A product of Hawaii's Poets-in-the-Schools program, this second volume of a compilation of essays and poems addresses diverse artistic and educational concerns about poetry writing and is divided into two sections. Section I consists of essays by three of the poets who were involved in the program: (1) "Evaluating Student Poems" by Tim Burke, (2) "Giving Voice" by Dana Naone, and (3) "Chinese Imagery" by Wayne Westlake. Section II consists of 94 short poems written by the children of the 28 Central Oahu Elementary Schools, merely a sample of the poetry produced in response to the presence and guidance of poets in the classroom. (NKA)
HAKU MELE O HAWAII, VOLUME II

OFFICE OF INSTRUCTIONAL SERVICES  DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION  STATE OF HAWAII
TAC 77-2952  JANUARY 1977

"PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE THIS MATERIAL HAS BEEN GRANTED BY Hawaii State Dept. of Education

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)."
The Honorable George R. Ariyoshi
Governor, State of Hawaii

BOARD OF EDUCATION
Noboru Yonahime, Chairman
Rev. Darrow L.K. Alona, Vice Chairman
George S. Adachi
Dr. Richard E. Ando
Hubert P. Minn
Ruth Tabrah
Howard I. Takenaka Hiroshi Yamashita
Marion Saunders

Charles G. Clark, Superintendent of Education
George D.L. Mau, Deputy Superintendent

May C. Chun, Assistant Superintendent
Office of Library Services

Emiko Kudo, Assistant Superintendent
Office of Instructional Services

Koichi H. Tokushige, Assistant Superintendent
Office of Business Services

Eugene Yamamoto, Assistant Superintendent
Office of Personnel Services

Francis Hatanaka, District Superintendent
Honolulu District Office

Barton H. Nagata, District Superintendent
Kauai District Office

Darrell Oishi, District Superintendent
Maui District Office

Kengo Takata, District Superintendent
Windward District Office

Liberato Viduya, Jr., District Superintendent
Leeward District Office

William A. Waters, District Superintendent
Hawaii District Office

George Yamamoto, District Superintendent Central District Office
FOREWORD

Haku Mele O Hawaii, Volume II is a collection of essays and poems written in response to classes held under the Poets-in-the-Schools Program at 28 elementary schools in the Central Oahu School District during 1975-76.

Volume I of Haku Mele O Hawaii, which included work produced in different districts during 1973-75, was received with great enthusiasm. This second volume indicates what the program attempted and accomplished in the Central District.

The book is divided into two sections. The essays in the first section were written by a few of the poets who have distinguished themselves in Hawaii's energetic literary community. These essays provide insights into the poets' thoughts as they worked with children in the classrooms. The second section, a collection of poems by the students, illustrates the children's response to the poets.

We hope that Haku Mele O Hawaii, Volume II will again provide our teachers with helpful, creative ideas for their own classrooms.

Charles G. Clark
Superintendent of Education
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Poets-in-the-Schools is a component of the Artists-in-the-Schools Program funded by the Department of Education and the State Foundation on Culture and the Arts in federal and state partnership with the National Endowment for the Arts.

We acknowledge with appreciation the following for their contributions to the Poets-in-the-Schools Program in Hawaii during 1975-76:

Poets/Coordinators

Caroline Garrett
Martha Garbisch
Eric Chock

National Endowment for the Arts

John H. Kerr
Leonard Randolph

State Foundation on Culture and the Arts

Masaru Yokouchi
Alfred Preis

Department of Education

Office of Instructional Services:
Dr. Ray Okimoto
Central Oahu School District:
George Yamamoto
Shuk Fon Yuen

Hawaii Literary Arts Council

Dr. Phyllis Hoge (Thompson)
Dr. John Unterecker

and all the participating poets, students, teachers and principals.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

<table> <thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Foreword</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>iii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction</td>
<td>Jim Kraus</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SECTION I</td>
<td>Evaluating Student Poems</td>
<td>Tim Burke</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>poems from Red Hill Elementary School</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Giving Voice</td>
<td>Dana Naone</td>
<td>10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>poems from Wahiawa Elementary School</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Chinese Imagery</td>
<td>Wayne Westlake</td>
<td>17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>poems from Aliamanu, Hickam and Kaala Elementary Schools</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SECTION II</td>
<td>A collection of poems by students of Central Oahu elementary schools</td>
<td></td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Aiea</td>
<td>Mokulele</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hale Kula</td>
<td>Nimitz</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Haleiwa</td>
<td>Pearl Harbor</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Helemano</td>
<td>Pearl Harbor Kai</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hickam</td>
<td>Pearl Ridge</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Iliahi</td>
<td>Salt Lake</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Kaala</td>
<td>Scott</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Kipapa</td>
<td>Shafter</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Kunia</td>
<td>Solomon</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Makalapa</td>
<td>Waialua</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Mililani - uka</td>
<td>Webling</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Mililani - waena</td>
<td>Wheeler</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Moanalua</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notes</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>66</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>
INTRODUCTION

In order to appreciate children's poetry, one must first have the desire to appreciate it. This means that, as adults, we should not expect to read a child's poem written like an adult. Children's poetry has its own strengths which, in fact, are not far from ideals which many poets in certain traditions have spent lifetimes perfecting. In the Western poetic tradition, the greatest poets have been ones who were able to write long poems, but in the Orient the striving has been toward short poems and simplicity. In Japan, the earliest classical verse form was the tanka, or short song, which consisted of thirty-one syllables. Instead of expanding as the tradition developed, the form was shortened to the familiar seventeen syllables. Robert Bly, in the introduction to the book The Sea and the Honeycomb, explains that short poems make both poet and reader aware of emotions that usually go unnoticed. There has never been a form in the English language to accommodate the world of brief emotions. According to Bly, longer poems become complicated with rhetoric and philosophy, which are part of the world of adults.

Children, who have not learned about rhetoric and philosophy, are equipped very well both to read and write the short poem. Bly's collection is used by several of the poets in the classroom to open for the children the possibilities of the short poem, but usually the best examples come from the students' own works. As I am sure many have learned, when it comes to the ideal of simplicity, the roles of student and teacher are quickly reversed. Many elementary school students considered slow by their teachers actually have the knack for understanding emotions in the most basic terms, and if they can find the words to express themselves, they are capable of extraordinary poetry.

In Tim Burke's essay we learn that children's poetry should be read as carefully as any other, especially if one has the hope of encouraging the writer. We might choose to see a psychological or philosophical pattern in a poem which might help shape a meaningful response, but we must remember that children do not consciously use such patterns. The musical quality, the repetition of sounds and rhythms in children's poetry, is especially pronounced, and responding to this quality of a poem often will be helpful. But the intense emotional life which is somehow linked to spontaneity is what produces the really fine poems. As Dana Naone mentions in her essay "Giving Voice," she will improvise on poetry ideas she developed before the class. She reports that this results in a highly charged, spontaneous atmosphere. Children are able to sense immediately whether a teacher is genuine, and if the teacher is able to demonstrate the ideals of spontaneity and simplicity, the students will pick up on them immediately.

The importance of the image, a picture from the imagination often associated with dreams, is sometimes neglected by teachers of poetry in favor of more objective formal aspects, such as syllabics. Strong imagery is the key to all good poetry, but in the very short poem it is crucial. It is good that so many children in Hawaii know what haiku is, but at the same time very few are aware of anything beyond the formal requirement of seventeen syllables. Wayne Westlake's remarkable idea of using ancient Chinese characters as a way of teaching children about imagery shows that poetry writing is not an abstract intellectual exercise. The visual image, to which Chinese characters are much closer than words, carries the added intensity of concrete associations. But what is perhaps most unique in this approach to poetry is that it draws on the oriental movement in poetry toward simplicity. As Wayne points out, the results from the children are "near masterpieces of simplicity."

