Middle Eastern literacy, family planning or health education campaigns, or the impact of religious revival on educational programs in the region.

Aims and Objectives

1. Acquainting professional educators with the cultural, educational, and socio-political dynamics of Middle Eastern societies.

2. Increasing awareness of the ethnic groups resident in southern New England and the United States with origins in the Middle East.

3. Providing a sufficiently inclusive background regarding the geography, history and cultural heritage of Middle Eastern peoples that professional educators will be able to interpret educational movements and issues in this region of the world.

4. Giving some appreciation of the fine and folk arts of Middle Eastern peoples so that educators can include instruction about these domains in their teaching.

5. Helping professional educators to understand the background and causes of controversies and conflicts among Middle Eastern nations and peoples.

6. Assisting educators to make plans and acquire new skills so that they will be more effective teachers of Middle East Studies.

Learning Objectives of the Unit

A. Process Aims
1. To expand inquiry skills and the ability to observe, and to formulate concepts, generalizations and hypotheses.
2. To further the ability of students to use a film as a creative tool for learning.

B. Content Aims
1. To introduce students to the four major civilizations that have flourished in Asia Minor (Anatolia).
2. To help the students acquire a basic understanding about:
   a. The people of Turkey and some of their customs.
   b. Turkish dualities such as the pull of the East and the West, forces of tradition and those of change, and the elite Bosphorus civilization contrasted with the "folk" culture of Anatolia.
   c. Some recognition of the geography, technology and economy of the modern Republic of Turkey.
3. To provide educators with a teaching instrument which, when used in a broad program concerning the Third World, the Middle East, or World Civilizations, will help students to form some impressions and make generalizations about a larger area of the world.

Basic Information about Turkey

An Analysis of the Film

Türkiye contains about seventy sequences. There is no commentary so you and your students are put in the position of being "participant/observers" of the Turkish scene. There is dramatic music written for the film by Francis Lai, who composed the score for "Love Story" and occasionally the authentic sounds of indigenous music or conversations in Turkish can be heard.

End
1. On the first day introduce the unit of study by briefly explaining that a film about the Republic of Turkey is going to be shown. Ask the students to pay close attention to what the film may show them about ten areas of Turkish life. They might have sheets of paper listing the ten areas and providing space to note down what is observed in each category.

1. What Turks look like (appearance and physique)
2. The physical topography of their country.
3. Interpersonal relations among people in Turkey.
4. The historical background of Asia Minor (Anatolia).
5. Turkish religion.
6. Family life in Turkey.
7. Crops and agricultural practices.
8. Traditional customs that still seem to be important.
10. What school life and being a child or youth is like in Turkey.

2. After the film has been viewed for the first time, the rest of the period could be used for a discussion of the observations and hypotheses of the students. remind the students that they must be careful about making generalizations because the film shows only selected scenes from western Turkey. All of eastern Anatolia and Thrace, more than half of Turkey, are not shown at all. There are urban and village scenes, but little that portrays life in Turkish towns.

3. Ask your students to identify other categories of social experience that the film does not show. (Some possibilities are home life, recreational activities, old age, commercial and banking institutions, courts, the penal system, public transportation, much of Ottoman history, any suggestion of Armenian presence in the area, contemporary minorities, the role of women . . .) They might speculate about why these topics are omitted in favor of those that were included.

4. Distribute outlines of the contents of the film when the students come in for the second day of the unit. Discuss the material with them so that they will have more orientation before they look at the film again. Compare the list of contents with what they were able to observe and identify on their own the first day. Then show the film again, and allow some time for another discussion of it.

5. Invite your students to select topics related to Türkiye for special additional study and research. These might include: Tasavvuf, the Sufi Mystical Orders of Islam; the career of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, cities and towns such as Bursa, Konya, Istanbul and Ankara; village life in Turkey, Hittite, Greek, Roman, Byzantine or Crusader archeology; the Seljuk Turks; policies of the Ottoman era; modernization in Turkey; Turkish art, music, folklore, folk dance, cuisine, costume, or literature; Turkish Islam, the Turkish language reform, Turkish "guest workers" in Europe . . .

6. Borrow slides sets and artifact kit from the World Education Project so that your students have other means of getting acquainted with Turkish culture.

7. Invite a Turkish American or someone from Turkey to visit your class and talk with your students. The students might prepare some questions to ask their informant.

