This guide contains 65 model lesson plans developed by Delaware public school English/language arts teachers for grades 1-12. Each entry in the guide lists content standards, the type(s) of activities involved in the lesson (for example, class discussion, oral reports, student writing), a description of the activity, and a selection of relevant elements of effective instruction. Appendix A lists the English/language arts standards in their entirety; Appendix B contains material derived from the manual for Delaware's 1986-87 teacher effectiveness workshops; and Appendix C provides an annotated bibliography of research reports. This publication resulted from the work of teachers who represented local school districts in Delaware. A workshop setting provided them with opportunities to share ideas for lessons which they had used in their classrooms.

The editor/reviewer for the content of this publication was Dr. Joan DelFattore, Associate Professor of English at the University of Delaware. This special project was under the direction of Dr. Gary L. Houpt, State Supervisor of English/Language Arts in the Delaware Department of Public Instruction.

Funding for this project was made available through a grant from the Professional Development Division. The activities associated with the project were intended to incorporate effective teaching methods and strategies into content, special education and vocational education areas.

INTRODUCTION

Background

In 1983-84, when the State of Delaware's English/language arts content standards (Appendix A) were being developed, a group of teachers produced sample activities illustrating these standards. These activities were used in an inservice course that was offered at three sites; approximately fifty teachers attended. Two years later, the Department of Public Instruction used a research-based model of effective teaching to develop a series of inservice workshops for teachers, who then expressed a need for sample lessons incorporating both the content standards and the principles of effective instruction described in the workshops. Accordingly, a group of 65 Delaware public school English/language arts teachers, representing all school districts in the state and all grade levels, met five times to study the content standards and the research on which the teacher effectiveness workshops were based. During the course of these meetings, the teachers wrote model lesson plans. Selected examples of these plans and some additional material are included in this publication. The material in this book, along with the original sample activities illustrating the content standards, will be used in future inservice programs.

Content and Use

This book contains sixteen model lessons for Grades 1-3, sixteen for Grades 4-6, seventeen for Grades 7-8, and sixteen for Grades 9-12. Teachers may wish to use these model lessons without alteration or adapt them to the needs of their own classes. Teachers may also wish to generate new lessons based on ideas suggested by the entries in this book. Although these lessons are classified according to grade levels, these classifications are by no means absolute. Teachers may wish to use activities from higher or lower grade levels to accommodate the needs of high or low achieving students.

The activities that appear in the next section illustrate all of the English/language arts content standards. Because of the integrated nature of English/language arts instruction, most lessons illustrate more than one type of standard. A lesson may, for example, include listening and speaking activities that serve to illustrate literary concepts and to prepare for a writing or study skills assignment. Inevitably, some standards appear more often than others because of their breadth of applicability. "To participate purposefully in class discussions," for example, appears more often than "To communicate thoughts through letter writing." Similarly, some standards lend themselves to being the focus of a lesson, while others are ancillary.

Each model lesson is presented as a whole, without reference to the number of class periods involved, except when students are assigned to bring materials from home. The number of days each lesson takes depends on the level of the class and on the teacher's decisions regarding in-class work and homework. The lessons in this book involve class discussions, small group work, oral reports, panels, and dramatizations that normally take place during class time, but most of the lessons also involve reading, studying, or writing assignments that students could do at home.

In addition to listing content standards and describing activities, each entry in this book lists the type(s) of activities involved in the lesson (for example, class discussion, oral reports, student writing) and a selection of relevant elements of effective instruction. Most of the elements of effective instruction were taken from a research-based list developed by Delaware educators, while others were suggested by the content-specific standards. Appendix A lists the English/language arts standards in their entirety; Appendix B contains material derived from the manual for Delaware's 1986-87 teacher effectiveness workshops; and Appendix C provides an annotated bibliography of research reports.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher relates a personal experience and asks students to recall specific details of the experience, to retell major events, and to identify the mood. Student volunteers relate personal experiences of their own and receive similar feedback from the class. This activity prepares the students to answer similar questions about stories that they will read and discuss.

IV. ELEMENT(S) OF EFFECTIVE INSTRUCTION

Previews skills to be applied to more difficult material
GRADE CLUSTER 1 - 3

I. CONTENT STANDARD(S)

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher reads a few sample sentences that convey emotion, and the students identify the emotion conveyed by each sentence. The teacher gives each student an index card containing a sentence and a description of the emotion to be conveyed. The teacher also distributes a list of the students' names. As each student reads his/her sentence with the appropriate inflections and gestures, the other students write next to the speaker's name the emotion that the speaker is conveying. The activity concludes with a brief followup discussion of what the students have learned about effective reading and attentive listening. This activity may be used as an introduction to reading a story that involves tone and/or mood.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher explains the difference between major and minor characters. The students give examples of major and minor characters in television programs, fairy tales, and stories from the basal reader. Each student selects a character from the basal reader and writes a few sentences describing the character, remembering to capitalize the character's name, to check spelling and punctuation, and to write legibly. Each student draws a picture of the character and writes key identifying words on cards attached to the picture with strings. These pictures are posted on the bulletin board and used for student feedback and review.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Following a discussion of a fairy tale, each student writes six sentences summarizing the tale. The teacher goes over all student work, and the students revise as necessary for capitalization, punctuation, spelling, and language use. Each student draws a picture illustrating each of his/her six sentences and writes the sentence under the picture, taking care to write legibly. The six sheets of paper are inserted into a set of six zip-lock baggies that have been sewn together at the bottom to form a durable "book." These "books" may be collected into a class library or used as bulletin board or Parents' Night displays.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Following discussions of several fairy tales and folk tales, the students break up into groups of four or five, and each group is assigned one of these tales. The students in each group make popsicle-stick puppets, clothespin puppets, or felt figures... representing the characters in the tale. After rehearsals, each group presents a puppet play dramatizing the tale assigned to that group. Students answer questions about the characters, events, details, mood, time, and place of each tale. They also discuss the differences between a fairy tale and a folk tale. Some tales used in this activity may be in verse or drama form, providing the opportunity to discuss those distinctions as well. This activity may be used as a review for a test on a unit of folk and fairy tales.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