My personal inclination is toward demonstration poems and other activities that encourage spontaneity, in myself as well as the students. A demonstration poem is where I do all of the writing on the chalkboard using suggestions from the students. This way seems to work in all classes, but is especially useful in classes where attention spans and writing skills are minimal. Another way I've found to encourage spontaneity and better imagery as well, is to do free-association "word chains" every day for a few minutes. I start off by timing them for thirty seconds. For some reason this makes them want to write very fast; if they were reluctant to write before, this will usually get them moving. Through the course of the week I explain what an image is, so that eventually the word chains become groups of images rather than single words. I then ask them to use the images they have written this way in their poems. Sometimes very little work is needed after the initial list is made. Maybe all I will suggest will be to rearrange some words, or simply take a line out. I try to convince them that the shorter they can make the poems, the better.

We live in a technological society where the automatic trend is toward classification and standardization. Too often teachers rely exclusively on games and teaching formulas and see these as ends. Most of the poets teaching in the schools use games with rules that are made to be broken. The idea is that the games will spark an interest in words and language so that students will eventually find a way to write poems on their own.

The poems in the second section are merely samples of the hundreds of good things written while the PITS Program was in Central Oahu. Some were directly inspired by an assignment, but usually the best were those that broke the most rules, including those of spelling and grammar. In the lower grades this can become a problem, but in most cases it is better to let these kinds of problems pass and think of the errors as contributing to the character of the writing. Although the program is oriented toward poetry, by stimulating interest in using words it no doubt does much to help increase overall language skills. Teachers and administrators often react with amazement when they see collections of student work after a poet's visit. The secret is that all of the people involved in the program love poetry and are personally in touch with the creative energies they are helping the children discover for themselves.

Jim Kraus Editor
EVALUATING STUDENT POEMS

Tim Burke

If you are like most teachers, you probably find the prospect of trying to guide would-be poets along the road to serious writing difficult with students at any level, and particularly so when the writer is nine years old and not sure how to spell "Martian." What does one do? How do you tell a good poem with exciting language from a more predictable one? And then how do you broach the subject with the author?

Fortunately, there are clues. Look at this poem by a sixth grader* at Red Hill School:

Pick up the night at my elevator light after dark.

I think this is an extraordinary poem, especially since it arose (no pun intended) from a formula we in PITS use sometimes—the "name poem." This one spells the poet's name vertically while addressing itself to a vertical image—that of elevator and the movement of the light after dark (and of dark after light, syntactically). The first line's four words (including "Pick up" which is what elevators do, after all) form a roof from which the shaft of the poem descends, revealing new detail at every floor. The word "elevator" itself in line four stands alone, hanging in midflight. Other questions I asked myself about this poem concern the other meaning of the words "pick up" (as in "Pick up a light far off through the trees"), and the association of the "light" and "dark" imagery with personality archetypes.

Clearly, Pamela may not have had all these things in mind when she took pencil in hand and wrote her name a new way. But that doesn't matter. What does matter is that you, her teacher, try to develop an eye for these kinds of possibilities and then point them out to her. If

*Pamela Halstead
Wallace Stevens, an insurance executive, can find thirteen ways of looking at a blackbird, certainly you can find one or two interpretations of a poem the kids haven't noticed. (Nobody ever said teaching was easy!)

Here's another:

Tomorrow will be a better world with lots and lots of fun and everybody will be happy. If not then maybe next time.

--Yvette A.

Notice the double meaning in the word "then"? The optimism that poem exudes is equalled by the sense of mystery in this one:

Reaching out in the night over and under things seeking light xylophones playing animals howling no one can hear nothing is clear everything is unknown.

--Roxanne

Here's a variation on a long-stale quatrain, praiseworthy for its refusal to follow the obvious:

The roses are drying the violets are dead My garden is wilting and my flowers are tilting.

(These are tricky—you may be the last one in the class to hear that ditty.)

Kids can be profound, more often than seems possible sometimes:

Rooms of museums I'd like to see other rooms beneath the miracle that might be inside me.

--Robin Y.

A dark night. Gray wolves upon me.

--Lee Ann A.
And look at these, all by a boy named Tony:

All of us remember when the art we took was fun.

Let all that think of you live in vain
even if they are my friends.

Language is an awful thing.
No one likes it.
Go and see under water and go and end your life.

Did you notice that these are vertical name poems, in this case about art, love, and language? If you didn't, maybe you are not reading as carefully as you should.

Not all students write as well as Tony and Pamela. Many don't come close. How do you encourage the struggling masses?

Sometimes a poem will be 90% cliche, gibberish and inside jokes. But it may also have qualities worth discussing. Music, for example. In this case, music may mean two words, lines apart, having similar sounds or repetition of vowels (assonance) or consonants (consonance):

Singing chimes in the wind wandering in the air full of cool, icy dreams.

Sounds of Animals
Horses clop very loud
Cows' moos make a nice tune
Snakes slide slow
Seagulls glide over sea
Puppies bounce up and down Kittens pounce around Lions roar very noisy
But I walk nicely.

Admittedly, this second one is not an example of predictable language, especially from a fifth grader. These lines, each a poem in itself, hang together as one poem because of what the author does in the last line, bringing herself (or her "persona") to the edge of this zoo collection of creatures and wild beasts and declaring her humanity in no uncertain terms. "Clop" and "moos" and "slides slide slow" and "glide" following "slide" as "pounce" follows "bounce" with "roar" bringing up the rear—all these words that sound like what they describe (onomatopoeia) bring enormous life to this writing.

Here's one a little less dazzling:

Thunder is as loud as my mother's voice yelling at me.

--Michelle P.

This one-dimensional image (or is it?) is the product of a literal approach to the challenge of writing similes, or comparisons. Once praised, what to say? What about the musical quality that begins at "thunder" and is picked up again by the word "mother's" in line three? Say them to yourself. Thunder. Mother. Thundermother. Both words come from the same resonance in the throat (and heart?) and give this poem its essential bit of musical unity.

Try another:

The crackle of a fire—like a cat playing ball with foil.

--Michelle P.

Can you hear the connection among the "f" sounds? "of" "fire" "foil"? And among "ball" and "foil" and "crackle"?

Even an honest error can give rise to a lesson in possibilities:

The radio has been here for years
I like to listen to it with my ears.

The second line is forced and fails, not only because it makes the poem a singsong but because of the redundancy of what is being said. How else to listen but with one's ears? (This is not to say that the line could not succeed, as is, in another context). But the first line is a gem due to the (inadvertent?) misspelling of the word "here." That writer might be interested that some poets do that on purpose—misspelling key words to force multiple interpretations on their work. That student has opened an entire area of inquiry. And if he/she swears on a stack of trading cards that it was done intentionally, so much the better. Half the art of writing is believing you can, anyhow.