8. Show the film again for the third and last time after the students have given their reports and you have had the Turkish informant. Invite your students to reflect on the aspects of the film that they now are aware of. How have their assumptions about Turkey and the Turkish people changed during this unit of study? What more would they like to learn about Turkish Studies?

The various religious communities in the Middle East also celebrate their respective religious holidays. The different Christian confessions follow several calendars, so not all of their festivals necessarily come on the same days. Jewish holidays conform to the Hebrew calendar. Several major ones were indicated with the information concerning the State of Israel. All Muslims celebrate Hiraj (New Year), Ramadan (the annual month of dawn to dusk fasting), and 'Id al Fitr and 'Id al Adha. Due to the lunar calendar, however, these festivals move throughout the year and cannot be exactly predicted in the more orthodox societies until the new moon has actually been sighted.

THAT HAVE MIDDLE EASTERN ROOTS

ANTIOCHIAN ORTHODOX CHURCHES

This Christian communion is of Syrian background and many of its members are former residents of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Palestine and Syria. All of the churches of this denomination in the United States are now part of the Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese of All North America with its headquarters at 358 Mountain Road, Englewood, N.J. 07631. The head of the church in the United States is Metropolitan Archbishop Philip Saleba, who leads ninety-two churches with over 100,000 communicants.

ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH

Most Armenians who have immigrated to the United States from the Middle East are members of the Armenian Apostolic Church. Smaller groups of Armenians, however, are Roman Catholics using the Armenian Rite, or Protestants associated with the Armenian Evangelical Union. There are no specifically Armenian Roman Catholic or Protestant churches in Connecticut, but there are four Armenian Apostolic Churches in our state. The first three are part of the Diocese of the Armenian Church of America, which is directly under the jurisdiction of the Catholico of All Armenians in Holy Etchmiadzin in Soviet Armenia. The Primate of this communion in the United States is the Most Rev. Archbishop Torkom Manoogian, St. Vartan Cathedral, 630 Second Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016. The last church listed belongs to the Armenian Apostolic Church of America, which is affiliated with the See of Cilicia, now located at Antelias, Lebanon. The Prelate of this communion in the United States is the Rev. Bishop Mesrob Ashjian, St. Illuminators' Cathedral, 138 East 39th Street, New York, N.Y. 10016. The beliefs and liturgies of the two Armenian Apostolic denominations are identical, and their division is one of jurisdiction.

ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST

This communion is the Syriac-speaking, Nestorian Church that was anathematized by Western Christians at the Council of Ephesus in 431 A.D. Its center was originally at Edessa, and after it was harried from the Roman Empire, it survived in eastern Anatolia and sent missionaries as far East as India and China. During World War One the Assyrians were driven from their home region in the mountains of Hakkari by the Ottoman Turks and had to re-settle in Iraq and Syria.

BAHA'I FAITH

The Baha'i belong to a religious movement that originally was founded in Iran by Baha'u'llah (1817-1892) with its origins in Shia Islam among the disciples of "the Bab", Sayyid Ali Muhammed (1819-1850). Driven from Iran by persecution, the Baha'is moved first to Bagdad and later established their international headquarters at Haifa, Israel. One of five Baha'i temples in the world is located at Wilmette, Illinois. The Baha'i religion claims to be the culmination and fulfillment of all the world religions. It has no clergy and little ritual. Although it is Middle Eastern in origin, not many American Baha'is are of Middle Eastern ancestry.

GREEK ORTHODOX

The Ecumenical Patriarchate of the Greek Orthodox Church is located at Kumkapi, Istanbul (ancient Byzantium or Constantinople), Turkey. Churches of this communion are located throughout the Middle East and their communicants may be Arab, as well as Greek, Christians. In the United States, churches of this denomination are affiliated with the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America, 8-10 E. 79th Street, New York, N.Y. 10021, which has over two million members.

ISLAM

Friday prayers for Muslims attending several universities in Connecticut are held on campus, especially for the religious holidays. There are three places of Muslim worship in Connecticut cities.

