This collection of poems, short fiction, and essays on teaching writing, 25 pieces in all, are personal reflections and excerpts from the work of writers and writing teachers. These works, reflecting diverse approaches to teaching, are intended to help writers with what and how they write and what and how they teach. (MS)
THE POINT
Where Teaching & Writing Intersect
Edited by Nancy Larson Shapiro & Ron Padgett
THE POINT

Where Teaching & Writing Intersect
THE POINT

Where Teaching & Writing Intersect

Edited by Nancy Larson Shapiro & Ron Padgett

Teachers&Writers
New York
Acknowledgements

In addition to funds from the New York State Council on the Arts and the National Endowment for the Arts, Teachers & Writers Collaborative's work has been supported by the many schools in the New York City area that have sponsored residencies by writers and artists. T&W has been able to survive and grow because of funding from foundations, corporations, and other agencies over the last 15 years. We sincerely thank the following: American Airlines, American Broadcasting Companies, American Stock Exchange, AT&T Long Lines, Vincent Astor Foundation, Atari Institute for Educational Action Research, Avon Products Foundation, Bankers Trust Company, Chase Manhattan Bank, CBS/Broadcast Group, Chemical Bank, Citibank, Consolidated Edison, Equitable Life Assurance Society, Exxon Education Foundation, Ford Foundation, Edward W. Hazen Foundation, Heckscher Foundation for Children, International Paper Company Foundation, Kulchur Foundation, Mobil Foundation, Morgan Guaranty Trust Company, National Broadcasting Company, New York City Department of Cultural Affairs/Arts Connection—Arts Exposure, New York Community Trust, New York Council for the Humanities, New York Foundation, New York Foundation for the Arts, New York Times Company Foundation, Newsweek, Henry Nias Foundation, Overseas Shipholding Group, J.C. Penney Company, Ellis L. Phillips Foundation, RCA, Helena Rubinstein Foundation, Scherman Foundation, Surdna Foundation, and Variety Club of New York. We also thank our many individual contributors and members.
Contents

<table> <thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Preface</td>
<td>xi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neil Baldwin</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barbara Barack</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jonathan Baumbach</td>
<td>8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judith Binder</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carole Bovoso</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anne Chernier</td>
<td>25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jack Collom</td>
<td>29</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barbara Danish</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Richard Elman</td>
<td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Harry Greenberg</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wendy Jones</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kenneth Koch</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Phillip Lopate</td>
<td>62</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dick Lourie</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Clarence Major</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Miguel Ortiz</td>
<td>80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abiodun Oyewole</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ron Padgett</td>
<td>91</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grace Paley</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Richard Perry</td>
<td>101</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Armand Schwerner</td>
<td>107</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meredith Sue Willis</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jeff Wright</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bill Zavatsky</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alan Ziegler</td>
<td>128</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Contributors</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>
This collection of poems, short fiction, and essays on teaching writing came out of a conversation that Ron Padgett and I began about a year ago and that still continues. We have been mulling over the sometimes subtle, sometimes startling influences writers and their students have on each other. We've also been trying to pin down precisely what happens to the writing (of writers and students) as a result of these influences. Finally, we've been discussing Teachers & Writers Collaborative--now over 15 years old--attempting to clarify what aspects of the organization's approach to teaching writing distinguish us and define the roles we play in the literary and educational communities.

A group of writers and educators formed the Collaborative originally as one remedy to the dismal state of writing in the schools. Their idea was to send writers into classrooms to get kids involved in serious and playful imaginative writing. They also wanted to show students--who had no experience with or understanding of contemporary literature--that "real" writers write from their own personal experiences and about things that matter to them. Too often, children's writing had been preordained by the expectations and limitations set by textbook publishers. T&W writers set out to find and nurture children's "authentic" voices.

What has come down to us from those early years is a continuing concern for what the students are trying to say--that is, for the meaning struggling to come through even when the mechanics need work. T&W writers still prod and coax their students: show us, really show, what you think, feel, dream, in your own words, yes, but also in language you reach for, trying to get the precise word, the exact image, the unexpected idea. In short, the writers bring to their teaching the same concerns they have when they write.

The writers also teach motivational techniques they have found work for them. T&W's publications like The Whole Word Catalogue 1 and 2 prove that these strategies can be passed along to others. But an outline of methods provides only the bare bones of what happens between teacher and students. Fortunately, many T&W writers have also kept diaries and done in-depth articles to give us a meatier view of their teaching. Not much has been written, however, on the connections between teaching and writing and the impact these links have on the writing itself. That's why we commissioned these essays.

The essays we present here take off in a number of directions. Some capture a special time when a writer and student came up against—and resolved—similar artistic problems. Others, more general, focus on the surprising influence teaching has had on the style or subject matter of a writer's work. Together these essays and writings help us get closer to something we might call aesthetic preference. This elusive element influences all aspects of the writers' work: what and how they write and what and how they teach. The literary models brought to class, the assignments given, the elements of language emphasized, the attitudes embodied in the writer, all these affect what students finally put down on paper. One of Kenneth Koch's students wrote, "I was born nowhere / And I live in a tree / I never leave my tree / It is very crowded / I am stacked up right against a bird" (see page 57). Would that stunning last line come out the same way with a different teacher? For each writer, of course, aesthetic preferences vary vastly and wonderfully. It is this intensely personal approach to teaching that is the hallmark of the Collaborative.
Although not all T&W writers are represented here—that would result in an enormous tome—we do have an excellent cross-section of writers who have built T&W over the years. Their essays reaffirm the original idea of the Collaborative: that the writers teach not just the act of writing but also the art of writing. That's the point of their 15 years of work.

--Nancy Larson Shapiro
Brenda was the only person in room 208 of LaSalle High School when I walked in that chilly morning in March ten years ago to begin teaching the first writing residency of my career. She was standing with her back to me, gazing out the window through dusty slats of Venetian blinds. The traffic hissed by along busy Niagara Falls Boulevard.

"I like to come here early, before the other kids," she explained, before I could say anything. "I like to have time to settle my thoughts. And we're going to write poetry, right? I figure it's important to be calm and collected before we start."

Nervous, unaccustomed to the company of people half my age, I stood next to her, shared her view of the world at that moment. It wasn't too lovely, but the rain helped soften the seemingly endless, bleak succession of fast-food outlets, steak houses, department stores with names like K-Mart and Two Guys, gas stations, and more gas stations.

"You see that place, Mr. Baldwin?" Brenda pointed directly across the highway at a desolate, abandoned lot, the blacktop blackened by rain. "That was the Starlite Drive-In Theatre. Every time I see it, I feel sad.... That was where my boyfriend Jeff and I had our last date, before we broke up last year, and it's been closed ever since. When I see it, I can't help thinking of him...."

"But you come in here every day and make sure to look at it--so it can't bother you too much, can it?"

She reflected for a moment. "Well, I feel sad, but it's a nice kind of sad, you know? It's kind of...kind of...."

"Nostalgic," I filled in, and sensing she wanted me to explain but didn't want to ask me, I went on, "a bittersweet, homesick feeling for the past, longing for the good old days...."

The classroom door banged open, and the rest of the students in second period English streamed in, quickly, noisily. Despite ourselves, Brenda and I exchanged disappointed looks. She took her seat in the front row, folded her hands in front of her on the desk, and waited.

I don't remember how that first class went. But on the long drive back to my home in Buffalo, I couldn't stop thinking about our tête-à-tête.

Here I was, with my newly-minted Ph D, fresh from four years of graduate school, having written a long, exhaustive dissertation on William Carlos
Williams. From those intensive years of study, I had taken one overriding principle: the world closest to hand, the local, was the inspiration that fuelled the imagination to make poems. Upon that conviction, Williams built a lifetime of work, and a multifaceted epic, Paterson. It made a lot of sense to me, theoretically.

But, no, I did not take that ideology into the classroom with me. Instead, I had been determined to rely upon traditional, formal lessons in "form": sonnet, haiku, sestina. A novice teacher, I was desperate for a set pattern.

In one brief conversation, a ninth-grader changed all that. The change began with my own poem, composed in a reverie-filled frame of mind while driving. When I got to my apartment, I dashed into the study, and the lines came, rat-a-tat-tat.

When I teach, I value above all else, the children's familiarity with family, friends, neighborhoods, memories, and dreams. This is what we write about, this is how we construct a curriculum together, out of the materials of their important--never common--lives.
I was wondering at the rhythmic crashing sound coming from the apartment above in the daytime. Too huge for sex, too regular for an accident. Tiny cracks formed in the ceiling's plaster. I'd be taking a nap or watching "Ryan's Hope"—and bam. It wasn't something you could get used to, like a refrigerator hum, or something admirable, like thunder. It was something that could drive you nuts. And in those days, a year-and-a-half ago, it didn't look like it'd take much.

I tried to visualize what I heard. Maybe it was someone with an artificial leg made of lead, dropped on the floor as he worked a slow and painful way to the refrigerator for a beer. Maybe it was an invalid falling out of bed. Maybe someone was trying to take apart the bathtub. These images didn't fit in with the unassuming family—mother, father, three kids—I saw troop up and down the stairs. They were a little frayed at the edges, but then in this building that was doing pretty good, most people here weren't so much frayed as tattered. I know I was. I'd be sitting at home with my tv, and there'd be this sledgehammer on my head.

Finally one day, after forty-five minutes of this, I couldn't bear it. Shy as a new bride, I went up the stairs and knocked on their door. The mother opened up, a tired face, and behind her two of her children, small ones. They were sitting on the floor, facing each other. As I stood there, with great delight they struggled to their feet, lifted between them—and dropped—a bowling ball. Then they paused to stare at the stranger. I wasn't that interesting.

They sat again. The smaller one, maybe five, stood up alone now, strained, and raised the ball a few inches by himself. I braced myself. It crashed. The mother didn't flinch. Behind her, the hallway stretched out to the living room. The whole floor was covered with dents.

"Yes?" she said. I'd been silent for a number of seconds.

"It's about that," I said.
Her face didn't change.
"About the bowling ball," I continued. "Why do you let them drop it?" My voice was as ordinary as possible.

But it was as if I'd tossed a match into her face. "Why shouldn't I?" Her fatigue instantly rearranged itself into anger. "It keeps them away from television. And what's it your business, anyway?"

Going back downstairs, I decided it was time to get a job.

It looked like the Midwest with a nearby ocean. On an endless plain dotted with occasional houses and shacks the subway--here an elevated--ran a lonesome straight line from horizon to horizon. Half a mile's brisk walk down a cracked asphalt street led me to the second-highest structure in the landscape: a proper New York city three-story brick elementary school. The highest structure--about a mile away--was a family of high-rises, whose population of children trooped to this school set in grand windy isolation.

Because I was as new to teaching as I was to Far Rockaway, I walked to the school simmering with stage fright. My best urbane manners got me past the school guard, through the office, to the handshake with the principal, and a tour down the hallway to the door of the first class I ever taught. Though, as I wrote in my notes that evening, "the fear could have knocked me down," at least, standing at the brink of this sixth-grade classroom, I had a plan.

A plan, I'd found, was not all that easy to hatch. How convey in public the private act of writing? Sweating it out the night before, I'd fallen back on my writer's instinct (as well as the spirit of a couple T&W meetings I'd already attended) to approach teaching the same way I'd approach writing: whatever is a live issue for me will generate my liveliest presentation—whether it's to a reading public or a roomful of children.

In fiction and in journalism—as well as in my person—I am unabashedly a nosy individual. I tend to be proud of this the way some people are proud of their discretion. I walk around in life asking people how they know what they think they know. And then I go to intricate lengths extrapolating from this a written fabric of my own making.

A pristine form of this method is the riddle. Looking at the thirty or so eleven-year-olds looking back at me, I began. "Today, I woke up, went into the kitchen, poured something into a glass. This liquid was cold and bitter and went down my throat like a spear. What was I drinking?"

It didn't take many guesses to hit on orange juice. "But," a girl said. "It could have been grapefruit juice instead."

"Or iced coffee," someone else said.

"You're right. My description isn't very good. How could it be better, without making it easy, giving it all away?"

The class elaborated many ways to describe the act and feeling of drinking orange juice. I wrote the result on the board: a long, metaphor-laden, improbably detailed description of an everyday experience. And the careful reader, after weighing and sifting all this observation, would have to deduce orang' juice.

We ran through one c., two more out loud--a brother snoring in bed, and so forth. And then we switched to paper. "Remember," I coached, "you're going to read these out loud, so make them good and hard to guess."

While they wrote I allowed myself some exhilaration. Too bad, I thought, it's harder to get myself to write than it is to get these kids working. One piece of writing in this first class, by Derrick Jordan, went beyond the riddle form entirely, to pose, like all good prose, many subtle questions:

"I heard weird noises downstairs in the living room, falling boxes and sounds of dropping plates. Then I heard deep, deep voices whispering. And all of sudden loud screams in the other room. My hands were trembling, my eyes stuck in, out, feel paralyzed, can't move a muscle. Seeing bags being thrown around man in blue suit. Beating, the heavy voice men take him in a blue and white car. And then it was over."
FIRST NIGHT

I am urinating when my father, an angry look on his face, comes into the bathroom. His standing behind me—I can feel the heat of his impatience—impedes me to a trickle. A watched urination can be an infinite drag. "Save some for a rainy day," he says, jiggling the change in his pocket. I leave unfinished, having to brush shoulders with him to get to the sink. His face the color of iodine, swollen and bruised. Why in God's name, I think, didn't I lock the fucking door?

Washing my hands while he goes. I can't distinguish the running faucet from the going father. "It's all yours," I say. But then he is also through and facing me. He puts his large hand on my shoulder. "Why did you tell the police we wanted to kill you?" "I didn't," I say. "It wasn't me." I can see from his eyes that he doesn't believe me. "Go down and eat," he says gruffly. "Mother is waiting."

On the black stairs going down, I remember they are trying to poison me. My mother, slaving over the stove, is wearing a nurse's mask to keep her germs off the food. And yellow rubber gloves because her hands, she says, are allergic to water. The combination strikes me as sinister.

"I'm not hungry," I tell her. "I'm going out if you don't mind to stretch my legs."