As the students recall events in a story the class has discussed, the teacher lists the events on the chalkboard. The teacher asks the students to help arrange the events in the correct order. The teacher then demonstrates how to make a "filmstrip" by folding a piece of adding machine tape into the appropriate number of sections. On each section, the student illustrates and labels an event from the story, using the sentences on the chalkboard. The "filmstrip" is shown by threading it through slots in the side of an empty half-pint milk carton, with blank tape left at the beginning and end for threading. Students share their "filmstrips" with classmates, checking for correct sequence. Each student is then assigned to a small group to make a "filmstrip" based on another story. Those "filmstrips" are shown to the class and evaluated for accuracy and completeness. This activity may be used to review for a test on a unit of short stories or narrative poems.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

After reading a short story, poem, fairy tale, or folk tale, each student writes one factual statement about it. Several students read their statements aloud. The teacher asks the class to think of false statements about the literary selection; for example, they might attribute an action to the wrong character or reverse the sequence of events. Several students read their statements aloud. The teacher explains that one way to find out whether students have understood what they have read or studied is to make statements and ask students whether these statements are true or false. The class reads another short literary selection. Using the chalkboard or an overhead projector, the teacher presents simple statements to the class and asks for a vote on whether each statement is true or false. The students read a third literary selection and take a short true-false test. The teacher goes over the test with the students, making sure that they understand the procedure as well as the subject matter.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The students read and discuss an incremental poem, such as "The House That Jack Built." The class reads the poem aloud, with the two sides of the room (or the boys and the girls) alternating verses. The class discusses the rhythm of the poem. The class is then divided into small groups, pairs, or individuals, each with the responsibility for reading a particular part of the poem. This choral reading may be taped and played back to the children, and the tape may be used in conjunction with Parents' Night or similar activities.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher explains that some letters of the alphabet are based on circles or parts of circles. As an introductory exercise to increase circle-drawing proficiency, the students use a jar lid or a similar object to trace a large circle. They fill in this large circle with polka dots of various sizes. The children may also draw animals that are made entirely of circles; these, with samples of the children's writing, may later be displayed on the bulletin board.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

After learning to form cursive letters, the children use these letters to make a decorative border; for example, dadedede, alalealea, or tttttttttt. The children may use different colored pencils or pens and may use these borders to decorate art work they have done in connection with another lesson.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher puts on the overhead projector a few samples of a child's writing. The students identify errors in the shape or alignment of the strokes, the size, slant, and shape of the letters, and the spacing between the letters of each sample. When the students understand what they are looking for, the teacher distributes similar samples for independent practice. Each child identifies the errors in the sample and rewrites the words correctly on blank lines provided for this purpose.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The room is darkened and the students are instructed to close their eyes. The teacher begins by asking the class to recall an embarrassing situation, a frightening event, or whatever other experience is the focus of today's writing assignment. Using a series of questions, the teacher encourages the students to focus on the details of that particular situation. Questions might include: "Where are you?" "Who is with you?" "Is it daytime or night?" Each student tries to recollect as many sensory details about the event as he/she can, without verbalizing any ideas at this time. After several minutes of questioning, the teacher turns on the lights and asks the students to write about their recollections.

IV. ELEMENT(S) OF EFFECTIVE INSTRUCTION

C.2 - To use language appropriately
C.3 - To use capitalization
C.4 - To use punctuation
C.5 - To spell words correctly
C.6 - To analyze language

II. ACTIVITY TYPE(S)

Student writing

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

After learning and reviewing the purposes and parts of a friendly letter, each child is assigned a pen pal from another class at the same grade level and writes a friendly letter describing himself/herself. Students may also ask appropriate questions and include pictures of themselves. The teacher checks the letters for handwriting, spelling, punctuation, capitalization, and language use, and the students make the necessary corrections. When the replies arrive, the students have the opportunity to share these with each other. For enrichment, pen pals from another state may be chosen. When these letters are shared with the class, research on that state may be incorporated into the lesson.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher asks the students what they usually like to learn about people whom they do not know well. A brainstorming session follows, resulting in a list of six questions written on the chalkboard. The teacher then divides the class into pairs, matching children who do not ordinary play or work together. Each child asks the other the six questions. At the conclusion of this activity, each student writes a letter to his/her partner summarizing what he/she has learned about the other person. The teacher collects and screens the letters before distributing them to the addressees the next day. The writers correct the errors that the teacher points out in capitalization, punctuation, spelling and usage. Illegible sentences are rewritten.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Student volunteers tell the class what they do when they play a game of football: for example, run, catch, tackle, kick, pass. The teacher writes these words on the chalkboard. Using the chalkboard list, the teacher explains that each word shows an action that a football player performs. The students look at magazine pictures showing observable actions and write the appropriate verbs next to each picture. The teacher hands each child a card containing a verb that can easily be demonstrated. Keeping his/her card a "secret," each student acts out the verb for the others to identify. The teacher distributes a worksheet that has 15 verbs and 15 sentences containing blanks, and the students match each verb with a sentence and read the sentence aloud. Each student also writes five original sentences using five of the verbs listed on the worksheet. Finally, the teacher passes out a worksheet on which the students can circle action verbs and fill in blank spaces in sentences with appropriate free-response verbs. Similar exercises, using classroom objects, magazine pictures, student experiences, and worksheets may be used to teach nouns and adjectives. These activities also provide an opportunity for students to practice handwriting techniques and rules of spelling, punctuation, and capitalization.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Each student is given a sheet of paper containing 25 squares. The student fills in the squares, using a list of vocabulary words from a story previously read. (Each word may be used more than once.) As the teacher calls out each word, the students block out appropriate square(s). Students who fill a row vertically, diagonally, or horizontally say, "Bingo." To get credit for Bingo, the students must be able to pronounce, spell, and define each word correctly. This activity may be used as a review for a vocabulary test.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Each student writes a step-by-step description of how to make a peanut butter and jelly sandwich. The teacher collects these essays and chooses a few at random. Each student whose essay has been selected reads the essay aloud to the class while a student volunteer, using real peanut butter, jelly, and bread, follows the reader's directions precisely. The class evaluates the accuracy and organization of the reader's set of directions. Less sticky alternatives include tying shoes, sharpening pencils, following a no-cooking recipe, and folding paper. At the end of the lesson, the teacher returns the students' papers for organizational revision in the light of what was illustrated by this activity. These papers are graded on handwriting, capitalization, punctuation, and spelling as well as on content.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

After reading several short literary works, the students break up into groups of four or five and each group is assigned one of these works. One student in each group is designated as the interviewer, and another as the expert. The group develops questions and answers about the story for the interviewer and expert to use. These interviews are played out for the entire class. Questions should deal with such topics as genre, mood, plot, and figures of speech. This activity may be used to review for a test on a unit of literature.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Students read a short article or essay about a particular breed of dog. Using the information from the article, they suggest fictional incidents involving a dog of this breed. After a brief class discussion, the first student in each row writes the first sentence of a story about a dog and passes the paper to the next student in the row. This student writes the second sentence in the story and passes the paper to the third student. When each student has had the opportunity to write two sentences, the students in each row form a small group to make the story coherent and give it an ending. One student in each group reads the story aloud to the class. In addition to serving as a writing exercise, this lesson may be used to clarify the distinctions between non-fiction and fiction. It may also be useful as an introduction to short stories and novels that are based heavily on historical, biographical, or scientific data.

