The manual is intended to help students and professionals in allied health fields find resources for helping disabled students and adults and their families. The first and largest section is a directory of organizations classified according to 15 topics, including advocacy, alcoholism, blindness and visual impairment, child abuse, learning disabilities, state and federal governmental agencies, and mental health and mental retardation. Entries list address, phone number, and a brief description of the organization and its services. Following the organizations directory is an annotated listing of publications (directories, catalogs, pamphlets, and self help guides) in 12 areas, such as accessibility/travel, health care, income support programs, recreation/camps, and sex education. An access guide focuses on advocacy approaches and procedures, and considers such issues as due process, finding services, and negotiation. A legislative summary concludes the manual with references to major federal laws and regulations affecting the mentally retarded/developmentally disabled population. (CL)

PREFACE

Family Centered Program on Intervention Project (FCPI) is an outgrowth of Family Centered Practicum for Developmental Disabilities Project (FCP-DD) and, as such, has adopted many of the philosophies FCP-DD acquired during its five years of working with and learning from families. FCPI was funded by H.E.W., Division of Associated Health Professions, to produce materials which will aid the student and professional in working with the family within the home setting.

The professional is seen in a supportive role to parents, who are viewed as the primary caregivers in fostering the growth and development of their children. The professional assists parents in becoming effective teachers of their developmentally disabled child. It is in this climate that the professional shares his expertise with the family.

Ten content areas were identified in order to produce training materials which cover the broad range of skills necessary to the individual working with families within the home. These content areas are:

1. OBSERVATIONAL SKILLS
2. SOCIAL-EMOTIONAL ASPECTS
3. ENVIRONMENTAL FACTORS
4. INTERPERSONAL COMMUNICATION AND RELATIONSHIPS
5. SCREENING AND ASSESSMENT
6. ACTIVITIES IN THE HOME
7. ADVOCACY
8. IDENTIFYING AND ACCESSING RESOURCES
9. TOILET TRAINING
10. FEEDING TRAINING

With the exception of this Directory/Access Guide (area #8), five categories of content are included within each training area: generic knowledge, assessment, development of treatment, implementation of treatment, and evaluation. The instructional materials are presented in modular form to facilitate presentation in a variety of teaching settings.

INTRODUCTION TO RESOURCE DIRECTORY AND ACCESS GUIDE

This is a National Resource Directory and self-help handbook. It is designed primarily to help Allied Health students and professionals as well as professionals in related fields get started finding resources and obtaining services for disabled children and adults. Parents and self-advocates will also find it a useful aid.

This volume is divided into four parts:

DIRECTORY OF ORGANIZATIONS - An annotated, alphabetized listing of national organizations providing services to the MR/DD population.

DIRECTORY OF PUBLICATIONS - An annotated, alphabetized listing of directories, catalogs, pamphlets and self-help guides for Allied Health professionals, parents and disabled individuals.

ACCESS GUIDE - A document designed to provide Allied Health professionals, social workers, professionals in other ancillary areas, parents and individuals the skills necessary to obtain services.

SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION - An annotated listing in chart form of legislation on the national level affecting the MR/DD population.

The Directory/Access Guide is a desk reference that can be used again and again to find the right resource for a client or patient. Each section is prefaced by a discussion of the criteria for listing and directions for using the material. Users should familiarize themselves with the general categories of information contained in the various sections. The editors recommend reading the Access Guide section in its entirety.

Much of the material is directed toward improving the self-help and advocacy skills of the disabled themselves, parents, and professionals. Professionals will find references to materials that they will want to recommend to or share with parents and others. Parents will find this an easy reference for appropriate resources for their child's particular handicap or disability.

The organization and resource lists are not exhaustive. They are meant to be used as a 'starting point.' As individuals use this handbook, they will find more and more resource materials. The editors strongly suggest that professionals (or parents) write to the organizations most relevant to the clients they serve or an individual situation, asking for bibliographies of additional materials. State and local organizations will have additional materials directed toward state or local programs. Specific instructions for expanding the Directory have been included in the introductions to the Directory of Organizations and Directory of Publications.

This volume is looseleaf for a reason - it should grow with the user's skills!
INTRODUCTION TO DIRECTORY OF ORGANIZATIONS

Criteria for Listing

The information provided in this Directory of Organizations is designed to assist in locating specific, appropriate services primarily for developmentally disabled, mentally retarded, and/or physically handicapped individuals and their families. Within this Directory are the titles, addresses and phone numbers of most of the major national agencies and organizations that routinely serve this population. The editors have also included the most current individual state listings of special education, advocacy, developmental disabilities offices, etc., in separate sections.

Using the Directory

The Table of Contents and major headings (listed alphabetically) are meant to serve as a guide to assist the user of the Directory search for services. Many agencies, however, serve populations other than what their official title indicates. For example, the Muscular Dystrophy Association serves individuals with muscular dystrophy as well as 35 additional neuromuscular diseases. The Talking Book Service is not only for the visually impaired but is available for anyone who cannot hold a book or read a printed page for a variety of reasons. The National Association for Retarded Citizen's (NARC) main emphasis is serving the MR/DD population and their families, but NARC may be able to provide information that can be expanded or adjusted to meet specific needs of another population.

Each entry in this Directory includes the official agency/organization title, address and phone number, if available (current as of Spring, 1981), followed by a brief description and summary of major services provided. A "Services" listing is also included in the entry to assist the user in quick identification of various services provided (for example: SERVICES: Advocacy, funding, public information).

Unless one has access to a toll-free telephone line (an "800" number), or one is provided by the service agency, a written inquiry is suggested. It should be brief and to the point. Letters with specific questions are generally well accepted and, in most cases, will be answered promptly. Some of these agencies and organizations refer inquiries to local chapters which can assist individuals in locating specific local services.