"I made what you like," she whispers through the mask, "your favorite. I gave you the last of the Cuban bananas. You know how dear those are. Dad will be beside himself when he finds out."

At my place is a bowl of soggy Rice Krispies with slices of rotten bananas on top. I hate cold cereal, which she ought to know by now.
It's his favorite, his. When she's not looking I scrape the stuff into the garbage, smacking my lips to give the illusion of eating.

"Keep your mouth closed when you chew," she says, pulling at her gloves. "Only pigs and potters eat with their mouths open."

We listen to my father coming down the steps. He has a heavy walk. Fifty percent of his weight, he once told me—a special family characteristic—was in his feet.

"You're the only one in the family who's not fussy about eating," she says in a voice loud enough for the neighbors to hear. "If it weren't for my little man, all my culinary gifts would be as nothing."

My father is still clumping down the stairs. What's taking him so long? "If he smells the bananas on your breath," she says, "he'll have a fit. You know how he loves those Cuban bananas."

I am thinking of hiding in the oven when for no apparent reason she clamps a rubber-gloved hand over my mouth. Her intentions are not clear to me. I have the sense that the woman posing as my mother is the murderer.

"If you don't tell him I gave you the bananas, I won't tell him that you ate them. Is it a deal?"

I can hear him clumping down the stairs, whistling a few bars of Stravinsky's Petrouchka—the only music he knows.

Breaking away from my mother's rubber glove, I run into my father at the bottom of the stairs. "Wait for me in the car," he says in a tough voice.

I go out into the car, my father a step behind. My mother in the kitchen screaming at the top of her voice, "Don't Carl, don't, Carl, don't."

Curious, I think getting into the powder blue Oldsmobile (the upholstery made from old lamp shades), my father's name isn't Carl. "I ate the last of the bananas," I tell him.
"Just shut up, you," he says, crying. "No one asked you. Did anyone ask you?"

The car hits someone backing out, a boy with glasses on a bicycle, a former friend.

(From ReRuns, The Fiction Collective, New York, N.Y., 1974)

WRITING TEACHING

I am writing this piece about teaching writing in order to find out why I do what I do. The act of writing is a step into consciousness.

In the past few years, I've been working mostly with advanced writing students, many of whom have developed a high level of skill before coming to my class. I teach in the fiction component of the MFA Program in Creative Writing at Brooklyn College. The students are all ages, are interesting, talented, limited, blocked, prolific, represent a range (sometimes it seems the whole spectrum) of styles and visions. They have their commitments, their ways of seeing (and not seeing) and I have mine. My job, as I see it, is to enter a student's fictional world no matter its distance from my own and deal with that world on its own best terms. I try to help my students clarify their impulses, help them be more articulately and surprisingly themselves. That may be the only conscious intention I allow myself.

The gratifications in working with advanced students are less obvious than those of working with beginners. The beginner has the possibility of making astonishing progress, of going from nowhere to somewhere, from nothing to something. The more skill writers have, the more locked in they tend to be to what they already do well-- the province of their authority. Skill without an overriding vision can be self-limiting. At times I prod students to take risks, to do things they feel uncomfortable doing. It is no secret that we learn most from our failures. A writer (like anyone, like everyone) either advances or loses ground, moves ahead or falls into self-imitation. With both beginning students and the more advanced, I want to push writers toward eccentricity, toward their most distinctive and surprising impulses.

The only constant in my method as a teacher is to keep changing what I do, a way of keeping myself from getting stale. It pleases me to believe that I teach the way I write, making things up as I go along, though who knows? I have no theories of how to teach writing, have kept my distance from awareness of methodology. I have few conscious techniques, and I tend to discard them as they make themselves known to me. I have little sense of what I am going to say to students about their work before I say it. I like to engender a condition of risk and trust to instinct, or hope for revelation, to get me through. This method (or non-method) works for me more often than not. I often discover what I think about a student's work, engage perhaps my deepest feelings about it, in the process of articulating what I didn't know I knew.

In the MFA I teach tutorials—one on one—and workshops with a group of approximately ten. My method in tutorial tends to be different with each student. In the workshop, I read a student's fiction out loud to the group, a story or part of a novel all of us have already read to ourselves. Each member of the group comments on the piece while the writer listens in, sometimes takes notes, restrains the urge to justify the writing. I usually save my remarks for last, though I strive to avoid predictability. Even after everyone has had a say, the author has the freedom to explain or to refuse to explain himself/herself. The point is to let the writing speak for itself and for the author to get a chance to reexperience the story as if it were written by someone else. (I realize that this sounds like method, but it is not something I articulated to myself before writing this essay.) The workshop tends to be useful to writers no matter, sometimes it appears, what I do. Writers get both criticism and support, a sense of audience, a sense of others in similar struggle. Student pieces influence one another, suggest other ways of approaching story. A community of mutual interest and trust gradually emerges.

In order to generate an occasion for this essay I gave my workshop a writing assignment; read them the opening chapter of my novel, Reruns, a work composed of what I think of as transformed dreams; and asked my students to write a dream (or short dream-like narrative) of their own. It is not something I had done with this group before. The virtue of any assignment is that it enforces focus. It is also, paradoxically, liberating in that it frees writers from the responsibility they feel toward their own choices of subject or mode. Also, writing a dream, in which theoretically anything can happen, frees the writer from the demands of credibility and verisimilitude. In a dream story, the writer has license to be incredible. Still, it is not necessarily easier to write a dream than to imitate waking reality.

The most obvious way to write a dream is by transcribing an actual one before it slips away into ether. But dreams, like remarks, are not in themselves literature. The writer must give the dream the rudiments of form, must carry its odd narrative through to the implications of its illogical logic. The invented dream, if it is right, comes from the same source (the dazzling code language of the unconscious) as an actual dream.
The assignment produced surprising results, particularly from writers who had been working in realistic modes. One piece seemed to me more resonant and powerful than anything the writer had done before. The writer, a woman, had been writing a novel about a failed marriage and had had difficulty imagining material that had not taken place in her "real" life. In the dream the same obsessive material was brought to life in a way it had never been in the writer's realistic novel. It will be interesting to see whether the impact of the dream, its resonance and clarity, will carry over into revisions of the novel. In any event, I'll probably use the assignment again, or an assignment like it, or an altogether different assignment.
Judith Binder

From THE CHICKEN MADE OF RAGS, a children's play

(The following excerpt begins with the Chicken Made of Rags receiving an invitation to the Banquet at the Big Hotel. She starts out and picks up lots of friends along the way. This short selection starts toward the end of the walk.)

Bees are swarming around a flower. The Swan is shooing them away with her white lace hankie. She smells the flower. Her white-gloved hand is holding the white-gloved hand of her tiny daughter. They are dressed alike and both hold white lace purses. They both bring their lacy white handkerchiefs up to their mouths to cover delicate coughs. They are in the midst of a lush garden where a gardener is putting in a new plant; the mother Swan directs his activity.

SWAN, pointing to the left: It would be a little more charming if the tulips were closer to the daffodils, don't you think?

The Gardener starts to dig a hole for the tulips. Little Swan sees the Chicken, Duck, and Rooster.

LITTLE SWAN: Look who's coming!!!

SWAN, waving them over: Ah, dear friends... (She coughs into her hankie; Little Swan does too.) Lovely day. (She turns back to the Gardener, directing his activity further.) Now a little to the right where the precious petals can catch the late morning sun. (Turning back to the other three as the Gardener grunts and carries out her orders.) Where are you going, Chicken Made Of Rags and Duck and Rooster?

CHICKEN: Oh, we're going to a banquet at the Big Hotel.

DUCK: A grand banquet'

ROOSTER: Harumph...I'm just going along for the walk in case anything needs fixing.

Swan coughs; Little Swan coughs too.

SWAN: How I wish that I could go. (She looks back to the Gardener.) Now a bit to the left. We wouldn't want the little petals scorched. (Turning to her guests.) They must have sent me an invitation too, but lost my address and are searching everywhere to find it. Perhaps I should save them the trouble and simply come along with you. (She ties a bonnet on Little Swan.)

LITTLE SWAN: We'll come along!

CHICKEN: Hurry then. We don't want to be late.

Swan puts a lace shawl over Little Swan's shoulders and they join the others. The Chicken, Duck, Rooster, Big Swan, and Little Swan flutter, waddle, strut, and glide off. The Gardener whistles the walk music happily and carries on his work.

Exterior. Chinatown.

The walk music is heard. The walkers pass a vegetable stand. The store window is full of signs in Chinese. The vegetable man is watering his vegetables. He waves. They cut through a playground where the Chinatown elders are playing checkers. They nod and wave to the passing party.
They turn a corner, cross the street and walk along the pier. The walk music is interrupted by the sound of a stone hitting the water.

Exterior. Fishing Pier.

The sound is the sinker on the Goose's fishing line, which has just been cast. Ripples and circles and waves form around it. The Goose sees the reflections of the Chicken, Duck, Rooster, and Swan in the water, and looks up as they approach. She is wearing overalls and a brightly colored kerchief.

GOOSE, whispering loudly: Hi, Chicken Maë Of Rags, Duck, Rooster, Swan, and Little Swan.

CHICKEN, DUCK, ROOSTER, and SWANS, in unison: Hello, Goose!

GOOSE, whispering: Shhh! Speak softly. The fish will be scared away.

The others nod that they understand.

Where are you all going?

CHICKEN, whispering: We're going to a banquet at the Big Hotel.

DUCK, whispering: Wow!

ROOSTER, whispering: I, of course, am just walking along in case anything needs fixing.

SWAN, whispering: My invitation was probably lost along the way, so I'm just going along to save the hotel the trouble of sending another in invitation.

LITTLE SWAN, in a loud voice: Me too!!!
GOOSE, whispering: Shhh! (Pointing to her line.) You'll frighten the fish. When is this banquet?

CHICKEN, whispering: Tonight at six o'clock.

GOOSE, in a normal voice: Well... it's getting a little noisy here for fishing. (She reels in her line and packs up.) I might as well come along with you.

CHICKEN: Yes. But hurry along. We don't want to be late!

(From Scripts magazine)

Based on an old Cuban folk tale, The Chicken Made Of Rags is a script I wrote in collaboration with Nina Serrano in 1972. It is impossible to separate the script into Nina's words and my words; it is as if it had been written by one person. Other collaborators and I wrote scripts in which scenes were written separately, then put together. In The Chicken Made Of Rags, however, every word was written while both writers were present, and lines started by one person were often finished by the other.

The many scripts I have written in collaboration were some of the most artistically and personally satisfying writing experiences I've had. Nina and I didn't know the now-popular term when we first started "collaborating." We called it the "Yes, and..." approach. Our three successful plays convinced us that our method works, and it's one I've used in my own writing, with or without others, and have passed along to my students.
I usually give students the option of writing alone or collaborating in pairs on any play or story they want to write, and tell them that the first step is to write down anything either of them says, even if it seems completely off the track. "Don't argue," I caution, "always say yes. Whatever doesn't belong will be discarded later."

Writing every thought down for the first rough draft is easy. Yet, students have a hard time with it at the beginning. They are as used to disagreeing with each other as they are prone to negate their own creative process. Indeed, sometimes they are not wrong when they find their partner's ideas bad. My own firm belief in the process comes in handy at this point. I urge them to plow ahead, write it down, and don't waste time disagreeing. Keep up the momentum.

After Nina and I finished our first draft, we broke it into small sections on separate cards, each with a simple descriptive title to remind us of what the section was about. It's so much easier to move cards around than to search through a written manuscript. This card game part of the process gave us a start on editing out extraneous sections. The editing and cutting process was furthered during the reshuffling of the actual script. Again the "Yes, and..." method works. Getting rid of words is an important part of the writing process. If either person felt it was important to cut a word, it went out. Later we might put some words back, but at this point it seemed just as important to cut as it had been to add at the beginning.

By collaborating, students get used to saying yes to others, they find it easier to say yes to themselves, and creative momentum builds. One problem I anticipated was that one of the collaborators might dominate and the other withdraw. I decided to risk this, since my experience with three different collaborators showed me that both pull their own weight as long as they say yes. My experience with students proved that the risk was worth taking. Often one did dominate at first, but the other soon picked up some skills from the dominant one, and since everyone was instructed never to say no (which is not to say they didn't try), both writers contributed fully to the work. It takes time and patience for teacher and students, but the process proves successful, and gives students skills not only for writing but also for any area of their school lives in which they have to work with others.
ON THE "TALGO"

For Angel

You and I were on the train to Paris.
In the morning the lady in my compartment asked,
Is that your husband? And she was nodding yes wi’ her head, signalling yes with her eyes, speaking to me on other levels,
yes, say yes.
And I said yes.
Because we were as close as that, because we were closer than that because you were more that than anything I could explain.
And I said yes, because that was the answer she wanted
because of what she had to tell me, and I said yes, because of all the answers, it was most correct.
And I shouldn't have worried, because... "Once I had a husband..."
she began...
Her Spanish clear, distinct.
Now she makes this journey each year, for 25 years.
The anniversary of a death.
SPECIAL MOMENTS

I have come to value certain special moments that occur during my teaching residencies. At these times there is a link between my students and me—a direct communication between us. I have a sense that there are things that we understand that the outside world does not. It is these moments that make me feel special as a writer, feel that my own work and life is fed, inspired, that I have been fortunate enough to be able to open myself up enough so that the children have been able to see me and to hear my voice.

Oddly enough such moments are likely to happen not when I am discussing or reading my own work, but rather when I am involved with exploration of the work of some other writer, be it that of a professional or one of the children.

This year I have had a rather high incidence of such inspiring moments. Asked to work with my classes on Writing from Direct Observation, I began to teach my kids the same kind of material I develop for my adult Journal and Notebook Workshops. That is to say, precisely the same kind of material that I develop for my own growth as a writer and a woman.

Working in journals and notebooks (quite different from the daily logs many teachers prescribe) involves being open to constant self-discovery. Most children are not used to considering the ordinary events of their lives as subjects for writing. They think that something must be "special" in order to warrant attention. In answer to a question about what happened to them this very morning before they left the house for school, I often get "Nothing."