After the students have learned about pictographs, bar graphs, line graphs, and pie graphs, the teacher distributes a questionnaire asking each student to identify his/her preferences in certain areas: for example, favorite color, song, TV show, story, sports activity, type of pet. The teacher divides the class into small groups, assigns each group a topic, and gives the group the survey results on that topic. The students in the group show the survey results in a pie graph, a bar graph, a pictograph, and a line graph drawn on sheets of clear plastic. At the conclusion of the activity, each group uses the overhead projector to share its graphs with the class for interpretation and comment.

After the students have learned the function of the guide words at the top of each page of a dictionary, the teacher distributes worksheets with guide words at the top and asks the students to circle the words on the worksheet that fit between the guide words. When the students have mastered this activity, the teacher distributes a pair of guide words to each student with instructions to compose a dictionary page of ten words that fit between the guide words. Each entry should include pronunciation(s), definition(s), and sample sentence(s). All papers should be written legibly and should be checked for capitalization, punctuation, and spelling.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Each student receives a sheet of paper containing seven sentences. Each sentence is separated from the others by horizontal lines. The students cut along the horizontal lines to produce seven strips of paper, each bearing a single sentence. The students arrange the strips of paper so that the sentences form a coherent paragraph. The students read their paragraphs and explain how they determined the order of the sentences. Following this activity, each student writes a five-sentence paragraph and then rewrites the sentences in scrambled order, skipping two lines between sentences and taking care to write legibly. The students exchange papers, correct one another’s spelling, punctuation, and capitalization, and arrange the sentences in logical order. Finally, the students work in pairs to compare the original paragraphs with the restructured paragraphs.

The teacher distributes worksheets containing all of the information needed for a model letter, and the students unscramble the information and write it in the correct format. Additional drill sheets or workbook pages may be assigned as necessary. When the students have mastered the business letter format, they work in small groups to write thank-you letters to the principal, cafeteria workers, custodians, crossing guards, school bus drivers, and others who assist the children in school-related activities. This assignment may be used along with art work and other activities related to Thanksgiving. The students and the teacher proofread the completed letters for punctuation, capitalization, and spelling, and one student in each group carefully writes out a clean copy to send to the appropriate person or group.

Using the chalkboard or an overhead projector, the teacher presents the format for writing social letters, and the students use drill sheets or worktk ok pages to practice using this format. In November, during Thanksgiving activities, each student writes a one-page thank-you letter to his/her primary caregiver(s). The teacher helps the students edit their spelling, punctuation, and capitalization, and each student carefully writes out a clean copy of the letter. Each student draws a picture on construction paper illustrating what he or she is thankful for, and these pictures are stapled to the letters. The letters and art work may be used as bulletin board displays until the children bring them home just before the holiday.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher explains the term "riddle" and gives examples of student-generated riddles. This example was written by a fifth-grader:

I am gray with a tusk on each side of my mouth.
I like to eat peanuts.
I have a long nose that can do many things.
I am very big.
What am I?
The teacher names a few common objects and elicits riddles from the class, writing acceptable suggestions on the chalkboard. The students work in groups of four or five to decide on an object and write a five-sentence riddle, using the models on the chalkboard. A spokesperson for each group reads the group's riddle aloud, and the rest of the class tries to guess the object. Each student writes a five-sentence riddle, taking care to use correct spelling, punctuation, and capitalization. These riddles, with or without names attached, are exchanged for guessing and proofreading purposes. Finally, each student copies his/her riddle carefully on a sheet of construction paper and draws an illustration on the other side of the sheet. These sheets are bound into a book for the classroom library and/or for a Parents' Night display. These techniques can also be used in helping students to write various forms of short poetry, such as haiku, cinquains, and diamantés.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

On the first day of this lesson, the teacher brings in boxes of cereal and asks students to explain which brand they would buy and why. Reasons might include color or design of box, free prizes, celebrity photographs, or television commercials. The teacher defines five persuasive techniques used by advertisers, encouraging students to supply specific examples of each. These persuasive techniques are: bandwagon (i.e., everybody uses this), testimonial from a celebrity, transfer (for example, showing a happy couple near a new car), emotional words, and repetition. On the second day of this lesson, students bring in old magazines and work in five small groups. After a review of the first day's lesson, each group is assigned a persuasive technique. Using advertisements from the magazines students have brought in, each group illustrates the assigned technique by making a collage on poster board. At the conclusion of the lesson, each group explains to the class how its collage illustrates the assigned technique. The class evaluates each presentation, using a checklist provided by the teacher. This checklist should include items relating to relevancy, logic, and style of presentation.

The teacher compiles a list of at least 50 homophones; for example, two, to, and too would constitute three items on the list. The teacher makes a deck of 50 playing cards by writing a different homophone on each of 50 index cards. After making enough duplicate decks to accommodate the entire class in groups of four to six, the teacher explains the rules of "Homophone Rummy" to the students. A dealer in each group shuffles the deck and gives each player seven cards. After matching pairs of homophones in the hands they have been dealt, the players take turns picking cards from the deck or from the pile of discards; each player discards one card at the end of his/her turn. Each pair of matched homophones is worth five points and the third homophone in a set of three is worth an additional five points, but no player may claim points without defining the meaning of each homophone in the pair. Other students may challenge a player's definition, using a dictionary and/or the teacher to resolve disputes. If a player is shown to have been mistaken, the points are awarded to the challenger. This activity may be used to review for a vocabulary test.