Expanding the Directory

This Directory is designed so that new entries can be easily inserted for quick reference. It may be helpful to include "how-to's" for the best way to contact a specific agency (phone call between 8 a.m. - 10 a.m., letter addressed to a specific individual, etc.). Names of specific individuals at each agency will also make subsequent contacts much easier. The direct phone number for that person should be obtained, if possible.
This Directory is meant to be a working guide that will expand and become a valuable resource through each user's individual efforts. Some good sources of new entries are:

Telephone Directory: The local phone directory is one excellent source of information on local services. The yellow page index headings may include such listings as follows:

- Business Organizations - (possible one-time special project funding source)
- Fraternal Organizations
- Health Agencies
- Human Service Organizations
- Labor Organizations - (another possible funding source for special projects)
- Political Organizations - (lobbying, advocacy, legislation)
- Professional Organizations - (O.T., P.T., Speech, Nursing)
- Religious Organizations - (may take interest in the special needs of a child or family of their faith)
- Social Service Organizations
- Veterans and Military Organizations - (especially if relatives served in military)
- Youth Organizations and Centers - (recreation programs, peer/sibling interaction, day camp, volunteers)
- Chamber of Commerce - (another excellent way to locate community resources; the Chamber can usually direct you at least to the major service agencies)

Government Agencies: Government listings are also an excellent source, but finding them may prove difficult due to variations in titling and confusion about jurisdiction. For example, Crippled Children's Services may be listed under Maternal and Child Health or Public Health. Many agencies perceived by the public to be Federal Government listings are actually listed under State or County headings. For example, the individual Welfare Departments, which may generally be perceived to be State agencies, are actually administered by the County. Key agencies and referral services are often listed near the beginning of the telephone directory. With a little patience and some imagination, these agencies can be found!

Additional Sources: Many times the local (county, city, district, etc.) Public Health Department can be the best source of information regarding specific resources and medical service providers in a given geographic area. This department also maintains lists of various agency-approved physicians and vendors (Bureau of Crippled Children's Services, MR/DD Agency, Medicare/Medicaid, etc.).

Hospital social service departments maintain constant contact with community resources. The Special Education Office of the local school district or the State Department of Special Education may also be a referral source, even if the child is not school age.
Often a phone call or letter to a related agency or a general government information listing (Federal Information Center, Ombudsman's Office at City Hall, etc.) will provide additional names and numbers. Another source of information is Closer Look (The National Information Center for the Handicapped, listed in Advocacy Section of this Directory). One of the Center's functions is to assist individuals in locating specific sources of programs and assistance in their geographic area.

STATE PROTECTION AND ADVOCACY AGENCIES

Created by the Developmentally Disabled Assistance and Bill of Rights Act of 1975 (PL94-103), these organizations are charged with protecting and promoting the rights of developmentally disabled persons. The organizations are separate from the state government. States must have a P and A agency to continue receiving Federal financial assistance for DD programs.

INTRODUCTION TO DIRECTORY OF PUBLICATIONS

The following is an annotated list of directories, catalogs, pamphlets and self-help guides for Allied Health professionals, parents and disabled individuals.

Criteria for Listing

Publications were chosen which emphasize accessing resources and services for disabled individuals. Those listed are practical, non-technical, and written to be understood by lay people. Publications, to the best of the authors' knowledge, are current and available. Many are free, others are moderately priced; a few textbooks are included.

Using the Directory

This Directory is organized by topics based on common problem areas encountered by the disabled and their advocates. Complete titles, addresses for ordering, dates and prices (if any) are included for each publication. There is also a brief description of the content and purpose of each. With very few exceptions, all entries have been confirmed with the publisher as to title, availability and price, etc. Confirmation is denoted by the dot (●) in the left margin.

A few publications that have not been confirmed as currently available have been listed because the editors felt that they are unique or of superior quality and should be listed. Copies may be available through public or University libraries.

Expanding the Directory

There are literally thousands of publications on special topics and specific state programs available through national and local organizations. The user of the Directory should write to those organizations concerned with specific problems that interest him and ask for a publications list or bibliography. The lists can be inserted in the Directory for quick reference.

Special Note on Child Abuse Section

There are numerous publications on child abuse and neglect. The editors have selected just a few samples that provide basic legal and/or advocacy information. The major national organizations working in this area have extensive publication lists and bibliographies which are free for the asking. Local organizations will be very cooperative in supplying free copies of pamphlets on identifying and reporting child abuse. These may be printed in several languages. The editors of this Directory urge the user to take advantage of this wealth of information. One way to start is to order publication catalogs. Four of these are listed at the beginning of the Child Abuse section.
ACCESS AMTRAK: A GUIDE TO AMTRAK SERVICES FOR ELDERLY AND HANDICAPPED TRAVELERS

Amtrak Headquarters
400 N. Capitol Street, Washington, DC 20013
1978, 6 pp. Free

This pamphlet describes in general terms the limitations as well as special features of Amtrak equipment and stations. It covers making reservations, assistance to deaf or blind passengers, group travel, travel alone or with an attendant, boarding the train, and accommodations on the train. Graphs provide dimensions for wheelchair access on various styles of coaches.

ACCESS NATIONAL PARKS: A GUIDE FOR HANDICAPPED VISITORS

Superintendent of Documents
S/N 024-005-00691-5, 1978, 197 pp., $3.50/copy

This guide details information about accessibility of facilities, services and interpretive programs in almost 300 areas of the National Park System. Mailing addresses are listed in the park headings. Telephone numbers of general information and directions, accessible, alternative transportation and other services or facilities are listed for all parks. Special telephone numbers are given for reservations of accessible lodgings, ticket reservations and for advance arrangements for assistance or special guided tours, open hours and seasons.

ACCESS TRAVEL: AIRPORTS

Consumer Information Center
Dept. 612J, Pueblo, Colorado 81009
1979, no cost for single copies

Access Travel: Airports lists design features, facilities and services of importance to the handicapped, for 282 airport terminals in 40 countries. Quantities may be ordered from: Federal Aviation Administration, APA 430, 800 Independence Ave., S.W., Washington, DC 20591.
ACCESS TO THE WORLD: A TRAVEL GUIDE FOR THE HANDICAPPED
By Louise Weiss

Chatham Square Press
401 Broadway, New York, NY 10013
1977, $8.95, bookstore orders over $5 - 40% discount

Access to the World is a guide aimed at assisting the handicapped traveler to become independent, utilizing existing services and knowing how and where to locate them. Travel agents, tour operators and travel organizations which offer special arrangements are listed. It also contains access guides and general tips.

HANDBOOK FOR DESIGN: SPECIALLY ADAPTED HOUSING

Local Veterans Administration Offices
1978, 79 pp. Free

The handbook provides information on designing accessible homes for handicapped persons and covers such topics as site selection, floor plans, interior detail and safety.

THE HANDICAPPED DRIVER'S MOBILITY GUIDE

Available to members of local American Automobile Association offices (but would send it even if not a member - as a traffic safety service).

This guide lists more than 500 services and resources available to handicapped drivers, including driving schools prepared to work with handicapped drivers and manufacturers of special adaptive driving equipment.