It is interesting, then, to unravel all the details of what actually did happen and what might have been important about it. The children soon enjoy both noticing and writing about such things as a new red toothbrush and the way the toothpaste looked on its bristles, or the way the eggs turned out (the first two yolks broke, the third turned out perfect).

So the children and I have focused on observing many things: among them, things we never noticed before in the classroom, overheard conversations, all the things that happen in two minutes of "real" time. The observation is internal as well: we have noticed how emotions change from moment to moment and observed the elusive processes of dreams and memory. My work with dreams has been ongoing, and I have found them to be an endless source of fascination to both adults and children. We talk about what kinds of things happen in dreams and the different ways in which they can happen (when we seem to have super-powers, for example). Having discovered that people who fly in dreams have very particular methods for getting airborne, I have begun to collect flying methods: two hops and a jump and you're off, or spin around and around until you rise up, or lots of arm flapping, for example. One boy rather alarmingly had to be hit by a bus in his dreams before he could take off, unharmed, into the air.

Dreams are, of course, a timeless source of inspiration as well, and it is with a special kind of ease that children write about them and create work that is based on dream imagery and dream events, e.g., transformation of time and space, of landscape, of humans into other life forms or vice-versa.

Dreaming I am inside the places I am Always knowing more than after or before.
During my first poetry residency in 1978 I developed this little poem, summing up my feeling about dreams, and I have always encouraged all my students to tap dream knowledge on a regular basis. Recently I sang a completely wordless song of my own devising, destined to create a state of mind akin to dreaming, during which the children could let images freely enter their minds. I had been inspired by Native American chants and the poet and musician Charlie Morrow's dream chants.

I then asked the class to tell me what images they saw during the dream chant, and there was a great deal of excitement as they spoke. We recorded the results and tried it again. Here is an example from a combined 3rd, 4th, 5th grade class:

GROUP DREAM POEM

A pink crystal is flying
A lot of Indians are sitting around a fire. There is a white horse standing behind them
A king crab is scuttling across the sand
A plane is crashing with green fire
A black horse with a white star on its forehead is standing next to a white horse with a black star on its forehead and there's a rabbit hopping next to it
A pink flower is blooming in a red cup with a million designs on it.

There was an excitement in the room about what seemed a new way of seeing, creating, and communicating with each other. By being shown how these images "popped" into their heads, the children were ready to pay attention to images that come at other times, images that are the poet's fuel.

My own work in prose and poetry continues to be fed by dreams and by the great wealth of of material that finds its way into my journals. And it continues to be inspired by the sometimes elusive ways in which my students and I interact. Compare this student poem with the preceding one of my own.

A SPECIAL PLACE

One day in the Catskills I was hiking and a bird whistled to me and I whistled back and it whistled back to me and again and again and again we whistled for hours and hours and hours.

---Mikel Washington, 3rd grade
THE REAPPRAISAL

The fledgling quivers in your hand, its feathers still sticky from the albumen.
You want to think, "Poor blind thing," your own heart beginning to palpitate at such a spectre of helplessness.
But you steel yourself;
you are stern and the world is so full of suffering anyhow.

You could paper any attitude with a justification.
The linoleum on the floor is warped from too many scrubblings and the same sad ballad bleats from the black radio-- the bird, just-born, can't sing, can't see, can barely beat its blood back through its terrified body.

Even if you spoke the same language,
what would you tell it?
That life, the accident, is lucky after all,
that summer evenings, like the clamor of myriad fluttering wings, will call this being to its moist green breast-- it's a lesson easy enough to minister in a sombre time.

But you? Your lookout?
You're the one
the bird will leave here.
Take that into consideration.
You of the sleepless nights.
Was it the longing for melodies you cannot memorize that cupped your hands for acceptance?

Admit you desire
what you cannot have.
Shudder as you will, put it from you, the cracked bits of shell still litter
the floor at your feet.
It's a long way for a little one to fall. Don't let it happen.

REGARDING "THE REAPPRAISAL"

Small but intense sensations—the swish of a pencil across paper and the faint cloud of a smudge superimposed over neat, slanting script because the pencil is being moved by a downcurved left hand. An eraser also fades the blue lines ruled on the paper, and the washed-out red of the left-hand margin is always more prominent than the right.

I begin with the writing materials of every schoolchild because teaching gave them to me again, although, like everything adult, my current versions are more refined: perfectly round maroon draughting pencils that don't callous the fing'rs, their butter-soft leads sharpened to pin-sized points by a manual sharpener of a solid and weighty brass that, unlike the mechanical sharpeners that Nabokov's Pnin thought said "Ti-con-der-oga, ti-con-der-oga," don't greedily devour half the pencil in half a minute.

When I am writing with these materials in the stillness of my living room, I am not thinking about teaching, but I suspect that the spectre of a little girl also inhabits the quiet, meditative atmosphere, for whom writing was also a diversion, albeit a less disciplined one. I sharpen my pencil, tap the sharpener against the carved wooden ashtray I use for the shavings and inhale the cool cellar odors of graphite and wood.

Sometimes I wonder what this ghost child would make of one of my writing assignments, but she is not in the classroom when I rivet the other pairs of eyes on me, and then on the blackboard. The children I have worked with in a fashionable corner of Manhattan, in the ghettos of Harlem and the Bronx, suburban Westchester and Long Island, and a Brooklyn as far removed as twenty years do not bring me back to the Alabama schoolgirl of the early sixties. And yet they have given me something else.

Reality on reality. The children do not necessarily see what I see. We are taught that the planet rotates in the void, but what are the ways by which we begin to accept it? And, if we comprehended in advance where the truth would bring us, would we want it? Children cannot know the desperation of their childhood, that its smallness is false, that it will change. That is what adults know and desire to protect, because it is what they once were themselves, and now are not.

Under as much duress as I ever wrote any poem, standing on a street corner in a frigid January afternoon after teaching, my fingers numb, I began to scribble the first lines that would become "The Reappraisal" and continued upon wakening the next morning at four a.m., anxious and apprehensive about the two-hour commute, also to teach, that faced me in three hours. The poem is about a love sparked by the helplessness of that object, and it is what children have taught me while I have taught them that with the right words they can describe what they formerly thought was inexpressible.
nobility is the secret of my character,
my slight paunch a flowering of gentleness.
my poached-egg eyes contain the seed of wisdom.
my tantrums are keenly-perceived emotional arabesques.
my compromises are selflessness making love to the world
my rotten teeth the restraint of brutality.
my shaking hands are joie de vivre.
my meanness is pure light.
my obscurity tantalizes everyone.
my blackouts are part of the music of time.
my cowardice is a beautiful dance.
my blandness is the space approaching God.
my murders are mutations of the unicorn.
my poems are bits of ice on the warm plains.

---

Dear Nancy & Ron--

Re our recent conversation, here are my feelings on the "me" side of the reciprocity be-tweer poet & student in school workshop activity.
For one thing, teaching makes me rehearse my thought and refine its presentation over and over, without recourse to the jargon of literary criticism—which can bestow a false aura of keen in-tellection on a small pedestrian thought. In class I have to say what I think about poetry in brass-tacksy, simple American. This helps keep me from spiralling off into some mental ivory tower, keeps me in touch with my original feelings about poetry.
Contact with children is like Antaeus bouncing off the earth, strengthens me in poetic feeling, since, as they say, the poet is sort of an overgrown, slightly disguised child (who has maybe learned how to cross the street) (and fill out forms).

The work, though intense, is a godsend, professionally, since you can work a little less than full-time and still buy baby a new shoe or two.

But, above all, it's good because it continuously excites me about poetry. The kids are not likely to be good at anything of versificatory intricacy or linguistic sophistication or "high" cultural reference. What we are left with—what they are, again and again, good at—is a freshness with language—a vague, and oft-used word. But let me try to explain. In being immersed in children's poems, my focus is inevitably directed to the minute moves, the basic energies, of rhythm and word-choice and image—uncluttered by any pretension except the most transparent—in what we might call primitive written speech. I'll illustrate with a few examples of what I call "lunes"—a flexible haiku-derivative for which not syllables but words are counted—eleven words arranged 3/5/3. Here is a lune writ by a 5th grader, years ago:

When the sun's rays hit the shades, it lights up lines.

(I had asked the class to look around them, if baffled for subject matter, and he saw the light striking through the Venetian blinds). This poem is extraordinarily physical. In the first place it recounts only the fact (and my proclivity in any case is to try to release the "primitive" energies in language and the senses—"no ideas but in things," a maxim I continue to admire).
Also, it's loaded with word-music: n and n forming a swing in line 1, that simple rhythm repeated in line 3 with the hot, different rhythm of line 2 tucked between, assurance of rays and shades, rhyme of hit and it, repeated soft "the" sound, repeated "uh" sound plus n and t in line 3, "li" rhyme, way the vowels rise and fall -- all of course non-calculated, just a good ear, a good minute. And then, of course, the poem has implications--his lines were lit up, in the piece he wrote and beyond. Mental play opened up via the word "shades," especially in conjunction with basic sunlight.

Here are a few more lunes (from high school students) that may best demonstrate that vivifying pure energy of the best of children's poetry:

if the rain was not wet it would probably be dry.

(I say damn the subjunctive, full speed ahead. These are all best, I think, when the line-break is emphasized by a breath-stop.)

extra, extra, read all about it! there is no news today.

(Haiku-like last-line twist of wit, confounding expectations.)

a raindrop falls. it falls on my nose-- delicate, light, transparent.

(Again a surprise, of rhythm and tone, in the final line.)
well I did but I wish I never left my home.

when ducks fly
from the very still water it becomes violent.

she reached up and caught the little piece of white fur.

you write with a pencil tip bending lines into your thoughts.

brains work hard:
the sound from gears grinding drowns out thought.

load the ship.
go out to the sea.
don't come back.

No need, I think, to point out specifically the ways in which these poems delight (and instruct). The only drawback is that the adult poet may, abashed by such glee, feel inadeqquate to transcend stodginess in his own work. Not really. So its altogether like learning aeronautics from the birds, which I gather the engineers continue to do. In sum, I find it inspiring to work with children in poetry workshops.
It allows me to exercise my human energy in just the field I prefer. And it provides me with a stream of what I regard as primal poetic example.

Yours sincerely,

Jack
BARBARA DANISH

JOURNAL EXCERPTS, JUNE 1982
Written in response to a teacher's request to write continuously and explore the language incidents that went into making us the thinkers/learners/writers we are.

(I notice myself taking time to prepare. I've noticed this lately about myself--I used to not want to do "research," that is, gather the information, figure out the task. Now I can't seem to start right in. I can still do freewriting of course, but when there's an assignment, I have to think. This is a nice feeling. I think I used to be scared; I just needed to get anything down; I was in a rush to finish. Now I'm more efficient--in a good way. Oh well, enough of this. Does this happen when I'm aware of audience? When I have an assignment? Will I use this writing for myself? Can I transfer my honesty from my journal to in-class writing?)

I want to make a list of the formal and informal learning and the part conversation played in my life. Any mode, the teacher said. Okay then--a list. I want to see what comes up.

--I was reading Exodus. Blue book cover. This must have been during elementary school? 5th-6th grade? D. said it was a hard book. Did I understand it? I said yes. He wanted to be sure so I was to tell him about what I had read. What I remember is that I got to a part with sex--and of course I couldn't talk to him about that--so I stopped talking to him. Maybe I stopped reading? What did I learn?

(I just reread what I wrote. Is it okay to reflect? Take time to think? It feels wrong. Is it okay?)
--In fourth grade I wrote poems about dinosaurs, and Miss Moore (pink walls) read my poem to the class. She said she was giving me a poetic license, and those she never gave out. In front of the class. I think I learned I could get praise this way. Rewarded. For some reason I was proud of this poetic license. Why? Would anything she gave me in front of the class have been valuable? Or did I have a notion of what this was?

Sometimes I wonder if I've ever affected a child's life the way Miss Moore affected mine. (I keep wondering, am I doing this right? She said it could be any topic--but I still want to know--is it right?)

--Let's think about the conversations over and over about trying things. (I really feel like I'm going to cry. Really, if no one was in this classroom right now I'd cry, I feel so sad.)

"If you can't do it right, don't do it at all."

"If you can't do it right the first time, don't do it at all."

Why didn't I ever fight back?

Language is how I have my parents in my mind. They live there--their words and their looks, and I say their words to myself. It's time for you to leave, Mom and Dad. I love you very much, but it's time for you to leave.

--Memories about learning what kind of learner I was.

I can't think. I have too much feeling right now.

--Conversations/Experiences:

Me around age 10–11 to someone, someone I felt very close to and was willing to confide in: "I believe that if I could find Jesus' grave and dig him up and give him food and water, he'd live again. He died of hunger and thirst, didn't he?

No response that I can remember. I didn't offer those things very often.

7th grade. 8th grade. 9th grade.

—Oh yes! 6th grade? A wonderful day—I had a peanut butter and bacon sandwich—what a treat! Mrs. S gave us a math test on a very light rexo. She went over the problems and told us to pencil them in. I didn't. I could read it! But I guess I couldn't. I got a lot wrong. Is that possible? And in front of the whole class she said, "Barbara thought she was so smart, and now look at what happened to her." She moved my desk away from everyone. I had to eat my sandwich alone. It tasted terrible. It stuck in my throat. Okay, Mrs. S, I learned I wasn't smart. Thank you for helping me learn that. I learned the consequences of not doing what the authority tells you to do. I was embarrassed. That was vicious, Mrs. S, but I learned that your way was the "right" way.

This is a story of how I came to be the learner/thinker/writer I am—not so much through conversation as through commands (not the right word) not through one incident, but through an accumulation of incidents.

THE JOURNAL AS "TEACHER

My journal was my first writing teacher. When I teach, I imitate the way my journal taught me.

What do I mean by this? How can a blank book be a teacher? How do I imitate my journal?

On August 4, 1964, I started my journal. I was 15 years old and that, in part, accounts for the entry:

'Allo. 'Ow are y'ole chap? Quite nice to meet you, I must say! J'ecrirai quelquechose en francaise et quelquechose en Anglais. La francais mienne n'a pas tres raison.

