This guide to college selection for learning disabled (LD) students was based on questionnaire responses received from 255 colleges, junior colleges, and universities in Connecticut, Delaware, the District of Columbia, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. An initial chapter discusses decision making timelines and offers suggestions to parents and counselors. Chapter 2 describes legal rights of the learning disabled to a higher education. Chapters 3 and 4 discuss beginning steps for students, early application, campus visits, and direct contact with schools. Chapter 5 gives students practical suggestions for adjusting successfully to college demands. The directory itself comprises the bulk of the document. Alphabetized by state, it is divided into two sections: four-year schools with and without limited support programs for LD students, and two-year schools with and without limited support programs. Information provided for each institution includes such items as application deadline, tuition, room and board fees, special application procedures, and available LD services. (JW)

A Guide To Higher Education
For Learning Disabled Students

by John P. Branson
This publication is designed to assist learning disabled adolescents, their parents and counselors in securing a college education adjusted to meet their individual needs.

More and more institutions of higher education are initiating services or implementing formal programs for learning disabled. This new emphasis is due in part to the federal regulations and requirements for colleges and universities who receive federal funds to provide for disabled students. It is also due to the rapidly increasing number of students who are being identified as having a learning disability, many of whom are, or will be seeking a college level education.

Since this guide provides step-by-step assistance in preparing, applying, and gaining acceptance to the appropriate program of choice, it should prove to be a valuable resource text and supplemental reference. In addition, the directory of services and programs from responding colleges also should be helpful, particularly with regard to those listed without formal programs.

Coupled with increased college receptiveness, this publication will hopefully assist more academically capable young adults who are learning disabled to complete a college education each year.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The author would like to express his sincere gratitude to the many college administrators whose information and valuable assistance made this guide and directory possible. A particular note of appreciation is extended to Faith Leonard of American University, who graciously shared her time and insights into the college experience for learning disabled students.

Special thanks to Dr. John K. Baillie, Executive Director; Carl Thornion, Director of Special Education; administrators, colleagues and friends at the Chester County Intermediate Unit for their encouragement and support.

The number of college freshmen claiming a learning disability has increased ten-fold since such statistics were first reported in 1978! Improved identification procedures, more effective educational programming at the elementary and secondary levels, and sympathetic legislation have all contributed to the increased number of LD students on the nation’s campuses. This guide is designed to help the student with a learning disability prepare for and select an appropriate college. It further endeavors to equip the student with strategies to facilitate success in the college environment. A Guide to Higher Education for Learning Disabled Students is intended to supplement, not replace other more traditional guides to college selection available through high school guidance departments, local libraries and bookstores.

Information contained herein was obtained via surveys mailed to 445 colleges, junior colleges and universities through the Middle Atlantic Region. The initial questionnaire was mailed in July of 1986, with a second survey being sent in November to those schools which failed to respond. Schools in Pennsylvania and New Jersey that did not reply within the designated time period were contacted by phone. In all, 255 schools responded.
CHAPTER 1

Preparing for College

Preparation for college should begin prior to the freshman year of high school. Decisions made at this time concerning course selection may well determine the student’s academic direction for the next four years. Unfortunately, many well meaning guidance counselors automatically recommend that students with learning disabilities pursue a nonacademic course of study. The intention, of course, is to protect the student from unnecessary failure. This suggestion is generally met with acceptance by the student and his or her parents, since most LD students have experienced a considerable amount of academic failure in the past.

It must be understood, however, that an LD student who struggled to survive school prior to being identified, is often very successful once the appropriate support services are provided. Despite success, the student frequently continues to lack self-confidence and avoids academic challenges. It is the responsibility of the guidance counselor, resource teacher and parent to encourage the student to develop to his or her full potential by attempting the most challenging coursework of which he or she is capable.

A Word to Parents

Selecting a college is an extremely stressful process for both student and parent, even when a learning disability is not a consideration. For most high school students, it is the most serious decision that they have ever had to make. Added to this is the prospect of leaving the security of family and friends. The pressure of deadlines and other application requirements, coupled with the everyday responsibilities associated with high school, often result in a tremendous increase in anxiety.

