*Formula Poetry; *Writing across the Curriculum

Intended for teachers in all content areas, this guide provides activities for teaching formula poetry (poetry written according to a defined format) in all subject areas. First, a rationale for why teachers should include writing in their classrooms is presented. Next, the stages of the writing process are explained and the benefits of formula poetry are discussed. Instructions for teaching students to write bio-poems, cinquains, concrete poems, definition poems, diamante poems, five-sense poems, found poetry, haiku, inside/outside poems, parallel poems, and vertical name poems are provided, as well as examples of poems that have been written in science, social studies, and English classes. Rx for FORMULA POETRY in the CONTENT AREA

For many teachers, griping about the poor quality of their student's writing is like talking about the weather. It seems everyone has something to say about it, but few believe you can actually do anything about it.

Teachers' complaints about the inability of students to express themselves in writing are justified and supported by recent research. The results of the 1979-1980 National Assessment of Educational Progress show that the ability of 17-year olds to analyze, interpret, and express their views about written prose had declined by approximately 20% since 1971. Only 41% of the students tested in 1980 were able to compose reasoned, thoughtful answers. These results are not surprising when one considers how much time is spent writing. In 1981, Applebee's National Institute of Education report, A Study of Writing in the Secondary School, based on the observation of 259 high school classes in all subject areas, found that 44% of class time is spent on paper and pencil activities. However, less than 3% of that time is spent in writing a paragraph.

Researchers in the past ten years have directed their studies toward writing as a process that can be taught. This process has been divided into three major stages: (1) the pre-writing stage, in which the writer thinks about the writing task and selects and organizes the information that will be used, (2) the composing stage, in which the writer actually writes, and (3) the re-writing stage, in which the writer revises the ideas in the composition and proofreads for grammatical and mechanical errors. It is important that classroom teachers and curriculum planners understand this process so they can design effective instruction in all stages of writing. However, most teachers have had little or no training in teaching writing. Teachers who have barely enough time to teach requirements in their curriculum will not eagerly leap on the writing bandwagon unless they are given (1) convincing reasons why they should include writing in their classrooms, (2) realistic strategies and activities to teach writing, and (3) examples of the benefits of writing.

1. WHY TEACHERS SHOULD INCLUDE WRITING IN THEIR CLASSROOMS

Writing is an important learning strategy for students. When a student writes, s/he must formulate a concept, then locate, select, organize and arrange facts to support the concept. Writing helps classify and clarify thoughts, regardless of the content. Writing makes information permanent and instantly retrievable, and enhances both long and short term memory of a subject.

For the teacher, writing is an important method of instruction. It is a true record of a student's learning experience and ability to think in a content area. There can be no accidental performance or guessing in writing.

Writing can only be taught by the act of writing. If skills introduced in language arts classes are going to be mastered, they must be practiced in all subjects. Students are able to expand and refine their writing skills if they are provided opportunities to write in a variety of situations.

2. REALISTIC STRATEGIES AND ACTIVITIES TO TEACH WRITING

Formula poetry writing is one way to incorporate writing in content area classes. Formula poetry is writing in a defined format. Examples of this type of writing include vertical poems, cinquains, haikus, bio-poems, diamantes, and concrete poems.
Students do not learn how to write by being assigned writing; they must be taught how to write. The writing process can be a model for teaching students how to translate their ideas into effective written communication. Instruction must be provided in every stage of the process in the skills that are necessary to complete that particular stage. Different forms of writing include different skills and, therefore, require different strategies and activities to teach the skills. It is important to realize that the stages of the writing process are not always consecutive. Students may begin composing during the pre-writing stage, generate new ideas in the composing and re-writing stage, or share and revise in the composing stage. The following instructional model has been developed to teach formula poetry writing.