I dropped the "French" a week later but continued writing, until today, 18 years later, I have over 50 volumes of my journal. I wouldn't call these volumes a chronicle of my life--there are too few events mentioned and too few details of these events. Instead, I would say that for me, these journals are like the lizard, that animal from prehistoric times who still lives among us, who reminds me of a time when the world was roaming by creatures who did not have names for things, and who did not know what was happening to them, or why. I never intended for my journals to describe my life. I used them for whatever I needed at the time, and those needs suggest who I was.

When I was younger I am sure I kept one of those fake red leather diaries. They had a few lines for each day and a key that always got lost; imagine, locked out from yourself! Those diaries seemed to be for girls only and seemed to suggest that a particular type of secret had to be told in them. My first journal was a plain black and white speckled composition book full of lined pages. The keeping of the journal was my idea, and the only rules were the ones I imposed on myself. When I go back to my journals I notice that one rule I kept for a long time, one that prevails among inexperienced writers, was that of disguise. Although I am sure that at the time I believed I was writing honestly, now I see that I was constantly disguising myself. I used foreign languages ("Allo...";) I wrote about myself as though I were in a teen novel ("We had lobster for dinner--scrumsh!";) I had a qualification for everything, subordinating all feelings to manners. ("It was rather good," "quite boring," "Hope it all goes well"; that last one was a wish for two classmates who had decided to fall in love with each other even though I was in love with one of them.) I wrote poetry, another disguise, since the subject of the poems is always missing and the poetry itself is undecipherable. My dreams were the one way I consistently escaped the disguises, although they too are disguises of a sort.

36

I can understand my inclination to disguise. Writing is dangerous. It is easy to write clichés ("I wanted to kill him") and generalizations ("Oh sure I felt good about it")—those conventional disguises that are so acceptable to others. It is our own personal truth that is painful and dangerous to tell (and, I think, to hear). I notice that when students begin to tell their own truth they hesitate, apologize, reveal their uneasiness.*

...I write more letters to people now just to see if I really can express myself better, and I really can. It's a little scary to think a paper and pen can do all that. But it is also interesting in a way....It's like for years now someone only let me use a little bit of my brain and now in college they gave me the rest of it. Sounds weird, huh. But I just can't explain this feeling I have...sometimes I feel a little crazy when I talk this way.

--Janet Paduaganian

What does it mean to be 20? ...I guess you have to make the meaning out of it for yourself. To grow up and become a man. I still think of myself as a kid (you know what I mean, not a baby or an adolescent, but in between that and manhood.) Maybe I'm making too big a deal out of this. Sometimes I get carried away.

*All excerpts were written by freshmen at the College of Staten Island.

--Liam Deahl

My journal started changing when I began to realize that while no one ever read my journal, I had an audience. It was a judgmental audience, a mother-father-teacher me who admonished me before I got a word out: "Put your feelings on paper and they'll be used against you"; "You think that?"; "That's not a very nice thing to say"; and "If you can't say it right, don't say it at all." As I became more aware of these voices (that had always been there, I'm sure), I began to notice what happened when they spoke. The "bad" thought did vanish, but so did every other thought; or if the "proper" thought stayed, I suddenly felt so bored that I just stopped writing. In short, I was left with nothing at all. Little by little I started to talk back to this audience. I challenged myself to write everything that came into my mind, no matter how horrible it was, even if I had to put a blank or an initial in the place of a word or phrase. With this new rule, I began to shed my disguises.

Now the strange thing about disguises in writing is this: they do cover us when we are afraid of exposing ourselves, and yet I believe that it is the desire for openness, for telling things as they are, that sends us to writing in the first place. So a person might say, "I want to write the truth of what's going on with me, but then I'll have to read it, or maybe someone else will read it, and everybody, including me, will see how stupid and messed up I am."

The fear of exposure is a perfectly reasonable one in writing. Maybe the material itself is dangerous to look into, or maybe going even a little below the surface will make a mess that we feel helpless to put back in order, and then we'll be left looking stupid. These fears are the territory of writing. Writers who must keep themselves protected never move far enough into the territory to get through it. Usually they stay away from it altogether.

My journal gave me years to try disguise after disguise, to feel comfortable putting myself on paper, making myself visible, getting closer and closer to danger. My journal seemed to say to me all the time, "Just write, go ahead. Don't look back. There's no need to look back. Use this journal for what you need now." And what I needed, and still need, was to be able to say what came to mind. I needed to have a place where I could get my own picture of myself, where my honesty could not disappoint. I needed to have a place where I had the freedom to speak French, write my enigmatic poetry, use initials, where I had time to practice telling the truth that I saw. What page after blank page said to me was that here I was trusted, that it was safe here to tell the truth.

I want my students to have a listener they can trust the way I had my journal. I want them to have the experience of acknowledging, in the company of a quiet listener, the voices they hear, the details they notice, the inspirations and questions they have.

...This class lets you go deep into your mind and search for those feelings you were always afraid to let out on paper...The students as well as the teacher don't try to change your way of thinking or even change your style. They just give ideas and a way to express yourself more, to make your writing better. They try to make your writing be you, not something or someone else.
(I hope you understand what I mean. I mean they don't try to make my work into their work.)

--Maria Arnau

I want them to experience writing as a process of reflection.

To me writing reflects your personality. So if you write about something and later read it back, I think you find out a lot about yourself. I remember when I wrote "How I see myself as a writer." What a negative attitude I had. I just couldn't believe it when I read it back to myself. I guess I was ignorant on the subject. That's way I hated it. Now I realize what it (writing) can do for you. You can really see yourself. That's so important to me, knowing who I am and what I want and trying to get it.

--Marianne Remolino

Above all, I want them to see themselves grow in self-awareness and self-confidence, to trust that there never needs to be an end so that growth.

(In September) I was a person with a negative attitude, an infant in writing. Now (in November) I see myself as a two-year-old child. I see and feel myself expanding my thoughts and knowledge in ways I've never done before.

--Joseph Aloi

Sometimes I think about my journals packed in their boxes, sitting at the back of the closet hidden by coats. Sometimes I worry—what if there is a fire? What if they are ever destroyed? What would I do without them? It is strange to have something so valuable that could be destroyed so easily. And yet, the funny thing is, I rarely reread them. I do not like to go back and read them. I just keep writing more and more and seeing more. My journals are a mystery to me. I cannot figure them out. Why did I start them in the first place? And yet it is clear to me that they have been my teacher. They have helped me step out of my disguises and feel the power of writing. They have been a model to me of the kind of writing teacher I want to be—patient and trusting and, like the blank pages, always expectant and always welcoming.
Outside the theatre
she glistened in red plastic like a bomb about to go off. Her eyes argued with her shadow. For a moment she came toward him not seeming to notice the way May heat seized her by the raincoat and threw her slicker image back at the double glass doors posterized with Roger Caussimon. Shortly that amiable large face would beg him to decide if he should buy a ticket to hear of encounters at Orly Bar, or a scuzzy weekend lay-over in Montreal where they blew their noses at him for applause. The life of a performer is to be superfluous just at the right moments. In the plush dark loge he oversaw they were all alone except for her friend so blonde she made her dark hair splendid for contrasting so much modishness with his immodesty. And, afterwards, in the night she was beautiful, his goddess of nothing doing at all she must be beautiful: Rue St. Denis smelling of fog and oysters:
Antoinette, Antoinée...

When I wrote this poem about Paris some years back, it was inspired by an assignment I'd given my class in prose fiction: to imagine an unusual encounter with a stranger, or someone already known, but under strange circumstances. I can remember priming them with a passage from Pasternak's Aerial Tracks: "A single incident brings you in contact almost for the first time with the charm of a uniquely significant experience."

As is so often the case when I have been teaching (and am asked to give specific assignments), I try to fulfill them on my own time.
But it is often difficult for me to write prose while I'm teaching, whereas the intense experience of a poem comes and passes and can be caught, if one is at the ready for it. The Paris experience had been real, but I had not thought of it until I sat down to write. It was like all flirtations—or nearly so—something that led nowhere, or almost so, and then it came to me as these people aware of each other, but from a great distance, gesturing in the darkness of a theater.

My students, meanwhile, were engaged in their own work: a girl from Appalachia, for example, wrote a brilliant story of a mine strike in southern Ohio as told by a middle-class woman who, for the first time, becomes aware of her father's complicity in violence.

Another young woman, of middle eastern ancestry, wrote the account of her terrified relatives in the Lebanon of the late '70s, as if she were visiting them from a long way off.

There were stories about meeting Graham Greene, Cord Meyer, J' , and John O'Hara, and stories about going to visit a friend and running into his crazy wife and/or husband.

Strangest of all, though connected, was the work of a young man of Irish Catholic ancestry, who, having just read Eliot's "Wasteland," described his character standing upon a bridge over a ruined industrial landscape as he explains to his confessor just why he lacked any religious vocation. They also stood apart and did not touch, it seemed to me, like the characters in my poem.

Imitation is often simply pointing oneself this way or that. The flattery is simply in the direction chosen, not in any slavish copying. So it sometimes seems, in the imperfect alchemy we call making art, that a flirtation can become for another writer a discussion of religion. It's no less devout and accepting just because it's not the same.
THE THREE STOOGES AT MY GRANDMOTHER'S FUNERAL

The Stooges did not attend the funeral services, but they're the first ones to the cemetery. Moe hugs my father. Curly walks solemnly down the row of cars reminding the drivers to turn off their lights. And Larry chats with my Aunt Sybil, reminiscing about how her dog Coco got into the habit of knocking the receiver off its hook and barking into the phone every time it rang. "You know, Syb, we put that piece of business in our tenth short, Malice in the Palace."

The rabbi asks my father to recite the Mourners' Kaddish with him. My father's voice drips from his mouth, in a few moments tears replace his words. He throws a handful of dirt on the coffin and it lands in a tight clump. Moe drops a fistful of dirt into the grave and whispers, "This is the first time I've ever thrown dirt at anyone other than a Stooge. I don't like it." He helps my father back to the limousine, both of them weeping like tiny birds. Larry and Curly shake hands with the rabbi. The Stooges wave as we pull away. From far off they flutter and shiver.

This was a difficult poem for me to write. For most of the afternoon I had seen my father in tears, his eyes filled with tender memories of his mother. As we inched our way from the mouth of the grave to a waiting car, his arms wrapped around me for support. I thought of all the times he had offered a steadying hand to my life of abrupt twists and turns. I wanted the poem to articulate my grief at the passing of the woman who gave my dad life and allowed me to choose to sit behind a typewriter. But I went through draft after draft of a poem that had a beginning, a middle, an end, and little else. It conveyed almost nothing of the concern I desired. I was writing from my point of view and I was standing too close.

One day I hit upon the idea of slipping in the Three Stooges, childhood favorites of mine, and having the action swirl around them. Getting them away from their trademarked pokes in the eye and having them behave as caring people caught in tremendous sadness was a startling juxtaposition. I was deeply excited with "The Three Stooges at my Grandmother's Funeral." A delicate situation had been creatively twisted and still managed to capture the compassion I was after.

Around that time I brought in the poem to talk with a fifth-grade class about poetic license—how poets occasionally get material by taking real events and blending in gentle portions of imagination to heighten effects. I explained I do have an Aunt Sybil; she has a crazy dog named Coco; a few people at the funeral forgot to turn their headlights off; my father was in tears and really needed help leaving the cemetery; but the Stooges were only there through the good graces of poetic license. I had no idea that my sharing of this poem would lead to one of the most pleasant experiences I've had teaching.

Greg Raden, a fifth grader in that class who had lost his grandfather the previous summer, privately asked if could work on a funeral poem like mine. I let him know that of course it would be all right, and that if he wanted to talk about it or needed help I would come running.

Greg did little writing that class, mostly he rolled his pencil up and down his desk and thought.

The following week I came in with a ...ew lesson. Greg called me over to show he had begun his "funeral" poem at home, but hadn't finished, and wanted to know if I'd permit him to work on it in lieu of the new assignment. I encouraged him to continue, secretly pleased he was sticking with it. One of the toughest things I find to relay to young students is the excitement of revision. To them it is excruciatingly boring to rework material after the initial creative spark has cooled.

Greg was special! He tinkered with every word, crossing out words and squeezing in others. His paper looked like a complicated treasure map with twenty arrows zooming this way and that to mark the spot. Once, he held his poem out to me and said, "How's this so far?" I looked at it for a good two minutes before fessing up, "Greg, I'm having a little trouble fitting all the changes together. It's just great how you're getting your language perfect. You're turning into a true professional. Read it to me now and then make a clean copy before you forget what you want to keep and what you want to take out."

I have never had a student spend so much time on one poem. For three weeks he reworked "The Grandfather Funeral." He knew quite well the feelings and events of that long, sad summer day, but it took a lot of thought to translate the raw hours of that experience to the precious minutes of his poem. Though I never asked him to keep up with the other work covered in class, he did so by doing all the assignments at home. He told me he felt more comfortable working on his poem in class because we had both gone through the same ordeal.

His dedication to craftsmanship gave me one of those "this is what it's all about" moments we come by all too rarely. Greg had one of those moments too. When he finished his poem and read it, everyone in class applauded spontaneously. Someone in the back of the room shouted, "That away, Greg!"

THE GRANDFATHER FUNERAL

I'm in the car riding to the House of Death squeezed between relatives
We walk into a dark and lonely room with our heads bowed
The rabbi shoves something on my head
I fall into my aunt's arms
My second cousin brings me a drink
A man came out and said,
"You may come in."
There he lies like a snake in a bottomless pit
My mother crying causes a flood Mine a shower
The lights are dim...So is everyone
The rabbi starts a mournful speech
He mentions my name...I felt proud
We all climb back into cars
"Where are we going?" I asked
"To the cemetery" answers a voice  Oh...
I saw a big black car with a wooden box in it
The cars stop
We get out Stones with names stand tall and broad
We walk under a tent to a big hole in the ground
The box is lowered in
I fall to the ground crying
People start leaving little by little...
They stop by the hole and drop flowers beside it and drive to my grandmother's for a feast
(Excerpts from "Savannah")

Sundays after church, Jess and I would walk down Seventh Avenue. My long, thin legs trying to slow their long pace to Jess' short toddle. She looked so sweet in her pink organdy dress starched and pressed, her little Mary Janes with the buttons on the side of the black patent leather shoes, the pink anklet socks with the frilly lace at the top and the little white hat with the pink bow tied in the back just like the bow tied at what would someday be her waist. I felt her tiny hand, curled around my index and middle fingers, damp in the late May warmth.