There are many Conservative, Orthodox and Reform Synagogues in the State of Connecticut. Although some Sephardic or Oriental Jews from Middle Eastern countries attend these institutions, they trace their background to the Ashkenazi communities of eastern and western Europe. Most, however, provide instruction in Hebrew and many also have courses about Israel and Middle Eastern Jewry. It has not been possible to list all of these places of worship here, but they can be identified by looking in a local telephone directory under "Synagogues" in the yellow pages.

MARONITE

This is a Roman Catholic Uniate communion in the East whose name comes from St. Maron, a Syrian celibate who died around 423. This group has long been united with the See of Rome, their Latin ties going back at least to the time of the Crusades in Lebanon and Syria in the thirteenth century. There has been a Maronite College in Rome since 1584. This rite uses a West Syriac liturgy and their Patriarch is known as "Patriarch of Antioch and All the East." He resides at Bkirk and Kannobin, two cloisters in the vicinity of Beirut, Lebanon. There are about 470,000 Maronites in Lebanon, constituting 30 percent of the population, and 380,000 people hold this faith in North and South America.

REPRESENTATIVES OF MIDDLE EASTERN GOVERNMENTS

There are no consulates of Middle Eastern nations in Connecticut because our state is usually served from New York City. There are, however, offices of five Middle Eastern countries in Boston, as well, so these are also listed. In most cases, these consulates or missions can arrange for qualified speakers regarding their societies. Some of them have films that can be borrowed. Brochures and pamphlets about the nations that they represent can be obtained from some of these offices, which also may issue bulletins or newsletters for their constituencies.

RESTAURANTS AND FOOD SHOPS

These are all places where Middle Eastern foods are prepared. In many cases the owners or chefs would be willing to discuss the cuisine with students, and might even demonstrate how certain dishes are cooked. Your students might enjoy the experience of having a typical Middle Eastern dinner at one of these establishments.

SPECIALTY SHOPS

Most of the typical crafts and manufacturing skills for which Middle Eastern societies are famous haven't transferred very well to the New World. The bazaar or chamba (marketplace) or a souk (covered market) almost anywhere in the region would contain wonderful spice shops, jewelry stores where silver and gold filigree is made, copper shops where beautiful and functional utensils are produced, and many tailoring and shoe making establishments. Even pharmacies, grocery stores, green grocers and butcher shops in the Middle East make our American counterparts seem pale in comparison. Although not many specialty shops of these kind exist in southern New England, we can list some very interesting places that you and your students may wish to visit.

CONNECTICUT SPECIALTY SHOPS

The Middle Eastern traditional folk craft that is best known in the United States is oriental carpet and rug making. It was possible to identify seventeen oriental rug merchants in our state, most of whom are also experts on the motifs and designs contained in the carpets in their stocks. Many of them make frequent trips to the Middle East and actually go to the local towns and villages in order to purchase rugs. They are an excellent source of knowledge about this part of the Middle Eastern heritage.

The Lebanese immigration to Hartford began at the end of the 19th century, and by 1910, there were about a hundred Lebanese in Hartford.

Most of these immigrants were from Zgharta and its neighboring villages in North Lebanon. A few came from the city of Beirut. A number of the Zgharta people had come to the United States earlier, settling in Springfield, Massachusetts, where they were able to find employment and be with friends. This was made possible, in large part, by Mrs. Mantura Frangie, a Lebanese immigrant for whom the American dream came true.

Mrs. Frangie was born into a rich Zgharta family. As a young girl, she wanted to attend school in Jerusalem but her mother would not allow her to leave home. As there were no schools for girls in the Zgharta area at that time, Mantura remained illiterate.

Reproduced from Arab Perspectives, 2(2), February, 1981, pp. 9-16 with permission.
After an unhappy arranged marriage, Mrs. Frangie was sent to America. She came first to Alabama where others from Zgharta had settled, but later, in 1878, moved to Springfield. She began her career by peddling dry goods. As her profits increased, she bought a wagon and later a store, and began to outfit friends and relatives with material for peddling. By the time of her death in 1932, Mrs. Frangie had 300 salesmen in her employ and their territory covered western Massachusetts and Connecticut.

When Mrs. Frangie's fortunes began to rise, her reputation reached Zgharta and the neighboring villages in North Lebanon. The economic and political situation in Lebanon was not good and many of her countrymen from the area, encouraged by Mrs. Frangie's success and her willingness to help new immigrants, came to the U.S. to seek a better life. The Frangies would bond the immigrants and set them up in business.