The beginning of this essay hinted that I'd tell you how to translate your judgments into easily understood language. I lied. I don't have the formula for that, for it is a chemical function of the rapport between teacher and student. What I will suggest, however, is that you continue to do one thing you probably do already or you would not have read this far: be honest in all conversations with your students about poetry. If you don't know, say so. Poems are mysterious amalgams of music and meaning that often go beyond literal interpretation. Don't fight it. Your students will respect you for your candor and for allowing them to be awed, excited, perplexed and ecstatic, often all at the same time. And they may learn to trust those feelings and rely on them for future poems, knowing they need not be locked within, but evaluated honestly, with your sympathy, attention, encouragement and blessing.
"Every time I dream, I go through a doorway," the first line of a poem by a sixth grade student, expresses better than I can the atmosphere and feeling I hoped the three classes I visited at Wahiawa Elementary School would sense each time they sat down to write. On each visit I had a general idea for a writing exercise in mind, then according to the current I felt in the individual classes and individual students, I improvised on the poetry idea that had been brought in for the day. It was a way of leaving the door open to the possibility of things happening in the classroom as the moment dictated. The result was a spontaneous, and even combustible, time for myself as well as the students.

My own feelings about the idea of "teaching" poetry writing have been evolving since I first started in the Poets-in-the-Schools Program four years ago. At the workshop held with the teachers at Wahiawa, I said I hoped it wouldn't sound too gratuitious for me to say that I didn't think anyone could be taught to write poetry, that poetry is a far too delicate, subtle, elusive and powerful art. I was more comfortable calling what I did with the students exercises in Imaginative writing, if one had to call it anything at all. The point was to make things less self-conscious, and less structured. What I aimed for lay in the opposite direction from the kind of workbook assignments the students continually engaged in. As a consequence, any attempts at introducing the students to some of the formal elements of poetry were done with as little fanfare as possible. I relied, in great part, on their tuning into the energy from which poems (here a prejudice in that I'm talking about the poems I pay attention to) arise and which they generate.

Equally important with what I do say in class, is what I don't say. Children have fantastic radar, and know instinctively where the real energy lies once assured that they're free to dip into it and are encouraged to do so. With that basic trust, one doesn't have to belabor issues, just get on with the task at hand, urging the kids to write what they feel, what they imagine. What comes is recognizably genuine:

I had a dream that someone was talking to me. But I didn't know who; that person touched me, which gave me a chill. People were knocking on my door so loud, that I couldn't stand it; I opened the door and no-one was there. I heard my mother calling me, but I couldn't get up to answer.

--Margaret

With a poem like the one above, I find that I don't have to do much talking about how one can write about a personal experience that every child and adult who remembers being a child, reading the poem, can feel touched by and share in; that the strength of poems lies, in part, in the particular experience, or the particulars of experience. The following example is more fantastical, but has the same authority of experience:

I dreamed a pumpkin headed person was chasing me, so I ran in my neighbor's yard, somehow I jumped in the car with them, and the car wouldn't stop. We rode for blocks and blocks, finally the sun broke through the dreary clouds, then it seemed as tho a lion headed person had stopped the car.

--Dina

As one might expect, particularly in the elementary grades, there are some students who have a bare grasp of writing skills. I received a poem from one fourth grade student written in a kind of shorthand. If it were merely ungrammatical it wouldn't be interesting, but the piece is infused with real energy and power:

I was dreaming that I was playing with my friend in the straw and stabbed I pull it out and the blood came down my friend to help but it was too late I died.

--David
I expanded one exercise by suggesting that students could write about the opposite of the dictated assignments, which had to do with memory. If they had trouble remembering anything that they felt like writing about, I said that they could write about all the things they had forgotten. We began the class by reading two poems by Jean Follain. Rather than attempt to explain the feeling of time and memory in Follain's work, I used the poems to create an atmosphere, asking the students to pay attention to the sound of the words and to try to picture what Follain was writing about. One student explored almost every combination of what amounts to two words, "remember" and "forgot," with astonishing sophistication. The rhythm that builds and carries the poem is something I could never have told that student how to achieve. He picked it up himself.

I Remembered

I remembered that I remembered something, but I forgot what I remembered, now I remember what I remembered. What I remembered is that I forgot I remembered and I said I remembered what I forgot. Then I remembered what I forgot it was, I forgot what I remembered. Because I remembered something else. The thing I remembered was I forgot I remembered. What did I forget? I forgot that I remembered something I forgot. I forgot that because I have too much to remember. One of those things is that I remembered that I forgot what I remembered. Now I remembered what I forgot what I remembered. So, I remembered what I forgot. But I forgot that I remembered that I was supposed to remember what I forgot, so I forgot it. Another of those things I remembered is that I forgot what I remembered. Today I remember what I forgot I remembered. What I forgot is that I have to write about what I remembered.

--Thomas

I further suggested that remembering could also take the form of the memory of having been something else before being born in this life:
As I opened my eyes the clearness of life opened its door.
The greeness of plant-life scattered about me; the scent of flowers filled the air. As a flying object neared me it spoke as if it was talking to me. I had soon found out that it was a blue jay.

--Janet

Or the memory of something that one imagines having happened:

I remember I cut the grass but when I looked behind I saw the grass was taller than it was before. I went back and cut it again, but it was even taller.
So I got some gasoline and poured it all over the grass and threw a match on it.
When the fire was over I saw that my house was burned down, but the grass was taller.

--Marvin

That same day I asked some of the students who had finished earlier than others to make up a definition for their names. One girl wrote about her name, Shelley: "I would like my name to mean rain drops falling very heavy by the sidewalk."

Another day, I brought in mimeographed copies of Frederico Garcia Lorca's "Guitar" and "Dawn" to introduce the idea of images, which I called "a new way of seeing." The students were free to imagine that they possessed any kind of extraordinary powers of vision to help them see their world, or the next world, in a new way. My only request was that they describe what they saw:

I saw a tree dancing with the wind,
it was also singing. When the leaves fell they were dancing also.

I saw a school of fish go walking by.
The fish wore diamond necklaces and crowns.

I saw angels in heaven eating steak.
God was making another body.
The angels wore furs. So beautiful!

--Naomi
I watched my mother in her pink bikini bathing in the sun, soon it started raining and I saw her no longer.

When the sun came up later my mother appeared again, she was more beautiful than she ever was.

She had roses and tulips in her hair and a fancy hair do, it soon began to rain and all of a sudden flowers of every kind bloomed all over the world.

--Merry

I saw the sun rise at dawn. Its rays made of burning light. The fire which roared within the sun heated the cold morning. My third eye then saw rain coming from the sun's eyes, But as the drops fell it turned to ice. As I touched the burning ice... my sky-blue bands turned to rings of fire.

--Janet

I had a ball Not the one that you throw. A rainbow is coming out of it. It is on a cloudy day The trees began swaying The wind blew my ball away Far up into a cloud And it bursted

I could see nothing but black Until ribbons, balloons, bubbles and strings Came down from the cloud. Stars came down upon me Then glittering people began surrounding me. It was only for a minute And they soon disappeared.

--Joyce
I saw a 100 foot flower.
With green fingers grabbing purple apples. On a 1 inch tree with pink leaves falling on the blue grass.
With silver brains in their orange heads. Next to the round blocks with transparent legs.

--Thomas

During my last visit I asked the students to write about themselves saying both real and fanciful things about who they thought and felt they were, or turning that around and writing about who they were not. On an impulse, I also suggested that they include a country or place name in what they wrote, if possible. We made a random list on the board, and then the kids turned loose:

I am not,
California where it snows everyday, I am not Texas where Mexicans pray, I am not Vietnam where poor people stay,
I am not me, I am you.

--no name

I am not a flower which sits there with morning dew like a million little jewels falling off each time a wind comes in the dense woods of Canada.

