The guide contains detailed suggestions for teaching 10 books about Indians to older students who read easily and are ready to be introduced to serious literature. The books are When the Legends Die; Laughing Boy; Dancehall of the Dead; The Man Who Killed
The Deer; Rolling Thunder; House Made of Dawn; Yes Is Better Than No;
The Man To Send Rain Clouds; American Indian Literature, An Anthology; and Son of Old Man Hat, A Navajo Autobiography. For the first five books, the guide contains study questions, tests, and reading activities which are coded according to Bloom's taxonomy of thinking. For the second five books, the guide presents a less structured instructional method including tests, some study questions, and suggestions for learning activities and large projects. The guide is geared to reading levels 6 and up and emphasizes critical writing and thinking and literary analysis. Test answers and suggested reading activities applicable to all the books are included. (SB)

INTRODUCTION

In the Teaching Guide for Indian Literature Volume I, I introduced a nine-point reading system for use with high-interest, low-level novels about Indians and teenagers. The novels covered in that guide were geared toward reading levels one through eight and dealt extensively with literal comprehension study questions. Tests, suggested activities and various checklists were included.

Volume II departs somewhat from that format. The works covered in this volume are aimed at reading levels six and above, and are more appropriate for older students — those who read easily or fluently and those who are ready to be introduced to serious literature.

Again, it is hoped the teacher will use the materials in this guide as appropriate, depending on his or her needs and goals, and those of the students. The suggestions here reflect my experience in teaching English, reading and Indian literature. Teachers as well as students are encouraged to adapt and synthesize.

The first five novels covered in the guide include study questions, tests and reading activities which have been coded according to Bloom’s Taxonomy. A Taxonomic Chart and Suggested Reading Activities are also provided.

The material for the remaining five works (two novels, two anthologies and an autobiography), is less structured. The novels are accompanied by tests and activity suggestions; the anthologies include tests and/or study questions. After reading the autobiography I recommend that students undertake one large project: make a movie, write a book, write your own autobiography ... or ...?

The emphasis in this volume is less on literal comprehension and more on critical writing/thinking and literary analysis. And, it is important to note that the seventh grade reading level on some novels may be deceptive (Hemingway wrote on a fourth and fifth grade level). It is recommended that when discussing complex ideas or themes, the teacher use a book on the students’ mastery or easy reading level.

The works discussed in Volumes I and II represent books I have used in my classes. These reflect a natural progression of literary/reading skills, thus accounting for the rather sweeping suggestions you’ll find toward the end of this guide — “Let’s read a good book, talk about it, and then write our own or make a movie!”

There is a story in every person, and I believe that a good book inspires us to do more with our own lives. Hopefully, at the conclusion of each reading experience you will hear your students say, “That was a great book!”

Fry's Graph for Estimating Readability

Edward Fry  Rutgers University Reading Center  New Jersey

Average number of syllables per 100 words

Directions
Randomly select 3 one hundred word passages from a book or an article. Plot average number of syllables and average number of words per sentence on graph to determine the grade level of the material. Choose more passages per book if great variability is observed and conclude that the book has uneven readability. Few books will fall in gray area but when they do grade level scores are invalid.

Benjamin Bloom, an educator who is now involved with "mastery learning," divides thinking into six areas ranging from the simple knowledge level to the more complex evaluation level. Listed are the types of tasks associated with each level. Use these to assist your inquiry process and to adapt/develop your own activities and experiences with the students.

WHEN THE LEGENDS DIE

Reading Level 6

This is an immensely popular book because of its modern setting and young protagonist. Students’ interest and experience with the boarding school setting and rodeo make this book especially interesting; moreover, the conflicting expectations of two cultures is something most Indian students have in common.

Thomas Black Bull, a young Ute Indian, spends his early years living in the “old way” on Colorado’s Horse Mountain. This idyllic life is interrupted by the deaths of his parents. He is tricked into going away to boarding school by Blue Elk, an elder member of his tribe who is described as being willing to “sell his own grandmother.”

