These guidelines are intended to assist library staff in making provisions for mentally retarded patrons. An initial assessment of the staff attitudes is recommended, followed by disability awareness exercises. Establishing contact with group homes and developmental centers is discussed, including specific steps to follow in making initial contact with potential patrons. A needs assessment is suggested for working with residential or day treatment staff and parents. Interactions with mentally retarded patrons are discussed, and the topic of building an appropriate collection of reading materials is examined. It is suggested that materials for families, caregivers, and other professionals also be made available. Finally, in-library programs are discussed. The bulk of the document consists of lists of residential centers in Florida, public and private organizations and agencies, and bibliographies of parent materials, as well as publishers of related materials and sample catalogs. INTRODUCTION

Throughout the United States large institutions for persons who are mentally retarded are closing or reducing their populations. This has generally been called deinstitutionalization, but it also implies that these persons are moving into different living settings. In Florida, alternative living facilities for former institution residents are opening in communities across the state.

Along with the movement to deinstitutionalize, more children with disabilities are living at home rather than another setting. Families and caregivers are finding that they need continuous support with current materials on assisting their children. Alternatives now available to living at home for the mentally-retarded person include independent living with various degrees of supervision, foster homes, group homes, cluster homes, and developmental centers.

In all of these situations, the persons involved need community information along with educational and recreational support and activities. While some of the services provided in large institutions are being duplicated in the new living situations, many auxiliary services are being provided from the community to allow persons who are mentally retarded to live more normally. A service provided to both staff and residents in institutions is that of an active library program that serves the needs of the entire facility. The public library is an important resource that can continue to do this for its new community residents.

Persons who are mentally retarded and living in the community, staff assisting them and families have have specific needs that can be met by the public library. Along with its basic services, the public library offers an accessible community activity that can be used on a regular basis at no cost. This is a crucial aspect of library services that librarians need to be acutely aware of. Many librarians feel they need extra funds or personnel to serve the mentally-retarded patron. Both would be helpful but neither is necessary. If your library is open afternoons, evenings and weekends and your staff is ready to serve the public, you have the basic prerequisites for service.

These guidelines are to assist in making the provision of services easier for both library staff and for their patrons who are mentally retarded.
ATTITUDE OF LIBRARY STAFF

The first step in providing service is an honest assessment of your staff's attitude. There are many feelings that may need to be addressed. Not always will it be easy to talk about them openly. These are some of the possible emotions that may be experienced:

1) Anger and Resentment - "I have enough to do." "I don't know anything about mentally-retarded people, and I don't want to." "I don't know what to do." "They can't read - what are they doing here?"

2) Fear - usually of the unknown. "I don't want to do the wrong thing - it might provoke hurt feelings or violence."

3) Embarrassment - not feeling able to assist a mentally retarded person. "I feel uncomfortable being with a mentally-retarded person."

Get your staff to talk openly. Listen to their concerns and do not be judgmental.

There are many ways of handling a staff introduction to patrons who are mentally retarded.

Disability awareness exercises are excellent discussion openers and are best administered by a non-staff person. Materials for these exercises can be accessed through your local FDLRS (Florida Diagnostic and Learning Resource System) or state FDLRS office (see Florida addresses in appendix). Request a librarian working with the mentally retarded do the disability workshop and to discuss the services she provides. Check with your local school board for a contact person. If you are close to a Sunland, contact the librarian there.

Using a librarian to give the overview and leading the exercises is ideal as professional understanding is present. It is more important, however, to have a person who is working with persons who are mentally retarded so that specific concerns can be addressed. If you cannot locate a qualified person to assist, contact the State Library Consultant for Special Clientele for a referral.

If your staff is already serving or is positive about serving mentally-retarded patrons, it is still a good idea to have an overview to reinforce what they are doing.

A question and answer period is important. Emphasize that all questions should be asked no matter how specific or general. Concerns need to be aired and addressed. One technique that encourages comments is to request all staff to write down their questions/concerns anonymously for submission to the discussion leader. This is done when the workshop is first announced.
After the workshop/overview is completed, arrange a tour for library staff to visit a local day or residential facility serving potential patrons. This has proved very effective in making library staff feel more comfortable about providing assistance at the library. Meeting people where they live, work, or go to educational classes, allows the library staff and patrons to get to know each other before a visit to the library is made.