"We goin' to Aunt Bannah's, Mama?"
"Yes, honey. But don't say we goin' say are we going?"

"Are we going? Are we going? Are we going?"

She was making my correction into a song, putting the beat on a different word each time. I'd given up trying to get her say Aunt Savannah. It always came out Sa'annah which she later shortened to Bannah, so I just let it stand. Bannah and Jess got on like white on rice.

Peas porridge hot Peas porridge cold
Peas porridge in the pot
Nine days old

Some like it hot
Some like it cold
Some 'ke it in the pot
Nine days old

Without missing a beat, Bannah and Jess clapping into the next rhyme. Bannah's ham hands stopping just before patting Jess' miniature ones so the force wouldn't push her tininess across the dining room.

Miss Mary Mack, Mack, Mack
With silver buttons, buttons, buttons
All down her back, back, back
To buy a sack, sack, sack
And never came back, back, back
All dressed in black, black, black
Miss Mary Mack, Mack, Mack

Jess dissolved into giggles in Bannah's lap.
Giggling because she'd one-handed the last "Mack" instead of two-handing it. She'd made me clap it out every evening this week so she'd do it right.

"Well, Miss Jessie, you almost did it that time. Allllll most," said Bannah as her gold rings rubbed the back of Jess' dress.

"Next time," Jess took her giggles cut of Bannah's lap and floated them toward her face, the sunlight from the dining room window sparking
the hoops at Bannah's ears with golden fire.
"Next time, I'll get it right!"

"I bet you will, Miss Jessie, I bet you will,"
Bannah picked Jess up and sat her on her lap.
Jess put her head on Bannah's cushion bosom and smiled. When she was no more than two, she'd embarrassed me by saying that when she grew up she wanted "bumps" just like Aunt Bannah. Bannah nearly fell off her chair laughing.

"Careful with your shoes, honey, you'll dirty up Aunt Bannah's pretty white dress." Bannah always wore white on special occasions. Sunday was a special occasion.

"She's all right, Frankie. Yes, Miss Jessie's all right with me,"

51
...Jess went with me to Bannah's house after he funeral in New York and went down South with us to the funeral there. As we walked back from the grave, the South Carolina red dirt baked hard by a beautiful September sun, she asked me, "Why wasn't she more careful, Mama? She was always telling me to be careful around that window."

"I don't know, Baby. I don't know," I let my tears come freely. I hadn't cried this much since Jess' father left. The crying was both a comfort and a knife in my soul. I'd been too busy with the funeral arrangements and helping Bannah's other friends bear up and worrying about Jess to sit down and have my own cry. And here I was stumbling through red dirt in high heels, grabbing at Jess' hand because my tears wouldn't let me see. Bannah, Bannah, why did you leave me?

"Mama, don't cry," Jess patted my hand between her two. "Don't worry. Aunt Bannah's just sleeping. She'll wake up and we'll play Mary Mack and I'll get it right this time."

---

REFEELING

Rewriting is not only the correcting of grammar and punctuation. Rewriting is refeeling the experience so you can write the emotional truth.

Joanna Emmanuellis is a seventh-grade student in one of my writing classes. Following is the first version of her story, "My Dream".

I was walking down a corridor when I saw a light come from a room. I walked to the room, but every step I took made the hallway longer and longer. When I finally came to the room, I opened the door and suddenly there was a creature, the most horrible thing in the world! It saw me. I ran as fast as I could away from it but it caught up with me. It growled and opened its mouth. It started putting my head in it. I screamed and yelled. "I have been eaten and swallowed by a creature!" I screamed. I opened my eyes. I was sweating and my fists were clutching the blanket. After all, this was just a dream. A horrible dream!

When the class discussed it, they said they could not see the monster. Mr. Talbert, the class teacher, said he wanted to feel what it was like to be eaten. Joanna's response to the comments was: "That's too scary!"

"Were you scared when you dreamt it?" I asked.

"Horribly scared."

I said to the class, "Raise your hand if you were scared."

No one raised her/his hand.

"Did you want us to be scared?" I asked Joanna.

"Yes."

"Then you have to be scared when you write it. You have to take yourself back to the feelings and write while sitting in those feelings."

What follows is an excerpt from the rewritten version of Joanna's story:

...He growled and opened his mouth. He started putting my head in it. I screamed and yelled. He was chewing my flesh up. The blood was running down his mouth. My head was in different parts of his mouth and body. My ears were still in his mouth. One of my eyes was stuck between his teeth and the other, who knows where. He was spitting my teeth on the floor one by one. My nose was in his throat going down and down to his stomach. Well, as for my brain and everything else, I don't know. I opened my eyes. I was sweating and my fists were clutching the blanket. After all, this was just a dream.

When Joanna read this to the class, they were all scared.

A recent story I rewrote is, like most of my work, a blend of memory and imagination. "Savannah" is about the suicide of an older cousin of mine who was like a mother to my mother and a grandmother to me. The story traces the emotional connections between Savannah, known in the latter part of the story as Bannah, the grown woman and the woman's little girl.

After my cousin's suicide, I had a continuing series of nightmares about her as horrifying to me as Joanna's nightmare was to her, but I did not grieve the way adults do. Years later, I did grieve for another cousin whose death was a jolting shock. I tried to write a story about my reactions to his death. When I found I couldn't, I went back to the earlier death of my older cousin. I used the feelings of sadness, pain and anger, which I felt at my young cousin's death, for "Savannah."

The story told itself best from my mother's viewpoint. The grieving scene, which is the last one, was the hardest for me to write. Just as Joanna did not want to be scared, I did not want to feel that pain.

In the original version, I was holding back, trying to protect myself, and cheating the story. Finally, in the third or fourth draft, the feeling of anger mixed in with the sadness came back. In the final rewrite I was able to write the one sentence that made all the difference to me, the sentence that made me cry: Bannah, Bann h, why did you leave me?
Kenneth Koch

WEST WIND

It's the ocean of western steel Bugles that makes me want to listen
To the parting of the trees
Like intemperate smiles, in a Storm coat evangelistically ground
Out of spun glass and silver threads
When the stars are in my head, and we Are apart and together, a friend of my youth Whom I've so recently met--a fragment of the universe
In our coats, a believable doubling Of the fresh currents of doubt and Thought! a winter climate Found in the Southern Hemisphere and where I am who offers you to wear,
And in this storm, along the tooth of the street,
The intemperate climate of this double frame of the universe.

(1954)

(From The Pleasures of Peace, Grove, 1969)

TEACHING AND WRITING

The poetry of the children I taught delighted me and encouraged me, though I think there was more influence the other way around. I influenced the children--not by my poems, but by certain id· as I had about poetry. I assumed that the children should enjoy writing, be happy and excited while they were doing it; that their poems didn't have to intellectually follow but could begin again and again, change the subject, or go off on any side way that pleased them; and that the subject of the poem, or, more accurately, what they wanted to "say," was something they might find out best while writing, not before. These assumptions were good ones, lucky and productive, I think, for the children's writing, allowing them to do something they were good at, not something they were not good at. They were not good at rhyme and metre, at the rational development of a subject, at planning a work in advance, at work that wasn't a pleasure. Here are some of the poems they wrote:

THE DAWN OF ME

I was born nowhere
And I live in a tree
I never leave my tree
It is very crowded
I am stacked up right against a bird
But I won't leave my tree
Everything is dark
No light!
I hear the bird sing
I wish I could sing
My eyes, they open
And all around my house
The Sea
Slowly I get down in the water
The cool blue water
Oh and the space
I laugh swim and cry for joy
This is my home
For Ever.

--Jeff Morley, 5th grade
COLORS ARE A FEELING

Red makes me feel like sunshine shining on a hill.
Blue doesn't look like red. Blue makes the day seem dull.
Pink doesn't make me feel like sunshine. Pink unlike red makes me feel floaty.
Yellow unlike red makes everything around me sparkle.
Black makes me feel heavy, very much unlike red.
Green makes me feel like I'm all wrinkled up.
Green is not as pretty as red, pink or orange.
White makes me feel happy just as I am now.
Purple is the end of the day and my poem.

--Eliza Bailey, 4th grade

I USED TO BUT NOW

I used to want to be a baseball player with my brother
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a singer
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a model
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a queen
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a dressmaker
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a boy
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a pen
But now I want to be a dancer
I used to want to be a king
But now I want to be a dancer

--Marion Mackles, 3rd grade

(From Wishes, Lies, and Dreams, Chelsea House, 1970 and Harper & Row, 1980)

Giraffes, how did they make Carmen? Well, you see, Carmen ate the prettiest rose in the world and then just then the great change of heaven occurred and she became the prettiest girl in the world and because I love her.

Lions, why does your mane flame like fire of the devil? Because I have the speed of the wind and the strength of the earth at my command.

Oh Kiwi, why have you no wings? Because I have been born with the despair to walk the earth without the power of flight and am damned to do so.

Oh bird of flight, why have you been granted the power to fly? Because I was meant to sit upon the branch and to be with the wind.

Oh crocodile, why were you granted the power to slaughter your fellow animal? I do not answer.

--Chip Wareing, 5th grade

(From Rose, Where Did You Get That Red?, Random House, 1974)

The lectures I gave and the books I wrote about teaching children to write poetry did have some influence on my poems. I think the introductory essays I wrote for Wishes, Lies, and Dreams and Rose, Where Did You Get That Red? did so particularly. I worked extremely hard on those introductions. I had never written really clear expository prose before. Hard as it was, I began to like it. I began getting aesthetic sensations from my clear instructional sentences:

The teacher shouldn't correct a child's poems either. If a word or line is unclear, it is fine to ask the child what he meant, but not to change it in order to make it meet one's own standards. The child's poem should be all his own. And of course one shouldn't use a child's poetry to analyze his personal problems. Aside from the scientific folly of so doing, it is sure to make children inhibited about what they write.

(From Wishes, Lies, and Dreams)

I liked the music that kind of prosy clarity made, and I wanted to get something like it in poetry, which I think I did in some of the poems in The Art of Love:

...The problem of being good and also doing what one wishes
Is not as difficult as it seems. It is, however,
Best to get embarked early on one's dearest desires.
Be attentive to your dreams. They are usually about sex,
But they deal with things as well in an indirect fashion
And contain information that you should have. You should also read poetry. Do not eat too many bananas.
In the springtime, plant. In the autumn, harvest.
In the summer and winter, exercise. Do not put Your finger inside a clam shell or
It may be snapped off by the living clam...

(From "Some General Instructions," 1974, in The Art of Love, Random House, 1975)
RUMORS

The whole fifth grade was suddenly amok with love Someone had thrown Jonas against Teresa in a game of catch-the-girls
And Jonas said I'm sorry She'd felt her arm slide over his Next Saturday he took her to the movies—or so she says and bought her a bracelet with two hearts, and a stuffed frilly lion.

Meanwhile David had thrown over serious-minded Tanya and showed interest in Wanda, his former enemy—
after telling everyone
he couldn't stand her guts.
And Wanda knew David's telephone number by heart.
She told it to her cousin who called David and said:
What do you think of Wanda?
And David screamed:
I can't stand her guts!
But Wanda knew he'd asked her out and had to keep their secret from the world,
and that was just his way.

The others who were not involved in this romantic life—
the slow ones, the workers, the short boys—
hated the lovers and called them brown-noses.
They thought that love meant sticking one's nose up a girl's behind.
But Christine, the tall mild grownup girl who wrote about horses, thought everyone was acting very childish, and wondered if the teacher needed help straightening off her desk, which looked a mess, or marking present-and-absent in the rollbook.

(From The Daily Round, SUN, 1976)

MERGING LANES ON A ONE-WAY STREET

The children I worked with changed my life in many deep ways, but I doubt that they affected my writing style. I would characterize that style as analytical and descriptive, focusing on the psychological and sociological contradictions of daily life. These are modes not too attractive to elementary school writers, who gravitate more to the heroic, satiric and supernatural.* Often, in fact, I envied their sense of plot. Granted, many of the troubles they inflicted or their characters were pinched from

* I need to qualify this generalization by explaining that occasionally one comes across children who are analytical, who brood ironically over small discordances in character and who have a distaste for the heroic. Some of these children have become my closest friends in the classroom.

63 73
television and comic books; but the sheer rapidity with which they pushed their protagonists through a landscape of choice and accident bespoke an affinity for plot at its dizziest, which I could only admire without hoping to imitate. I had been slowed down incalculably by the confusions of life. My aim was to untangle some of the snarls by writing carefully about small moments.

I even tried teaching children a more analytical approach to the moment, to perception and to memory. They did these assignments because I asked them to, and because I asked me, but I doubt that it changed my relation toward the moment. It was a way of lessening my own feelings of loneliness around them, on those days I felt introverted and cerebral, and longed to be having an adult conversation about Stendhal or Cavafy. Of course, many more times I was delighted to put that introversion aside and be refreshed by their cockeyed surprises. I went into their world of monsters and bandits happily. But sometimes I made them come into my world, just to keep the relationship equitable. Directing a production of Chekhov's Uncle Vanya with fifth and sixth graders was one such experiment, as well as a signal to me that I had better get out of working with children soon or I was going to start imposing my own adult ambitions on them in an unhealthy way. Who knows what would have been next: a production of the Ring cycle? A Wittgenstein study group?