--Fern

I am an orange
I am grown in California at first I was a seed
Then a fruit, now I ripe but nobody likes sour oranges
I am sour
I am not a vegetable
I am a fruit
Then suddenly Drop!
I fall, and then start to rot on North American ground.

--Wendy
One student wrote a poem that is so remarkably Buddhist in feeling and insight that it makes me think the gate has been left open somewhere:

I never was I

and I always was I. Since I was born I was I. After I was born I never came I. I was I when I never was I. I have I and I don't have I. I am just
I. When I am not I, I am I. Forever
I will be I but not I. I will continue to be I until I am not I. I am not I now. I am also I now.

What characterized the work of these children is boundless energy, life and vitality. As one student put it, "I am just me/alive and free."

Or the wonderful upsurge at the end of the poem written by a fourth grader:

I am not the mosquito on his arm.
I am not the lion
in the zoo.
I am not the fish
in the water.
I am the human in the boat.

--Mark
"A man's character is revealed in every brush-stroke."

-- Confucius

English is a language of words, Chinese a language of pictures. English strings letters arbitrarily together to produce "words," that through learning, we associate mentally with the proper meaning or image. The Chinese simply draw the pictures. In Chinese all characters are images. In English, the words themselves are never images. The Chinese have a saying: "One picture is worth 10,000 words."

I begin by asking the children if rain looks like RAIN or like ; if the moon looks like MOON or like ; if the sun looks like SUN or like ; if mountains look like MOUNTAINS or like ; etc. It's simple enough and obvious to everyone. The kids catch on fast and start shouting out "NO!" before I even begin to write the word. I tell them that not all languages use words—some, particularly Chinese, use pictures.

Priming the children to think in pictures rather than words, I draw a number of primitive Chinese pictographs on the board. I ask them to draw the pictures and make up a meaning for each one. I sometimes call these pictographs "cave drawings" or hieroglyphics, but actually they are inscriptions found on ancient fortune-telling turtle bones—the earliest known use of Chinese written language.
The images look simple but you'd be surprised at what the children come up with. Ancient Chinese writing is incredibly simple and childlike, making it ideally suited for sparking a child's simple imagination.

I don't tell the children the real meaning of course, only give them the ancient pictograph. By making up their own meanings the children essentially create their own language. And now to use it. I ask the children to write "picture poems" using no words, only the pictures I've given them. After drawing the picture poems I ask them to translate it into English, so that I might be able to understand their scribbled drawings.
Some fascinating results:

The river sparkled by the light of the full moon.
The fish in the river had cold eyes.
Rain fell on my nose.
The snake was in the grass.
The dogs paw got wet in the river.

--Sharlene Lum, gr. 5
Kaala

The birds flew over the mountains, into the white clouds
like a fish swimming in a river, in the bright sun past the moon.

--Marie Baligad, gr. 6
Kaala

The lizard on the branch was trying to peel a banana with his paw.

--Kenny Kawamoto, gr. 6
Kaala
One fish was captured in a boat, his eyes were furious and he said, "I'm the King of fish, they should know that, can't they see my crown?"

-- Cathy Capellman, gr. 6

The stick man had no face

-- Dawn Jaeger, gr. 5

The waterfall is mighty, powerful, as it rushes and gushes into the lake.

-- Laurie Smith, gr. 6

Doesn't the moon look like a man?

-- Kelly Kihon, gr. 5

The nose was near the eyes as the eyes looked up at the moon.

-- Jacques, gr. 5

The water was near the lake.
Crashing through the forest
Crawling down the mountains Shining for the sun Glowing for the moon
My heart beats rapidly for
The running water
As evil eyes watch me, run!

—Lani Mayfield, gr. 6
Hickam

Poem

The moon gave way to the shining sun
as I followed the tracks a feather in my head and a hammer in my sack
I fell asleep
but when I opened my eyes
I could see nothing but clouds in the sky.

—Tuan Vu (Vietnamese refugee), gr. 6
Altamuru
Next I offer to show the children some "Chinese tricks." Using more modern stylized Chinese characters I show them how the Chinese magically create whole new images simply by adding other images together. Chinese characters are either single, simple images or more complex images built up by intriguing combinations. This combining of images to create other different images is one of the most fascinating aspects of the Chinese written language.

日 = Sun 月 = Moon 明 = Sun and Moon together = Brightness

I ask the class what Sun and Moon both are. The children grow lively, finally hitting on the fact that both are very bright.

日 = Sun 木 = Tree 東 = Sun through Tree = East

"Where does the Sun rise?" I ask. "East!" the children shout back.

女 = Woman 专 = Roof 安 = Woman under Roof = Peace and Contentment

"How does a woman feel inside a house?" The ladies in the class all agree that a woman in her house feels peaceful and content.

女 = Woman 子 = Child 女子 = Woman and Child = Goodness

"A woman with her child is a picture of what?" "Goodness!"

女 = Two women together = Arguments

女 = Three women together = Adultery and Wickedness

"A man has three women—what kind of man is that?" I ask. "Bad!"

"Rich!" "Tired!" the children shout, finally coming around to wickedness and adultery.

人 = Man 山 = Mountain 仙 = Man Mountain = Immortal

"How long does a mountain live?" "For ever!" the children scream! Very good! By now they are filled with images and fired-up enough to begin writing poems.

Other images:

月 = Moon 朋 = Two moons = "buddies" = friends
日 = Sun 木 = Tree 春 = Sun under Tree = Darkness, Mystery
果 = Sun over Tree = Bright sunlight, daytime
日 = Sun 一 = Horizon 旦 = Sun on Horizon = Sunrise Peaceful Woman quarreled with Wicked Man. Wicked Man took a grove. The grove was Peaceful Woman's. Wicked Man was from East, did not know how to work a grove.

Man and Woman following Peace into the forest to the East. Sun was rising, eye was seeing, as Man and Woman followed Peace.

--Kathleen Moorehead, gr. 5 Hickam

In the village two women were in a fight, The strong men were following each other.

--Steve Kehoe, gr. 5 Hickam

A lady two ladies three ladies sun going up and down sun above a tree sun below a tree sun between tree man on a mountain two moons.

--Jerry Chang, gr. 4 Altamana

The sun shines brightly. The stream is peaceful. The moon rolls in with wickedness in his heart. The immortal giant argues within his thoughts.

--Diana Reyes, gr. 6 Hickam
Very often children choose to write short, simple poems based on a single Chinese image. The kids seem fond of the image of Sun and Moon together:

\[ \text{od} = \text{明} \]

= Ming = Brightness. I've come to call these the 'Ming Poems.' Several are exceptional—a couple in particular are near masterpieces in simplicity.

People in love like the sun and moon coming together over the hills.

---Cheryl McDougall, gr. 5
Hickam

Who Am I

Who am I?
Am I a moon and sun,
or an earth and moon, or am I an apple and banana. Who do you think I am???

---Donna Rice, gr. 5
Aliamanu

When you look at the moon, it looks like an orange.
After awhile it looks like a banana.

---Christine Benites, gr. 5
Aliamanu

There was a Moon who had a Sun.

---David Cannon, gr. 6
Hickam
By far the most difficult exercise I attempt in teaching Chinese imagery is one of translation. I use short Chinese poems by Li Po (699-762), China's greatest poet. Among other things he is famous for his expert use of Nature imagery and for his simplicity — simplicity being something strived for in Chinese poetry (quite unlike English poetry today!). The poems I use, "In the Mountains—You Ask, I Answer" and "Summer Day in the Mountains," are simple four-line (chüeh-chü) "short poems"—one with seven characters per line the other with five characters, both with four character titles. So the children are given between 24 and 32 Chinese images to work with.