For parents, too, the college selection process can be stress inducing. Financial worries, increased demands on an already busy schedule, and concerns regarding the impending separation from their son or daughter can certainly lead to tension and strain.

The normal stress described above may be magnified many times for the learning disabled adolescent and his or her parents. Finding the appropriate college will undoubtedly be more difficult, simply because fewer exist to meet the needs of LD students. For the child, it is a time of self-examination which may reawaken memories of failure and insecurity. For parents, many of whom fought long and hard to obtain adequate educational services for their child, it is like starting over.

It is absolutely essential that both students and parents learn to cope with the stress associated with the college selection process. Proper planning and open communication are two ways to accomplish this. Parents must offer reassurance and support to the child and help him or her to proceed in exploring colleges realistically. They should help with planning a time line and obtaining the necessary documentation for applications. Most importantly, however, parents must listen and assist their child in identifying his or her goals.
While finding a college with adequate support services is very important, parents should exercise caution. In their desire to assure success, parents occasionally direct their child toward specific schools solely on the basis of the amount of assistance offered to LD students. This approach often minimizes the child's personal goals and allows the learning disability to take precedence. This, in turn, may lead to an increase in frustration and insecurity for the child.

Hopefully, the student with a learning disability will receive a great deal of help and guidance from parents and school personnel when exploring colleges. It must not be forgotten, however, that it is the child who will have to live with the final decision. No matter how extensive the LD support program, success is unlikely if the student is not comfortable with the total learning environment. It is the parents' responsibility to help their son or daughter locate a suitable college; it is the prospective student, however, who should be allowed to make the final choice.

Guidance for Guidance Counselors

Counseling the learning disabled high school student with college aspirations requires that the guidance counselor be familiar with the federally legislated rights of these individuals with regard to higher education, their special learning needs, and the types of services currently available to them on the nation's campuses. Much of this information is discussed in later sections of this book, but the counselor is encouraged to seek additional information through direct college contacts and supplemental reading.

It is essential that guidance counselors maintain close contact with the LD specialist on staff to identify those students with college potential. Careful planning and preparation for these students should begin prior to their freshman year in high school whenever possible. The guidance counselor should consult with the LD specialist at this time to determine the student's learning strengths and weaknesses. Courses should then be selected which will afford the student the necessary academic background required for college, while balancing subjects associated with his strengths and deficits. Postponing college preparatory courses until the later grades often leads to overwhelming course loads, heavily weighted in subjects of particular difficulty for the LD student. Such a situation should be avoided.

During the freshman year, the guidance counselor should assist the student in exploring his or her interests and how they might relate to career goals. An overall plan should be developed including a sequence of courses to be taken and a time line for completing intermediary steps in the college selection process. While such planning may seem premature, it must be remembered that the LD student's college search must begin in earnest much earlier than that of his nondisabled peers. If the freshman year is part of a junior high school program, the guidance counselor should meet with the student's high school counselor prior to the student's promotion to the high school to share information and assure that the plan is continued.

The student should be encouraged to prioritize his interests and career goals during his sophomore year. The guidance counselor can help in this through the use of interest inventories, career fantasies, and the use of computerized career exploration packages, if available. While it is unrealistic to expect a fifteen or sixteen year old to know with any certainty what he or she wishes to do in life, it is none-the-less important that the student become goal-oriented and begin to plan for the future. The student should begin exploring colleges at this time and generate a list of schools offering programs of study in which he or she is interested.
At the outset of the junior year, the student and counselor should meet with the LD specialist to review the student's individual learning style and particular needs. These should be added to the criteria already established for college selection and the original list narrowed accordingly. Once a reasonable number of schools with appropriate support services have been identified, the student should begin contacting admissions officers and LD support program directors. The counselor can help the student in developing pertinent questions and a means of recording answers, such as a questionnaire. Further assistance may be given through the role playing of telephone contacts until the student is comfortable with the procedure.

This data gathering process should be completed prior to the end of the junior year so that the information garnered may be reviewed by both student and counselor. The student should then have enough information to narrow his college search to those schools which he or she wishes to visit. Guidelines for the campus visit should be discussed at this time and role playing again employed. Since the LD student should avoid extensive time out of school, it is recommended that college visitations be conducted during the summer, with follow-up visits made during the fall of their senior year, if necessary.