Tom is not happy with boarding school life and the “new ways.” One day, in a nearby town, he is “discovered” riding a wild horse and con man Red Dillon talks him into the rodeo circuit, bilking spectators with fixed rides. From there on, Tom has to deal with conflicts — his love of riding vs. Red’s con game and living in two worlds — the old ways and the new ways. At this point, most students are eager to discuss values an... Tom’s coming of age.

This book can be supplemented with several materials (films, filmstrips, short articles, etc.) on Utes, the West, rodeo or any of several other themes. The novel was made into a movie of which a sound filmstrip version is available. Scholastic Scope magazine has also printed a simplified play version of When the Legends Die, which has proven a valuable tool to involve students in the story.

LAUGHING BOY

Reading Level 7

"Laughing Boy is a classic romantic western that remains a favorite with students. I have found the novel to be an excellent discussion and research starter. Students talk easily about the characters and situations, making this book a difficult one to ignore.

The novel has been the object of some controversy, as many of today's teachers question its cultural accuracy. Most experts, however, attest to the book's authenticity and realistic portrayal of Navajo lifestyles at the time. One teacher found it to be one of the most successful books he ever used to "turn on" his reluctant second-language readers. He and his students checked on fact after fact and as a result compiled a list of hundreds of Navajo taboos.

The story concerns a young Navajo, Laughing Boy, who falls in love with Slim Girl, a young lady who is not well regarded by his family. Slim Girl has spent most of her youth in the "white man's world" and has lost much of her own culture.

Against the advice of his family, Laughing Boy leaves his home to live with Slim Girl in her home in a nearby border town. There, in an alien culture, doing things differently than he was taught, Laughing Boy achieves a peaceful life with Slim Girl, waiting for the day they have earned enough money to go home to the north country. As the novel nears its tragic conclusion, most students find themselves totally involved in the characters' lives and unable to put the book down.

DANCEHALL OF THE DEAD

Reading Level 7-8

A Zuni boy is savagely murdered; his young Navajo friend is missing. Lt. Joe Leaphorn, Navajo policeman, is called in to search for the boy and at first, it is unsure whether he is the killer or a witness.

Even though the novel unfolds as most mysteries do — a procession of suspects, characters, clues — there is the suggestion that this is more than an ordinary murder mystery. Young Ernesto was to have been the Fire God in the Zuni Shalako ceremony and just before his murder, he is worried that he may be punished for breaking a taboo in telling his friend George too much of the ceremony. Lt. Leaphorn sees someone with the head of a Salamobia lurking near a house he is watching.

For a first-time Tony Hillerman reader in the Joe Leaphorn series, the experience is incredibly new, interesting and suspenseful. In this blend of the new and the traditional, Hillerman tells a believable story. His main character, Leaphorn, has a logical detective's mind but is also knowledgeable and respectful of the Indian cultures of which he is part.

The sequence of events is easy for students to follow as they perceive the mounting evidence and become aware of the mystery unraveling in Leaphorn's mind. Simultaneously, the Shalako ceremony and much of the Zuni culture come alive for them.

Ideally, this book should be completed in November and followed by a field trip to the Shalako house-blessing ceremony in Zuni, New Mexico. (This is usually held on the last weekend in November or the first weekend in December.) All are welcome at the ceremony. My students have been eager to track down the seven houses they have learned about in the novel.

For those who get "hooked," there are four other novels in this series.

14. Describe George's thoughts as they must have been while he was running and hiding. Since George never actually appears as a character in the novel, write some scenes using him as a main character. ★
THE MAN WHO KILLED THE DEER

Reading Level 8

This is the classic novel of a young Indian caught between two cultures, not fully a part of either. Martiniano kills a deer illegally, one of many things he does against Pueblo custom. The deer becomes a symbol, his burden, something he will live with for the rest of his life.