I give the children the poem in Chinese, the sounds of the characters, and a varied assortment of possible literal meanings for each individual character. I read the poem in the best Mandarin I can muster and urge the kids to begin piecing, puzzle, puzzling together some sort of meaning for each line, aiming ultimately at coming up with a poem (a translation?).

I encourage them to feel absolutely free to do anything they please with the images they have before them. My favorite quote on translation: "In the end you put down anything you like." I also try to convince them that it is not necessary to use the exact words that I've supplied, but to try to find other, more poetic words to express their thoughts. This is exactly what the poet must do once he or she has worked up a literal translation. As expected, most children choose to write literally, yet enough are free and literary.

Literal:
slowly shake white feathered fan.
unshaded body color of nature forest within.
ake off cap, think of stone wall.
are head shiver fir tree wind.

--Billy Mason, gr. 6
Hickam Literary:

Summer days within the mountain nights.
Slowly the wave cleared the flight of wind.
A black forest within a solid strip.
Think of stonewalls capping emptiness.

--Diana Reyes, gr. 6
Hickam

Within the green forests, solid handsome bodies take off their clothes.
Uncover pine trees so that wind can breathe insane dew.
Think of a stonewall as a hat.
Sluggish waves clear their white feathers slowly with a fan.

--Rebecca Carskadden, gr. 5
Hickam

Summer Day

the body is solid as a mountain you need a fan a cap of hat and you sit on a rock
the mornings soft as dew.

--Dean Wilson, gr. 6
Hickam

Because I encourage the kids to do anything they like with their translations, they often use more than one meaning for each character. This image expansion sometimes causes the youngsters' minds to overflow with thoughts. I find there is enough imagery suggested in a single line of Chinese for the children to write four or five lines in English. More than once kids have had so much bouncing around in their brains to write a whole poem based on the four character title!
To take advantage of this creative overflow I recommend three or four line stanzas in English for each line of Chinese. It is hard for the children to sustain poetic intensity throughout their entire poem, but occasionally individual stanzas stand out spectacularly.

The following poems derived from one line or less of Chinese:

I investigated
An island of jade And stayed Wondering why.

--Julie Hadley, gr. 5
Aliamanu

I will have a long life near the river with mysterious blooming plants flowing a large circle around me.

--Angelina Cris, gr. 5
Aliamanu

People ask questions.
I reply nothing.
Ask me how all I'll say is I wish I lived
In the green hill.

--Ellen, gr. 5
Aliamanu

Lazy bird shake your white feathers
Lift your naked body out of your nest Become the color of Nature, fly!

--Russ, gr. 5
Nickam
I sometimes ask myself when will my wish come true for I want to stay in that green and blue Island that keeps interrupting my dreams.

--Vicki Vetter, gr. 5
Aliamanu

I laugh and laugh.
I don't mind having whiskers.
Echos still answer me!

--Kathleen Regan, gr. 4
Aliamanu

Don't cry Laugh and smile
Make fun of life.
Beautiful flowers decorate dark days.

--Kelli Moros, gr. 6
Aliamanu

(Following are several interesting successes at sustaining intensity throughout a longer poem).

Look into the Grave and Fall into the Echo

Ask me why I wish to stay on a green island.
Make fun of my whiskers and you won't return to Nature's mind itself.
Beautiful peach flowers spreading through the dark night corners wash away
Is there another Nature-ground without people inside?

--John P., gr. 4
Aliamanu

(A remarkable piece of translation, staying very close to the original).
In the mountain
The center has strange Questions.
People investigate
And return without the answer.
Long life flowers keep Flowing like water.
There's a secret But know one knows it.
Always leave water.

--Jerry Chang, gr. 4
Aliamanu

And all of sudden flowers started to bloom while my heart started to relive
And every night the secret why by the hill I should go away.
I pray! Thy God don't separate Heaven from me
Amen.

--Ramona Villa, gr. 5
Aliamanu

I return to my father's grave
On a hill red green and blue stands
His only wish I never knew it
There were no smiles on our whiskers
Over the river over the dim blurry mountain Stands our home
My father is in Heaven He is in the sky
That's the way nature and god planned it Without people knowing.

--David Bruce, gr. 6
Aliamanu
I stand near the center of the mountain and ask it a question. My answer comes back in an echo.

I love to sit and rest as I gaze at the blue sky on the hill near the mountain.

I smile and yet don't really understand this imaginary person that I have locked in my mind to think and dream about.

Long life can be beautiful flowing like a stream but it can be mysterious and dark like a hidden secret in the distance.

Nature rests here on earth and yet its beauty stretches across the universe.

--Laurie Smith, gr. 6
Aliamanu

The mountains center questioned when the echo returned.
I questioned myself when the idea rested in my mind.
I smiled but yet I don't know nature naturally.

Peaches flowers moving spreading mysteriously.
Separate the skies of heaven drifting without the wind.

--Wayne Leigh, gr. 6
Aliamanu
One of the more unusual and original poems to come out of this translation exercise is one using Chinese sounds. Chinese poetry is extremely musical and one boy decided to include Chinese sounds in his poem. Due to misspellings and writing errors the original version is virtually incomprehensible. I've corrected it here because I love it so much. By its marvelous use of sound it hits straight to the heart of poetry. It rings like Chinese music in my ears!

The Heia Jih in the Shan Grove

Chung the two towns
The Lan Yao with the Po Yu gave a Shan to the Lo Ti in the Ching Lin that Chung and Tuo your Chin and Qua it on the Shih Pi and Lu from Ting to toe and Shai with the Sung in the Feng!

---Jim, gr. 5

Hickam
At first I thought the translation exercise might be a bit too complicated for the children, but once they understand exactly what to do, once they get the hang of it, they immerse themselves in it and enjoy. Judging from the results, and the number of leis I get, I find that translation exercises can be a very useful technique for getting kids to write. Giving them the "bones" of a poem and letting them "flesh" it out, provides a special stimulus for the creation of poetry. It gives them interesting ideas to play with, to juggle around in their minds. Moreover, it exposes them to something poetic that is so foreign, so new, mysterious and even bizarre, that they plunge right in with characteristic childhood curiosity. The role of the teacher is not so much to teach any particular subject, but to teach learning itself. By exciting the children's natural curiosity they will learn just about anything by themselves. It is only natural. Chinese poetry has lots to offer everyone, especially children.
SECTION II

STUDENT POEMS Harvest the kite by glass. Unorganized but still seen through side interior with wood on my side called a pane. Who am I? from the air?

--Lawrence Pascua, gr. 6
Webling

Even when I come home
Voices come in my body
And nobody knows if I am home

--Evalyn Ventura, gr. 4
Waialua

Heart mountain. Fish in the running water.
Two friends fish in the forest.

--Evalyn Ventura, gr. 4
Waialua
Mystery to China?

The closer you look, underground moon beams all ways help Black Sand Beach and white tip rocks.

--Scott Antonio, gr. 4
Kaala

In the fall rain, haze, air Slide over the fur road.

--Cimone, gr. 6
Aiea

A Shark

Sharptooth whiteteeth Danger in water Bite not a pain killer

--Jonathan Burge
Webling
Harvest the teeth
As sharp as a thorn
As gray as clay mud
Connected to jaws with teeth Teeth grew as wild, as wild grass.

