ABSTRACT
Intended for elementary school teachers, this short pamphlet describes the processes involved in executing a readers' theater. Much easier to implement than dramatic performances, reader's theater is seen as part theater and part oral interpretation. As outlined in the pamphlet, the procedures for implementing readers' theater in the classroom include (1) finding or writing scripts; (2) introducing and assigning parts; (3) rehearsing; (4) reassigning parts; (5) planning a performance; and (6) finally performing. The pamphlet lists the steps to help involve students in writing scripts as: selecting the story; making a photocopy to mark; labeling character and narrator parts; deleting non-essential information; reading aloud to edit; and typing. The pamphlet concludes that the major benefits of readers' theater are increased oral reading, a deeper and more meaningful understanding of the elements of story such as character and plot development, and exposure to new books. An appendix contains a scene from "Charlotte's Web." (MS)
READING AND WRITING
READERS’ THEATRE SCRIPTS

by Charlene C. Swanson

Put a little fun into your classroom and reap the benefits!
The fun is readers’ theatre. Readers’ theatre is half theatre, half oral interpretation. The script consists of one or more narrator parts to describe actions and background information and the characters’ parts. The characters read their lines but rarely perform actions. In lieu of costumes characters may wear identifying hats or labels. The major benefits of readers’ theatre are increased oral reading, a deeper and more meaningful understanding of the elements of story such as character and plot development, and exposure to new books.

The easiest way to begin to understand readers’ theatre is to observe a performance. Visualize a small group of fifth grade students performing a scene from Charlotte’s Web(Appendix A).
Three students stand in front of the classroom facing their audience, the remaining twenty-five students. Each character wears a hat or sign. Protruding from Charlotte’s hat is a gaudy, yellow 25cm pipe-cleaner spider. Wilbur wears a pink hat depicting the head of a pig. The narrator begins reading. The characters read their lines fluently and convincingly from the scripts they hold. The scene ends. The audience applauds.

From this brief glimpse you can see that readers’ theatre retains some of the elements of drama while emphasizing the element of oral interpretation.

As in drama there is a script. But all the information an audience needs to know is revealed by the various character speaking parts and one or more narrator parts. There are no costumes, stage actions, scenery or memorizing of parts to worry about.
While simple hats or signs may be worn, the main emphasis is on fluent oral reading with appropriate voice manipulations to convey meaning.

Both drama and readers' theatre provide students with rich learning opportunities. Yet many primary teachers shy away from involving students in dramatic performances because certain aspects of a dramatic performance appear to be overwhelming obstacles: directing, costuming, blocking, set design, props, makeup and rehearsal time. Even when teachers feel competent to handle these details, the reality of the increased work load involved in producing a play may be enough to reduce their efforts to one performance a year. But readers’ theatre is much easier to implement.

PROCEDURES FOR READERS’ THEATRE

The first time students are introduced to readers’ theatre the procedures should be kept simple. Keep student decision-making to a minimum until students have had several successful experiences with readers’ theatre. The major steps for readers’ theatre are summarized visually (Figure 2) and elaborated below.

1. Find or write scripts
- First, the teacher needs to find or write readers’ theatre scripts appropriate for the intended class. A few scripts for classroom use can be found in the books listed under resources.
For public performances a wide variety of scripts are available from the Readers’ Theatre Script Service.
Writing your own readers’ theatre scripts and teaching your students to write scripts is the best way to get good scripts for your class. Directions are included in another part of this paper.
2. Introduce and assign parts
- Introduce readers' theatre to one group at a time if possible. Bring the correct number of students together to participate in a particular script or adapt a script accordingly. (It's easy to add an extra narrator part by alternately numbering the narrator parts for Narrator 1 and Narrator 2.)
- Provide a motivating introduction to the selected script as you would any piece of literature.