By 1920, so many Lebanese Americans had moved out of the Hartford area that those who remained felt the need to maintain and strengthen their relationships with the larger and more powerful Lebanese community in Springfield. Bonds of kinship, background, and customs were perpetuated for quite some time.

In the 30's there was a new wave of immigration to Hartford. Although some of the new immigrants came directly from Lebanon, most were from other places in the United States: Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Maine, Ohio and Pennsylvania. A substantial number were American-born whose parents had come from different areas of Lebanon, including Zahleh, Batroun, Ma'asir al-Shouf and Ain Zhalta.

Many names were changed by Ellis Island officials or were anglicized at a later date. Many of the third- and fourth-generation Lebanese-Americans have intermarried with people of other ethnic groups; thus women now have surnames that do not identify their Lebanese background.

The Frangies would bond the immigrants and set them up in business. Mrs. Frangie, nicknamed "Queen Mary," was able to provide political support and acted as intermediary between the new immigrants and the government. Most of these immigrants were related to one another.

The group that came to Hartford was small and somewhat overwhelmed by the large numbers of immigrants from other countries. Many of the Lebanese who were able to save enough money, migrated to other parts of Connecticut and to Pennsylvania where they opened their own businesses.

They belonged to a different Catholic Uniate Church (more than half of them were Melkites) and were traditionally less individualistic and more open to assimilation.

Over the years, the balance was gradually shifted again and the most recent immigrants have come from Lebanon itself. The new immigrants usually live with relatives until they are able to make their own living and most families have supported relatives at one time or another.

The new immigrants reflect the United States' policy of selecting individuals able to contribute to the needs of the United States. These are mainly highly-trained individuals, including doctors, engineers and pharmacists who are part of the "brain drain" from which Lebanon suffers.

There are between 1,000 and 2,000 people of Lebanese origin in Greater Hartford today. Obtaining a more accurate estimate presents a formidable task. Many names were changed by Ellis Island officials or were Anglicized at a later date. Many of the third and fourth generation Lebanese-Americans have intermarried with people of other ethnic groups, thus women now have surnames that do not identify their Lebanese background. Then, there is the absence of a religious institution or an ethnic school which would have provided support for a Lebanese identity. In fact, most of the third generation know nothing about Lebanon except what they see on television.

"Many names were changed by Ellis Island officials or were anglicized at a later date. Many of the third- and fourth-generation Lebanese-Americans have intermarried with people of other ethnic groups; thus women now have surnames that do not identify their Lebanese background."

In the past few years there has been a new emphasis by third generation members on ethnic identity and an increased interest in learning about Lebanon.

Identity in the Middle East is based on the family, the village of origin and one's religious sect. Because the early Lebanese settlers in Hartford shared these aspects, they were able to maintain a closely knit group.

Most of the Lebanese who came to Hartford were from isolated mountain areas where the family was the central social and economic unit and family relationships were rigidly defined. The family was essentially... producing unit and children were considered a source of wealth and income rather than expense. Large families were quite common. Parental authority was all-powerful, with the father as the supreme decision-maker and disciplinarian. The ideal mother was supposed to be soft and gentle as the father was rugged and stern. Her function was to provide love and protection and to leave discipline to the father. Young children were generally fussed over and spoiled but as they entered adolescence, they were treated like adults and were expected to shoulder adult responsibilities. Older children took care of their siblings as a matter of course and acted as parental surrogates. Overall, the key to the successful operation of the family was mutual responsibility.

The father continued to be viewed as the final authority in all matters of discipline but because he was away on business much of the week, routine discipline was taken over by the mother.

In the new culture, parents had less direct control over the lives of their children, who attended American schools. The schools promoted American social customs and expectations that were often alien to the parents. First-generation American Lebanese were caught between the old-country traditions of their parents and the new-world values of their peers. Now and now, parents favored sending children to parochial schools because of the stricter discipline.

Girls were always chaperoned and there was no dating. Young people were channeled into marriages with persons of the same religion and similar background in the belief that by minimizing areas of differences and conflict, there would be a greater guarantee of marital happiness. While these and similar ideals are still voiced occasionally, they were not enforced by the second generation or followed by the third. Assimilation into the American middle class has had minimal effect on the Lebanese concept of family responsibility and solidarity.