Having completed workbook exercises, worksheets, and chalkboard exercises to develop skills in following directions, the students are divided into small groups. Each group writes a set of directions for another group to follow in locating a "treasure" on the playground. These directions take the form of six short notes; each of the first five notes gives clear directions for finding the next note, while the final note leads to the "treasure." The directions may not be used unless they are written legibly and contain no errors in punctuation, capitalization, or spelling.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

At mid-term or near the end of the school year, as students are preparing to take examinations in various subjects, the teacher brings in a version of Trivial Pursuit appropriate for children and allows students who already know how to play the game to explain it to their classmates. When the whole class understands the game, each student uses the previous semester's lessons as the basis for preparing five items in the history category, five in the science category, five in the literature category, and so on. If the school has more than one class at the same grade level, the items composed by all of the classes may be pooled. The teacher edits the items, eliminates duplicates, and makes enough copies for the whole class. After a few days for review and study, the class is divided into groups of four or five, and each group is assigned a category at random. Using the student-constructed items, each group plays Trivial Pursuit.

The students listen to a tape or recording of excerpts from H.G. Wells' The War of the Worlds. (Orson Welles' Mercury Theater version is available in many libraries.) After discussing the entire story, the students listen again to the description of the alien invaders. The teacher asks them how they think the invaders would have described the earthlings. After a brief class discussion of the importance of point of view, each student writes a description of the way he or she would look to an alien invader. The students proofread their essays for punctuation, capitalization, and spelling. This activity may be used in conjunction with a videotaped excerpt from a science fiction movie, such as the scene from Star Wars in which assorted aliens from different galaxies gather in a space pub. It may also be used as an introduction to a lesson on literary point of view; in this case, each student might rewrite the alien invasion scene in The War of the Worlds from the point of view of the invaders.

The teacher reads these essays and selects a few to be read aloud as the basis for a class discussion on the importance of point of view in depicting characters, selecting details, and expressing emotion in short stories. The students are asked to bring in a hat or other headgear. Each student creates a character based on the headgear; for example, a student who brings in a kerchief might create a grandmotherly figure, while a student who brings in a battered felt hat might create a tramp. The students name their characters and list appropriate likes and dislikes; favorite foods, places, and reading materials; and favorite expressions, such as "My goodness" or "What's comin' down?" Each student also determines his/her character's age, address, marital status, occupation, and goal in life. Finally, the students decide how their characters walk, speak, sit, and stand. Having listed all of these characteristics, each student composes a multi-paragraph biographical essay describing his/her character. After reading the student essays, the teacher divides the class into groups of three or four based on appropriate combinations of characters. The students in each group read each other's essays and decide where and under what circumstances their characters might meet. Each group composes a skit and performs it for the class, using appropriate gestures, dialects, and inflections and wearing their characters' hats. This activity may be adapted for use as an introduction to a literary work; in that case, the teacher assigns appropriate character types.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

After discussing a novel, a play, or several short stories and/or poems, the students think of questions that might be asked about this literature. The teacher makes and elicits comments about composing effective questions. Each question should, for example, be clearly worded, focused, and non-trivial. Each student composes ten questions that touch on several different elements of the novel, on all acts of the play, or on all of the short stories and/or poems. These questions are handed in on index cards, one question per card. The teacher reviews and edits the questions, eliminating duplicates, and sorts the cards into groups. If the work under review is a novel, the questions can be grouped under the headings of character, setting, plot, and so forth. Otherwise, the questions can be grouped according to the act of the play, the short story, or the poem they cover. The teacher divides the class into groups and assigns each group an area in which that group is to become expert. Each group must add at least ten questions to those already prepared, writing them on index cards. The group members compose answers to all of these questions, and every member of the group is responsible for being able to answer any question. The teacher collects the index cards and edits the new questions. During the next class period, each group is given ten minutes in which to function as a panel of experts. The teacher hands out the question cards to the other students and calls on them at random to ask their questions. Questions are directed to each member of the panel in turn; if the student whose turn it is to answer a question cannot do so, any member of the panel may volunteer. During the next class period, the teacher gives a test that includes as many student-composed questions as possible.

Each student checks off the audience and setting of his/her choice and passes the paper to the person seated at his/her right. This student looks at the audience and setting and writes a sentence beginning with the word "First." When all the "First" sentences have been written, each student passes the paper to the next person, who writes a sentence beginning with "Next." This process continues until all of the items have been completed. Each student reads a completed story aloud to the group, and the group selects the story whose language is best suited to its audience. These stories are read aloud to the whole class, which identifies the words and phrases in the story that show that the audience was being considered. The class then chooses another audience for each story and changes the language of each sentence to make it suitable for the new audience.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher asks, "If you were hiring a person for a position in a fast-food restaurant, what would you want to know about that person?" Using student replies, the teacher constructs a model application form on the chalkboard or on an overhead projector. The teacher distributes sample application forms to the class, the students compare these with the model they constructed, discussing the reasons for including or omitting various items. The class then reviews the appropriate vocabulary words, such as "references," "nationality," and "marital status." The students are urged not to give facetious replies (for example, "SEX: Whenever I can get it"). Finally, the students fill out the sample forms and exchange them to check for accuracy and completeness and for capitalization, punctuation, and spelling. This approach can also be used with other kinds of forms.

II. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher explains five elements of propaganda: transfer (for example, showing a happy couple near a new car), testimonial from a celebrity, bandwagon (i.e. everybody uses this), glittering generality, and plain folks appeal. Using videocassettes, records, and/or audio tapes, the teacher provides examples of television or radio advertising and asks the students to identify the propaganda elements used in each sample. The teacher also provides examples of political speeches using these same elements, such as Franklin Delano Roosevelt's first inaugural address and John Fitzgerald Kennedy's inaugural address. (Records and tapes of such speeches are available in most public libraries.) The students identify topics that lend themselves to propaganda and suggest sentences that use one or more propaganda elements. As a group, the class composes one or two five-sentence paragraphs of propaganda, and the teacher writes these on the chalkboard. The students break up into groups of four or five; each group is assigned a topic, and, using the model(s) on the chalkboard, the group composes a five-sentence piece of propaganda. Each group reads its work to the class, and the other students identify the propaganda elements and suggest improvements.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Each student brings in a mail-order catalog from a retail chain (for example, Sears, Montgomery Ward, Penney's). Each student is given a budget of $500.00 and assigned a real-life situation that requires certain purchases. Examples include a teenager purchasing clothes and shoes for a school year, an expectant mother preparing a layette, a person starting a small engine repair business, a teenager redecorating a bedroom, and a newly married couple buying what is needed for a kitchen in a small apartment. Remaining within the $500.00 budget, each student completes the catalog order form with catalog numbers, prices, and other required information. Each student writes a paragraph justifying his/her choice of purchases. The teacher puts a few student paragraphs on the overhead projector to stimulate a discussion of accuracy, completeness, logic, organization, punctuation, capitalization, and spelling. The students revise their paragraphs in the light of this discussion and hand them in for a final grade.