--Lance Matsuoka, gr. 6
Webling

Phantom Dream

One night on the Island of Guam,
I had a dream of the strangest little old thing.
I felt like a phantom was watching me with a camera
inside my dream.
Meanwhile, in my dream I dreamed I was climbing a cliff and all of a sudden I lost my footing and fell two miles down, down, down, then a cloud had gotten in view of the phantom's camera and me out of view.
And, suddenly I heard a THUMP and got a great big bump but when I woke up I realized that I had fallen out of bed.

--Steve M., gr. 6
Wheeler
I sat by the river
Under a willow Nobodys there Quiet as can be
The clouds moving in the sky.

--Tammy, gr. 6
Haleiwa

I stuck my sticky tongue in the blue milk and then my face turned blue and my hair got noodely and my ears got hairy.
But I did not panic because everything turned normal. But I had spilled some of the blue milk on the sink. I went to see if anything happened, and something bad happened the pipes had hair coming out. I did not panic I brought the barber over to trim the pipes.

--Sandra
Pearl Harbor

I expected my mind to be silver and clean but it wasn't. It was dark and dusty and it looked dark like a cave. My mind hurt while I was looking for moonlight to get out. I was singing to my self while it was raining and finally I got out.

--Glenn O.
Mililani - waena Center circle is always Easy to Color Ever green

--Cece Dev, gr. 6
Pearl Harbor Kai

I carried my silver present
Down the soft road
In the beautiful ice wind...

--Lawrence, gr. 4
Salt Lake

I disappeared into a dark cave.
I cried for my mother.
An eel held a grey spear.
I crawled to my mother.
The eel pointed his hand at me.
I stepped in some mud.
The hand grabbed my hibiscus.
I grinned. I crawled to the eel.
HE hit me with a canoe.

--Tom C.
Mililani - waena
Moonlight disappears over rocky fire.

Father attacked a soft hollow body.

---Andy Andrews
Nimitz

Yarborough is a sly one yes
A sly one when she goes babysitting she charges 75 cents yes 75 cents she is a Barbarian yes she is she should go to the funny farm yes indeed she should why I bet she pulls peoples hair she's Ugly too she looks like a Gorilla yes she does yarborough is a sly one yes she is

---Cathy Mililani - uka

Young Octopuses linger
And Meditate In the Nile river

---Dean, gr. 5
Salt Lake
Glue melts when the ocean turns into a or

A person smells a little bit of the metal that grows an inch every year.

--Anonymous
Scott

A tree in front of the mountain.
A volcano erupting?
Let me fell the cross
Let me have the hook.
Is it a side V?
It's an end of a house.
I see a music symbol.
A lantern that I have.
Let's go to the mountains.
I see a rock by grass.
I see a music symbol.
A house?
A mountain?

--Nathan Pearl Ridge
In the purple sunset
there's an old ghost town.
An old yellowing picture has evil black-eyes that move the misty-hammer.

--Kelly A., gr. 6
Hale Kula

One day a mynah bird was over a silver sunset. And the wind blew hard and the kukui nut tree danced and the branches made music.
And the fire pointed at the branches and the mynah bird cried father!
and the problem was solved.

--Wendy
Mililani - waena

I am a fiery ball overlooking the streets of violence that swiftly turned to the city but has yet to find a place where no one has gone before. The ghost that haunts my house is a mere old man rattling chains and every night he goes to lie in a raggedy old lamp shade which is a dull thing
I am yet to find my destiny as the future glows before me but yet if I were to live I would be in endless space reaching toward an unknown planet yet to be reached by an unordinary person but a space creature as though he was at the end.

--Greg Stone, gr. 5
Pearl Harbor Kai
We PUNISH the BALD LITTLE BUSHES that are CLIMBING the great FOUNTAINS of INDIAN TIME. TODAY, CARDINALS eat ABOUT two ELEPHANT VALLEYS in two DAYS. In five days, PIRATES eat FAMOUS DESERT CEMENT. I have a WITNESS that said he saw TICKS flying to JUPITER.

--Anonymous
Wheeler

I dreamed me and family and some of my relatives went in the coffin until two dead men came because they had to go in the coffin. After that we went some place. Then we came back and two lady have to wear something on their head then they have to go in the coffin then close the light and a ghost going to make sound and the ghost can see true the coffin.

--Caroline, gr. 4
Kunia

PEOPLE IMAGINE GREY POISON CRYING AND THEY PICK PAINTED EGGS DEEP IN THE WINDY FIELDS.
THEY PICK THE ROOT BY THE SKIN.
ONE TIME, THEY BOUGHT A RADIO AND LISTENED TO THE SILENT CEREMONY WORLD WHILE THEY WERE AT HOME WITH A LACED BALL WRITING A MYTH.

--Anonymous
Mililani - uka
The doll who is walking.
Skin.
   Lion is crying.
Who is a song?
Who is playing piano?
Who is crashing?
Girl screaming in the window.
Who is playing trumpet?
Who is playing harmonica?
Gorilla is crying and walking.
   Man and woman are singing.

--Sun Min, gr. 4
Pearl Ridge

The moon and the sun play in the running water
The heart joins the moon and the sun.
The moon says good by. and goes away. and now the sun and the heart meet a man talking to the moon.

--Lorrie Antonelli, gr. 4
Waialua

As I was chopping the wood under the park tree I saw the twilight shine over the waterfall.

--Karen, gr. 6
Kipapa
THE BUS CARRIED FAT TOURISTS THAT HAD PROBLEMS FALLING ASLEEP IN THE VALLEY WORLD.

---Tricia
Mililani - uka

Sun setting lamp goes on cloud spreading mountains hard to see.

---Tracy, gr. 6 Kipapa

thread a needle pick a vine and watch the rain fall on the edge of the valley the surface of the water is asleep now but tomorrow we will pick a vine and smoke behind the wall our toe is slick because we wash it and next time ride a root in the evening

---Joey, gr. 6
Salt Lake

The face of the moon!
It has come to take one of us away.
Everyone run into their house.

---Kristy Y., gr. 6
Mokulele
In the city garden a man said I will plant a seed and make a gate.

A boy came and said can I help you? And then I'll make a key to the city gate. You have to wear boots. O.K. Now go home and sleep and cover yourself good because it will be cold.
Wake up 7:00 ............. The sun was high. It was windy...

... my head was a vine
I holded my heart
I felt the island swallowed by a vanilla crab Venus Earth was everywhere. !!!

--Jan, gr. 4
Aiea

The shining pond shines so bright-- that the stars are ashamed.

--Stephen C., gr. 6
Hale Kula

All about chalkboards

Chalkboards in the trash.
I sit on a stool.
and then outside my window I hear crash boom pow zap ah.
and out came a man and he was embarrassed
he was embarrassed because his invention didn't work.

--Aaron, gr. 4
Pearl Harbor Kai
This LEMON is as DRY as STONE POPCORN.
Watch out, that OCTOPUS and OTTER are CREEPING up like a BULLDOZER.
PEOPLE sure can be crafty when there's a LOT of FREE coke's.
HELLO, do you like the WORLDWIDE EMERALD TRUCK service? WHY do you ask?
I just saw a SILKY POLAR BEAR and an APPLE-looking BELL and OLD-looking TEACHERS in their under SHORTS.