We PITS (Poets-in-the-Schools) types used to talk about the possible mutual stylistic influences of children's writing and our own. The implication seemed to be that, since we had to make it simple and direct and emotional for children to be attracted to poetry, our own poems would take on these tendencies. Actually, the enormous influence of William Carlos Williams and the demotic "plain" style on PITS types (as opposed to poets in the academy) probably came before any contact with children's writing. Those drawn into PITS work to begin with were, on the whole, casual, populist, bohemian and democratic-sentimental; it's hard to be an aristocratic elitist on that salary or working with such diverse populations. The bold assertions (sometimes a matter of limited syntactical repertoire) found so often in children's poetic lines had a freshness and sincerity not without comic surrealist undertones, which the PITS-poet's ear was quick to pick up on, and relish--though it was more a question of finding support in an unconscious, largely untutored body of material for an aesthetic direction one had already started to follow, like Paul Klee letting the discovery of children's artwork reinforce his own.

I was bitten as deeply as anyone by the charm of children's writing, and for a while even preferred it to the work of my contemporaries in small press magazines. It felt more "whole," since it was less aware or less troubled by what it had left out; and it certainly felt less tainted by insecure writer's ego. Nevertheless, I saw no way to go back to writing like a child.

There were exceptions: an occasional "found" poem, like "Rumors," in which I basically wrote down what was happening to a group of fifth graders in a semblance of their own language as they had told it to me. Actually, the diction ended up a mixture of mine and theirs. I am leery of falling into a faux-naïf tone, always a danger in writing about childhood. It seems to me that an adult writer should never turn his back on his adult vocabulary. The trick is to convey the child's psychology in the mature language and style of the grownup: a double perspective. When it works, as in Black Boy, The Woman Warrior, So Long See You Tomorrow, it can be marvelous.

My elementary school students had a deeper influence on the content of my writing than on its style. Through the engrossing spectacle of their lives, they provided me with rich material—enough to fill a whole book, Being With Children, and many descriptive articles on education. I also wrote a bad one-act play set in a children's playground, my one and only dramatic attempt. I was more successful in using child-characters in my fiction. They appear prominently in "The Chamber Music Evening" and a new novella, The House on the Pond. There are also several memoir-essays drawn from my own childhood in my book, Bachelorhood. I think I would have written these personal reminiscences of childhood even if I had never taught a single class, because my childhood haunts me. However, working with children for twelve years gave me the confidence to try writing other portraits of children. I like working with child-characters in family settings because they provide a relief from the adult longeurs, and represent a potential for surprise and frankness. They bounce in and out of the living room so quickly. You never know what they're going to say in a scene: Child-characters can be very cute, and they can also be dangerous, like a ticking bomb.

The debt I owe the children I worked with is so much larger than I can indicate in this little essay that it is easier to deny the ways they might but didn't influence me than to speak of how they did. This is going to sound sticky, so to summarize as bluntly as possible: They made me see that I could be effective in the world; they made me feel loved; they gave me faith in my own shaky knowledge that I could love; and they fed back to me a sense, which had otherwise always been in doubt, that I was a good person.

BACKYARD JEALOUSY

It's a hot summer day and Shelli, like usual, is walking around showing off with Jennifer.

Hey, Caroline, I say, you wanna play with me?
I'll tell you who I like.

Okay, you promise you won't tell?
All right.
I think that Chuckie is cute.

Well who cares if you don't.
I do!

Look.
There she goes again showing off.
Hey, why are Chuckie and Ricky chasing Shelli and Jennifer?

Oh. They're playing Run, Catch, and Kiss.
I hate Shelli.
I always knew she was a fake!
I'm never going to play with her again.

Oh. Now they're wrestling on the grass.
Now I hate her even more.
I'm so jealous.
I don't know why, but I still am.
I feel like crying.
I really do.

Well, I guess I'll go inside and change.
Long pants on a summer day isn't exactly practical.

I know what.
I'll change into some shorts and a halter top.
Then maybe Chuckie will notice me.

Oh ya.
I'll put my hair up too.
That's the way Shelli always does her hair.

There. Hey, Mom!
How do I look?
Thanks, Except I don't want to take my hair down.

Hey Caroline.
I'm sorry I left you like this.
How do I look?
Thank you.

Let's go play in the playground.

--Sarah Oakes, 6th grade
SPRING

(For Cynthia)

I keep saying the details of our lives are also our symbols and our mysteries but people don't always believe it.

I felt all this again today sitting in your house: it's early March R has come from Chicago to visit you and your woods fifty miles from New York City.

I keep trying to simplify my life opening windows closing doors attacking the papers on my desk as if they were the sad story of all my lovers this winter taking up the space I need to write new poems.

you stop work on your novel about strangers and put us all in a new piece of which you are directly the center and it keeps happening to itself as you keep sticking in the events of five minutes ago.

V has written you from Berkeley that the baby he delivered in the snow-bound mountain cabin last December has died unwanted we are all wondering what we want besides the new chance at spring.

my weeks ahead are filled with work at schools that want poets to shine on their kids now the snow's gone: in May you'll head for New Mexico
R will be back in Chicago I'll be here waiting for C to come visit from Milwaukee maybe all three of you will by accident meet on the road for coffee

our friendship is blooming again you and I between the two of us we may get around enough to carry the smells of spring almost anywhere sometimes I really feel years as they say fall away and time that invention yielding to the seasons of earth

I have never used my poem "Spring" as a model in the classroom, but I think that what I have to tell kids, what I want to show them about the relationship between life and art, is pretty well expressed in the poem's first two lines. A good many of my poems are entirely literal, and, sometimes entirely factual, akin to documentary photography or filmmaking. I don't use metaphor very much in my poems. It has always seemed important to me to show students that the literal has as much place in poetry as the metaphorical.

Needless to say, I don't claim to have invented this idea. The influences on my own early work, those writers whose poems impelled me toward the kind of writing that has evolved into my "style" (or at least my way of looking at things), were Whitman and Williams, both of whose work I do use as models in the classroom.
One of the things I find most often when I go into a school is teachers as well as kids believing that for something to be counted as "creative" it has to be made up—and the less resemblance to real life the better. I myself long ago stopped using the term "creative," since it invariably leads to such misunderstanding. I always tell students that we are going to do "imaginative" writing. Like "image," I say, imagining refers to the capability of picturing something in your head—whether it's real or not—and so "imaginative" is a more inclusive term than "imaginary."

Often what I ask my students to do first of all is to imagine something real, like their room at home, using Williams' "Nantucket" as a model (thanks to a suggestion by poet Bob Hershon). Then they imagine what someone they know might be doing right this minute—get it written down so we can see it, I tell them. I call this a "movie" poem and the models for it are usually poems by other kids. After they are able to concentrate enough to visualize a person who's not there, and to follow his/her activities in their minds for five minutes, I figure they can concentrate enough to actually watch people, so I send them somewhere to do that.

In effect, this introductory procedure gives a lot of practice in turning the details of the world into poems, exercising a high degree of selectivity, with a minimum of invention. The length of residencies most places being what it is (with T&W as a blessed exception), I rarely get much beyond this first level of responding to the world by representing some aspect of it with accuracy and detail. But this seems to me a sufficiently important activity in itself.

When I worked with 5th and 6th graders at the Robert Frost (by coincidence) Elementary School in East Brunswick, New Jersey, we had a longer time than usual to get acquainted and work on poems. We did do metaphor, and various other things, but the most exciting aspect of this residency for me was the "rhythm" poems and the "movies," and their varian tion "motion" poems in which you describe someor... about 30 seconds--our model was Williams' poem about ... cat and the jam closet.

I suggested to the kids that they copy their poems on newsprint, big, so we could fill a hallway with the... very noticeably, for everyone to see and read. These room poems and movie poems and slow-motion poems were as plain as the newsprint, for the most part. Also, they were unadorned by any illustration and, if the truth be told, they were not very elegantly calligraphed (is that a verb?). It was like life being turned into words, but with no fuss and little delay. I saw my friend Cynthia's short story: "it keeps happening to itself."

In at least one instance at Frost the corresdonse correspondence was between the poem and the life of the school. After a lot of practice imagi
... ing, I sent two of my star fifth graders down to the school cafeteria one morning to observe and then to write movie poems describing the pre-lunch, lunch, and post-lunch activities.

As it happens, Frost School has one of the best cafeterias going. The food is not bad, and the staff is a lively bunch. They always carry on their jobs with real verve (I don't use that word often), and they have a good time. Cheryl Domenichetti's poem featured lines like "Helen is cleaning up trays while the rest argue with Jenny because she doesn't want to answer the phone." Jonathan Ackerman wrote: "The milk lady strolls out her cart...."

When these were copied out big, we brought them to the cafeteria, and the ladies hung the poems up on their kitchen wall, where they stayed until we had our public reading later in the spring.

This event featured everyone in the class reading at least one poem. As a display, we set up portable bulletin boards, and hung all the big-print poems, so the parents could walk among them as in a gallery. You could see they were impressed, although they were not too sure what this had to do with poetry. Like most other people, they wanted to think of poems as very removed from life, not very involved with life (let me refer you now to the third line of my poem). But the kids had all got the point, which was the very simple one that their lives could generate art, and that the making of a poem could be a matter of selection as well as invention. My students understood that they had both the resources and the power to make poetry.

During the course of the evening, I think the parents also came to understand, because they saw their daughters and sons coming to the microphone one by one and reading poems that were made from their own lives, and yet, like art, transcended the moments of experience they were drawn from, through that process of distillation that is so easy to recognize and so hard to describe.

I was proud of the kids and of my own efforts as well. They in turn were proud of their poems and the over-sized copies that showed them off. We all had a fine evening, and if I hadn't already written those first lines of "Spring," I'm sure I could have done it right then.
LOWER EAST SIDE: 1960's

I want to try to be fair about this.
So far I haven't been.
To the left is a dark woman with long black hair.
Dressed in a white cotton shirt and a long blue cotton skirt.
So there.

What good does it do?
I could explain--describe-- everybody on the street and even the physical relation of each to each in the frame. Of the eye. The fruit and vegetable carts and the old horses.
The cries the talk the laughter.
The fast-talking foreign accents.
Blankets and sheets hanging from second story fire escapes.
I did want to trail the scene.
Fast and smoothly. But I lived here too long without knowing them.

INTERVIEW WITH CLARENCE MAJOR

(This is an excerpt from an interview that took place in Boulder, Colorado on March 18, 1981.)
NANCY BUNGE: You've said things that imply to me that you believe in order to write anything original or interesting, you have to get as close to your perception of things as you can.

CLARENCE MAJOR: I don't remember saying that, but it sounds true. (Laughter) I would say that it's very complex and difficult because this whole idea of getting into yourself constitutes a problem because if you're writing from an intensive, personal, subjective point of view, you're also facing the inevitable problem of near-sightedness. You're very likely to miss something. One example: I was living in New York. I was walking along the street and passing in front of the laundromat and a dog was tied to the parking meter. A little girl came out of the laundromat to pet the dog and the dog bit off her ear. Whack! Just like that. A lot of people gathered around and it was a very tragic moment. It was not the thing you would expect on a casual afternoon; people were feeling good in the city; it was one of the first warm days. I tried to write a poem about it. I wanted to say something about how it affected me and what the implications were: how unsafe I felt we all were, forever. To try to put that on paper proved to be extremely difficult and finally, impossible. I was just too close to it. I tried to do it that very day. What we very often need is some distance, not just from the experience, but from ourselves, in order to write anything worthwhile.

That distance is very necessary and can be achieved in different ways. Usually my process is doing a first draft and not knowing how I feel about it. I'll put it away and look at it six months later, three weeks later, sometimes two years later, and then I can start working at the thing in some sort of objective way, because I can then see what's there in a way that I wasn't able to see in the beginning. But that's my process. I tend to overwrite and have to cut a lot, so usually what I do is look for the essence of it and try to refocus the thing and glean out whatever vitality might be there. But I don't necessarily encourage my students to write that way. We're all individuals, and we're all different. There are many, many ways in which things can be accomplished. What I try to do is understand my students' processes. It's really interesting for me to see all those different ways that things can be made, watching the students work.

NB: So you try to understand how they go about it and then reinforce whatever...

CM: Yeah, right. And I don't ever impose a group assignment, but I make assignments optional so that they pick and choose because the students work in different ways, and it would be unreasonable to try to make all them in my image.

NB: Or encourage them to do anything in a certain way.

CM: Right. Except their way.

NB: That must be exhausting.

CM: It is, it is. (Laughter)

NB: Someone else I've spoken with said that his students think that all good writing makes an important point and so they spend all their energy trying to think up a "significant thesis." Have you seen that tendency in your students?

CM: Yes, especially the fiction writers. They have an argument that they need to give expression to, and they build the story around the argument. There is a student in one of my classes now who writes excellent satirical pieces about political situations, and you can see that the fiction is really there as a kind of conveyor for this argument. Well, then you think, 'That's what the history of satire has always been, really.' You look back to Swift; you look back to Nathaniel West. I think it's OK and probably works pretty well, and it certainly has a substantial tradition. But the other situation is a lot more aggravating: where the students have some sort of muddled notion of what the point of view should be and so on and simply try to decorate that idea with a few pages of careless prose. That's a lot more disturbing from my point of view.

NB: What do you do?

CM: I do several things, depending on the situation. (Laughter) I try the positive approach, to use these pieces in different ways to discuss writing problems. But I run into the problem of so many students being in workshops for approval rather than tough, hard criticism, and that's one of the more difficult things that I have to face in dealing with the kinds of manuscripts that are, quote—-not worth talking about—-unquote.

I don't believe that I can always help anyone become a better writer, but I think I can always help them become better readers and then become more sensitive to the language and how it's put together. They take that writerly experience back to the reading process; I've seen it happen. They understand something of the process and therefore they can read with greater sensitivity, and more pleasure too.

NB: A large number of the people I've spoken with talk about the importance of having their students read aloud and listen to their own work. Is that...
CM: Yeah, I think so. I have certain kinds of prose read in class because they lend themselves to that kind of expression; it's not just a visual experience. I certainly learn a lot by reading my work in public; it's a way of educating myself in public, or not educating myself, but rewriting, which is an educational process. And a way of getting distance too, looking at my work from different angles. Very often right in front of an audience, I will make a mental note to change something I'm reading because I've suddenly had the experience of seeing what's wrong with it as I'm reading it. So I think reading aloud is important.