After the students have completed an activity that involves real-life situations, such as the activity described on Page , the teacher reviews the format of a business letter and provides drill sheets or workbook pages for review and practice. Each student develops an inquiry, complaint, or request based on his/her earlier project. For example, students who had completed the activity on Page might ask about the safety features of nursery furniture or kitchen utensils, or complain about the selection of clothing sizes, styles, or colors. Each student finds the appropriate address and writes a business letter on his/her topic. The teacher helps the students proofread and edit their punctuation, capitalization, and spelling.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher draws a simple design, such as a triangle in a square with two lines beside it, and staples it to a sheet of construction paper so that students cannot see the design through the back of the paper. A student volunteer describes the design, and the other students draw what the volunteer describes. No questions are permitted. At the conclusion of the activity, the students hold up their drawings and compare them with the original. The class discusses the need for specific directions, including size and position on the page. This activity may be used to introduce a lesson on following or writing clear directions.

The students view the first ten or fifteen minutes of a videotaped television drama that includes relatively simple characterization and plot development. In a class discussion, the students describe the characters' most important traits and relationships and predict the outcome of the plot. Following this practice session, the students view the first ten or fifteen minutes of a filmed or videotaped literary selection. Using the skills they practiced on the easier selection, the students discuss the characters, relationships, and probable outcome of the literary work. The students read the work silently or aloud, or the teacher reads it to them, before they view the rest of the film or videotape. During the followup discussion, the students consider the differences between the written and dramatized versions of the story.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

After a detailed discussion of Chaucer's Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, each student selects a character from the Prologue and identifies a present-day counterpart of that character. For example, the Wife of Bath might suggest a member of NOW, while the Pardoner might suggest a television evangelist. Each student writes twelve heroic couplets describing this modern character in Chaucerian terms. The couplets may be written in modern English or in Middle English (or some approximation thereof). After the students have completed this assignment, the class breaks up into groups. As far as possible, students who selected the same Chaucerian character work together. Each student reads his/her verses to the group, and the group selects one paper to be read aloud to the class. At the conclusion of each reading, the class discusses the human characteristics represented in the verses and the relationships between the modern character and the Chaucerian character.

Following a detailed discussion of mythological gods and heroes, each student selects one of these characters and places him/her in a modern milieu, such as a shopping mall or a Burger King. The teacher leads a discussion on the ways in which the personalities of the gods and heroes are depicted in these papers. After reading the papers, the teacher also discusses areas of capitalization, punctuation, spelling, and grammatical usage in which the students seem weak. The students exchange papers or correct their own papers following this discussion.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

As an introduction to Hamlet, students participate in extemporaneous improvisations designed to simulate elements of the plot. The class is divided into groups of four, and the desks are moved to provide a central acting area. Each individual is given a 3 X 5 card containing a thumbnail sketch of his/her part.

Sample assignments:
1. Female, no mother, involved with an older man
2. College student, brother of #1
3. Friend of female #1
4. Father of #1 and #2, widower
For five minutes, the groups consider who their characters are and think about a situational problem assigned by the teacher.

Sample problem:

Friend (#3) enters upset at having heard a nasty rumor about girl (#1) and tells her in front of her family.

Each member of the group should take part in the scene, and each scene should take 3-5 minutes. Following this activity, the class lists traits they have inferred about each character from what the performers said and did.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

To prepare students to read a novel that contains autobiographical elements, such as Chaim Potok's The Chosen, Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn, or Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar, the teacher tells the class about an important aspect of the author's life. This brief lecture may include excerpts from letters, journals, or biographies. The class discusses the importance of the events described by the teacher and suggests ways in which these events might have affected the author. Each student then writes a fictionalized version of these events, paying particular attention to consistency of character, tone, and mood. After reading these stories, the teacher asks a few students to read their stories aloud as the basis for a class discussion of the ways in which autobiographical elements can be adapted to fiction. The students revise their capitalization, punctuation, spelling, grammar, and word choice and hand the papers in for a final grade. As the students read the novel, the teacher reminds them of this discussion and assigns students to research and report on other aspects of the author's life that are relevant to the novel.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher asks the students to imagine that they have been asleep for one hundred years or that they have travelled in a time machine from the nineteenth century. The class discusses briefly what life was like a century ago with regard to transportation, entertainment, and dress. The teacher may illustrate this part of the lesson with slides or pictures. The teacher then holds up a simple modern object, such as a radio, a pencil sharpener, or a hair dryer, and asks the students to describe this object as if they had never seen anything like it before, and to guess its use. The teacher holds up another such object and asks the students to write a description of it, using the preceding discussion as a model. When the students have completed this assignment, they form small groups, pass their papers around, and write a group essay combining the best features of their individual papers. Each group reads its essay to the class. This activity may be used to prepare students to read literature dealing with time travel, such as H. G. Wells' The Time Machine, or with long-term sleepers, such as Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle."

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The class listens to a recorded version of a tall tale, such as Twain's "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" or a Paul Bunyan story. The teacher defines six elements of effective storytelling: selection of material, visualization, language, realism, suspense, and vocal inflection. The students provide examples of each element from the story they have heard and from other sources. While listening to another story, the students take notes on the six elements in preparation for a brief class discussion. The students then identify four or five topics for tall tales dealing with school activities, after-school jobs, social events, and other aspects of their lives, and the teacher lists these topics on the chalkboard. The students focus on one of these topics and suggest ideas for developing a tall tale.

Using the chalkboard or an overhead projector, the teacher writes the story as it evolves from the class discussion. Following this discussion, the class is divided into small groups and, using the story developed by the whole class as a model, each group writes a tall tale based on one of the topics listed on the chalkboard. The teacher grades the completed tales and suggests revisions. Each group presents its revised tale to the class, and each member of the group participates in the oral reading in some way; for example, the group members may take turns reading, or one student may read the expository sections while other students read the various characters' dialogue. The class evaluation of each presentation is based on the six elements of storytelling defined at the beginning of the lesson.