The counselor and student should meet immediately upon returning to school for his or her senior year to discuss the results of the college visitations. The criteria established by the student should again be reviewed and the colleges under consideration evaluated. The student’s academic background and financial resources should also be examined to determine the most appropriate selection. At this point the student should begin the application process. The counselor should assist in obtaining the necessary documents, including psycho-educational evaluations, IEP's, recommendations, etc. He or she should proofread all applications and personal statements, and assure that the college is aware of the student’s learning disability. The student should practice responding to possible interview questions with the counselor. The close contact maintained with the student throughout his or her high school career should enable the guidance counselor to answer any questions that the college might have regarding the student.

Helping the qualified LD student identify and gain acceptance into the college of his or her choice requires a great deal more involvement on the part of the guidance counselor than is normally required. Yet, it is a highly rewarding experience as well. As the process evolves, the counselor gets to know the student intimately, and shares in both success and failure. The counselor watches as the student grows in self-understanding and self-confidence. Finally, the student’s acceptance into college is the counselor’s triumph as well.
Legal Rights of the Learning Disabled to Higher Education

It is extremely important that LD students wishing to attend college, and those assisting their efforts, be aware of their rights as they relate to higher education. Section 504 of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act of 1973 requires that otherwise qualified handicapped individuals, including the learning disabled, be assured access to higher education, stating:

No otherwise qualified handicapped individual in the United States shall solely, by reason of his handicap, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance.

While the law is only one sentence long, its implications for the LD student are far-reaching. Since most colleges and universities accept veterans' benefits and other forms of federal financial aid, few institutions of higher learning are exempt from its mandates. How this legislation affects the LD student seeking a college education is highlighted below.

Admissions
- No quotas may be placed on the number of LD students accepted into a program.
- No test or other measure may be required for admission that highlights the student's disability rather than aptitude. (The SAT's and ACT's may fall under this category.)
- Colleges may not require students to disclose their disability.

Treatment
- LD students may not be excluded from any aspect of the college program (academic or extracurricular) on the basis of their disability.
- LD students may not, on the basis of their disability, be excluded from any program or activity sponsored by the college of attendance, although provided by another institution.
- Programs and activities involving LD students must be provided in the most integrated setting possible.

Academic Adjustments
- Modifications to academic requirements must be made to ensure that they do not discriminate against the LD student. This does not mean that standards fundamental to the program must be altered. Modifications may include extension of time to complete degree, substitution of courses, or adaptation of instructional methods.
- Rules may not be imposed which limit the student's ability to complete a course of study, i.e., banning tape recorders in the classroom.
— Schools must assure that disabled students are not denied the benefits of, excluded from participation in, or otherwise discriminated against with regard to an educational program or activity due to the absence of auxilliary aids. (Taped Texts, Note Takers, etc.)

Financial and Employment Assistance
— Schools offering financial assistance or work study employment must do so in a nondiscriminatory manner.

Nonacademic Services
— Disabled students must have an equal opportunity to participate in all physical education and athletic activities if otherwise qualified.
— Counseling services, both academic and personal, must be provided in a nondiscriminatory manner.
— Counselors may not direct a qualified LD student towards more restrictive career goals than they would a nondisabled individual with similar interests and abilities.

Current Program Models
In an attempt to meet their legal obligation, as noted above, colleges and universities provide support to LD students in a variety of ways which often reflect the philosophy and goals of the particular institution. Prospective students should examine support programs carefully to make certain that they are appropriate for their specific needs. Some of the more common models currently available in colleges and universities throughout the nation are briefly described below to assist the student in determining the program design of their choice.

Tutorial Model
Tutors may range in expertise from college undergraduates (peer tutors) to Ph.D's. Peer tutors can be very effective as long as they are carefully selected, trained and supervised. Since their schedules often reflect that of the LD student they are tutoring, conflicts may arise. Caution should therefore be exercised when selecting a school with a tutorial program staffed solely by peer tutors.