NB: One article I read suggested having the students talk into tape recorders and then write from that material. The author said he thought that would make what they wrote more honest because people tend to lie when they write.

CM: They think of writing only as an approximation of their speech and the extent of our normal experience with writing is to write a letter to someone and it's not really the same. It's always the same tired, worn-out expressions: "Dear Betty, I'm sorry that I didn't write earlier...," rather than doing it the way we would speak. We get into the habit of thinking that writing cannot be an instrument of the speaking voice, but the most effective writing has been an approximation of the voice. I'm always trying to get students to write in their own voices and also to write out of their experiences and to write about what they know about and part of that process involves using an approximation of their own speech, not the way Shakespeare wrote and talked.

NB: That sounds good. I had a student Jas. year who used inflated language, because he was scared, I guess, and when he came to my office, I had him read his paper out loud. He knew right away what the problem was.

CM: I run into it all the time with students who will get fascinated with a certain writer and they'll be writing that writer's prose. That's fine as a learning process, but one should move beyond that and constantly think in terms of moving toward one's own voice and one's own speech and one's own rhythms. That idiom is a vital part of the experiences they should be writing about.

Most students in college today aren't going to have an opportunity to be in touch with who they are and where they come from in such an intense way ever again as they will in a workshop. They will go into different kinds of things: business, engineering, the sciences; but, hopefully, they will remember how important it was to create a wedding of the voice that was theirs and the history that was theirs. No matter how much television one watches or how many movies one watches, the kinds of associations produced by those kinds of experiences remain marginal and accidental and incidental; they won't be like the experience of writing and discovering one's voice and creating that bridge to an audience. That's an entirely unique experience that there is no substitute for.

(Copyright © 1982 by Clarence Major and Nancy Bunge)
THE COAT

When it snowed my brother and I watched from our window. Roofs, antennas, skylights all turned white.

"I don't want to go out by myself," Norberto said.

"You have to. We can't both go together. I'll watch you through the window."

We had to ask permission.

"Ma!" I shouted. She was in the other room ironing. "Can Norberto go out in the snow. then me?"

"Yes," she said. "But don't cross the street."

He put on the coat. It was a brown coat with a checkered pattern running from the shoulders to the waist on both sides of the front. It was an old coat that had belonged to one of our cousins. Some of our cousins had been born in New York. We had never seen them before. When we came it was October, not very cold. My father, who had been here already for six months, met us at the airport. He had jackets for us, and they were all right because it was not winter yet. We visited all our cousins we had never seen before, and when the winter came one of them gave us a coat, but there were two of us.

He went out. I watched for him through the window. Below was an empty lot. The snow was falling, piling up on the window ledge. I opened the window a little, gathered the white powder into a ball and tossed it from hand to hand. My fingers became red, so I put the snow down on the window sill. I looked out on the white world. It was silent. Everything seemed numb. Norberto appeared in the lot. He raised his hands over his head and waved them back and forth. He was shouting something at me, but I couldn't hear him. He ran around, stopping to shake the snow from his shoes. He made a snowball and threw it against a brick wall. Then he disappeared around the edge of the building toward the stoop.

Soon he was back.

"It's too cold," he said. "My feet are freezing."

"I got some snow from the window," I said. I turned to get the snowball. There was a puddle on the window sill. Water was dripping on the floor.

"You better clean it up," he said, glancing toward the other room.

I got the dish rag from the sink and was wiping up the snow water when my mother walked in. She didn't say anything. I waited.

"How's the snow?" she asked Norberto.

"Too cold," he answered. "My feet got wet."

"Put on a dry pair of socks," she said. She sat him down on a chair and took off his shoes and socks. She rubbed his feet to make them warm.

"Are you going out too, Mario?" she asked.

"Yeah, I want to see what it's like."

"It's cold!" Norberto said.

"Get something from the store," she said.

"All right," I said.

She didn't say anything about the water. She told me what to get. Norberto handed me the coat.

"Here's the notebook," my mother said. I reached out for the notebook and put it in the coat pocket. It was a little notebook.

I went out. The radiator in the hallway, under the battered mailboxes, was knocking like crazy. I hurried into the street.

The snow was coming down very thick. The footprints my brother had made were almost covered. There were no people on the street except for me. I waited on the stoop wondering what to do. I looked up to let the snow fall on my face. Snowflakes melted on my nose and cheeks. I made a snowball and threw it at a parked car, then looked around to check whether anyone had seen me.

It was no fun to be alone. I ran a little way on the sidewalk then looked back to see my tracks. I walked backward stepping in my footprints. It looked as if I had disappeared where my tracks stopped. That was an Indian trick I had seen in a comic book. I had seen a lot of things in comic books. 'Specially comic books about Indians. Suppose an Indian wanted a coat. He'd go out in the woods, hunt down a bear, take the skin and make himself a bear skin coat. First he'd look for tracks, then dig a hole right where the tracks are because that's where the bear walks. He'd cover the hole with branches, so that it looks like there's no hole there at all. When the bear comes by, swapo! Right into the trap. I wished I could hunt down a bear for a coat. I went in the empty lot, and I started to dig a hole in the snow. I knew there weren't any bears. New York City, but there was nothing else to do. I looked up to the window. Norberto was there.

"I'm gonna catch a bear," I shouted up to him, pointing at the hole.

He put his hand to his ear. I shouted louder. He shook his head, his hand still at his ear. He couldn't hear me. I wished that he were helping me to dig the hole. But then if he were with me there wouldn't be any need to catch a bear. I got to thinking that since there were no bears, probably the only thing that would fall in the hole would be a stray dog. That wouldn't be any good for a coat.

Digging a hole in snow was hard work, and I had no gloves and no galoshes. I couldn't tell which were colder, my hands or my feet. I remembered the store. The wind had started up, and the snowflakes were wild, running in waves as if to escape but only dashing themselves against cars and walls, then falling to the ground.
In back of the grocery store there was a little bell that was attached to the door by a string. Whenever anyone came in through the front, the bell rang, to let Don Justino, the grocer, know that someone was in. That way if anybody came to rob him, he wouldn't be caught by surprise. Besides the bell Don Justino had a German shepherd that growled all the time. It had attacked Don Justino once. I remember Don Justino had bandages all over his face and hands, but he still kept the dog. I guess he was more afraid of losing his money than of being mauled, though he did put a muzzle on the dog after that. Beside the store Don Justino owned a brick house and a row of garages, which he rented out, behind the house. Everyone bought on credit at Don Justino's, and he even lent out money. He was always writing down numbers. He would write in his big book how much you owed him, and he would write down in your little book how much you owed him. And sometimes people would just say a number to him, and he would write it down in a different book. I didn't know then why he did that. On Sundays he gave away money to policemen. That was, my father said, so he might sell beer on a day meant for going to church.

The bell rang when I walked into the store. Some of the snow tried to get in with me.

"Dos libras de arroz y una caja de abichuelas," I said to Don Justino.

There were candy jars on the counter. They sat there grinning like fat little men. The jellybean jar laughed a rainbow of jellybean colors that broke up into perfect jellybeans. The more it laughed the more jellybeans appeared. Then they fell on the counter making a sound like raindrops on a window pane.

"Anything else?" Don Justino asked.

The jellybeans disappeared.

I handed him the little notebook. He wrote down how much we owed him for the rice and beans.
Another kid walked in with a notebook just like mine.

"Isn't that your brother's coat?" he said.
I didn't say anything, but he said, "You wanna come out later to play?"
"I don't know," I said. "My name is Mario. My brother's name is Norberto."
"I'm Raymond. Your brother can't come. He don't have no coat."
I didn't say anything.

WRITING AND TEACHING

How does teaching affect the writer's writing? When I first approached the job, I didn't have a clear overview of the matter. I was confronted with a roomful of students who were supposed to write in my presence. I thought my task was to provide assignments that would serve as catalysts. We can call this the Firecracker Approach: The students are charged but inert until the fuse is lit, at which point they explode with creativity. This was the prevalent approach in the late '60s. All the T&W writers were busy creating starter exercises, the kind in The Whole Word Catalogue 1. This approach worked well enough at the time. But I began to ask myself, "Is this the way I write?" I couldn't tell my students just to wait until inspiration strikes. That was what I did in my own writing. But it was too unrealistic for the classroom.

I had no satisfactory way of solving this dilemma, but I had become alerted to the fact that I needed answers. I tried to remember exactly what I did when I sat down to write: my mind would usually become unfocused for a while. Some-Sometimes an image would appear, and I would jot it down. Sometimes I'd have intimations of a rhythm, and I'd try to find words to fit it. But sometimes my mind remained unfocused, and I was unable to write anything.

I picked up clues where I could. I read books about writing. I kept a sharp eye out for what other writer/teachers were doing. I tried using a tape recorder with children. That turned out to be an excellent tool in the classroom. I tried it on myself--no go. I could not compose on the machine. Writing had to be something more than speech.

Finally I hit upon a plausible model of the mental activities that lead to writing. I presupposed that the mind is constantly generating streams of words and images that relate to whatever input it has ever received. Since sensory input is myriad, we may assume that there are multiple and simultaneous generations of words and images. The generating mechanism may be like a magic cauldron that bubbles continually, the contents never diminishing no matter how much of it is siphoned off. The problem of writing then becomes one of creating the siphon and seeing to it that only the appropriate material flows through it. So the problem often thought of as scarcity (the proverbial "dry spell") may really be one of access to overabundance.

This view of the origins of the writing stream has made me feel certain that the basic material is there, and it has removed a great deal of anxiety from the process of setting it down. The less anxiety there is, the easier it becomes to order the material, because the act of focusing becomes more manageable. Teaching writing forced me to analyze my own writing process, and I eventually came away with an understanding of it that led to better writing for me.

I doubt that through my contact with the students I experienced some subtle alteration of writing consciousness. Although children's lack of sophistication often allows them to use language in a startling way (which many poets strive to do), this ability in children is due primarily to a lack of facility with the language rather than a mastery of it. When my three-year-old son describes an eye ailment by saying, "I have a bicycle wheel in my eye," it is to him an accurate description of how his eye feels, not an attempt to be figurative. As his vocabulary increases he is likely to abandon the image of the bicycle wheel because it will no longer seem to him accurate enough. Many of us who have worked in the schools have been inclined to look at this progression in children—from what appears to be figurative language to more abstract forms—as a corruption brought about by education. In truth it is a natural development. It seems to us a falling from grace, because as sophisticated adults we are moving in the opposite direction. We are trying to hone our ability to produce figurative language, and so we envy what seems effortless in the child. What the child is doing is not really what we want to do, though on the surface it is strikingly similar.

In the final analysis, the influence of teaching on my writing was not so much external—not from the students as much as from myself. The classroom experience forced me to fall back on my own experience with writing, and in that way I was unavoidably confronted with the persistent problems of creating order out of chaos, which is essentially what writing is about.
ABIODUN OYEWOLE

ANOTHER MOUNTAIN

Sometimes there's a mountain that I must climb even after I have climbed one already

But my legs are tired now and my arms need a rest
my mind is too weary right now But I must climb before the storm comes before the earth rocks and an avalanche of clouds buries me and smothers my soul
And so I prepare myself for another climb
Another mountain
and I tell myself it is nothing it is just some more dirt and stone and every now and then I should reach another plateau and enjoy the view of the trees and flowers below
And I am young enough to climb and strong enough to make it to any top
You see the wind has warned me about settling too long about peace without struggle
The wind has warned me and taught me how to fly
But my wings only work
After I've climbed a mountain
In a world of color television, quadrophonic sound cinemas, 2000 lb. portable radios, stereos, super Sony Walkmans, newspapers, magazines, billboards, telegrams and mailgrams, "word of mouth" still reigns supreme. Oral tradition still remains the most viable and effective means of communication.

For the last three years I have used an oral tradition concept to teach children and young adults creative writing. For example, if I want to teach simile I sing one of my original songs that highlights the use of simile: "Just like the leaves holding on in a breeze we got to be strong and get along" ("Black Order"). This both illustrates my point and gets juices flowing by having everyone sing along.

It is important to note however that in order for this oral tradition approach to teaching to be successful, the teacher has to memorize numerous poems and songs as well as have the ability to perform them. With this approach each class session is like a performance with audience participation. With the recent advent of the "Rap"--a rhyming story done to a disco beat--this concept becomes even more viable and valuable.

Many teachers and parents have complained to me that all their kids do is repeat those "stupid" raps all day, such as the Sugar Hill Gang's "Hotel motel Holiday Inn if your girl starts acting up then you take her friend."

Even though I had taught children the poetry of Langston Hughes and Mari Evans, as well as other children, none of this had the force of the Sugar Hill Gang or Master Flash and the Furious Five. I began realizing it wasn't so much the words, that came at you at the speed of light in a most incoherent fashion, it was the rhythm--the percussion of the rhyme and the sensuality of the human voice pulsating in an intense rhythm supported by loud percussion instruments—that created this force. Many times I've asked the kids what these groups are saying and to explain it to me. They seem almost amazed because it's something they've never thought about before. They just repeat the raps like a well-programmed computer.

With this new knowledge, I began bringing in "consciousness raising" raps. For example: "Now is the time for us to be more in control of our destiny / change the game from rich and poor and learn to love each other more," (from my rap poem "Now Is The Time").

Another aspect of rap poetry that coincides with good ol' oral tradition is the concept of storytelling. In most cases a story is being told in rap poems, rhythm 'n' blues songs and even in some disco. The story is not always the most positive or mentally stimulating, but there are stories nonetheless.

In addition to the percussive rhythm and the story, there is a special vocabulary common to each generation. There are certain slang expressions like "That's Badd" and "Take a chill pill" that become an integral part of the communications network among young people.

In my efforts to communicate with the young folks, I used one of their popular slang expressions, "I got it like that" (an expression that exudes confidence), to develop a story-poem which later became a song about a young man trying to court a girl who looks physically mature but is in fact only in her early teens. In the song I used figurative language as well as the three main ingredients of oral tradition: strong rhythm and rhyme, storytelling, and language common to the people.*

* "She Got It Like That", is available from Street Beat Records.
One of the most incredible results of my teaching oral poetry is that the children in the upper grades voluntarily share the songs and poems with the children of the lower grades. This is what the oral tradition is all about. Academically, the definitions of poetry, prose, and all of their ingredients (metaphor, simile, alliteration, personification, and onomatopoeia) are understood better because the students now have tangible examples in original songs and poems, some by the children themselves.