He first earned the disrespect of the community elders by going away to school and flaunting untraditional dress and ways upon his return. An outcast among his people, Martiniano's only true friends are Palemon, a respected member of the community, Rodolpho Byers, a trader, and Flowers Playing, his Ute wife.

Eventually, Martiniano comes to terms with himself, his place in the community and "his deer."

Despite the eighth grade reading level, this book is probably more appropriate for older students. Its tone is more serious and introspective than that of similar books such as When the Legends Die.

This book is an excellent introduction to the study of Pueblo cultures; it helps encourage students to write about themselves as they identify with particular scenes in the novel — such as Byers paying Martiniano's fine (has anyone ever bailed you out of trouble?), being tempted to "go on the peyote road" (what are your feelings about peyote?), Martiniano's visions of his deer (has anything similar ever happened to you?) and his jealousy over his wife's acceptance by his people (have you ever felt jealous when someone you loved got more recognition than you?)

ROLLING THUNDER

Reading Level 9

Working for the Menninger Foundation, author Doug Boyd originally sought out Shoshone medicine man Rolling Thunder to compare his work to the eastern Swami Rama. This is a true account of his experience.

Doug Boyd becomes close to Rolling Thunder, following him on some of his ventures to save the environment and the dignity of Indian people. Along the way Doug learns something of the medicine man's view of knowledge and power.

There are elements in the book that appeal to both the traditional and the "activist" student— the many accounts of Rolling Thunder's rites with herbs, ceremonies, and discussions of healing and Rolling Thunder's "missions" to preserve treaties and save the environment (for instance, trying to stop the chaining of piñon trees by the government).

This book is a good vocabulary-builder. It appears to be easy to read, but contains dozens of new words per chapter, many of which can be defined contextually. Students are not deterred by this as they plow through chapter after chapter, dictionary in hand. However, students often lose interest in the book halfway through unless the teacher paces them and discusses each chapter. This is one book I use to encourage students to write, as it has several chapters that can be read alone and which serve as good writing-starters. (For example: "After reading Chapter One, describe Rolling Thunder; compare him to a medicine man you know. Why is Rolling Thunder reluctant to speak about 'spiritual matters' to the public? What does he say about becoming a medicine man? Is this in keeping with what you know of medicine men? Compare traditional Navajo beliefs to those Rolling Thunder mentions about "Karma," herbs, killing animals, being a medicine man.")

HOUSE MADE OF DAWN

Reading Level 10

House Made of Dawn is the story of Abel, an Indian youth who leaves the reservation “in shame,” does equally poorly in Los Angeles, and returns home. Through a series of flashbacks we learn about Abel’s grandfather, other important people in his past, his experiences in Los Angeles and the fact that he served time in prison for a murder. The story is divided into four sections, most of which are told in the third person; one chapter is told in the first person by a friend of Abel’s.

The structure, the change in viewpoint and the flashbacks make it difficult for students to follow. Nevertheless, I feel this is a book worth “walking them through.” To clarify the plot, the teacher may wish to outline and explain as the students read. Reading a work of this type is like reading Shakespeare for the first time — you have to be told what you just read, until you get the hang of it.

Because of its difficulty I have always used this book as a writing- and discussion-starter. I found it appropriate and necessary to provide the structure and themes, and allow the students to synthesize various aspects of the novel.

The activity I suggest for this novel is a journal students keep for each chapter or section. After a discussion and “lesson” on each section or chapter, students are given a choice of topics to write about in their journal. The journal format enables the teacher to incorporate any topics included in class discussions, presentations or lectures. The journal entries must not necessarily reflect events in the novel; they may be about the students themselves or ideas they had while reading. For example, the prologue is about running in the early morning with the “dawn runners.” Students may write about “Running in the ’80s” or “Something I saw early one morning.” For the first several days I select one suggested topic and show several possible approaches for journal writing. Examples from student writing are read to the class each day until they are familiar with the process. This practice can be continued throughout the novel or included in class discussion. Eventually students may be eager to read their writing aloud.

