ABSTRACT

Five questionnaires based on Ronald Edmonds' work on "effective schools" were developed for elementary and secondary students, teachers, principals, and parents. They were designed to assess the perceptions of each group on the five areas identified by Edmonds as distinguishing effective and ineffective schools for students from low-income families. These characteristics represent areas to which schools may look for improvement. They are: (1) the principal is a strong instructional leader; (2) there is an emphasis on basic skills; (3) pupil progress is monitored frequently; (4) school staff have positive expectations for all students; and (5) the schools' climate is safe, orderly, and business-like. The questionnaires were designed for optional use by the principals themselves. An attached memo provides the principals with instructions on using the instruments and interpreting the results, although there are no norms available. (PN)

EFFECTIVE SCHOOLS QUESTIONNAIRES

This set contains questionnaires for elementary and secondary students, teachers, principals, and parents based on the work of Ronald Edmonds on "effective schools." They are accompanied by an introductory memo for the principal on how the questionnaires might be used to assess the perceptions of each group on the five areas identified by Edmonds as distinguishing effective and ineffective schools for students from low-income families.

The questionnaires were developed due to interest generated by a brochure by ORE reporting on Edmonds' article on effective schools. They were designed for optional use by the principals themselves, and the attached memo also provided the principals with instructions on using the instruments and interpreting the results. These questionnaires have not been used by ORE, and there are no data available for comparison.

Elementary

A body of work called "effective schools research" has been getting a lot of attention lately, especially an article by Ronald Edmonds in Educational Leadership (October 1979). Edmonds identified five characteristics which distinguish effective and ineffective schools for students from low-income families. While these characteristics do not represent a panacea for all school problems, they do represent areas to which schools may want to look for improvement.

The attached questionnaires were developed to provide principals with information about how teachers, parents, and students perceive the school's performance in these five areas.

Using the Questionnaires

In using these questionnaires keep the following points in mind:

1. You need not give the questionnaires to all parents and students to get meaningful results.
2. Make sure all responses are anonymous. You want to know what teachers, parents, and students really think, not what they think you want to hear. For example, provide teachers with envelopes for returning their questionnaires, and have them returned to a designated teacher rather than to the office.
3. The use of these questionnaires is strictly optional. None of the results will be reported to ORE.
4. If you have questions about giving or interpreting the questionnaires, your ORE contact person may be able to help.

Interpreting the Results

These questionnaires do not lead to easily quantifiable results. They do not provide a score for each characteristic or a way of directly comparing your school with others in the District. The questionnaires may be most useful in helping you identify areas in which your perceptions of your school differ from those held by others. They might also be useful in stimulating discussion about school improvement in the areas covered. For example, they might be given to teachers at one faculty meeting to be turned in later. At the next meeting the tallied results could be discussed; and plans to address the areas of greatest need could be made.

The items on the questionnaires are grouped by the characteristic they best seem to measure; see Table 1. Perhaps the easiest way to tally the results is to go through the questionnaires one area at a time placing tally marks on a blank copy of the questionnaire beside the answer given by the respondents. For example, items 1 and 2 on the parent form relate to an emphasis on basic skills. To get an idea of how parents see the school in this area you might:

1. Get all parent questionnaires together in a stack.
2. Get a blank copy of the questionnaire.

3. Examine the first parent questionnaire. Make a tally mark on the blank questionnaire beside the answer given to item 1 by the first parent. Then do the same thing for the second question. For example, if the parent marked "Agree" for item 1, a tally mark would be placed by "Agree" on the blank form.

4. When the tallying of responses to items 1 and 2 have been done for all parents, the marks can be counted for each answer. A percentage of the parents giving each response can then be calculated by dividing the number of responses for each answer by the total number of parents who answered the item. Tallying the results by characteristics makes a routine job more interesting by focusing your attention on that one area.
5. Then go to the next area and repeat the process.

It may be helpful when the tallying is complete to discuss the results with other interested persons (the persons who completed the forms or perhaps a group of principals with similar schools who have also used the questionnaires) to get a diversity of opinions about what the results mean and how "good" or "bad" they are.