3. Rehearse
- The rehearsal is the essence of readers' theatre. Here is where students get practice becoming fluent oral readers. They must understand the story before they can use their voices to convey that interpretation to others. Repeated readings in a readers' theatre setting is not tedious, but fun.
- First, students read the script silently to get the main idea. Younger students can read it aloud with the teacher or listen to an older group of children performing the script. They might follow along with their fingers while they listen.
- Then assign the parts to individual students. Be sure that longer, more difficult parts do not go to the poorer or less confident readers for the first few readings of a script.
- When using a script for the first time, have students find and underline the name of their part each time it appears in the left margin of the script. Then have them write that character's name on the front of the script. As students change parts, they exchange scripts.
- Students then rehearse their parts and ask each other or the teacher for help with unknown words.
- Now read the script aloud. Remind students to say the line the way that the character would say it and to follow the voice directions included by the script writer. Also, remind them to follow along when others are reading so they will be ready to read when their turn arrives.
- After the first reading, discuss the story as a group. Focus on how each character feels in this situation. What are some different ways we can show that kind of feeling in our voice?
- Now have the students do a second oral reading, keeping the same parts.
- Use of a particular script with a particular group of students can end at this point or, as Figure 2 shows, other options are available.

4. Reassign parts
- Some scripts are so enjoyable that students will not be ready to stop. One option is to switch parts. This is a good time for the less able readers to read a larger part.
- This swapping of parts may take place over several days. Stop each day's lesson before students become bored. Time limits will vary with age and script.

5. Planning a performance
- When students are especially fond of a script, they may wish to plan a performance for the rest of the class or for other audiences.
- Let them decide as a group if they wish to make hats or any other costume or props, and if so to design them together.
- Folders can be made for scripts. Sometimes the colour of the folder reflects the character.
- If students will perform in a large hall for an audience, more extensive planning is required. They will have to be sure their voices are loud enough or else figure out how microphones can be used. Make sure lighting is adequate so scripts can be read with ease. Memorized lines are not part of readers' theatre.

6. The performance
- Students stand in front of the audience holding scripts and wearing the simple hats, signs or costumes decided by the group.
- They read the lines with expression and enjoyment.

WRITING READERS' THEATRE SCRIPTS
Many young children who have read and performed three to four readers' theatre scripts are ready to write their own scripts from favourite books they have read. Most children find the task easier if they work with a partner who has read the same book. Figure 3 provides an overview of the steps to be discussed.

1. Select the story
- Keep two factors in mind when selecting an event from a favourite book to convert into a readers' theatre script. (1) The event must have sufficient interesting dialogue between characters, and (2) the event must be self-contained, that is, knowledge of events before and after this event is not necessary to understand and enjoy the script.

2. Make a photocopy to mark
- Easier than hand-copying all the lines is making a photocopy of the pages to be transformed into the script.

3. Label character and narrator parts
- Most dialogue requires no rewriting for the readers' theatre script. Just write the character's name in the left-hand margin and follow with a colon.
- It is permissible to give a character advice regarding the speaking of a particular line. These voice directions are placed within parentheses and follow the character's name.

Example 1: Wilbur: (softly) Charlotte?
Example 2: Mrs Kookaburra: (anxiously) Do you want a nurse for him?

- Descriptive passages are rewritten for narrators to speak to provide necessary information to the audience.
- Most scenes begin with the narrator describing the scene and the characters.

Example: Narrator 1: The bush was alive with excitement, Mrs Koala had a brand new baby and the news spread like wildfire.
4. Delete non-essential information

- Cross out parts of the descriptive passage which are unnecessary for the understanding of the script. Combine two or three sentences into one if necessary. Too much narrator information will make a script move very slowly.
- Since characters speak their own lines all statements referring to the speaker are omitted: These can be crossed out on the copy.
  Example: 'she said'.

5. Read aloud to edit

- When the script seems finished, the writing pair ask a group of students to read the script aloud while they, the writers, listen and follow the script.
- Sometimes voice directions are added at this time. Narrator parts may be added or deleted to help clarify meaning.