After reading and discussing several works of literature, the class is divided into groups of four or five students. Each group is assigned a character from one of the literary works the class has read. The group composes a speech in which the character expresses ideas and attitudes that suggest his/her identity. The speech should employ language that is appropriate for that character to use, but it should not include references to specific events that would disclose the character’s identity too easily. One student from each group reads the speech to the class, and the other students guess the identity of the character and identify the clues contained in the speech. This activity may be used to review for a test on a unit of literature.

The teacher divides the class into groups of four or five and gives each group a large envelope containing a database (articles, editorials, newspaper clippings, charts, pictures, cartoons, or letters to the editor) on a particular topic. Topics may include drugs in athletics, seat belt laws, and teenage drunk driving. (The teacher may prefer to give the students in each group enough lead time to bring in such information on their own.) The students read the information in their packets and study the ideas presented on their topic, noting similarities and differences in the information. After studying this material, each student in the group draws a conclusion based on the database information and develops this conclusion into a multiple paragraph essay, using the database material as supporting information. For purposes of comparison, the teacher may request that one student in each group write on the topic without having read the database. The students in each group evaluate each other's work for accuracy, specificity, and logic. They also proofread for spelling, diction, usage, capitalization, and punctuation. Each student revises his/her essay and reads it aloud to the group for final comments before handing it in for a grade. This activity may be used as an introduction to report writing. In the next phase of the unit, students go to the library to collect their own data.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher explains two headings that are commonly found in business and technical reports: statement of the problem and proposed solution. During a brief class discussion, the students consider aspects of their school and community that could be improved. Examples might include slow lunch lines; library policies, hours, or holdings; school bus routes or hours; or policies or hours at a local movie, swimming pool, or arcade. Each student selects a topic and writes a description of the problem and a proposed solution, including time and cost factors. The students select only topics on which the necessary information is available. One or two volunteers read their papers aloud, and the class discusses and evaluates the accuracy and completeness of the description of the problem and discusses the strong points and the weak points of the proposed solutions. The students exchange papers and each student writes a paragraph arguing against the proposed solution in the paper that he/she is reading. If possible, more than one student reviews each paper. The original writer writes a reply to the other students' objections and/or modifies the proposed solution. Each student then writes a final report, including an accurate and specific statement of the problem, a proposed solution, and a rationale for the proposed solution that takes possible objections into account. The teacher evaluates the students' work on the basis of content, tone, diction, usage, spelling, punctuation, and capitalization. Where appropriate, students may write a cover letter, using the business letter format they learned at an earlier grade level, and send the report to the appropriate person or organization.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The teacher reads aloud items from the annual list of "doublespeak" published by the National Council of Teachers of English. Considering such expressions as "pre-dawn vertical insertion," meaning "paratroop invasion in the middle of the night," the students infer the meaning of the word "euphemism" and supply examples of euphemisms they hear in commercials and news reports. The students list ideas or objects that they consider objectionable, such as homework and curfew, and make up euphemisms for these terms. The students then work in groups of four or five to write reasonably coherent paragraphs using at least one euphemism in each sentence. A member of each group reads the group's paragraph to the class, asking the other students to interpret the euphemisms sentence by sentence. Finally, the class discusses the possible uses and misuses of euphemisms. This activity may be used as an introduction to a literary work that employs euphemisms, such as George Orwell's 1984 or Aldous Huxley's Brave New World.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Following class discussions and worksheet practice on organizing facts and selecting appropriate details, each student selects a vacation destination in the United States and goes to a travel agency or an AAA office to pick up brochures relating to that destination. The students plan all the necessary arrangements for a three-week vacation, such as transportation, baggage handling, accommodations, meals, and travelers' checks. The students also plan travel wardrobes, sightseeing itineraries, and budgets. Each student writes a multi-paragraph procedure paper describing these plans in detail. The paper should include such information as specific flight or train numbers and times, hotel names and rates, and sightseeing itineraries. The students should have enough lead time to write to the appropriate Chamber of Commerce or Tourist Bureau for free information. Papers receive a grade for content (accuracy and completeness) and a separate grade for correct capitalization, punctuation, and spelling. Mistakes in areas of language that have already been discussed in class are considered especially serious. Students whose language grade is below a B use grammar handbooks and dictionaries to make corrections. They may consult other students or the teacher only after they have made reasonable efforts to find the answers independently.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

The students complete a research activity that involves real-life situations, such as the activity described on Page . Each student develops an inquiry, request, or complaint based on what he or she has learned in the course of the research activity. Using the chalkboard or an overhead projector, the teacher reviews the format of a business letter, which should have been introduced in a previous grade. The teacher also provides drill sheets or workbook pages for student practice. Each student writes a letter embodying his or her inquiry, request, or complaint. The students exchange letters to proofread for capitalization, punctuation, spelling, grammar, and word choice, and the teacher reviews the letters and grades them. Finally, the students address envelopes and mail their letters. When replies arrive, they may be shared with the class.

III. DESCRIPTION OF ACTIVITY

Students are given a sample essay test and are asked to list steps they could use to prepare for this test, such as looking over lecture notes and textbook assignments; developing some of their own essay questions, outlining responses to these questions, and memorizing the outlines; using catch phrases; and practicing writing an essay within a specific time limit. Students write sample essay questions and identify key words, such as "compare," "evaluate," "prove," "relate," "state," "illustrate," and "discuss." The teacher identifies three common errors found in students' essays: padding, weak development, and choppy sentences. The class discusses suggestions for dealing with these errors, such as sticking to the point, using details to support major points, and using transitions. Each student writes an essay discussing the methods that can be used to write well-organized and complete answers to essay questions. Each student also writes an essay explaining the five steps in preparing for an essay exam. These essays are graded for content and for correct capitalization, punctuation, spelling, and grammatical usage.

Academic Learning Time

According to David Berliner, a prominent researcher who participated in a widely cited study of teachers' use of instructional time, Academic Learning Time is composed of three elements: Allocated Time, Engaged Time, and Success Rate.

Allocated Time is the amount of time assigned to teaching a subject. For example, an elementary school teacher might teach reading for 100 minutes each day and social studies for 60 minutes three times a week.

Engaged Time is that portion of Allocated Time in which students' minds are "in gear," focused on the teacher's objectives.

Success Rate means that students must not only be engaged in learning activities, but must also experience success with academic tasks valued by the educational system.