INTERNATIONAL DIRECTORY OF ACCESS GUIDES

Rehabilitation International USA
20 West 40th Street, New York, NY 10018
1980, 24 pp. Free

This directory lists guides for America and 18 foreign countries, describing the accessibility of hotels, restaurants, theaters, churches and transportation. Many guides are free or available for the cost of postage and handling.
The Office for Handicapped Individuals
Switzer Building, Room 3611, Washington, DC 20202
Fall, 1980

This is a guide to information resources, funding and publications available from Federal sources compiled to aid in the development of a barrier-free environment.

INTRODUCTION TO ACCESS GUIDE

This Access Guide is designed to provide Allied Health professionals, social workers, professionals in other ancillary areas, parents and individuals the skills necessary to obtain services.

Accessing services for oneself, one's child, or a client is not always as easy as simply picking up the phone. When required services are available but not readily obtainable - one becomes an ADVOCATE.

ADVOCACY is not viewed in this context as 'militant,' but rather as a set of procedures and skills necessary to obtain services. These skills include interviewing, research and negotiation. This Guide offers a starting place and perhaps will change the reader's view of ADVOCACY.

I. ADVOCACY DEFINITION

What is advocacy? The term 'advocacy' has many different definitions and applications. In this manual, advocacy will be defined as the art and science of obtaining that to which an individual - or persons represented by another - are entitled by law or by right. The idea of being an advocate for oneself or others may be intimidating; but people are all advocates in one way or another, at some time in their lives.

Advocacy skills begin the moment one is born. A child learns that crying will get his parents’ attention so they can attend to his needs. As he grows up, the child learns more sophisticated advocacy skills, such as negotiating, to get what is needed from parents or others. By the time a person reaches adulthood, he is using advocacy skills in his daily life. When returning a product to a store or promoting an idea to his boss, he is being an advocate for himself. When, as a parent, he speaks up for his children at school parent-teacher conferences, he has come full circle, in a sense, and is advocating for his children.

As advocates in daily life, people rarely stop and consider systematically the best tactics to achieve their goals. This Access Guide - a kind of advocacy 'how-to' manual - will help the reader develop the skills necessary to become a more effective and successful advocate.

II. WHY ADVOCATE?

People advocate to obtain rights and entitlements. Some of these are:

• ACCESS TO COMMUNITY RESOURCES

All citizens have a basic right to share in the resources of the community of which they are a part. For some citizens, it is very difficult to obtain a share of community resources. Advocacy activities may be used to obtain those resources on behalf of groups of people who would otherwise not share in the resources. These resources may include recreational and educational facilities, health care, housing, and a full range of human services.

• EXERCISE OF RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES

The United States Constitution, and laws made by Congress and the States, provide for certain rights and privileges for the citizenry as a whole, as well as for individuals and groups of citizens. Having the right does not always mean having the ability to exercise it. Advocates seek to ensure that individuals are able to exercise these rights and privileges.
These rights include the right to legal representation regardless of income, the right to vote in all elections even if special voting arrangements are required, the right to personal property, the right to fair business dealings, the right to education, the right of access to public buildings, and the right to privacy, peace and dignity.

EXPANDED PROGRAMS AND RESOURCES

Disabled children and adults have unique needs and problems. Attempts to solve these problems are often inadequate. Consequently, there is a continuing need to advocate for increased benefits and improved services to disabled citizens.

III. TYPES OF ADVOCACY

There are several types of advocacy. One is case advocacy, that is, advocacy that is undertaken by or on behalf of one individual, one particular family or case.

Another is group advocacy. This requires community organization skills. It involves bringing people together who have a common interest to identify and work toward a common goal. That goal will involve some kind of community change. Lobbying, as we traditionally think of it in terms of legislative change, is a kind of group advocacy.

Yet another type of advocacy is litigation or judicial advocacy. This advocacy occurs in the court system and often results in systemic change.

It is important to remember that the various types of advocacy do not usually occur as isolated situations. One-to-one case advocacy frequently progresses from an administrative level to a judicial level. Similarly, the goals of a group of people can frequently be advanced through litigation.

Since the basic skills and techniques required for the simplest advocacy effort are also important in the more complex types of advocacy, this Access Guide will deal primarily with case advocacy.

IV. THE ADVOCACY PROCESS: A KEY TO THE ACCESS GUIDE

This Guide presents advocacy as a process with three basic steps:

- Discover and define the problem (i.e., lack of services).
- Develop and negotiate a solution.

- Monitor and evaluate the results to ensure that the solution is being carried out and that it is a working solution.

A chapter is devoted to each step in the advocacy process. Sections within these chapters detail skills and techniques which the advocate would find most useful at that particular stage.

To communicate skills and techniques, the authors have had to 'freeze' them, so to speak, within one area. In real life, of course, things are not so clear-cut. Events refuse to parallel 'how-to guides' and rarely are parcelled out in easily-managed bundles. The advocate will find that situations can be highly complex and stages will overlap. Most of the skills and techniques presented are basic, but any approach can become inappropriate as conditions change. An advocate must be ready to adapt.

The reader should keep in mind that he will not — indeed, cannot — learn everything he needs to know about advocacy from this Guide. It is a beginning, a starting place. Each person will develop individual methods and style. To develop good advocacy skills, there is no substitute for experience!

V. ADVOCACY — THE INITIAL STEP: DISCOVER AND DEFINE THE PROBLEM

The first task of the advocate is to DISCOVER AND DEFINE THE PROBLEM(S) facing the disabled person. In what way — and why — is this person being deprived of a right or entitlement? Discovery is the first awareness that a problem exists; definition involves understanding the causes and complexities of a problem. They are the two stages of the initial information-gathering process.

A problem may be simple to discover but complicated to define. For example: a parent approaches a professional saying that his or her developmentally disabled child cannot get into special classes. The problem seems obvious. Its cause, however, can be anything from a lack of transportation to inadequate diagnosis and testing.

Both parents and professionals can save a lot of time and unnecessary anguish if they have developed good techniques for obtaining appropriate and complete information required to DISCOVER AND DEFINE THE PROBLEM. Some basic skills and techniques are outlined in this chapter.

A. DEVELOP BASIC INTERVIEWING SKILLS

Knowing how to conduct a good interview is the first information-gathering skill an advocate must develop. A good interview, like a good letter, consists of (1) an opening, (2) a body, and (3) a closure.

1. The Opening

In the beginning of the interview, the advocate should:

a) Introduce himself by name, title (if any) and purpose.

Examples:

- "Hi! I'm Ms. Brown, physical therapist with The Nisonger Center. I'm working with Johnny's teacher to evaluate what kinds of activities are beneficial for Johnny."