Meanwhile, a phenomenon common to many immigrant groups has occurred. As the early immigrants and first generation struggled to preserve customs and mores that were appropriate at the turn of the century, these same customs had gradually become obsolete in the old country. Second-generation Americans who visited Lebanon were amazed at the anachronisms that were propagated and perpetuated by earlier immigrants in the U.S.

Religion

The majority of the Lebanese in Hartford are Uniate Catholics. The early immigrants attended the local Roman Catholic services and occasionally the Maronite services in Springfield. The Maronite priest would come to Hartford for baptisms or marriages which were usually held in a borrowed church basement. The Roman Catholic clergy ministered to Maronites and Melkites, but it was apparent that assimilation meant Latinization. Because of the absence of a paramount Maronite church in the immediate area and the unavailability of Maronite parochial schools, many of the third generation and even some of the first and second generation had no idea what the Maronite rite was. In 1972, the Maronites began a drive to build a mission church but the project is still in progress. in the planning stage. Over 50% of the Maronites prefer to maintain ties with other churches and parishes, thus illustrating their integration into the general population. Masses for the dead are said on the first Sunday of every month and a social hour follows the service with the family of the deceased providing the refreshments. In spite of the hesitancy to build their own church, there is general reluctance to give up these monthly meetings which reinforce their special identity.

Trade, Professions and Employment

When the pioneer Lebanese immigrants, the majority of whom were farmers, arrived here, they realized that the stories they had heard about America, the place where “you could pick money off the trees,” were false. Instead, it was a land of hard work. They had had plenty of experience with that. Most started as peddlers, lacking other skills or capital. Their inability to speak English seemed a minor handicap, and they trudged into the Connecticut rural areas to sell their dry goods.

Women as well as men went out peddling. In some cases, the women had immigrated on their own. Once they had saved enough money, they sent for their husbands, who did not want to leave a sure source of income, however small, until another one was guaranteed. These pioneer women worked very hard alongside their husbands and at the same time raised children and maintained a traditional Lebanese home. They made their own bread and cooked Lebanese food which required long hours of preparation.

Industrialization brought about a shift in the economy and there was a corresponding shift in the job goals. Employment as a salaried worker became more attractive than peddling or shopkeeping. In part this was due to a change in the purchasing habits of the rural population. In the days of the horse and buggy, farmers had welcomed the salesman with his wares, but the advent of the automobile gave the rural folk greater mobility and shopping in the city became preferable. At the same time, immigrant peddlers, who had spent long periods away from home, wanted to be closer to their families in the city. The life of constant movement was becoming tiresome. Furthermore, the competition from the big stores made peddling a small business unprofitable and a steady factory job provided more security.

Although a few of the Lebanese who came to the Hartford area in the late '20s and through the '30s became self-employed, the majority had been attracted by the availability of work opportunities.

in the factories and especially in the armaments industry.

A limited survey of trades and professions of Lebanese presently in the Hartford area revealed that 13% were in executive jobs, 27% were in professions, 24% were in private business, and 36% were salaried (the last category included both those employed in government and those in the private sector.)

Third generation Lebanese-Americans and recent immigrants tend to seek employment in corporations and professions. The third generation appears to be mostly, if not totally, assimilated into the mainstream of the American middle class society while recent immigrants are products of the modern Lebanese economy which is mainly service oriented.

Another interesting similarity that has been noted between recent immigrants and third generation Americans is a willingness to take bank loans. Earlier generations preferred to borrow from family and friends, a custom that was probably dictated by their lack of credit as well as the biases that the earlier generations had to overcome.

Education

The majority of the pioneer immigrants who came before the turn of the century were illiterate, but they were able to acquire enough English to survive in an alien culture and to become citizens, acts of which they were very proud.

Not all, however, came from the restricted mountain area where there was little opportunity for education. Some could read Arabic and Turkish, and occasionally someone knew English.

First-generation Americans of Lebanese origin in Hartford attended local schools both public and private.

Although a few went on to become teachers and professors, most joined their fathers in the family business after high school, or started their own businesses. Many served in the U.S. Army or worked in ammunition factories.

This situation appears to have changed. A limited sample of second-generation Lebanese-Americans, showed that more than 95% had graduated from a liberal arts or a technical college. This can in part be attributed to the availability of several colleges within commuting distance. It also shows the progress of assimilation and the greater emphasis on social mobility and participation in the American middle class, and the awareness that a college education helps to achieve middle class status. Significantly, the first generation was affluent enough to be both able and willing to provide a college education for their children.