This procedure encourages all students to become involved in the book. They will all, at least once, “analogize” or relate their experiences to those of Abel. By focusing the assignment on several short topics, students find themselves writing well; often this is their first experience with critical writing.

In the beginning it might be useful to pick an event and ask some standard “journal-starter” questions: “What does this remind you of? Did you approve or disapprove of the character’s actions? Why or why not? Put yourself in his/her place. What would you be thinking, feeling?” Write each day yourself, and leave your journal around for inspection!

Following are some suggested journal topics for each section of the novel:

21. Pick one character and “psychoanalyze” that character.
22. Where does the title come from?
This is a comedy about a group of Papago Indians living in Tucson, Arizona. Each chapter of the novel focuses on one of over a dozen characters and the reader gradually gets to know the whole community. A plot of sorts revolves around Mrs. Domingo's winning of a swimming pool at the state fair which she has installed without water so her family, sorely in need of housing, can move into it. Maria, who lives on a mattress in an alley, can't get her welfare benefits unless she has a proper address, so she uses the address of the Domingo's swimming pool/home for this purpose. A young Indian artist who calls attention to his Indianness with headbands, chokers, feathers, Red Power T-shirts, bumper stickers, etc., comes to paint a mural on the side of the Domingo home's entrance and provides the love interest for a young, blonde (of course) social worker.

And what would an urban Indian comedy be without the "evil" social worker, a meddling Red Power group, a crazy lady, a wino and a boyfriend who is taking a detective course by mail?

Since this was the first comedy we read in my Indian Literature class, I felt one of the main objects was to have fun! I didn't want to find myself saying, "See how this is funny here?" so I structured class time and activities accordingly. The focus of study was informal discussion, characterization and group projects. We began class with 10-15 minutes of discussion of the chapters read the previous evening. Thus, far into the course, often nothing more was needed than "Well, what happened?" The remainder of the period was given over to work on one of two group projects: character profiles of each character and a group mural.

Character Profiles: A large poster is made for each character, including one or more portraits or a scene involving that character. Students write their descriptions, personality "analyses," observations and comments about that character on the poster (attractively and artistically placed; encourage students to use their knowledge of design, lettering, etc.).

Group Mural: A large piece of butcher paper is taped to the wall and students gradually fill in a city map as they read. They also comment on where various events take place. Around the edges, and under the title, students respond graffiti-style to "Yes Is Better Than No." In between are pictures (drawn or cut out of magazines) of objects that "go" with various characters.

Individual projects can be research reports. Suggested topics included:
(a) Papago Indians
(b) urban Indians
(c) Red Power
(d) American Indian Movement
(e) Tucson
(f) welfare
(g) social workers
(h) St. Jude
(i) Papago-Navajo similarities
(j) Papago-Navajo differences
(k) Indian art

The test is given after group projects are complete, so if a student writes particularly well on a given essay question or seems especially interested in some aspect of the book, I assign an individual essay or story for that student in lieu of the research report.
If you have access to video equipment, this would be an opportune time for filming scenes from the book or writing a class script and performing it for the cameras. A comedy relieves some of the pressure of "performing" and lends itself more easily to ad-libs, forgetting lines, etc.

34. Do you think the Chicago Indians and Red Power helped the Papagos? How did they help them or hurt them? Should they have gotten involved at all?
THE MAN TO SEND RAINCLOUDS
(Contemporary Stories by American Indians)

Reading Level 8 and Above

The editor of this anthology, Kenneth Rosen, spent two years tracking down the stories and poems represented here. He was especially interested in young authors and concentrated his search on the Southwest, where he determined most Native American writers to be.

The anthology includes 17 short stories and two poems. I have included suggestions for eight of the short stories and both poems. The activities can be used as study questions, essay questions or open book test questions and are intended to be adapted to individual class needs. The reading levels vary from work to work but are in line with the levels represented in this guide. It is suggested that the teacher do a readability analysis on any work he or she intends to have students work on alone.