- "Hello! I'm Mrs. Johnson, Johnny's mother, and I am here to find out what kind of problems Johnny is having in school."

b) Make the other person comfortable. This can be accomplished through a pleasant greeting, a complete introduction, an offering of coffee, or a similar gesture. The interviewer should remove physical obstacles to communication. For example, if he is behind a desk, he should come out from behind it, or put a chair beside the desk.

c) Give the other person complete attention. Phone calls and other interruptions are distracting and impolite. If they cannot be avoided, they should be as brief as possible.

To parents: When interviewing teachers, principals and other professionals, a parent may have to establish himself as an equal in spite of the physical environment. If the chair is movable, it should be moved! Stand over a desk, suggest a meeting over coffee, lunch, etc.

2. Questions - Body of the Interview

During the body of the interview, the advocate should:

a) Begin with the open-ended questions which encourage the interviewee to tell the whole story. This is particularly important when one does not have a clue as to the specific problem or is not acquainted with the person being interviewed.

The advocate should avoid initial questions that can be answered with only a "yes" or a "no."

Examples:

- "What brings you here today?"
- "I understand that you are having difficulty with my son in your classroom. What seems to be the problem?"
b) As much as possible, explain the reasons for the line of questioning. People cooperate better and can be more helpful if they understand and are a part of the discovery process. This technique also helps to overcome any anxiety or sense of inadequacy that the person being interviewed may feel. Involve the interviewee in the solution.

c) Move from the open-ended questions to questions aimed at obtaining specific information necessary to identify the causes of a problem.

Examples:

Teacher: "Your son doesn't seem to pay attention in class. There are a number of possible reasons for this. I need to ask you some very specific questions so we can sort this out together. Has Johnny ever had his eyes tested? If yes, when? By whom? What results?"

or

Parent: "I know Johnny has a short attention span. I've learned ways of helping him concentrate. Where does he sit in the classroom? Is he near a door or window? Does he get more restless as the hours pass?"

In these examples the interviewer is getting some very specific information that will assist him in identifying the problem and possibly correcting it. It is important that questions be asked in a non-threatening way. The person being questioned should not feel that he is being criticized.

3. Closure

At the end of the interview, the advocate should:

a) Bring the interview to a definite closure.

b) Make sure each person understands what the next step is. If possible, specific responsibilities should be assigned to the interviewee. These can be gathering additional information, monitoring the child's behavior for clues, or trying a new technique or approach with the child.

c) Set a time for the next meeting.

B. APPROACH THE PROGRAM ADMINISTRATORS

In the course of discovering a problem and/or defining the causes of a problem, the advocate will probably have some contact with program administrators or representatives of a care-provision agency. Many times, problems can be avoided if the skills and techniques listed below are employed properly when that important first impression is made. If a problem does develop, these same skills and techniques can help make resolution of the problem easier.

In a sense, this section is a refinement of the previous section on basic interviewing techniques. Good, solid interviewing skills will be very useful as the advocate begins to work in the specialized area of communicating with program administrators. The advocate should:

1. Do His 'Homework'

   a) Know the program requirements. This information can come from phone calls, agency publications, reading the law and rules.

   b) Take along appropriate documentation. Most programs for disabled persons will require -

      1) documentation of the disability
      2) test scores, if available
      3) reports from referring physician, agency or school.

      If the program is an income support program or has financial eligibility requirements, the applicant may be required to provide -

      4) birth certificate
      5) pay stubs or other verification of family income
      6) verification of financial resources such as bank accounts, stocks, bonds, real property, insurance policies, etc.

2. Present the Request or Case

   a) Describe the problem and the needs of the person. Explain why the person for whom one is advocating needs assistance and how the situation fits the requirements of the program.

   b) Organize the presentation. The advocate should:

      1) Write out a list beforehand of all the points to be covered.
      2) Prepare a list of questions he wants answered.
      3) Take notes during the interview.
      4) Ask for copies of applications and other documents that he completes, or make them himself.
      5) Get commitments of the length of time the decision process will take.
      6) Set a date for the next contact.
      7) Make certain all parties are clear on what is expected from the next contact.
3. Deal with the Response

The response from the administrator will fall into one of four categories: "yes," "no," "maybe," or no response at all. When dealing with the response, the advocate should:

a) Know the person's rights under the law and the regulations. This is the most important prerequisite for dealing with the response. As discussed in the due process section, p. 160, most publicly sponsored programs have grievance or appeals mechanisms. It is important to know what the specific procedure is for the particular program in question and the time limits for appealing.

b) Ask for an appeal. A good rule of thumb is to ask for an appeal as soon as an unfavorable decision is rendered. The appeal can always be withdrawn later if conditions change. Once the time expires to appeal, the agency rarely makes an exception.

c) Find out specifically why the request or application was denied. "You are not eligible" is not a good enough answer! There has to be a specific reason and the administration should explain it. The advocate should insist upon a written explanation.

d) Get a firm answer. If the answer is "maybe" or there has been no response at all after a reasonable length of time, the advocate should insist on a firm answer. He should request an explanation of difficulties that are slowing down the decision-making process. The advocate should remember that there are many times when "no" is better than no decision at all! Many public agencies are required to make prompt written decisions. Some programs provide for appeals when timely decisions are not made.

e) Last but not least, remember that the agency is not the enemy! It is set up to provide services and its personnel will usually make some effort to be of assistance. Larger agencies often have an ombudsperson who can give out information on a claim or request. The appropriate agency personnel should be called, and the advocate should not be afraid to ask questions. If information is still not forthcoming, an elected official or labor union office can be contacted. They very often can intervene.

4. Special Problem: Handicap vs. Disability, and Proving the Latter

Many people make the common mistake of using the terms 'handicap' and 'disability' interchangeably. The advocate should be aware that these words are not synonymous.
'Handicap' is defined in Webster's New World Dictionary as a difficulty, disadvantage or hindrance. 'To disable' means to make unable or unfit, cripple, incapacitate. Thus, by definition, a handicap is not necessarily disabling.

Programs that provide special services or income support for either handicapped or disabled individuals do not use one universal criteria for determining entitlement to benefits. Each program has its own specific criteria for determining if a person meets the physical/mental qualifications for services or benefits.

An advocate may be called upon to assist in proving that a person meets the physical or mental criteria for a particular program. Frequently, this takes the form of proving a disability or handicap. In going through this process, the advocate should:

a) Understand the definition. The advocate must have a thorough understanding of the definition used by the program. Disability or handicap is a 'grey' area. Factors such as age, education, functional IQ, work experience and duration of the impairment are taken into consideration when the extent of a disability is being determined. Each program will have different emphasis depending on the program purpose.