It is not fair to expect your staff to be completely positive about extending services to mentally-retarded patrons. Some staff will intuitively be relaxed in the same way that some persons work better with children, the elderly, or any other special clientele. It is not right, however, for staff to always rely on the same person to assist mentally-retarded patrons. Groups and individuals would be very aware of having to wait for a certain library staff person to assist them. The entire staff needs to feel comfortable in order to make your patrons feel welcome. When staff attitude problems occur, it is usually because staff is unsure of the patron's limitations and doesn't want to hurt someone's feelings. If the library staff member is attempting to assist a patron, that attempt to help will be remembered whether or not the question was answered or the item found.

CONTACTING PATRONS

Although group homes and some ICF/MR's have been operating for over 5 years, the majority of the clusters and developmental centers have opened since 1982. This is not a long time for a 24-hour total care facility to be in operation. Staff turnover at residential centers tends to be constant because of the size of staff required and burnout from required job duties and low salaries. Primary services such as medical needs, food services, and transportation can take time to establish and work through problems. Community activities are important but sometimes have to play a secondary role to life-support needs.

Administrators of residential facilities are always interested in providing community experiences for the people they serve. Libraries are not always considered as a possibility in the planning of community outings. This is due to many factors. One reason can be that staff are not library users and, in that case, the librarian must also orient staff and parents to the library and what it can provide for them. Another reason can be that visiting the library is not always perceived as a recreational activity. The role of the public library as a source for recreational reading as well as an informational center must be made clear to the administrator or families as well as the mentally-retarded persons that you will be serving. Activity planners are looking for community experiences that are available on weekends and at nights as most of their clients are involved in school, job or vocational training during the day. Often, library hours are not widely known. Because of these main reasons for non-usage, the librarian must initiate contact.

Below is a suggested method for making initial contact with potential patrons.

1. Check your district HRS office for the location of all types of residential facilities. A list of clusters and developmental centers is in the appendix along with the addresses for HRS district offices. New facilities will be opening, so ask to be notified by HRS when that occurs.

2. Send the facilities a letter with a brief overview of your services and invite them to the library. Place the centers on your mailing list if you have one.

3. Send brochures or any publicity on the library in multiple copies with your letter.

4. When advertising by radio, newspaper, television, or word of mouth, always emphasize that all programs are open to the public and accessible to the disabled.

5. Inform center staff how the library generally advertises events so they can plan activities accordingly.

6. After the letter is sent, telephone the center to establish a contact person both at the library and the center to arrange for tours of both locations.

7. Request that center staff assist library staff in getting acquainted with residents in order to provide better service.

8. Locate persons living at home through your county Association of Retarded Citizens (ARC of Florida can provide addresses for local ARC programs - see Florida Agencies in appendix). Contact known day training or work programs and the special education office of your county school board and advertise library services through them. HRS keeps track of these programs.

9. Request that the agencies serving people living at home advertise the library and its programs.

10. Request input and feedback from residential and day programs staffs on the best ways to reach the families of their clients.

WORKING WITH RESIDENTIAL OR DAY TREATMENT STAFF AND PARENTS

As with any other target group, a needs assessment is the best tool to use in gauging the interests, needs, and attitudes of those to be served. It can be extensive or brief depending on your library's capabilities. Use the agencies/groups that you have contacted about library services as your target group. You can do this formally with a written questionnaire to all known groups or through random sampling by telephone or interviews. Questions should include a list of library services available and let respondents indicate which ones they are interested in. Subject needs and interests of your new patrons should also be reflected in the questions. It will be time well spent and will also show your potential patrons that you care about their needs.

Families can be reached through the groups/agencies approached. Ask agencies to request that parents respond to the library's needs assessment.

Assumptions can never be made about center staff or families. Mental retardation occurs in all families regardless of income or educational levels. Staff awareness of library services will also vary greatly depending on their personal knowledge of the library and how well they know their clients. The best example in my personal experience is that I assumed center staff would realize that they did not need their library cards to return books. In other words, negotiate with each patron or group as you would with any other unfamiliar user of library services to ascertain their abilities, needs, and interests.