--Richard Cragg
Wheeler

Blue hydrants by celophane flowers at the yacht in the harbor with a dog biting a man by a bike with a 8 trac Rightover the hill is the door of fantasy with newspaper taxis and shark teeth of silver
On the other side lies a diamond hotel with crystal like fish

a runner from nowhere comes with a gun that can't shoot, but has a bullet of satin

--Derrick Kida, gr. 6
Moanalua

If you take your eyeball and look through someones brown teeth you will see a rock inside a shoe and on the rock will be an ice cream castle with a yellow hippo guarding it and a river around the castle.
In the river would be a sailboat.
Under the sailboat will be a hairy fish with a black nectarine in his mouth.

--Blair
Makalapa
YOU'D PINCH DRACULA if you want A NIGHTMARE but I wouldn't even dare. The TEN MYSTERY WAVES I went to look at the SEA looking for an IDEA for me When I went to look to see I saw ten waves looking at me I looked back only to see the ten waves were running away from me.

---Anonymous
Helemano

Crazy Wishes

I wish I were a refrigerator but I'm only a piggy bank filled with shells and fish I'm so lonely it's like being in a bottomless pit with a waterfall. I'm so sad I feel like being kidnapped then somebody would pay attention to me. I cried myself to sleep that night and had a bad dream. I dreamed that I was being mugged by Godzilla after that I woke up.

---Karen Shafer

Wind the point - then lean on the problem.

---Michael (a girl)
Makalapa

A boy grown to work hard for gold in the war when the devil dies and trouble comes—we won with bloody arrows down some lie and some were loony and jump and shout. Wee, then, we visit the ghost and celebrate.

---Anonymous
Iliahi
I am unspoken of

I am unspoken of
I can walk through my house but no one can see me nobody speaks of me for I am unspoken of----

I can walk through a meadow but no one will know for I am unspoken of

A horse can run wild and I will be upon him but he will not know for I am unspoken of----

---I can walk up a flight of stairs and my mother will look out but she will not see for I am unspoken of.

--DeAnna Gaines
Solomon

a crying dog a dead cat a broken blue glass

--Sally G.
Nimitz
Diamonds

Asparagus grows beside the lane and every morning after rain
The leaves hold drops of water high
The rising sun with generous light will make each drop a diamond bright
To shine against the velvet sky.

--Anonymous
Wheeler

We go hunting when it is red.
We don't have meat because we scared them.
When flowers appear people goes away.
I hate beautiful human beings.
When I see a shark I cry.
I bite my self when I am in the graveyard.
Beware of ants.
Porcupine is my favorite food.

--Cesar Pudiquet, gr. 6 Watalua

words never enter the air they only float until they reach someone's ear

--Patrick, gr. 6
Mokulele
The magic rock is oval and sharp and it glows in the moonlight. It barks when the wind blows

---Tina Coffelt
Hickam

The birds feet are on fire next to a flower with a nice stem and he is in the middle surrounded by fire.

---Cecilia, gr. 5
Kipapa

As I was walking down this old street I saw this old house
I went inside and I saw this map
I took it and looked at it as I looked at it, it lead me to this hot and sunny Island.
When I reach there I saw my family
looking for water.
They didn't want me to help them So I turned back and went home.
As I reach home
I saw them laying on their beds!

---Sonia, gr. 5
Kunia
I harvest Lines and I turn blue to my heart and pencils kiss pens erasers turn to stone and my pants are of paper
my shirt turns to paint

--Patti Day, gr. 5
Webling

the electric piano plays long songs that sound like quiet valleys with broad trees with leaves falling into the ashes and threads flying around

--Jinny, gr. 6
Salt Lake

The rose patch was harvest in the Spring when the color was green
The roses were rolled in a roll of carpet
The window was open so that rain could fall on the carpet
The new record played a song so the roses could grow
The snake slid into the window to eat the picture of the donut
The donut sang a song of a rose
The color of the donut changed from rose pink to brown

--Carrie V., gr. 4
Webling

I got some money from my house.
I found a crab in the river.
I found a pretty stone.
I got a doll from the planet.
I will buy some food.
I will take my friend with me.
I found some dirt in the hole.
I will show my mother my things.

--Kerry Shafter
The sun has risen beyond the hills, and spreads its gleaming rays upon all window sills. But far off in another place it is still night; for when we are night they are light.

"So we will never hear the Wind's Song together"

Unless of a miracle (the sun stays in one place) we will wait (not very long) for the others from the other place: "To hear the Wind's Song!"

--Tracy Loeffelholz, gr. 6

Kaala

Last night I dreamed that I went for a walk under a rainbow, I followed the rainbow until I came to the end. At the end there was a prism. The prism was in charge of all the rainbows. I asked him how to wake up from this dream. He said to pinch myself. So I did and I woke up.

--Alan A., gr. 6

Haletwa

Ele-ake is the kind that would eat the world. He has his father's swamp and his mother's eyes of Mongolian ear. Watch out! If he touches you, ICK!

--Anonymous

Iliahi Mynah, sleep in the rain inherit spoiled illusions

--Byron
Scott

One crazy night the moon shone white my eyes felt like it was to bleed in a sharp twinkle it was gone and I went home crying

--Cindy, gr. 6
Aiea

I was walking in a dark forest and a light kept flashing.
When I was close the light was far but I kept chasing the light.

--Devin, gr. 6
Haleiwa

I Like to Have Fun

I like to run in the grass,
It feels like bugs are crawling under my feet, Sometimes I go with my friends and we roll down the hill where the grass grows tall.

--Daniel Elvenia, gr. 6
Haleiwa
I spend hours in the garden Teaching my flower stems to dance.

--Linda, gr. 5
Salt Lake

HOW can a ROYAL MIND WIN a race with CARS?

--Freda Faletoi
Helemano

Many years
And many days Run In an Alligator's face

--Pamela Rosales
Helemano

Irene has brown eyes.
Eneri sah mworb seye.
Eneri saw a worm sigh!

--Irene, gr. 5
Salt Lake
I see the cat even God sees him
   some poets see him
There on the road, now he's by the young bear.

Your eyes made me laugh
   tonight.
Life makes hearts whiz around.

   --Ruby, gr. 4 Mokulele

weave slender clouds slide white Venus down to to up Earth and jump

   --Tammy Choy, gr. 6
   Kaala

Women down the stream are mean and lazy.
Asleep in chains,
   their minds think of another world
They're like fire Burning off your head. Their skin is like sand.
People try to touch them,
but they throw paint.
   They imagine they're jewels.
Their home is in the mountain.
They're a myth.

   --Keith
   Mililani - uka
A man was looking out the window crying for his star that was lost in a box.

--Lisa, gr. 6 Kipapa

Spirit

The spirit of steel was scraping for the coloring of baked gardenias—Oh, how greatly thin and white it looks soaring through the room of the fat cat that’s waiting for the doctor that touches the winner with the Real Thing. The morning is getting near for the enemy of hundreds of jars. John is pinching the frosting on the chocolately lawless perfume. Enjoy the cheaper price of peaceful snippers with a secret wrap see more games cause the cost is despairing from dollars to change.

--Lani Mayfield
Hickam

Harvest the Green

When you harvest the green
What do you harvest?
Trees are green so are leaves
But did you ever see a greenbean?
seaweed under the water is green weeds are green windows in the jungle are green the bars are covered with green leaves
But which is green the river or the wind?

--Kerry Kurgh, gr. 6
Webling
A firefly humming in the cracking sun near crystal waters of a pond. Snack on green nuts and carrots. It was spying on fishes with big eyeballs and gold teeth in the water where toads and snakes lurks. Some kids slide along the bank of mud in the afternoons. Ducks quack at their children. Trucks pass over on a bridge.