Income support programs such as Social Security Disability Benefits emphasize the ability or inability of the applicant to work and earn a living. Vocational training, education, work experience and age are as important as the medical diagnosis.

Education for handicapped children is offered under a law, PL94-142, that recognizes a broad range of impairments. Local officials, program administrators, school boards and funding agencies sometimes take too restrictive a view, thereby limiting access to the program. The purpose of the program is supposed to be to provide educational services to overcome dependency to the greatest extent possible. Thus, a broader approach to defining handicaps is more consistent with the law.

b) Gather and submit evidence. Once the advocate understands the criteria the individual must meet, he is faced with the problem of gathering documentary evidence of disability. The advocate should:

1) Start with the obvious: family physician, school nurse or counselor, aptitude and psychological test results, etc. The rule here is that one should gather every possible statement or report on the individual's medical condition. Medications the person takes should be inventoried.
2) Get a good medical history. Marginal disabilities are frequently substantiated by accidents or illnesses that occurred years before. Do not count on the diagnosing physician to supply complete medical history. The physician may be a specialist who is concerned only with the current problem. Doctors for income support or disability benefit programs frequently are rushed. Clients may be too intimidated to talk.

The advocate should prepare written questions and send them to doctors, hospitals, and other practitioners to get information regarding the person's medical history. A useful technique is to prepare a letter with the questions, leaving space under each question for an answer. A signature line should be put on the bottom for the practitioner to sign the document and return in a stamped, addressed envelope included with the letter.

c) Prepare arguments. The advocate should prepare a written summary of his evidence and arguments and submit this to the appropriate authority. This person may be the initial decision maker or it may be the hearing officer at a formal appeal, depending on the stage of the inquiry.

In the event of a formal appeal hearing, the advocate will have an opportunity to give oral arguments prior to submitting a written statement. He should use the case analysis techniques that are described on page 164.

VI. ADVOCACY - THE NEXT STEP: DEVELOP AND NEGOTIATE A SOLUTION

As noted in the beginning of the previous chapter, if the advocate approaches care-providers in a correct way, problems can often be avoided. Sometimes, however, problems arise in spite of one's best intentions.

In the first step, DISCOVER AND DEFINE THE PROBLEM, the advocate has determined that there is a problem; he has done some initial interviewing and has come to understand something about the causes and ramifications of the problem. Now the real work begins. The advocate must DEVELOP AND NEGOTIATE A SOLUTION to the problem.

Part 1: DEVELOP A SOLUTION

This is the homework, the research phase. Before one can continue with an advocacy effort, he must develop a reasonable idea of what he wants for himself or his child or client. The advocate must become aware of what options are open for him, and who can best provide those services. (Then he will have to 'sell' himself and his ideas to those people - that is NEGOTIATING A SOLUTION; it is covered in Part 2 of this chapter.)

A. IDENTIFY THE BARRIERS AND DETERMINE THE OPTIONS

The process of identifying barriers and determining options is the first stage of developing a solution. At this point the advocate starts sifting through what he has learned during the DISCOVERY AND DEFINITION PROCESS. The advocate should:

1. Identify the Barriers

   There can be many reasons why an individual is not able to obtain services. These range from the service not being available in the community to inadequate diagnosis of the person's condition. Barriers may be logistical, such as lack of transportation or accessibility, or they may be systemic barriers caused by short-sighted policy makers. In any case, an advocate must identify the specific barrier in order to remove or overcome it.

2. Understand the Barriers

   The next step after barrier identification is to determine the cause or reason for the barrier.

   - Example 1: A reluctant administrator refuses to mainstream a handicapped child. The refusal to mainstream may be a result of the administrator's prejudices. However, it may also be that the class is already full and the administrator believes the child would be harmed rather than helped by enrollment in that particular program.

   - Example 2: A Medicaid application is denied due to excess financial resources - specifically a car worth more than the rules permit. Additional probing might uncover the fact that the car is used to go back and forth to work. In this situation a different rule applies and the car is not considered an excess resource.

3. Determine Options

   Options are possible solutions - actions which can be taken to solve a problem or overcome a barrier. To determine options, the advocate should first decide if the barrier is logistical or systemic in nature.

   a) If the barrier is logistical, advocates may have several choices or options for solving the problem. Transportation, for example, may be available from several public or private sources. Applications can be made for financial assistance or transportation subsidies. Schedules can be adjusted, etc.
b) Systemic barriers may be more difficult to overcome. If someone is denied a service or benefit because an administrator has determined that the person does not meet the criteria, the advocate must argue convincingly that the person does meet the criteria. As mentioned before, most public programs and some private ones have procedures for challenging these decisions.

A person may be excluded from a service because the 'system' does not provide for anyone with that particular problem. Rules have been purposely written to exclude entire classes or groups of people. If this is the case, the advocate should make every effort to find out why the exclusion was made. Three major reasons are: (1) limited funds, which force the service providers to restrict the number and type of people they serve; (2) the service is provided elsewhere (if this is the reason, get as much information as possible about the agency that does provide the service); (3) local, state or federal governments may not have legislated monies provided for services for that group within their definitions, or simply have not yet made provisions for services to be rendered. At this point, it would be wise to find out how current legislation reads. Perhaps the exclusion has been made by state or local policymakers based on their interpretations of a legislated definition. (See p. 158 and also the Legislative Summary Section.)

The types of options which arise will be determined in large part by the type of barrier which is causing the problem. Options can then be rank-ordered as to the most desirable.

B. FIND PROGRAMS AND RESOURCES

This and the following section, LEARN RIGHTS AND ENTITLEMENTS, are closely related. To continue developing a solution to an advocacy problem, programs and resources which can provide the service one feels is required should be identified. To do this effectively, the advocate must understand the concept of DUE PROCESS, and what his or his client's rights and entitlements are under the law.

1. Schools

   If the person about which the advocate is concerned is a school-aged child, school personnel may be the best resource in terms of learning what programs are available to help the child. A good start might be talking with the child's teacher or the school guidance counselor or the school psychologist to obtain information. School personnel are required to provide explanations of programs that are available in the school system for children with special needs. Optimally, they could also provide information about community-based programs outside of the school system.
2. Private Agencies

a) Contacting the local United Way organization is often the simplest way to learn what services are available in a community. One can ask for a directory of local agencies that are affiliated with United Way. Most of the private non-profit organizations that serve the special needs of handicapped children are likely to have some United Way affiliation.

b) The second way to learn about both public and private organizations is to contact the community information and referral service that may be available in the community. In a rural area, the service would be listed in the telephone directory of the county seat or nearest city, perhaps at the front with general information numbers, or the number could be obtained by contacting the operator.

c) The telephone directory itself can be helpful in identifying organizations that serve people with special needs. The yellow pages will list such groups under organizations, associations, social services or similar headings.

d) The city's Chamber of Commerce or City Hall, particularly City Council members who are usually very active in the community, can often be a good resource. Again, if the desired information cannot be obtained, the advocate should call his State Senator or Congressional representative.