Pre-Writing Stage

1. Tell students the name of the formula poem, and provide an example of that poem. If possible, use a poem that has been written by a student.
2. Point out and label the distinctive features of the poem. For example, label the number of syllables in each line of haiku, the types of words that are in each line of cinquain, or the beginning letter of each line in vertical writing.
3. Suggest a general topic for writing that directly relates to what you have studied in class; students must have information about a topic to be able to write about it. As suggestions are offered, write them on the board.
4. Select one of the listed words as the subject for a class poem, and develop a "word bank" for that subject. A word bank is a list of facts students can use during the course of writing to help them with the correct spelling of a word or as a resource for ideas. The design of the word bank should relate to the requirements of the poem. For example, if you are demonstrating cinquain, the word bank should include columns for adjectives, verbs, and synonyms. If you are demonstrating vertical writing, the word bank should include words that begin with each letter in the word that will be written vertically. It is important to list enough words to write the poem.
5. Demonstrate, line-by-line, how to write the poem. Begin with the first line, and remind the students (what type of word, . . . how many syllables, . . . what beginning letter) is/are used on that line. Tell them to refer to the word bank and suggest a word they'd like to use. Repeat this procedure for every line in the poem. Allow more than one suggestion, and encourage discussion about the word choice. Tell the students they can change their minds about a word they have used and revise at any time. Continue with this procedure until the poem is completed. Depending on the age and ability of the students, you may write several poems as a group project or have students write individually about the topic on the board before proceeding to the next step.
6. Ask each student to select a subject to write. Suggest that they select a subject from the original list of topics if they are having difficulty discovering a subject.
7. Tell students to develop word banks for their poems. This is not a test of memory; provide dictionaries, thesauruses, texts, or other instructional aides for students to use to help them locate information. Specify in advance the number of words they must have in their individual banks before they can begin the composing stage.
Composing Stage

8. Using formula poetry, the composing stage is often the easiest for students because the structure organizes and arranges their ideas into written form. Students who have had little writing instruction are free to use their imaginations and creativity to experiment and "play" with the language of the course content. Students can write individually, with a writing partner, or with a small group of three or four students. Allow plenty of time for this stage of the writing process. Circulate among the students to assist those who may be experiencing difficulty.

Re-Writing Stage

9. Students need meaningful feedback and evaluation on their writing. This does not mean that they need a grade; it means they need to share their writing and have others respond to it. Teachers who expand a student's audience to include other students, effectively use the powerful influence of the peer group to give students a reason to edit and polish their work. One evaluation technique is to pair each student with another student to exchange and read what each one has written. Ask each student to indicate the part of the poem that they liked the best. Then ask them to indicate if there is a part of the writing that they did not understand. Encourage them to help each other find errors in spelling and mechanics. Allow time for students to revise their rough drafts and make final copies of their poems. Encourage, never force, students to share their writing with the entire class. Some students may want to share their writing if someone else reads it. You may also want to display final drafts in a "Poet's Corner" in the classroom, submit some of the poems to the school or local newspaper, or publish examples in a class anthology of poems.

3. BENEFITS OF FORMULA POETRY

Formula poetry helps develop foundation skills for more complex writing. It requires the student to select a topic, to list information that is related to the topic, and to organize the words and ideas in a specific pattern. These same cognitive skills--selecting, listing, organizing--are a strategy that can be used in almost all forms of writing from simple paragraphs to complex research reports.

The poetry demands succinct writing. Students must be selective, isolating key words that relate to the subject of the poem, and eliminate all excess verbiage from their writing.

Formula poetry is easily integrated with the course content and reinforces subject matter instruction. When writing is part of the content, learning in the subject area is enhanced at the same time that writing skills are strengthened.

Formula poetry provides opportunities for students to actively participate and contribute in an activity. Students who are active, rather than passive learners, develop a sense of ownership towards the writing. They are motivated to succeed because they have invested their ideas.