If residents are physically unable to come to the library, arrange for outreach services — small deposit collections or a bookmobile stop at the residential or day center. Involve center staff and families in choosing materials and programming for this group. If you are unable to do outreach, encourage staff/families to pick up library resources for their clients/children. Encourage feedback from staff and residents on the types of materials and programs provided. It is most important that anyone assisting a mentally-retarded person be aware of library policies, programs, and collections. If specific programming is arranged for residents, always do the planning with the center contact person. You will obtain valuable guidance and have better attendance with this coordination.

Family members of disabled persons can benefit from a supportive community resource that helps them access information and provides a welcome atmosphere for their family. Community Information and Referral files, parenting materials, and catalogs of assistive devices are examples of the types of services that libraries can offer.

Inform center staff and families how to obtain materials from the DBS Library for the Blind and Physically Handicapped and the FDLRS Clearinghouse (addresses in appendix). Both have catalogs of materials that are loaned free of charge. Also, advertise the film and interlibrary loan services from the State Library often as additions to your program. Encourage them to use these audiovisual resources for in-service training and community programs.
WORKING WITH MENTALLY RETARDED PATRONS

As with all parts of this manual, this section only suggests how to initiate and continue services with mentally retarded patrons. If you devise a method that works, stay with it.

Tours and library instruction should be handled in the same manner that you would use with other groups. Ask the group leader about the level of understanding and the needs of the group and proceed accordingly.

Decide with families/staff how the circulation of materials will be handled before the tour and let the group know how they can borrow materials.

If individuals are getting library cards, assistance will be needed in filling out application forms. Repeat procedures and rules until you feel individuals/groups understand. You may also have to repeat and explain this on subsequent visits. Staff accompanying new patrons are being paid to be there, so make sure they also know rules and procedures to help their clients both at and away from the library.

The concept of mainstreaming and normalization emphasizes equal access and treatment. Mentally-retarded patrons should follow the same rules as other patrons and suffer the same consequences if these rules are abused.

Some librarians consciously overlook fines, damages, or lost materials in order not to "upset the patron." This well-meant action, however, is detrimental to the mentally-retarded patron as it condones his/her inappropriate actions. You must continue to repeat rules and regulations. Repetition is crucial to learning for a mentally-retarded person. Patience is crucial to a librarian's outlook on serving this clientele.

Problems are best dealt with directly and at the time of occurrence. This may also be difficult for staff. Remember that expecting acceptable behavior from retarded persons is beneficial to them as you are treating them the way you would any other patron.

Often you will have to explain what is acceptable behavior in the library. It may be the first time in the library for residents, their families, and caregivers. Again, don't assume that everyone will understand what is acceptable or library behavior. Explain general rules as you would to any new group and give reminders as necessary. Ask for staff/families and student/resident participation in becoming familiar with the library and its services.
COLLECTION DEVELOPMENT

Library staffs often express that there are not materials appropriate for mentally-retarded persons in their collection. The existing collection needs to be reviewed with a new outlook. Does your collection include audiovisuals? Films, videos and audiocassette tapes, filmstrips, and slide/tape programs that are recreational and informational are of special interest to this group. There are a few publishers that produce items for mentally-retarded persons and they are listed in the appendix along with a list of publishers of high interest/low vocabulary materials. Also attached is a list of materials to assist library staff in serving mentally-retarded persons. Entertainment films are appropriate to use for programming and for checkout. All types of music are especially popular in audio and video format.

Magazines with pictures such as Ranger Rick, any of the teen magazines, and People - type publications have been well received. Comic books, children's, young adults, and adult books with the story told primarily by pictures are also popular. Non-fiction is utilized as much as fiction. Informational and how-to-do-it books with pictures or step-by-step instructions are appropriate. Photographic or comic strip adaptations of movies, stories, and biographies are especially popular.