Compensatory Strategies Model
The compensatory model makes use of strategies which allow the student to circumvent his or her disability. The number of possible strategies is limitless, although the most common include books on tape, extended time for tests, reduced course load, taped lectures, etc. The compensatory strategies model necessitates a considerable amount of liaison and advocacy support since it requires accommodation, and perhaps compromise, on the part of administrative and instructional staff who may not truly understand the nature of a learning disability. An LD specialist is best qualified to perform such a service.
Adelphi Model

Named for the school in which it was first developed, the Adelphi model offers a balance of academic and psychosocial support. Each student is assigned to a professional who acts as a liaison, while offering academic assistance. Students are required to attend one hour of personal and one hour of group counseling per week.

Higher Education for LD Students (HEDS) Model

Developed at Central Washington University, the HEDS model was designed to provide a comprehensive array of academic support services and increased awareness among members of the college community as to the nature of learning disabilities. It includes a series of course packages offering curriculum adjustments and alternate teaching methods expected to aid the LD student. A unique feature of the HEDS program is its "Academic Protection" clause, which exempts students from being placed on academic probation or suspension for three semesters. This was instituted to reduce pressure on the LD students while they develop the skills or strategies necessary for success.

Linking or Bridging Model

This model allows LD students to sample courses at a nearby college or university during their junior and/or senior year in high school. The goal of such a program is to promote an appropriate attitude and aptitude for college study, as well as mobility and independence.

Special University Courses

Under this system, courses are designed specifically for LD students. They may range from a few remedial courses offered in addition to the regular course of study, to a complete program such as that offered at Lesley College through its Threshold Program. These courses are often noncredit bearing and, as in the case of the Threshold program, may not lead to a degree.

While the above six models represent the major means by which colleges and universities presently support students with learning disabilities, they are by no means exclusive. Many in the field believe that the LD student's greatest problem is lack of self-confidence, resulting in excessive anxiety. They concentrate their efforts, therefore, on stress reduction through counseling and therapy. Other programs seek to instill within the students a sense of independence by assisting them to become experts on their disability and then encouraging them to devise their own strategies and accommodations.

As the above illustrates, a wide variety of support programs are available for LD college students. Yet locating the one that is right for you requires painstaking research and patience.

Beginning the Search — A Guide for Students

In the previous two sections of this book, suggestions have been offered to counselors and parents as to how they might help you, the student, in your college search. The primary responsibility for locating the college that is right for you, however, is yours. The following guide is offered to assist you in organizing your college exploration. Since the one most important factor in choosing a college is you, it is here that we will begin.

Know Yourself

Prior to initiating a college search, all students must resolve certain basic issues regardless of whether or not they have a learning disability. The following questions are among those which you should consider carefully:

1. Has your academic background prepared you for college?
2. Have you examined your interests and abilities carefully and determined possible career goals?
   Resources provided through your high school guidance department can be very helpful in this area.
3. Do you want to attend a two or four year college?
4. What size college would you like to attend?
5. In what part of the country would you like to go to school?
6. How much can you afford to spend on college? Will you need financial assistance?

Begin Your Search

Once the above questions have been answered, it is time to begin compiling a list of schools which meet the criteria you have established. Your list should be large at first, including all schools in which you have an interest. Next, identify any special needs which you might have, such as extended time for tests, tutorial support, etc. and then, using the directory included in this book or one similar, narrow your list to include only those schools with the necessary support services to offer you a fair opportunity to succeed. Your LD teacher or guidance counselor should be able to help in this process.

When examining college profiles, the following list represents some of the services which you should be seeking:

1. Alternative admissions policies for disabled students — These might include waiving minimum scores on the SAT's to a completely separate application procedure, requiring diagnostic testing and documentation of disability.
2. Diagnostic testing and prescriptive planning — An individual plan is developed similar to an IEP where services are provided based on your particular needs as determined by psychoeducational testing.

3. Special advisement by an LD specialist — This may include academic counseling, tutoring and remediation.

4. Advocacy/liaison by an LD specialist — The specialist acts as an intermediary between you and the staff to assure that you receive the accommodations to which you are entitled. The specialist will also act as a consultant to instructional staff as needed.

5. Supervised tutoring in academic areas — The key word here is “supervised”. Tutors should be trained in working with students with learning disabilities, and their performance should be monitored and evaluated by a professional with a background in learning disabilities.