Classroom Organization and Management

Before the School Year Begins

Determine expected student behaviors with regard to the use of classroom space and of other areas of the school; procedures for whole group activities; procedures for small group or reading group activities; and procedures for beginning and ending the school day, going to recess, and dealing with interruptions and delays. Translate these expectations into a reasonable number of rules and post them where the students can see them easily.
Identify consequences for appropriate and inappropriate behavior.

During the School Year

Set aside time the first day for a discussion of rules.

Teach procedures as systematically as learning objectives.

Teach procedures as they are needed.

Involve students in easy tasks that promote a high degree of success during the first few days.

Use simple procedures and a whole-group format during the first few days.

Assume that students do not know how to perform a procedure after one trial.

Continually monitor student behavior.

INFLUENCES ON STUDENT BEHAVIOR

Strategies for Encouragement

Accept students as unique individuals, without qualification.

Give students confidence, encouraging them to not be afraid of new learning experiences.

Emphasize the positive.

Encourage students to respect themselves and others.

Teach students to evaluate themselves and their own behavior.

Demonstrate genuine concern for students.

Effective Teaching Practices

Establish and communicate clear, simple rules and consequences early in the year and apply them firmly and consistently.

Teach students appropriate behavior and consequences of misbehavior at the beginning of the year.
Be sure that parents are aware of rules and consequences.

Stop potential problems through low profile interventions, such as eye contact, physical proximity, use of students names, and statements of rules.

Use incentive systems to increase positive behavior.

Inform students of schoolwide rules governing behavior.

Use peer observation as a help in becoming aware of interactions with students and the effects of those interactions.

TEACHER EXPECTATIONS

Teachers need to consider the effects of their expectations for high and low achieving students, their proximity to students, the workloads they assign, the response time they allow, the amount and kind of delving they do after an incorrect or incomplete student response, the amount and kind of positive and negative feedback they provide.

LESSON DESIGN AND INSTRUCTIONAL DELIVERY

Planning/Diagnosis

Evaluate the difficulty of the content to be taught.

List the ways in which students might learn this content.

Consider relevant physical, social, and psychological factors.

Estimate the amount of time and effort required of students and teacher.
Mind Set Strategies

Have the students review the main ideas of yesterday's lesson.
Discuss the objectives of today's lesson.
Go through a quick-paced drill of previously taught information.
Read an interesting short story or poem that relates to the lesson.
Hand out a cartoon that leads into the lesson.
Place a "brain teaser" on the chalkboard.

Clarifying Objectives/Expectations

Make objective(s) and purpose(s) of the lesson clear to the students.
Establish, discuss, and clarify expectations.
Encourage students to strive for success without intimidation.

Deliver the Lesson

Be sure that facts and concepts are accurate.
Maintain a close relationship between activities.
Present the lesson in logical and manageable parts.
Be sure that oral and written vocabulary is appropriate.
Be sure that the materials used are at the appropriate level of difficulty.
Use illustrations and examples to emphasize and clarify critical factors.
Maintain a pleasant and supportive atmosphere.
Present the lesson with enthusiasm.
Provide opportunities for all students to experience success and to gain recognition.

Wherever possible, use activities that are related to the real-life experiences and interests of students.

Draw parallels between previous lessons and current lessons.

Be sure that information is adequately sorted, labeled and classified.

Encourage students to arrive at conclusions and generalizations.

Providing Guided Practice

Encourage student response and use it as a basis for reinforcement or reteaching.

Maximize students' engaged time.

Check student understanding before proceeding to the next step.

Ask questions at different levels of difficulty and abstraction.

Use review techniques that foster retention and recall.

Be sure that students receive positive feedback in addition to corrective action when needed.

Give students the opportunity to refocus, reflect on, and internalize content.

Give students the opportunity to demonstrate new skills and knowledge through performance and/or by verbalizing what they have learned.

Providing Independent Practice

Design independent assignments that require students to apply newly learned material to the solution of problems.

Be sure that independent assignments are evaluated and given constructive criticism.

Hold students accountable for the completion of independent assignments.

Taken from Delaware Effective Training Modules: An Overview (1986)

Adams and Biddle found that physical placement in the classroom affected the extent of pupil participation. "Pupils up and down the center line of the classroom are the ones who are most likely to join in the discussion, and the ones the teacher is most likely to talk to. Others away from the center line are much less likely to speak or be spoken to."

The One Minute Praising works well when you praise people immediately, tell people specifically what they did right, tell people how good you feel about what they did right, encourage them to do more of the same, and shake hands or touch people in a way that makes it clear that you support their success.

Brophy and Good used the term "latency" for the length of time that a teacher waits when a child does not immediately begin to give an answer to a question. "Long latencies would suggest a confidence in the child and a willingness to wait for him to respond." The response opportunity may be sustained by waiting or may be terminated by the teacher asking another child or supplying the answer.

Clark and Walberg reported a number of studies involving the use of praise and other rewards with low achieving students. Deliberate use of praise as a reinforcement was shown to increase academic achievement.

One interesting finding was that the teachers who used praise in this manner subsequently expressed more favorable attitudes toward the student with whom they had used this form of reinforcement.

Edmonds found that teachers in ineffective schools prefer to question the children they predict are most likely to know the answers. Other children decide the teacher does not expect them to know as much; as a result, they are less likely to do their homework and master lessons.

Teachers were asked to evaluate essays written by fifth-grade students. False information about the ability of the students was given to the teachers. Teachers from urban schools invariably rated higher the essays of children whom they had been told were bright.

If all questions asked by teachers can be answered immediately, no latencies will occur. Flanders' studies suggested that most teacher questions require little more than simple recall on the part of the student. "The majority of the questions asked by the teacher, who has been lecturing, are sufficiently narrow that they can be answered by a student in less than three seconds."

Based on efforts at the University of Maryland Reading Clinic to increase the amount of wait time, Gambrell suggested several steps for teachers to consider: silently count up to five seconds after asking a question, tell students that wait time will be extended, and begin slowly.

Good and Brophy used their observation schedule to examine teacher interaction with children perceived as high and low achievers in four first-grade classrooms. Children perceived as low achievers received fewer reading turns in reading groups, fewer opportunities to answer open and direct questions, and fewer opportunities to make recitations. They were also less apt to call out answers. Children perceived by the teacher as high achievers received more praise and less criticism than children perceived as low achievers. Even when a low child gave the right answer, he was less likely to be praised than a high child who had answered correctly.