The present college generation of Lebanese-Americans are more inclined to go away to college, a further indication of the ongoing acceptance of American middle class ideals by the immigrant group.

A study of third and fourth generation Americans of Lebanese origin in the Greater Hartford area showed that the question is not whether they should go to college, but which college should they attend. There continues to be a preference for professional degrees over liberal arts degrees.

Although some of the American-Lebanese who moved to Hartford after the 30’s from different parts of the United States were highly qualified professionals, those immigrants who came directly from Lebanon after 1945 are almost without exception highly educated. As a result of the educational and social revolution that has made Lebanon the educational center of the Middle East, the new immigrants include a high percentage of doctors and medical technicians who are graduates of the French school system in Lebanon. The new immigrants are westernized before they arrive in this country. In their case, assimilation appears to lag behind acculturation.

Politics

The Lebanese people come from a tradition of extreme interest in how subtle political changes influence and have impact on their lives. Being from a background that emphasized individual freedom and autonomy, however, they continue to respond negatively toward any efforts at political organization.

In Lebanon, allegiance was traditionally given to the political ruler and the church and even this allegiance varied in intensity. The only organization formed with a reasonable degree of success and cohesion came into being during the periods of stress and crisis. They were united when there was a common enemy. Once the threat decreased, the love of individual freedom succeeded organizational bonds. When they came to the United States, their ability to organize appears to have depended on the availability of leadership. Mrs. Frangie, a relative of a former president of Lebanon, and Father Michael Saab were a powerful team in Springfield and the community worked together and prospered together under their guidance. After the deaths of Mrs Frangie and Father Saab, community spirit declined.

Traditional patterns in the American-Lebanese community have changed in direct relation to their economic situation. If the feudal system of Lebanon had survived, they would have continued to depend on the established leadership for their livelihood. In America, however, they were independent. Acculturation and assimilation erased most of the characteristics of Lebanese political structure. The major surviving trait appears to be the insistence on autonomy and freedom. Conversations with first-generation Americans of Lebanese origin reveal a deep suspicion of politicians, who are viewed as egocentric, self-serving manipulators of people who trust them.

Two second-generation American-Lebanese in Connecticut have been involved in politics: Ralph Nader and Toby Moffett, whose grandfather started as a peddler in the Frangie establishment. Nader and Moffett achieved prominence through their work in consumer protection. An interest in politics on the national level has only recently emerged and there have been several Congressmen and one Senator of American-Lebanese descent. Given the minority status of the Lebanese-Americans and their attitudes towards politics and organizations, it is obvious that the Lebanese heritage of these politicians played little part in their appeal to the electorate. Clearly, their assimilation into and identification with mainstream American culture is complete.

While recent immigrants and American-Lebanese of the first- and second-generation appear to have a better understanding and perspective of the situation in the Middle East, many of the third- and fourth-generation express confusion over the events in the region. There is a natural hesitation to discuss politics pertaining to Israel, as they fear that airing their generally pro-Arab, anti-Zionist views may jeopardize their situation as a small minority. Although some disapproved of unquestioned U.S. support to Israel, all of them emphasized their loyalty and patriotism and readiness to identify with U.S. objectives. Curiously, few are aware of "Operation Boulder," a U.S. government project in 1972 that resulted in harassment of Arab-Americans.

Perceiving themselves as supporters of the Palestinian people and viewing Lebanon as a host country that has offered the Palestinians many advantages, they are bewildered by the present crisis in Lebanon. Generally speaking, Lebanese-Americans prefer to keep a low profile. Those questioned feel it is futile to write letters to Congressmen and have opted for a passive role in political matters. Until recently, there was no Lebanese political organization to act as a lobby group on matters of interest to the Lebanese. The present crisis in Lebanon has led to the formation of the Lebanese American Unity Committee and there is a local chapter in Hartford.

Cultural Heritage

Early Lebanese immigrants to the Hartford area preserved much of their cultural heritage. Although the small size of their group made it difficult to maintain identity and culture, their lack of English fluency and the strange customs of the host country encouraged them to keep in close contact with nearby Lebanese-American communities. Sunday visits to relatives in New Britain, Waterbury and Springfield helped to reinforce their ethnicity and contributed to the survival of traditional customs and group cohesion. At the same time negative experiences of the early immigrants encouraged them to replace their native customs with norms acceptable to the dominant culture.