6. Remedial courses designed specifically for LD students — Most colleges offer remedial courses of some type. They are generally designed to bolster the skills of average students who have deficits due to a poor educational background, not a learning disability. These courses are often just a review of basic skills and may not employ any special teaching strategies to accommodate an LD student.

7. Auxiliary aids such as tape recorders, note takers, etc. — Many colleges provide these. Others simply allow them in the classroom, but it is your responsibility to acquire them.

8. Counseling — career and personal — This is a service offered by most colleges to all of their students. It is important that the counselor understand the nature of your learning disability and its ramifications. However, this should not lead to limiting your career goals.

9. LD peer support groups — These are generally only available on a formal basis at colleges with a large LD enrollment. These schools often have a well structured LD program with peer support groups being only one of the many services they offer.

10. Services available throughout entire college career — Some institutions only offer services during the freshman year. A student is then expected to have developed the necessary skills to succeed independently. This is a very risky situation.

11. Willingness to arrange course substitutions — Substitutions might include a computer programming course for a foreign language. Colleges will generally not allow substitutions for required basic or “core” courses.

Several directories are currently on the market which purport to list colleges with LD programs. Any such directory, including this text, must be viewed as simply a starting point for your college search. Many college administrators have expressed concern over the fact that in other publications they have been identified as having a formal LD program, when in fact they do not. It was not the intention of the publishers of these directories to misrepresent the schools or to mislead prospective students, but merely a misunderstanding as to the LD student population. Before using the directory included in this publication, be sure to read “How to Use the Directory” to avoid any misconceptions. In order to truly assess a school’s ability to meet your needs, you must personally investigate it thoroughly.

Contacting Schools

Once you have generated a list of schools which appear to meet your requirements, it is time to contact them directly. It is imperative that you speak to the person who is ultimately responsible for providing the support services you seek. This may not be a simple task, and may result in referrals to a variety of college offices, none of which are involved in the administration of the LD program. Be patient. While perhaps frustrating, this can be an informative experience.

If the majority of individuals contacted are totally unaware of services for the learning disabled or, worse yet, do not know what is meant by the term, there is serious reason to question the extent of the school's commitment to aiding LD students. This should not, however, deter you from pursuing your investigation.

Once you have reached the director or coordinator of support services, the following questions should aid you in determining the suitability of the program:

1. Is there an LD specialist on staff to work with students? Some schools might respond that there are several LD specialists on staff within the Special Education Department. This does not mean, however, that they are available to work with LD students attending the college. Ask if working with LD students enrolled in the college is one of their designated responsibilities.
2. Does the program develop an individual educational program? If the answer is yes, you may feel confident that the program is highly structured and individualized.
3. Are all services provided through one office? If services are administered through more than one office, it is important to determine who is responsible for coordinating them.
4. Are tutors available? Are they trained to work with LD students? Are they supervised by a professional with a background in learning disabilities?
5. Are students allowed to tape lectures?
6. Is there someone who will speak to a faculty member on the student's behalf if the need should arise? Who is that person?
7. Is there remedial instruction available designed specifically for LD students?
8. Is alternative testing available?
9. Is individual and group counseling available?
10. Is there an LD peer support group on campus?
11. Are the following services available...? (List services of specific importance to you.)
12. Is there a cost for LD support services above the cost of regular tuition? If so, how much? Many of the more extensive programs charge a fee. Compare tuition at the school plus fee for service to tuition at other schools. If the difference is not too great, the additional cost may be well worth it.
13. How many LD students are currently enrolled and receiving services? This will give you some idea of the extent to which the services are used. If a school has only one or two LD students enrolled, it is difficult to believe that they have a formal program to support them. By the same token, a school with a superior program generally has many applicants each year.

14. Are LD students required to take any special courses? If so, what are they, and when are they offered? Are they credit bearing? Taking additional courses during the summer may be required for admission at some schools. Such a requirement based simply on the fact that you have a learning disability is discriminatory and does not seem to indicate a firm understanding of the nature of learning disabilities. Courses required based on an educational evaluation of your learning strengths and deficits are highly appropriate, however.

15. How many LD students have graduated from the school? This will indicate the experience and success that the particular institution has had with LD students.