When children perceived as high achievers experienced difficulty, the teacher repeated or rephrased the question or gave a clue 67% of the time. They gave the answer or allowed another child to answer 33% of the time. For the children perceived as low achievers, the teacher provided help only 38% of the time and terminated the response opportunity 62% of the time.

Good and Brophy replicated a study by Siberman of the differential behavior of teachers toward children for whom they felt attachment (If you could keep on student another year for the sheer joy of it, whom would you pick?), concern (If you could devote all your attention to a child who concerns you a great deal, whom would you pick?), indifference (If a parent were to drop in unannounced for a conference, which child would you be least prepared to talk about?) and rejection (If your class were to be reduced by a few children, which would you have removed?).

"Attachment" students generally conformed to institutional norms and knew the right answers. These students received more praise than others but less process feedback, probably because teachers do not feel they need it. "Concern" students received the most process feedback, and the teachers were most apt to stay with these children when they had difficulty reading or answering a question. "Indifference" students tended to avoid the teacher, and the teacher initiated fewer contacts with them. When contacts did occur, the teachers provided high rates of process feedback. "Rejection" students were less apt to be given individual help or to be called upon, and more apt to be criticized. Teachers often failed to respond to all answers or to give them any feedback after their reading turns.

In their study of teacher interaction with children for whom high and low expectations were held, Good and Brophy found striking differences in the teachers' reactions to children's responses. Teachers failed to react in any way to a child's response to a question in 3% of the interactions with high expectancy children, but this occurred in 18% of the interactions with low expectancy children.

Good and Brophy also found that "Even though the highs gave many more right answers and fewer wrong ones than the lows, they were twice as likely to receive praise for a correct response and only one-third as likely to receive criticism for an incorrect response."

Horn asked teachers in 229 classrooms to rank their children in quartiles by ability. He then examined the distribution or response opportunities among these ability groups. The highest quartile did about 40% more reciting than the lowest quartile. This disparity increased with grade level, so that the highest quartile in high school did almost twice as much reciting as the lowest.

Hurlock divided 108 fourth-graders into four groups (praised, reproved, ignored, and control) of equivalent performance on an arithmetic test. The children were tested for four successive days. After each test, the praised group was verbally commended for its performance and the reproved group was criticized, while the ignored group observed this but were given no feedback about their own performance.

The praised children were the only group that showed gains in excess of those due to practice (as measured by the control group). The scores of both boys and girls increased in the praised group, but girls' increased slightly more. After the first administration of reproof, the boys did slightly better than following praise and the girls slightly worse. With continued use, reproof lost its effectiveness. The ignored children showed less improvement the longer they were ignored. The groups were further divided into thirds by ability. The low ability students were the most responsive of the three groups to praise, while the highs were the most responsive to reproof.

Teachers must give respect if they want to receive it, they must expect success to help students achieve it, and they must foster student leadership if they want students to learn decision-making skills.

Murphy et al. suggested that one way for teachers to establish "academic press" in their classrooms is to interact with all students in a similar manner. Teachers should not call on some students and leave out others. They should prompt all students to correct or improve responses. Praise should be given when it is deserved.

When teachers deliberately praised low ability students, these students did as well as high ability students in tasks involving mechanical skills. The control group did less well.

Reissman suggested that it is more difficult for the disadvantaged child to volunteer. Therefore, teachers should make special efforts to involve such children.

Reissman regarded praise as a crucial strategy in teaching the group of children he called "culturally deprived" or "disadvantaged." "Teachers should praise the disadvantaged child for every inch of progress because of his fear of failure which is a roadblock to his learning."

Rist observed one kindergarten class over an entire year. Early in the year, the children were placed in three groups. The group which was comprised of students for whom the teacher held high expectations received less than a third of the number of rebukes directed toward children for whom the teacher held low expectations. The teacher's expectations appeared to be based on socio-economic considerations rather than on evidence of learning ability.
Rist, Ray C. "Student Social Class and Teacher Expectations: The Self-Fulfilling Prophecy in Ghetto Education," Harvard Educational

Rist observed the same group of children in kindergarten, first, and second grades in an attempt to discover how teacher expectancies are formed. He concluded that teacher evaluation commenced immediately upon the child's enrollment in kindergarten and that the teacher behaved differentially in terms of that evaluation. "Within a few days, only a certain group of children were continually being called on to lead the class in the Pledge of Allegiance, read the weather calendar, show and tell, etc." Throughout the three years, the same group of children enjoyed the preponderance of classroom verbal interaction with the teachers.

Rist also reported that the three teachers in his study communicated with and listened to the children for whom they held high expectations almost to the exclusion of the students for whom they held low expectations. However, Rist discovered in visiting the children's homes that the low-expectancy children were learning from listening to the teacher and to the high-expectancy pupils, and by discussing what they learned among themselves and at home. Yet the teacher thought the low-expectancy children "had no idea of what was going on in the classroom." Rist concluded that the teacher inhibited the children from verbalizing what they had learned and so assumed they had learned nothing.

The children for whom the teachers held high expectations frequently belittled the low-expectancy students. The direction of belittlement was never reversed. Rist's description of the classroom interaction leaves little doubt as to the effects of the courtesy behavior modeled by the teacher toward the low-expectancy students.

Rosenshine, Barak. Teaching Behaviors and Student Achievement. London:

Rosenshine reviewed research based on classroom observations relating specific teaching behaviors to the academic achievement of children.
Ten of the studies reviewed distinguished between mild criticism (indicating that a child's answer is incorrect) and stronger criticism. He found no evidence in the 10 studies that a teacher should avoid telling a child that he/she is wrong. However, teachers who use stronger criticism frequently have classes with low achievement rates in most subject areas.

Rowe reported that teachers waited significantly less time for answers from their less capable students than from their more capable students. Therefore, if the less able were not to lose their response opportunity, they had to respond much more quickly than higher achieving students.

Rowe found the mean wait time to be one second after the teacher asked a question. If a student did not respond in one second, the teacher either repeated or rephrased the question, asked another question, or called on another student.

After teachers had been trained to increase their wait time to three to five seconds, Rowe's analysis of over 900 tapes of these teachers showed increased length of student responses; increased number of unsolicited appropriate responses; decreased number of failures to respond; increased student confidence in responding; increased speculative thinking; decreased teacher-centered teaching and increased student-student interaction; more student-provided evidence preceding or following inference statements; an increased number of student questions; increased contributions from slow students; and increased variety of student structuring, soliciting, and reacting moves.