As a result food customs have survived more readily than language. Whereas the fourth-generation young women are able to create beautiful trays of Baklava, they have no knowledge of Arabic.

The number of Lebanese-Americans in the Hartford area has always been too insignificant to support an Arabic paper or radio program. Those who wanted Arabic publications had to get subscriptions from elsewhere in the U.S.

Celebrations, Maihrajans (festivals) and Hafis (parties), in which Arabic music was sung, were held in different cities at different times. The famous Lebanese singer, Odette Kado, performed in Hartford several times. Entertainment in the early part of the century was mainly provided by listening to a singer and participating in the Dabkeh. Men usually danced; young girls were allowed to participate while the women watched.

Of late, ballroom dancing has become popular. A simple form of dabkeh survives. In recent years, a belly dancer has been featured at festivals, an event that would have aroused the fury of the earliest generation who considered belly dancing immoral. Interestingly, not one of the belly dancers featured between 1970 and 1976 was of Arab descent.

"Although a few of the Lebanese who came to the Hartford area in the late '20s and through the '30s became self-employed, the majority had been attracted by the availability of work in the factories and especially in the ammunition industry."
While several of the early immigrants and some of their children became shopkeepers, none of their stores catered to ethnic needs or carried ethnic foods. Most of the cracked wheat, the halawì, the spices, the sesame seed sauce, the olives, et cetera, were shipped in from New York. Until the '30s Arab food was bought at the Sahadi Company on Atlantic Avenue in Brooklyn and a year's supply would be ordered at one time.

The small number of Lebanese in the Hartford area continues to be a factor in their culture. Many are unaware of the impact of Lebanese-American intellectuals on the Arab world. Although a few have copies of Gibran’s Prophèr, most have not heard of the Lebanese-Americans of literary fame. Nuaymeh and Abu Madi, who have had an extensive influence on modern Arabic literature.

The early Lebanese who came to this country shared the dream of most immigrants in the 19th and 20th centuries—making money and raising their standard of living. Americans of various ethnic groups have aspired to own a nice house and one or two cars.

A further attraction is that in the American experience, material success brings with it social acceptability and it is frequently difficult to see where one ends and the other begins. The early immigrants who decided not to return to Lebanon naturally participated in the social part of the dream. Because accumulation of wealth in itself was no longer sufficient, it took the form of affluent living.

The tendency of American society to equate success with promotion into the white collar job corps has effectively influenced the Lebanese and they are proud of members who have achieved professional and executive status. The work ethic is strictly adhered to but ability to enjoy the fruits of one's labor, to take vacations and trips, is definitely a status symbol.

The good old days, when things were better and when the American dream was not challenged and threatened by decreasing opportunities, are still seen with nostalgia. Having worked hard to acquire the luxuries of life that soon become necessities, it is very hard to accept inflation and shrinking affluence.

When the American dream is revised or re-evaluated, American-Lebanese will surely be right there with the rest, working towards its fulfillment.

“A study of third- and fourth-generation Americans of Lebanese origin in the Greater Hartford area showed that the question is not whether they should go to college, but which college should they attend. There continues to be a preference for professional degrees over liberal arts degrees.”
CORRECTING STEREOTYPES ABOUT MIDDLE EASTERN PEOPLES

Unfortunately, American mass media frequently distort and malign Middle Eastern leaders and events. Studies of attitudes among Connecticut school children have demonstrated that many have unfavorable perspectives regarding Arabs, Iranians and Turks.

More balanced interpretations can be fostered by instruction that helps students to recognize cross-cultural slanting. This can be done, for instance, by encouraging students to maintain a file of clippings regarding the treatment of Middle Eastern issues in the press. It can contain news stories, editorials, and/or cartoons. Another approach is to monitor coverage on television using a rating scale to identify the perspective and types of information and evidence that are provided.
If access to copies of the press from Middle Eastern countries is available, the students may benefit from getting acquainted with the ways the United States and American policies are interpreted in the indigenous media. A publication that has frequently carried this type of material in English translation is Atlas Magazine.