The outstanding author in these selections is Leslie Silko, a Laguna Pueblo Indian from New Mexico. Her story, "The Man to Send Rainclouds" lends the anthology its title. Her stories are an intriguing blend of the old and new — her characters are contemporary Indians shrouded in ancient mysteries and beauty.

Another author of interest is Simon J. Ortiz. A former resident of Rough Rock, Arizona where he worked on the local newspaper, his story "Kaiser and the War" appears to take place "right here."

Throughout the anthology run the common themes of searching for identity, longing for the past, occasional violence and bitterness, and pride in one's culture.

The editor of this anthology stresses that the selections represent literary excellence and that this is not to be regarded as a romanticization of Indians, nor is it a selection of stories merely about Indians. Instead he hopes that teachers using this text emphasize the same areas they would in the teaching of all literature: importance of subject and theme; form, structure and beauty.

Indian literature, as we know it today, was originally an oral tradition and half the works in this anthology reflect that tradition — tales, poetry, songs and oratory. The book is divided into six sections: tales, songs, memoirs, oratory, poetry and fiction. I have provided here suggestions for one work from each section, including study questions and activities. Again, these suggestions may be used as a discussion format, study questions, essay questions, or may be adapted for multiple choice tests or other activities.

5. Give him a name. Explain your choice.
6. Illustrate a scene from the story or draw a picture to go with the novel.
7. Write a poem called "Winter in the Blood."
I have saved this book for last because the approach I recommend for using it in class is totally different from that of the other works discussed in these two volumes. That doesn't mean it is not as significant or useful as a study unit or as a book to be read for pleasure. In fact, this book is as enjoyable and delightful to read as any I have discovered. The picture it provides of Navajo life in the 1800s is vivid and meaningful. This book evokes the time and the culture more than any single work I have yet read. And the kids love it!

When I began teaching English on the Navajo Reservation, I heard about this book. It was an object of much controversy among teachers because of its frankly sexual content. For this reason, many teachers refused to deal with it as serious literature. The students, too, seemed to know exactly which pages to turn to. Indeed, when I stood before a class of 20 teenagers and said, “We are going to read ‘Son of Old Man Hat,”’ I wondered if I had finally “arrived” as a teacher because of the silence, the awe, the rapt attention—or were they thinking, “We are about to read a book with three pages of sex in it?” More likely they had heard that it’s a “great book!”

Walter Dyk began this venture while conducting research on Navajo clans and kinship. He spent much time with people around Lukachukai in the early 1930s, and finally concentrated on one of his “informants,” Left Handed, who told Dyk his entire life story through an interpreter. His story stretches over 20 years, beginning with his birth and ending with his marriage. Left Handed was born in 1868, and those students who have read Sing Down the Moon or another story about the Navajos’ Long Walk and their stay at Fort Sumner will be able to place his birth as being just a few years after Bright Morning “came home” (see Teaching Guide for Indian Literature Volume 1, pp. 77–84).

Each chapter in this book begins with a series of “subtitles” or phrases which afford a glimpse of what is to come. These lend themselves perfectly to rewording for oral questioning, discussion topics or essay test questions. For example, following Chapter One it is noted: “He is born before his time and is taken by his mother’s older sister to live with Old Man Hat ... Trials and tribulations ... He has lots of fun playing with Paiute children ... He has lots of fun playing with Paiute children ... He has lots of fun playing with Paiute children ... He has lots of fun playing with Paiute children ... He has lots of fun playing with Paiute children.” You might ask students: “Tell about Left Handed’s birth. Why was he taken to live with Old Man Hat? What were his trials and tribulations? What did the children do for fun? Why was his mother jealous?” And so on, for each chapter of the novel.

The suggested activity for this book is to encourage students to produce a similar work of their own—to interview someone they know about his/her life. A series of these interviews could be compiled in a class publication—an American Indian “Foxfire” or a video production.