The written results of the formula poetry are immediate and impressive, and this helps generate positive attitudes toward writing. Compared to other forms of writing such as letters, reports, and stories, poems can be completed in a short time. As students and teachers experience success, they develop a courageous attitude toward writing and may tackle a more difficult and challenging writing task.
FORMULA POETRY IN OTHER SUBJECT AREA CLASSES

Formula poetry can be used in almost any subject area class. Imagine the exciting possibilities of--

--a vertical poem using the name of a famous scientist, an occupation, a mineral, or a style of painting.
--a bio-poem written by a dinosaur, an animal that is almost extinct, or a famous artist or musician.
--a concrete poem about a land formation, a planet, a nerve cell, or a tool.
--a diamante about positive/negative space, solids/liquids/matter/anti-matter, skilled/unskilled occupations, or Pluto/Mercury.
--an inside/outside poem from an astronaut's view as s/he lifts off into space, or as a virus attacking a healthy cell.
--haiku about DNA, ecology, weather phenomena, a famous art object, a song, or a sports event.
--cinquain about atomic energy, pollution, an artist, a musical instrument.

Use your imagination! The possibilities are endless!!

Poetry is made up of Originality that never Ends

Run out of Your mind.

The Diamante Rough Draft is recommended for some intermediate and junior high students. Make sure the chart is completed before the actual writing begins. Filling in the chart can be an individual, small group, or class effort.

If you have students who have difficulty writing the final draft in the diamond shape, place a sheet of paper on the top of the rough draft. The students can then copy over the words.

TEACHING SUGGESTIONS:

1. Introduce this activity with concrete nouns for Line 1 and Line 7. Abstract nouns are much more difficult to write about. For example, use "free man" and "slave" rather than "freedom" and "slavery".

2. Before students write individually, structure and direct the activity until everyone has had the opportunity to write as a group.
   - Ask students to brainstorm words they might use for the diamante.
   - List the words on the board as they are suggested by the students.
   - On the board, compose a group poem from the listed words.
   - Encourage revisions! Let students "play" with various word combinations until they are satisfied with the results.
   - Have each student copy the poem.

Be creative! You can re-write the diamante for almost any subject, and grade level.

Found Poetry

Found poetry is locating, isolating, and ordering words and phrases from already composed writing and re-structuring them into a poem. One type of found poem is to simply re-write the prose and set it in an appropriate visual arrangement. Another is to select the strongest images and/or pleasant sounding word combinations from different sentences and re-order the words and phrases so that it looks like a "poem". A third type of found poetry is to cut words and phrases from magazines and arrange them on a piece of plain paper. This type of poem also has visual impact.

When the Japanese write haiku, they imply a relationship between two disparate ideas, events, or scenes. These events must have some relationship to nature or the season and take place at the present moment. This concept is difficult for most students to grasp. Inside/Outside Poem
(recommended for advanced students)

In a poem, tell what exists outside a thing and inside the same thing. A very simple example is "Outside me is blue pants/ inside me is red blood."

BOSTON MASSACRE

Outside me I see a crowd gathering on King Street of Boston.
Inside me I am curious about what is happening---yet I feel safe because I'm watching from the warmth of my home.

Outside me I hear townspeople shouting insults and throwing snowballs at the British soldiers.
Inside me I am astounded and somewhat angry at the remarks of the people of Boston because I am afraid of what the soldiers might do.

Outside me I see the soldiers becoming angry, and weapons are starting to be drawn.
Inside me I am horrified at the thought of the soldiers firing into the crowded square.

Outside me I hear the word, "Fire!". I hear the shots from their muskets, and the crowd scatters.
Inside me I feel sickened. I did not expect the soldiers to actually turn their weapons on the crowd.

Outside me I see Crispus Attucks, Samuel Maverick, Patrick Carr, and two other men falling dead in the street.
Inside me I am outraged, but I am not really surprised. Something like this was about to happen sooner or later; things have been very tense lately.

TAXES

Taxes are plenty,
They're never few.
Taxes keep growing,
They're always due.