3. National Organizations

The Directory section of this manual contains lists of national organizations which provide services to or information for children, families and others with special needs. It also contains a list of guides and directories and selected publications that will be helpful both to parents and professionals in finding resources for children with special needs.

4. Public Agencies

a) Both the state and local departments that administer public assistance programs in an area can be helpful sources of information about income supplement programs, as well as local social service programs. Most local public welfare agencies are now providing social services for low income families and children in need of protective services.

b) The Social Security Administration office in a locality may also be a source of information about community agencies. There will be an individual assigned to public relations and community liaison in that office who may be able to direct the advocate to local resources.
C. LEARN RIGHTS AND ENTITLEMENTS

People understand that normal, healthy, functioning adults are guaranteed certain rights under the Constitution and are granted certain privileges. They take for granted the freedoms that are guaranteed in the Preamble to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights; the right to life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, freedom of assembly, the right of privacy, the right to equal treatment by the government. If they are parents, they also have the right and the authority to make the determinations as to appropriate education, recreation and health care for their children. In every state in this country, children are guaranteed the right to free public education.

Those rights and privileges which seem obvious and ordinary to most people may not be so when one is dealing with a developmentally disabled or physically handicapped child. Administrative, legislative and judicial systems all too often mirror the misconceptions that are still common in this society about people, children and adults who are somehow "different." These fears and misconceptions remain evident in the inappropriate and insensitive decisions that are sometimes made and become part of public policy.

Two questions arise - how does an advocate find out the rights and privileges of a person with special needs? and, more importantly, how does an advocate make sure those rights and privileges are exercised? There is no easy answer to either question. However, there are some starting places.

1. Public Programs

Programs or agencies which use public tax dollars to provide services and resources to specific groups of people, such as handicapped children, must have some basis in law for the decisions that they make. Figure 1, p.161, outlines the statutory and regulatory scheme to which all federally sponsored programs must subscribe.

a) Federal laws. As illustrated by the diagram in Figure 1, a federal program begins with a statutory authorization passed by Congress which becomes part of the United States Code. Everything that is done under the program authorized by this law must fall within the parameters established by the law.

NOTE: This section may be reviewed in conjunction with the SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION section.
To obtain copies of federal legislation, the best resource is the office of the U.S. Congressional representative in whose district the agency or individual requesting the law resides. Requests for legislation are generally answered promptly.

Federal legislation appears in several locations in a law library or documents library: (1) Current laws (within 2 or 3 years) may be loosebound together as they are received. (2) Acts of Congress of a general and/or permanent nature are incorporated into the United States Code (U.S.C.). This Code is available in several published versions with indexes by subject and by Public Law number for locating applicable statutes. The Code is divided into Titles according to the subject matter (domain) addressed by the legislative provisions. United States Code citations are identified by the title (42 U.S.C.) and section (§6001) as in 42 U.S.C.§ 6001. (3) Public Laws of past Congresses are published in the U.S. Code Congressional and Administrative News, which is comprised of a number of hefty volumes. The spine of each volume is marked with the number of the applicable Congress. Laws from each congressional session are contained in numerical order in the "Laws" volume of the applicable year. The librarian can guide researchers to the locations of these volumes in the library.

b) Federal Regulations. When Congress passes a law to establish a human services program, as part of that law Congress assigns the responsibility for administering the program to a federal agency. The agency may be the Department of Health and Human Services, the Department of Education, the Department of Labor, or any other appropriate federal agency as determined by Congress. That agency is charged with writing the rules under which this program will be administered.

Rules and regulations written and issued under federal legislation are first published in the Federal Register under the name of the program they are designed to implement (for example, "Developmental Disabilities Program"). When adopted, they become part of the Code of Federal Regulations which is published by the Office of the Federal Register. The Code is divided into titles with corresponding volumes. Most regulations pertaining to the developmentally disabled appear in Title 42, Public Health, or Title 45, Public Welfare. Sections of the Code are cited by title part and section; for example, 45 C.F.R.§ 1385 pertains to Developmental Disabilities Assistance. The Code must be used together with the Federal Register in order to keep abreast of changes in the regulations.

Agencies put proposed regulations in writing and provide for a period of public comment before they make the regulations final. Final regulations become a part of the Code of Federal Regulations, which can be found in most public libraries. The regulations generally provide the framework for state and/or local agencies to administer the program on a local level.

c) State and Local Rules and Laws. For some programs there is an additional level of rule-making and policy-setting. In the area of public welfare, for example, the state agency for welfare programs is given the responsibility for determining what the rules are for eligibility for public assistance programs in its state. State agencies must stay within the federal laws and regulations when administering the federal and state program. Federal programs usually require that the states make their own state rules available for public comment.

A local agency may be a public agency (such as a welfare department or a school district), or it may be a private agency operating under a grant (government or private). Local agencies have procedures which they will use in administering the particular program. Frequently these administrative policies and procedures are not made available to the general public. However, when public funds are involved, anyone has a right to ask for and see copies of administrative policies which impact on the administration of the program.

2. Due Process

The Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution guarantees every citizen the right to due process of law. Due process procedures must be followed before the government can deprive any individual of rights and/or privileges granted by law. The courts have applied the right to due process to include programs and benefits created by statute. Social Security, Public Assistance programs, and education benefits are examples of programs and benefits in which all citizens are guaranteed the right to due process.

Virtually every publicly administered program provides for due process through grievance or appeals procedures. These procedures can be followed by applicants (or their advocates) who have been denied the services or privileges of the program. The right to appeal is usually guaranteed in the authorizing statute and the process is explained in the regulations. The agency responsible for the program should provide applicants with the information necessary to begin appealing a decision. There are time limits during which an appeal can be filed, usually 30 to 60 days from the date of the agency decision.

This appeal process is called an 'Administrative Appeal.' Most public programs provide for several levels of administrative review, starting with a case review and ending with a formal 'Administrative Hearing.' Applicants generally have the right to be represented by an advocate (not necessarily a lawyer) throughout the administrative appeal.