---Clement Chang, gr. 6
Moanalua

NINETY-NINE PERCENT INDEPENDENCE GIRL.
NATURAL SUN ECLIPSE OCYTOPUS in the SAND
Do the twist in WAIKIKI CRUISE around in the beach
Don't get LOST in LOVE.
RATS and BEES with the TRUCK, NATURALLY SPIDER DUSTY.

---Patrick Coon
Wheeler

CENTURY INSURANCE, A SHORT COOL MURDER.
ALMOST SHARP, DRY BUSINESS, SOFT, COOLER, MUCH LIFE.
PEOPLE in PITS of BLACK.
FALCON eats SNAKE and all is GEMINI.

---Tracy Crewe
Wheeler

We harvest hungry.
The strawberry talk is all gone.
Every plate is very hungry.
When you eat you feel like your flying.
Even the fruits shrinks to hearts.
Sometimes you feel like eating candy vegetable.
Also when you sing you have a sour taste like your in heaven.

---Kathleen Repollo, gr. 6
Waialua
STEEL WHEEL PASS OUT PRESS TIRE SUPER HAND KIDNAP TIME REALLY WILD SUSHI PLANT BLUE PRINCE

--Jeff, gr. 5
Pearl Ridge

I am going to harvest a scribble
the paper might even change.
It might even tear
also it could even leave a long strip.
I might even turn it into soap lather and climb up and down it.

--Eric Correa, gr. 6
Webling

grandpa's wife always shines his boots and waits on the earth While grandpa is on his island fishing in a teacup pond.
but he never catches any fish because the spinach in the pond is so slimy so the net always brakes and the bees always nip you...

--Lynn, gr. 5
Salt Lake
I have a big tree
it has soft leaves and long branches too
Most of all I like the trunk
it is big and thick

--Shawn Pearl Harbor

my mother's voice sounds like a child sliding down a window pane and her mother's voice sounds like a bear swallowing a seed.

--Deidra, gr. 5
Aiea

One day I went to the beach.
I saw a jelly fish-- a lonesome fish.
I put him in a samin bowl.
I turned on the radio, and he heard the Hustle and started to rockout.

--Rea
Scott
Once upon a time a fat woman riding a surfboard fell and her head was washed in a deep sand hole, along came a simpleton riding a skateboard came up and fingered her pockets and found a precious jewel And the lady said, "What are you doing?" And the simpleton said, "Taking this jewel for tax." "And for renting my beach." The lady said it was worthless and she started crying. The simpleton said "HA HA!" "YOU CRY BABY, I GOT YOUR JEWEL." Now he screwed it into a tree, and poisoned the sap so it would be safe from the wind.

--Robbie

Mililani - uka

In a river down in the forest play little pebbles underwater.
The river is smooth like glass.
The water is sweet like candy.
The rocks are hot from the sun.
A horse passes by in a confused way.
I know some children will find this river...

--Lenore, gr. 6
Salt Lake

I am the wrath of mankind,
the hunger to kill and cease all life.
I am the gullet, that hangs over the people of this mad world.
The people of the place we call hell.
I am the memorial of the past.
The memorial of what became a slaughter house covered with blood.
I am the salvoes of death.
The salvoes of anger which covered this once peaceful and beautiful place.
I, war, garrotted and impaled by my people which became savages

--Edgar Cheshtre
Solomon
I dreamed

While walking to Japanese School
It rained
I ran
Then I heard loud voices calling my name
I looked, the town was flooded
The school was floating away
I saw my parents crying
I swam to the school Cold & shivering I caught hold of my father's hand
Then I was safe with my parents floating away with the school.

--Lynn, gr. 6
Haletwa

Once upon a time there was a HIPPOPOTAMUS and a BIRD and a GIRAFFE that saw a jewel thief. So they called the DETECTIVE and said,
"Can you keep a SECRET?" "Yes," said the Detective. "Well, there's a CRIMINAL in the jewel store." "A what!!" "A jewel thief." "I better get me some RUM. EVERYONE is in DANER. You're right, so we've got to FIGHT." "You're right." The animals SNATCHING the drink away from him. "We won't let that criminal take ADVANTAGE of us." Mrs. BEE said, "Hurry, for OLD-TIMEsakes. I've got to go before baby BEE gets hungry and starts eating my wife's MINI-skirt and starts drinking GAS! Good-bye." The animals and the detective ran off and caught the criminal. They sat there and POURED some rum.
The chief came in there and said, "That was a BEAUTY." I hope you know what he meant. He said, "Just for that, you can be a pers." Then an EAGLE came in with a WIGGLE. "Can I be one too?"

--Rene M., gr. 5
Wheeler

Purple People

poiple, poiper pot and propula drink poison from the ploinet pink!

--Steve M., gr. 6
Wheeler
I SLEEP IN THE CAT’S TRACK WHICH WAS IN THE SOFT GRASS...

--Kensyn, gr. 4
Salt Lake

Enter the wife with glasses carrying a hog with a bread that looks like soft leaves
She calls over to the egg that's a hatching eye and she faints !!!!

--Della, gr. 6
Aiea

Rainbow egg Yolk is ma sokentop brothen poorpoise--

--Wilfred Yoon, gr. 6
Kaala
eggs are painted like a dolphin it has problems people stretch it like a bus it grows watery wine it smells like odory rice
it went deep in the valley
a long time there was silence.
the land got poisoned by fire
the eggs were in pain now they use it like fertilizer.

--Susette
   Mililani - uka

Hard pillow in a wet oven.
A boy used a rotten toothbrush accidently twisted his tongue

--Reynald
   Pearl Harbor

I touched dust one day by the window and found the secrets of ISIS

--Gail, gr. 4
   Salt Lake
If you yell, silver flowers will arise and the sun will shine brightly and the Birds will start singing and the Trees will start swaying grass will start moving in the wind and you will fall in the silver flowers and dream of what I wrote.

---Richard, gr. 4 Mokulele
NOTES

TIM BURKE is an instructor of English at the University of Hawaii. Before coming to Hawaii he lived in New York where he helped found the magazine Rapport. He has published poems in many magazines, including Choice and Hawaii Review.

JIM KRAUS is a writer and part-time teacher living in Haleiwa. His poems have appeared in Hawaii Review, Bird Effort, Wind, and Another Voice. He edits a newsletter for the Hawaii Literary Arts Council, and has been active in the Poets-in-the-Schools Program for two years.

DANA NAONE was the founding editor of the Hawaii Review and has contributed poems to Hawaii Literary Review, Tantalus, Ironwood, and Kayak. A group of her poems also appeared in Carriers of the Dream Wheel (Harper and Row), an anthology of poetry by native Americans. She has been active in the Poets-in-the-Schools Program for the past four years.

WAYNE WESTLAKE is noted for his translations of Chinese poetry. His work has appeared in Chicago Review and Seaweeds and Constructions. He lives in Honolulu and works at the airport.

Other participants in the program during 1975-76 were Caroline Garrett, Darrell Cabacungan, Martha Garbisch, Eric Chock, Elizabeth Shinoda, Richard Hamasaki, Brad Matsunaga, Mari Nakamura and Steven Goldsberry.

Funds for printing of Haku Mele O Hawaii, Volume II provided by Artists-in-the-Schools and the Secondary Language Arts Program, Department of Education.