16. Are there any special procedures that an LD student should follow when applying for admission? It is very important to obtain this information to facilitate your application. Schools often provide an opportunity for the learning disabled applicant to supply information which will explain and mitigate poor scores on SAT's and other standardized tests. It is essential that you take advantage of such an opportunity.

17. How should one arrange a campus visit? Specify whom you would like to meet during your visit and what you would like to see while on campus.

Visit the Campus

Having obtained and reviewed the above information carefully, you should now be prepared to narrow your list of prospective colleges to those under serious consideration, probably between four and eight schools.

At this time a college visitation is appropriate. A visit should be planned well in advance, and should include an appointment with the Dean of Admissions and the LD Program Director. They can, in turn, make arrangements for you to meet other LD students already enrolled, visit classes, observe the program, speak to professors, and possibly spend the night in a dorm. It is a good idea to have your parents accompany you on your visit so that they have the opportunity to ask questions which are of concern to them. It also enables you to discuss what you learned about the institution with them at a later date.

It is important that you plan some activities without your parents, however, to allow you to get a feeling for what it might be like to live on your own at the school. During the visit, consider how well you are able to adjust to the physical layout of the campus. Were any aides provided to assist you in this process? If possible, try to attend a social event sponsored by the college or university. The director of the LD program or the Dean of Students may be able to arrange this for you.
Apply Early

After following the above procedures, you should be prepared to make a decision as to which school you wish to attend. Once again, academic and financial resources should be examined to ascertain the appropriateness of the selection. Financial assistance through the Bureau of Vocational Rehabilitation should be explored. Applying early is essential! The programs fill up quickly!

Many colleges which are willing to adjust admissions criteria require additional information at the time of application. This might include letters of recommendation from a guidance counselor or special educator; a recent IEP indicating type of support received; a WAIS-R, taken within the last one to three years; and a personal handwritten statement. Obtaining some of this information may take considerable time, so it is wise to plan ahead, requesting it well in advance of when it is actually needed.

College admissions officers and LD program directors will use your personal statement to assess your ability to express yourself as well as to determine your goals and motivation. Always write a rough draft, which may be checked by someone for grammatical and spelling errors. In the personal statement, be sure to stress your strengths not your weaknesses. Identify your goals in life and how you hope to achieve them. Explain how you have learned to cope with your learning disability and give examples of your accomplishments. Be sure to mention any extracurricular activities in which you have participated and how they have helped you to grow.

While most students have a clear first choice as to where they would like to go to school, it is wise to apply to several different colleges of varying levels of competitiveness. This assures that if you are not accepted by your first choice, all is not lost.

Be Patient

Waiting to hear whether you have been accepted or not by the college of your choice takes patience. Colleges differ with regard to response time depending upon their schedule for reviewing applications.

Surviving at College

Acceptance into college is the beginning of a great challenge for a student with a learning disability. Even with support, you must be prepared to spend more time on study assignments than your nondisabled peers. With reasonable effort and a high level of motivation, however, you should enjoy an enriching and successful college experience.

To some degree, your success in college will be determined by your self-awareness and confidence. It is essential that you develop a thorough understanding of your learning disability and the skill to explain it to others. This is especially important if you choose to attend a school without a formal LD program. In such a case, you must act as your own advocate; approaching professors without support when adjustments or accommodations are necessary. Due to the “invisible” nature of a learning disability, you should be prepared to encounter disbelief on the part of the professor. It will be your responsibility to educate the professor as to the nature of your learning disability and unique learning style. While it is essential that you inform the professor of your needs, it is equally important that you communicate your learning strengths as well.