The children's and young adults' collections are good resources to begin with; however, don't leave out the rest of the collection in an introduction to the library or in providing reference assistance. Newspapers, magazines, and the adult collections can also be utilized and enjoyed. Again, each patron's level of understanding and need will have to be discerned on an individual basis.

Age appropriateness is a term that applies to both people who cannot read, as well as mentally-retarded persons. It refers to providing materials on a level that can be understood, yet reflects the age of the person requesting the materials. While this is a concern, many of your patrons' requests and interests will need to be filled by the children's collection.

Library Services and Construction Act (LSCA) funds can be applied for to begin or expand a program of services. There is a handicapped category within Title I of the LSCA program. Community agencies, groups and individuals already working with the mentally retarded should be involved in determining the need, how best to meet it, and proposal planning for services and materials.

Libraries can also assist other agencies as they apply for funds which could include materials to add to the library collection. Members of the local Association for Retarded Citizens should be very willing to assist in either of these processes. Many libraries are providing services without extra funds.
MATERIALS FOR FAMILIES, CAREGIVERS AND OTHER PROFESSIONALS

Having a file of catalogs of materials of interest to persons with disabilities can assist in filling the needs of disabled persons, their families, and caregivers. A list of catalog publishers and addresses with a brief description of products is listed in the appendix. These can be ordered in multiples for both in-library and circulating use.

As families continue to take a more active role in their children's lives, new materials are made available to assist them. Most of these are reviewed by the professional library literature. Request that families and center staff assist by recommending materials they are familiar with or help in the materials selection process.

Exceptional Parent is a recommended publication to have in your collection. It publishes annual directories of organizations, discusses technological advances, and includes book reviews and articles.

Computer Disability News is also recommended as another low cost source for materials and resources. Computers have been used successfully with and by mentally-retarded persons. Both major computer companies have developed software and adaptive devices appropriate for this group. The Exceptional Parent publishes a yearly Resource Directory of Computer and Communication Technology in their October issue. This lists clearinghouses and publications, as well as commercial vendors.

The National Association for Retarded Citizens publishes extensively in brochure, pamphlet, book, and audiovisual format. Other organizations and agencies listed in the appendix publish materials at low or no cost.

Vertical files are a good method to keep brochures and other current information. Seek a volunteer to assist with this task if staff is not able to establish or expand a vertical file to include information on disabilities and related information.

If staff and families know that the library also has materials to assist them in their jobs and lives, they are more likely to continue utilizing services for their clients and children.

Parents and other family members are the "front-line" professionals and can also become strong advocates for the library if it offers services for their family. Involve them as much as possible in the planning and implementation of services.
COLLECTION ARRANGEMENT

In all libraries, there is a discussion at one time or another on special collections versus interfiled materials. The entire collection should be available with assistance provided by library staff for patrons who are mentally retarded. Setting up a special area for patrons, staff, and parents will limit their selection. To incorporate the idea of mainstreaming at the library, materials added should be cataloged and shelved in their normal place.

PROGRAM PLANNING

After you have determined your target group, where they live, and acquire services in the community, programs can be planned.

In-library programs can include, but not be limited to: storyhours, flannel boards, audiovisual programs, booktalking, arts and crafts workshops, and musical programs as well as cosponsoring informational programs on specific topics of interest for this group and the general public on mental retardation. A repeating of library rules and time for questions should be included in each program. Ongoing in-library programming should be advertised as described in the "Contacting Patrons" Section.

Planning for special programs specific to this clientele can include families or staff assistance in choosing themes and materials and deciding on the best times for programs.

There are some residential facilities that have residents who will be unable to visit the library due to limiting physical conditions. Alternative methods of service include a bookmobile or van stop at the center, a deposit collection maintained either by library or residential staff, or staff and family access to materials at the library for those unable to come themselves. Audio and visual materials are most important for the homebound. Programming brought to the center by library staff is ideal. Providing program materials and suggestions to parents and staff who will then do the programming at the centers is also appropriate. In-library usage of materials and attendance at programs, however, is always preferable as it allows your patrons to experience the library as a community member.

The following lists of residential centers, organizations and bibliographies are to assist in planning and implementing services. Contact the State Library Consultant for Special Clientele if more assistance is needed.