6. Type

- Either type, enter onto a computer disk or neatly hand copy the final script.
- Lines must be easy for characters to read.
- I recommend that students and teachers use the word processor whenever possible. Then scripts can be edited easily as more readers indicate that changes should be made.
- If scripts are to be placed in a folder, be sure to keep a wide left margin so that binding doesn't make the script difficult to read.

BENEFITS OF READERS' THEATRE

Readers' theatre is an extremely useful instructional activity. The benefits centre around the amount of time students can be engaged actively in meaningful oral reading and purposeful listening. This is in sharp contrast to the non-meaningful oral reading and absence of listening which has dominated circle or round-robin reading. In readers' theatre students are motivated to read a script three or four times, thereby achieving a level of fluent reading so important to reinforcing a positive self-esteem. If they decide to exchange parts, they may read the script even more times. What is more important is the ease with which students of all ability levels can work within the same group. In light of the many research studies which have confirmed the negative effects of ability grouping for the off-

The thought of death came to him and he began to tremble with fear.

Wilbur: (Softly) Charlotte?
Charlotte: Yes, Wilbur?
Wilbur: I don't want to die.
Charlotte: Of course you don't.
Wilbur: I just love it here in the barn. I love everything about this place.
Charlotte: Of course you do. We all do.
Wilbur: Charlotte?
Charlotte: Yes?
Wilbur: Were you serious when you promised you would keep them from killing me?
Charlotte: I was never more serious in my life. I am not going to let you die Wilbur.
Wilbur: How are you going to save me?
Charlotte: Well, I don't really know. But I'm working on a plan.
Wilbur: That's wonderful. How is the plan coming Charlotte? Have you got very far with it? Is it coming along pretty well?
Charlotte: Oh, it's coming all right. The plan is still in its early stages and hasn't completely shaped up yet, but I'm working on it.

Wilbur: When do you work on it?
Charlotte: When I'm hanging head-down at the top of my web. That's when I do my thinking, because then all the blood is in my head.
Wilbur: I'd be only too glad to help in anyway I can.
Charlotte: Oh, I'll work it out alone. I can think better if I think alone.
Wilbur: All right. But don't fail to let me know if there's anything I can do to help, no matter how slight.
Charlotte: Well, you must try to build yourself up. I want you to get plenty of sleep, and stop worrying. Never hurry and never worry! Chew your food thoroughly and eat every bit of it, except you must leave just enough for Templeton. Gain weight and stay well — that's the way you can help. Keep fit and don't lose your nerve. Do you think you understand?
Wilbur: Yes, I understand.
Charlotte: Go along to bed then. Sleep is important. Wilbur trotted over to the darkest corner of his pen and threw himself down. He closed his eyes. In another minute he spoke.
Wilbur: Charlotte?
Charlotte: Yes, Wilbur?
Wilbur: May I go to my trough and see if I left any of my supper? I think I left a tiny bit of mashed potato.
Charlotte: Very well. But I want you in bed again without delay.

Narrator: Wilbur started to race out to his yard.
Charlotte: Slowly, slowly!! Never hurry and never worry!
Narrator: Wilbur checked himself and crept slowly to his trough. He found a bit of potato, chewed it carefully, swallowed it, and walked back to bed. He closed his eyes and was silent for a while.

Wilbur: (Whisper) Charlotte?
Charlotte: Yes?
Wilbur: May I get a drink of milk? I think there are a few drops of milk left in my trough.
Charlotte: No, the trough is dry, and I want you to go to sleep. No more talking! Close your eyes and go to sleep!
Narrator: Wilbur shut his eyes. Fern got up from her stool and started for home, her mind full of everything she had seen and heard.

Wilbur: Goodnight, Charlotte!
Charlotte: Goodnight, Wilbur.
Wilbur: Goodnight.
Charlotte: Goodnight.