Success in college depends on your ability to take responsibility for your learning regardless of whether a formal LD support program exists. Resources may be available to you, but to what extent you take advantage of them is entirely up to you. Several authors in the field of special education have offered strategies to assist LD college students. They are listed below:

For the student in a college without a formal support program, Dexter proposes several strategies:

• Making key people such as the Dean of Students, or the Chair of the Special Education Department aware of your needs.
• Establishing a working relationship with your advisor and maintaining regular contact.
• Contacting professors to explain your learning strengths and needs and to make arrangements for any accommodations which you might require.
• Checking with reading department or clinic as to services they might provide.
• Role playing initial contacts. (This could be done with high school resource teacher or guidance counselor prior to high school graduation.)
• Practicing good time management techniques.
• Setting priorities.
• Using Recordings for the Blind.
• Taping lectures and keeping notes of key words.
• Using scanning techniques prior to reading text. Color coded highlighting.
Additional suggestions are offered by Kay:
- When looking up a word in the dictionary, highlight it for easy reference next time.
- Use a thesaurus to look up words you are unable to spell well enough to look up in the dictionary.
- Request reading list months in advance to allow for recording.
- Select professors whose teaching style matches your learning style.
- Balance strong and weak area courses.
- When approaching professors with a problem, stress strengths before explaining problem. Demonstrate willingness to do extra to overcome problem.
- Deep breathing to relieve test anxiety.

Seitz and Scheerer suggest:
- Noting distractions or daydreams for later attention.
- Survey, Question, Read, Review, Recite (SQRRR) study method.
- Seeking or forming study groups.
- Goal setting.
- Burying past mistakes or failures.
- Keeping health by keeping regular hours, eating well, avoiding overextending oneself.

Social concerns are addressed in the 1985-86 edition of the HEATH publications Learning Disabled Adults in Post Secondary Education:
- Familiarize yourself with the campus bookstore procedures.
- Investigate how to get a parking permit.
- Simplify terminology in sports or technical areas. Ask for definitions or synonyms.
- Schedule regular exercise.

As the above suggest, there is much that learning disabled college students can do to help themselves. Success, however, requires motivation, persistence, and a great deal of patience. Students not accustomed to “going it alone” would be well advised to consider schools with formal programs.
How to Use This Directory

Students seeking a college with an LD program are advised to begin their search in the conventional manner as described in the earlier chapters of this guide. After compiling a list of schools meeting the basic requirements of location, cost, size and academic offerings, the student is ready to explore the support services available. It is for this purpose that A Guide to Higher Education for Learning Disabled Students was developed.

Format

Colleges are listed alphabetically, according to state. Since many colleges offer support services to LD students, but do not have a formal program for doing so, each state contains two sections: schools with formal Learning Disability Programs, and those with limited services. Each college profile contains twenty-three entries including an in-depth listing of academic support services. A sample profile is depicted below followed by an explanation of terms and abbreviations.

1. COLLEGE NAME

2. ( ) - Information contained within the parenthesis indicates a school's affiliation, i.e., Federal, State, or Private

3. LD Program: Indicates whether or not a school reports having a program of support designed to meet the particular needs of LD students. Such a program should have a director who is responsible for organizing and providing services to the LD student. Ideally, a program should also have an LD specialist on staff or someone trained in working with LD students. A "Yes*" entry should be interpreted to mean that while the school reports having a program, specific details seem to imply that the support services may not be provided through a "formal" program intended specifically for LD students. Special attention should be given to Number of Students in Program and Program Staff in such a case. A "No" entry indicates that the college or university does not report a formal program for LD students. Services are listed, however, which may offer sufficient support for the particularly independent LD student. Colleges and universities reporting no formal program, but reporting extensive services and support staff with LD background are denoted by a "No*" entry.

4. History: Number of years that a program has been in existence.

5. Contact: Identification and mailing address of person one should contact for information regarding support services. In the case of schools with formal programs, this is generally the individual ultimately responsible for the provision of services.

6. Title: Represents the administrative title of the contact person.

7. Phone: Phone number of contact.

8. Application Deadline: Generally the standard deadline for filing applications. If a special application date is required for admission to an LD support program, it is also indicated. Students should avoid waiting until the standard application deadline to apply, since good programs fill up very fast.

9. Director of Admissions: Good source for general background information regarding a school. The best source for information concerning admissions procedures. Not necessarily the best source for information regarding support services.

10. Enrollment: Number of full-time undergraduates

11. S/F: Student-Faculty Ratio — This is used to give an indication of average class size throughout the college or university. The figure can be misleading, however, since some freshman lecture classes may be much larger than the number indicates.
12. Tuition: Except when otherwise noted, the figure quoted represents the cost of tuition for one semester. These rates are subject to change and should only be viewed as estimates. When two figures are presented, as in the case of state schools, the first amount represents tuition for state residents and the second figure applies to nonresidents. Tuition cited does not include fees.