U.S. Constitution

Congressional Act (U.S. Code)

Federal Agency (Code of Federal Regulations)

State Legislation (Enabling Acts)

State Agency (State administrative rules)

Local Programs (Policies and procedures of local operation)

(Subject to judicial review at all steps.)
Before a complaint can be taken to court, the complainant must usually exhaust the administrative remedies, that is, go through all of the levels of administrative review. Court action requires legal representation by an attorney. The right to a court review is not automatic. Some programs have limitations on what kinds of issues can be appealed to Federal Court. Others specifically limit the authority of the court and still others provide no access to Federal Court.

Keep in mind that the court always has jurisdiction to determine if laws or rules conflict with the Constitution or with each other. Judicial review of the validity of a rule or statute can occur at any level of the statutory-regulatory scheme. (Refer to Figure 1, p. 161, for a flow chart of the U.S. legal/regulatory structure.)

Part 2. NEGOTIATE THE SOLUTION

A. APPROACH THE RIGHT PEOPLE

After the barriers are identified, laws and regulations researched, and alternative solutions analyzed, the advocate must identify the specific individual(s) who can implement the solution. This may be one person, such as a school principal or program administrator, or it may be a group of people such as the school board or an agency board of trustees.

It is important to understand the scope of authority and the regulatory scheme of a program in order to identify the specific individual or group with the power to solve a problem. Line workers can only apply the rules; agency administrators establish procedures but may not have any authority to change policies or rules. Regulations in public programs have the effect of law and are subject to a formal process as discussed in Part 1, Section C. An advocate can waste a lot of time and unnecessarily alienate a lot of people by not taking the time to understand how the program functions.

B. PREPARE TO NEGOTIATE

Once the personnel who can implement the solution are identified, the advocate begins to negotiate. Negotiation is a skill that can be learned and should be practiced.

Negotiation occurs when two groups with conflicting interests meet to discuss the issues between them. Sometimes negotiations are concisely carried out, as in labor union wage negotiations or out-of-court settlements of law suits. Usually those who are not experienced advocates enter into negotiations without preparation or clearly established goals.
To prepare for negotiation, the advocate should:

1) Set goals. Know exactly what is wanted and what it will take to get it.

2) Know when to negotiate. Negotiation is normally a low key approach to problem solving. It usually occurs prior to more dramatic public actions. However, advocates sometimes have to use more dramatic strategies just to get the other side to agree to negotiate!

3) Target. Negotiate only with persons who have the authority to make the appropriate decisions.

4) Set the agenda. The advocate should take control of the negotiating process by listing the issues in the order he wants them discussed. Issues which can be won should be listed first.

5) Determine compromise points. The advocate should decide exactly how much he can or will compromise before going into the negotiation. He should decide beforehand what he must get in order to give up something else. The other side should never be told what those compromise points are. Strong points are never compromised, only weak ones, and those only if necessary. Nothing should be given away without something being received in return.

6) Know the rules (or law). The advocate must understand his client's (or his own) rights and entitlements under the law. He should be prepared to discuss differing interpretations of the requirements. Any documents or other evidence that will strengthen the arguments should be assembled beforehand.

7) Perform a 'case analysis.' In order to represent himself, an individual, or a group having been denied rights or privileges, the advocate should do a thorough analysis of the case facts and laws. Lawyers call this process fact-law analysis, a fancy name for applying the rules to a particular situation. The authors will call it Case Analysis.

Case analysis is simply a method for analyzing the situation and organizing arguments. For each problem, a list of facts should be established that are relevant to the problem. Next, the laws and rules that apply to the problem and the facts are listed. Finally, based on this analysis, favorable arguments can be formulated and counter arguments anticipated.

The advocate should complete this process for every issue or problem that he is trying to solve. This exercise will prepare him for negotiating with program administrators and for representing a client at an administrative hearing or grievance meeting.

Problem: The school is refusing to put a 9-year-old physically handicapped child in a regular 4th grade classroom. The child is in a wheelchair, is socially mature, has tested at or above grade level for aptitude and achievement in math and verbal skills. Reading skills are 2nd grade level. The child has a slight speech impediment and needs speech therapy.

There is one 4th grade class with 25 pupils. The principal does not want to enroll the child in that class. The advocate suspects that this is because the teacher is refusing to accept another child. In addition, the school would have to schedule more time for the district speech therapist to be at the school. (Refer to Figure 2, p.165.)

C. NEGOTIATE!

In order to negotiate effectively, the advocate should:

1. Make sure before negotiating that the people with whom he is negotiating have the power to make the changes being sought.

2. Control the negotiating sessions. A variety of techniques are useful to accomplish this. The advocate should:

   a) Set the scene – Choose the location. The physical setting can have an impact on the ability to control the meeting. Try to have the meeting occur somewhere other than the administrator's office. A conference room with a table is preferable. If there are several people coming with the advocate, he can stress the convenience of having a table, etc. In any case, the official should not be allowed to hide behind a desk or sit at the head of the table.

   b) Prepare a specific agenda and stick to it. The advocate should not be distracted from his agenda.

   c) Use an opening approach that is polite and empathetic. The advocate should let the other party know he understands their constraints as well as areas of discretion.

   d) Review the circumstances which led to the meeting. Any documents or other evidence which substantiates the claim should be presented. A common sense approach to the problem is usually best.

e) Cite the specific sections of law or regulations that apply in the present situation. The advocate needs to demonstrate how the case circumstances fit these rules, or how the case is unique and therefore is an exception to the general rule.

f) Present demands clearly. No room for doubt should be left as to what the advocate wants. Obtain firm commitments of what the other side will do and when.

g) Seek the support of third parties. Never negotiate when out-numbered. This is particularly crucial when negotiating alone. If the advocate suspects that the official will bring in several other officials unannounced, he should bring his own group, another parent or colleague. If a group is negotiating, the members of the group should select a spokesperson. That person should be the only one empowered to make compromises. Divisiveness should never be demonstrated within the group at a negotiating session. This will only weaken the group's stance. Make certain all members of the group have a clear understanding of the goals before entering the session.

h) Be assertive. Do not hesitate to question. Avoid being put on the defensive. Refuse to discuss irrelevant issues or past actions. Deal only with the facts relevant to the case at hand!

i) Create a record. This can be written or tape recorded. A tape recorder may be intimidating to the other side and therefore not desirable. The advocate may decide to record specifically because of this effect. In any case, be aware of this effect.

j) Climb the chain of command. Everyone has a boss who can overrule decisions by employees. If the advocate is dissatisfied with a decision or action of an employee, he should appeal or complain to the next level of authority, making it clear that he is willing to fight the issue all the way up. This may include litigation.