13. Room/Board: The cost of living quarters and a typical meal plan. The same constraints apply here as with Tuition.

14. Degrees: The degrees conferred by the given institution.

15. Majors: A general description of the courses of study offered. This should not be viewed as a comprehensive list, but rather as a sampling.

16. Number in Program: Generally, this item refers to the number of students enrolled in an LD Program as described above. Occasionally, however, a number will be reported by a school which is listed as not having a program. This occurs when a school is currently serving a given number of LD students, but does not have an organized program specifically designed for this purpose.

17. Ceiling: The maximum number of students which the LD Program can serve.

18. APP/ADM: The number of students who applied for admittance into the LD Support Program/The number of students actually admitted into the program during the 1985-86 school year. This information is provided to assist the student in assessing the likelihood of acceptance. Programs with a large discrepancy between the number of students who applied and those admitted are highly competitive and the student should apply as early as possible. Often programs are filled on a first come, first served basis.

19. Cost: The cost of services above and beyond the cost of regular tuition. As with tuition, these figures are subject to change and should be considered as estimates.

20. Program Staff: The number of staff involved in the LD Program. This also indicates the type of staff involved, i.e. counselors, LD specialists, etc. This entry is simply labeled Staff in records of schools reporting no formal program, but offering support services.

21. Special Application Procedure: Any special procedures the LD Student should follow when applying for admission to the college or university. One general suggestion would be to always indicate that you have a learning disability when making application. If a school can meet your needs, they will most often admit this. Hopefully, before time of application, direct contact has been made with the school and support services have been discussed.
22. LD Services: These are services provided through an LD program and are hopefully designed specifically for the LD student.

23. Services Available to All Students: These are support services offered to the entire student body. Many of the services are similar to those offered through a LD program, the major difference being the delivery model. The services listed may be provided through a variety of offices, with little interdepartmental communication. The student will have the responsibility for finding the appropriate resources and obtaining the necessary support. This takes a great deal of assertiveness and organizational ability. It can also take a significant amount of time. Many schools today do have an administrator to help the student with this task. Access to this individual may be limited, however, since this may represent only one of several responsibilities.

NOTE: A blank space in a given category indicates that no information was provided by the particular institution with regard to that feature. Students are advised to consult the college bulletin or contact the school's admissions office for specific details.

TERMS

Advocacy/Liaison — A service whereby a member of the college staff (advocate) assists the LD student by communicating his or her needs to professors and other members of the college community. The advocate then follows up to assure that these needs are met.

Alternative Admissions — Adjustments to the admissions criteria to avoid discrimination. May include waiver of SAT or language requirements. Schools may also require additional information such as psycho-educational evaluations, IEP’s, and recommendations.

Alternate Testing — Adapting testing procedures so they are not discriminatory against the LD student. Common adjustments include: extended time; tests on tape; oral tests; tests read aloud; etc.

College Bulletin — Official description published by each school including information regarding programs, facilities and requirements.

Note takers — Individuals provided to take notes for the LD students (usually another student).

Peer Support Groups — Available in some colleges with a large number of LD students. Students meet together to help each other adjust to college. Often students help one another with course selection, stress management, self-advocacy, and social concerns.

Peer Tutoring — Tutoring in academic areas by students with a particularly strong background in a given subject.

Psychological Testing — Diagnostic testing designed to assess learning style and aptitude. May be required in order to receive support services. Some schools provide psychological testing for their students.

Readers — Individuals provided to read written material, such as tests to the LD student (usually another student).

Remedial Instruction — Instruction in basic skills often referred to in college bulletins as developmental courses. These courses may or may not be credit bearing. While remediation is certainly of value to the LD student, not all such courses offered by colleges to their general student body are appropriate. Caution should be exercised.

Rolling Admissions — No specific date for application. Applications are evaluated as they are received.

Tape Recording — Permission for the recording of classroom lectures.

Time Management Assistance — Help is provided to the student in organizing his/her time efficiently in order meet the demands of college life.