There are some additional techniques that an advocate may employ that must be used carefully or they will cause more harm than good. These include the following:

k) Put all the cards on the table. The advocate should be direct and completely aboveboard in telling the agency official what his position is and what he wants. This technique is useful when the official is simply insecure or unsure of what the advocate is seeking. The official will probably respond the same way.
1) Make demands. This can be very effective if used properly. The demands should be reasonable and attainable. If they are not, it may give the impression that compromise is impossible and unacceptable.

m) Threaten. Threats are not physical. They include the advocate's letting the official know he will "climb the chain of command," or embarrass the official, suggesting that the advocate or his group will "go public." The advocate might indicate that he will be uncooperative on some project that the official favors.

n) Express anger and hostility. This tactic generally does more harm than good. However, some people only respond to anger and in some situations anger is the appropriate response. Anger can be a sign that the advocate is serious and intends to pursue the issue. He should be careful not to lose control, or to make angry threats that cannot be carried out.

The last two techniques are generally to be avoided!

o) Preach. This technique is seldom effective in one-to-one negotiations. It is used frequently to exhort a crowd. Preaching provides good media material but little substantive improvement.

p) Embarrass. The advocate can show the agency official that he does not respect him, in a way that makes the official look silly, but the advocate should be aware that if this technique is used, he probably will not be able to work with this individual ever again!

3. Be prepared to redefine the problem. If a problem cannot be solved, it may have to be redefined. Redefining the problem is part of the continuing advocacy process. Goals change, circumstances change, and problems change. Remember - the advocate must make sure he is talking to the right person; he should choose his technique deliberately, and he should not be distracted from his agenda and his tactics.

VII. ADVOCACY - THE LAST (AND POSSIBLY THE FIRST!) STEP: MONITOR AND EVALUATE THE RESULTS

The good news is that at this point the advocate has come to the end of the advocacy process. He discovered a problem and defined it in all its ramifications. He did his homework, developed a solution and sold it to the right people. In some form, the solution he proposed has been adopted. The advocate, his child, or his client has achieved a 'victory.' He has obtained a program or service. Perhaps others will benefit from these efforts as well.

The 'bad' news is that the advocacy process is not always linear. Often, it is cyclic. There is not always a beginning, a middle and an end. Sometimes there is a beginning, a middle and a beginning. Advocacy requires a long-term commitment, and nowhere is this more evident than at the 'final' stage, when the advocate must MONITOR AND EVALUATE the results of his work.

Many variables come into play at this point. The solution decided upon may have been eminently satisfactory to all concerned - and it may have engendered a host of other problems undreamed of by anyone. The solution may be poorly communicated to the lower levels of the care-provision system, again resulting in more problems. Or the solution may be well-received, well-executed, and still turn out to be the wrong answer for the individual it was designed to help. The possibilities are virtually endless.

Before moving on to other concerns, the advocate should make some provision to follow-up on the results of the negotiated solution. This does not mean setting up a 'vigilante' committee or otherwise being a nuisance. But before the solution is even put into effect, the advocate should have an understanding with the people who will carry out the solution that his interest will not end with the final negotiating session. Some reasonable, mutually-acceptable mechanism for monitoring and evaluating the results of everyone's efforts should be part of the final package.

The key to success in advocacy is perseverance. In defeat, this can translate into a realistic kind of determination. In victory, it means taking a continuing interest in how things are going.

VII. ADVOCACY - THE RISKS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

There is more to being a good advocate than simply developing effective skills. Being an advocate for oneself or someone else involves judgment, insight and the recognition and willingness to accept both the responsibilities and the risks of advocacy.

The advocate cannot avoid responsibility for his decision. He must determine the best course of action in a given situation - that is, he must make crucial judgments that quite literally will affect the quality of life for himself or his client. As discussed in the previous chapter, he must follow through on those decisions and be constantly aware of the impact of his actions.
An advocate must always keep his client (if competent and of legal age), the client's family, and/or other legal guardian or representative(s), advised of the actions he is taking. The client retains the right to refuse services or assistance. The client may decide the possible outcome is not worth the trouble.

In all cases, the advocate must be careful not to 'oversell' his point of view. It is sometimes very difficult to instill realistic expectations. Some clients will want and expect miracles, or at least instant results.

On the other side of the ledger, clients who are afraid to question - afraid that if they make waves they will lose what little they already have in services or support - will require encouragement.

Risks:

There are certain risks inherent in being an advocate and speaking out. Professionals may be viewed as 'radicals' or 'unprofessional' if they question the decisions of their peers and superiors or challenge the 'system.' Health and social service professionals, however, are more and more accepting the responsibility of challenging the service system, especially the governmental system, when it works against the best interests of the citizens it has been designed to help.

An advocate should be prepared to hear criticism of advocacy activities. However, the confidence and satisfaction gained from having changed something for the better usually more than compensates for the criticism.

There are times, though fortunately they are few, when employers simply will not permit professional staff to engage in certain advocacy activities, such as client representation or community organizing. The advocate must then decide what to do. This Directory provides many resources which can be related to another not in such a position.

No one should give up without first trying to negotiate on his own behalf. Many organizations permit and, in fact, encourage 'low profile' advocacy. The community contacts and knowledge that the advocate develops often boost the reputation of the agency or organization for whom he works. The old adage, "it's not what you know, it's whom," applies throughout the human service system as well as in the halls of government.

Confidentiality and Privilege:

The exchange of information between the advocate and his client should be kept completely confidential. The advocate should have the client's written permission to release any information and must have written permission to obtain information from other sources. Social security and welfare offices, doctors, clinics, hospitals, etc., will require written releases from clients before giving up information. It is a good practice to obtain limited, special purpose releases from the client. These release forms should be separate from those used for social security, welfare and medical providers.
Advocates do not have a blanket privilege for information obtained from clients. The legal confidentiality of information and exchange between the advocate and the client depends on a number of variables.

Certain professionals, such as lawyers, doctors, nurses and clergy, have limited privilege under state laws that permit them to withhold information in court and during investigations. The statutes vary from state to state.

Other licensed professions may have statutory protection in a specific state. They certainly have professional codes of ethics that govern confidentiality and disclosure.

Individuals who are paid by federal or state funded social service programs may be subject to specific programmatic regulations in confidentiality. Each program seems to have its own set of rules.

In summary, very few professions have a legally protected right to privileged conversation with clients. Even those who are protected are subject to court interpretation of the statute. An advocate should discover which laws and rules apply in his profession and current job. The courtroom scene of the dedicated professional being compelled to violate a privileged communication or face jail is the stuff of Perry Mason novels. The day-to-day reality is that of the advocate, releases in hand, begging a government agency for information the client clearly wants released!