Harlem is like a red rose
Harlem is like a book with black and white pages
Harlem is like a magic potion
Harlem is like a pot of black eye peas
Being in Harlem is like kissing someone you love

--Karen Haskett

Harlem is like a black and white T.V.
Harlem is like the blackest night
Harlem is like a red black and green rainbow
Harlem is sweet like a chocolate cake
Sometimes Harlem is like a wild woolly cat

--Latasha Matthews

Harlem is like a bell
Sometimes it's like a wishing well Harlem's got a nice smile and a whole lot of style

--Victor Tuck
HIGH HEELS

I have a vision in my head of Cubism and Constructivism in all their artistic purity joined with a decorative attractiveness that exceeds deliciousness, even more to be desired than becoming a milkman in a white suit and hat delivering milk to the back door of a white frame house on a street lined with elms and being invited inside
by the curvaceous, translucent lady of the house, not once but many times, too many times, perhaps, for later her husband will be coming home with a sledgehammer in his hand, the pink hand with light blue fingernails, oh
you have colored the wrong picture!
You were to put the pink and blue on the beachball on the next page.

(From Triangles in the Afternoon, SUN, 1979)

THRÉÉ LITTLE WORDS

The mountain grew as the winding road cracked and the bird watched.
The boob had continuing excitement with a typewriter on fire.

The cornucopia filled with colored popcorn tumbled onto the map of Fredonia.

The enormous Yugoslavian has no cartilage.

The peachy tomatoes fell on the oceanographer's head.

We played baseball and the temperature was rising like the people.

--Collaboration, 11th grade

I once had an odd experience in the classroom. Or rather, one of my students did.

It was in Newark, Delaware, spring of 1975. I was in the final week of teaching poetry in all the city's junior high schools for three months, five days a week. At that point I was really rolling, from both the exhilaration of knowing that I had enjoyed such a demanding residency and from the sheer momentum of sustained high-energy teaching. I was having especially good teaching experiences in working with dreams and dreamlike material. There was something about the children in Newark that made them very excited about thinking and talking and writing about their dreams, as if they had been waiting all their lives for this chance.

Those three months I kept a diary, using a tape recorder. Every morning, at first dim consciousness, I recounted my dreams into the bedside microphone, usually without opening my eyes. And every afternoon after work I described the day's teaching experiences. So the diary went:
dream/teaching/dream/teaching/etc. My dreams appeared to be unaffected by my teaching, but my teaching took on something like the automatic magic of the dream. Simply telling my dreams to the students, for "starters," put some weird fascination into the air.

In this particular class—a bright and responsive one—I started by talking about dreams and nightmares, dreams continuing after you fall back asleep, recurring dreams, déjà vu, how to remember your dreams better, how to influence them to some extent, what dreams might mean, and some of the ways they work, especially how they mysteriously transpose places and people and times, and how the dreamer can be both in a dream and outside it at the same time. About then I noticed that a girl sitting in the back had begun to cry silently, but rather than call attention to her I kept talking, as the teacher tactfully escorted her out.

The next day I was told that the girl had been taken to the nurse's office, where she had sobbed and muttered incoherently for 20 minutes.
She then calmed down enough to tell her best friend that during the class she had seen her grandmother enter the room, walk over, hand her a cat, and then exit, and that she knew with absolute certainty then that her grandmother had just died.
Aside from this experience of an unexpected visitation, the girl was thought to be normal.

I single out this experience not because I think its strange unhappiness is desirable, but because it serves as a graphic (if gloomy) parallel to what I sometimes experience when writing poetry: the words arrive unexpectedly in my mind and flow down through my fingers onto the page, taking sudden turns on their own. It is similar to—but not the same as—automatic writing, for although I relinquish some control of the poem, I do monitor its arrival. I even feel free enough to allow my aesthetic judgement to move in and out of the poem, altering the poem's automatic turns almost as they happen.

93

For example, in "High Heels" the abstract music of the first six lines—the sonority of those words read aloud or heard in the mind—gives way suddenly to a pleasant visual image from a late 1930s movie, which then becomes threatening with the idea of the angry husband, and then comic with the exaggeration of "sledgehammer." Abruptly the camera zooms in on the husband's hand, the outline of a hand from a coloring book, and even more suddenly—with the "oh"—a different voice is saying the poem's last three lines. And then the voice is gone: the poem is over.

This poem burst in on me one night and took three minutes to be written. I don't know where it came from, but I do know that it's mysteriously satisfying to write poems such as "High Heels." I wanted my students to have something of that experience, too, so—sometimes at the risk of being the boob with his flaming typewriter—I designed writing situations for them in which the everyday world reveals something surprising and true about itself or else just falls away completely.
Grace Paley

A woman invented fire and called it the wheel
Was it because the sun is round
I saw the round sun bleeding to sky
And fire rolls across the field from forest to treetop
It leaps like a bike with a wild boy riding it

oh, she said
see the orange wheel of heat light that turned me from the window of my mother's home to home in the evening

SOME NOTES ON TEACHING:
Probably Spoken

Here are about fifteen things I might say in the course of a term. To freshmen or seniors. To two people or a class of twenty. Every year the order is a little different because the students' work is different, and I am in another part of my life. I do not elaborate on plans or reasons, because I need to stay as ignorant in the art of teaching as I want them to remain in the art of literature. The assignments I give are usually assignments I've given myself, problems that have defeated me, investigations I'm still pursuing.

1. Literature has something to do with language. There's probably a natural grammar at the tip of your tongue. You may not believe it, but if you say what's on your mind in the language that comes to you from your parents and your street and friends you'll probably say something beautiful. Still, if you weren't a tough recalcitrant kid, that language may have been destroyed by the tongues of schoolteachers who were ashamed of interesting homes, inflection, and language and left them all for correct usage.

2. A first assignment: To be repeated whenever necessary, by me or the class. Write a story, a first person narrative in the tongue of someone with whom you're in conflict. Someone who disturbs you, worries you, someone you don't understand. Use a situation you don't understand.

3. No personal journals, please, for about a year. Why? Boring to me. When you find only yourself interesting, you're boring. When I find only myself interesting, I'm a conceited bore. When I'm interested in you, I'm interesting.

4. This year, I want to tell stories. I ask my father, now that he's old and not so busy, to tell me stories, so I can learn how. I try to remember my grandmother's stories, the faces of her dead children. A first assignment for this year: Tell a story in class, something that your grandmother told you about a life that preceded yours. That will remind us of our home language. Another story: at Christmas time or Passover supper extract a story from the oldest persons told them by the oldest persons they remember. That will remind us of history. Also—because of time shortage and advanced age, neither your father or your grandmother will bother to tell unimportant stories.

5. It's possible to write about anything in the world, but the slightest story ought to contain the facts of money and blood in order to be interesting to adults. That is—everybody continues on this earth by courtesy of certain economic arrangements, people are rich or poor, make a living or don't have to, are useful to systems, or superfluous. --And blood--the way people live as families or outside families or in the creation of family, sisters, sons, fathers, the bloody ties. Trivial work ignores these two FACTS and is never comic or tragic.

May you do trivial work?

WELL

6. You don't even have to be a writer.
Read the poem "With Argus," by Paul Goodman. It'll save you a lot of time. It ends:

The shipwright looked at me with mild eyes.
"What's the matter friend? You need a New Ship from the ground up, with art, a lot of work, and using the experience you have--"
"I'm tired!" I told him in exasperation, "I can't afford it!"

"No one asks you, either," he patiently replied, "to venture forth. Whither? why? maybe just forget it," And he turned on his heel and left me--here.

7. Lucky for art, life is difficult, hard to understand, useless and mysterious. Lucky for artists, they don't require art to do a good day's work. But critics and teachers do. A book, a story, should be smarter than its author. It is the critic or the teacher in you or me who cleverly outwits the characters with the power of prior knowledge of meetings and ends.

Stay open and ignorant.

(For me, the problem: How to keep a class of smart kids--who are on top of Medieval German and Phenomenology--dumb? Probably too late and impossible.)
Something to read: Cocteau's journals.

8. Sometimes I begin the year by saying:
   This is a definition of fiction. Stesichorus was blinded for mentioning that Helen had gone off to Troy with Paris. He wrote the following poem and his sight was restored:

   Helen, that story is not true
   You never sailed in the benched ships
   You never went to the city of Troy.

9. Two good books to read:

   A Life Full of Holes, Charhadi
   I Work Like a Gardener, Joan Miro

10. What is the difference between a short story and a novel? The amount of space and time any decade can allow a subject and a group of characters. All this clear only in retrospect.
    Therefore: Be risky.

11. A student says--why do you keep saying a Work of Art? You're right. It's a bad habit.
    I mean to say a Work of Truth.

12. What does it mean To Tell the Truth?
    It means--for me--to remove all lies. A Life Full of Holes was said truthfully at once from the beginning. Therefore, we know it can be done. But I am, like most of you, a middle-class person of articulate origins. Like you I was considered verbal and talented and then improved upon by interested persons. These are some of the lies that have to be removed.

1. The lie of injustice to characters.
2. The lie of writing to an editor's taste, or a teacher's.
3. The lie of writing to your best friend's taste.
4. The lie of the approximate word.
5. The lie of unnecessary adjectives.
6. The lie of the brilliant sentence you love the most.

13. Don't go through life without reading the autobiographies of Emma Goldman
    Prince Kropotkin
    Malcolm X

14. Two peculiar and successful assignments. Invent a person—that is, name the characteristics and we will write about him or her. Last year it was a forty-year-old divorced policeman with two children.

   An assignment called the List Assignment. Because inside the natural form of day beginning and ending, supper with the family, an evening at the Draft Board, there are the facts of noise, conflict, echo. In other years, the most imaginative, inventive work has happened in these factual accounts.

   For me too.

15. The stories of Isaac Babel and the conversation with him reported by Konstantin Paustovsky in Years of Hope. Also, Paustovsky's The Story of a Life, a collection of stories incorrectly called autobiography.

   Read the Poem "The Circus Animals' Desertion" by William Butler Yeats.

   Students are missing from these notes. They do most of the talking in class. They read their own work aloud in their own voices and discuss and disagree with one another. I do interrupt, interject any one of the preceding remarks or one of a dozen others, simply bossing my way into the discussion from time to time because after all, it's my shop. To enlarge on these, I would need to keep a journal of conversations and events. This would be against my literary principles and pedagogical habits—all of which are subject to change.

Therefore: I can only describe the fifteen points I've made by telling you that they are really notes for beginners, or for people like myself, who must begin again and again in order to get anywhere at all.

Richard Perry

(From The Summer Is Ended, and We Are Not Saved, a novel in progress)

I don't mean to sound as if Marcus was a monster. I loved my brother. When I was a child, I ido-lized him. But he was so obviously my father's favorite that I felt excluded and I grew to resent him. The resentment peaked in the days before we left for Mississippi. I hadn't planned to go south. Changing the world was not important to me; it is not important now. I was going to college in the fall to study photography. I was not happy in that house. My father and I had had a fight; he wouldn't forgive me. He was upset because of Marcus; he had vowed that Marcus would not go to Mississippi. He'd begun to drink heavily, alternated between brooding and rage.

In my father's relationship to Marcus Garvey, my brother said, could be found the key to my father's craziness about Marcus going to Mississippi. A very long time ago my father had served as Garvey's driver and bodyguard. That was in the summer of his sixteenth year; he'd been big for his age. A year and a half later, a brutal winter found him married with a baby on the way. At the insistence of my mother, who complained of a lack of money, he'd quit and gone to work in a meat-packing plant. And though he'd kept his membership in Garvey's organization, he wasn't where he should have been, at the side of the man who'd been his leader and spiritual father. Because of his absence, the federal agents had come and taken Garvey without a fight. A man who would not protect that which was important to him was less than a man, and my father had never forgiven himself.
Through Garvey, my brother said, my father had had an opportunity to change the condition of black people in America, and he had, by acceding to his wife's demands, allowed circumstances to prevent him from doing so. And now his children had inherited this condition, and the unarmed efforts of his oldest son to change it could conceivably cost that son's life. It was not, Marcus said, a legacy to ease the heart of an aging man, and it was this guilt that had driven him to drunkenness and rage.

I don't know about all of that. I know that my father insists to this day that Garvey was framed. I know that my father was betrayed by a person or persons he would not name. I know that on the day he went to prison for plotting to break Garvey out of jail, a baby girl was born to my mother. That was February, 1925. The baby lived for three days and died in the midst of vomit and a strangled cry, the result, my mother said, of milk gone bad from worrying.

Two years later, a month after Garvey was deported, my father, carrying a brown paper bag, dressed in the suit one size too small for him, walked through the prison gates into a morning so drunk with sunlight he thought his heart would burst. His wife was waiting, sat on a bench in an arboretum festive with birds and blossoms. When she saw him, she stood as if startled, as if her waiting was some penitent ritual outside the fortress walls, and her husband's appearance this morning miraculous answer to habitual prayer.

Testing the solidity of earth beneath his feet, the ease with which the body carved passage through unrestricted space, my father went to her. He spoke in the tone that men reserve for solemn occasions and took her home to resume their lives together. Neither he nor my mother mentioned why until much later, but there were no more children until Marcus, and by then my father had been home from prison sixteen years.
I remember the morning Marcus told me he was leaving for Mississippi. We were on our way to the hotel where we worked as busboys. He was talking about the beauty and nobility of passive resistance as if he had invented it. The day was glistening. The rhythms of his voice suggested song.

"Listen," he said. "You're my brother, right?"

"Yes."

"And you love me?"

"Of course."

"I'm going to tell you something and you got to promise not to tell."

I knew what he was going to say. I didn't want to hear it. "Marcus," I began, but the sun was full in his face, making his eyes glitter, his skin turn bronze. I asked when he was leaving.

"Sometime in the next two weeks."

I didn't know what to say. I knew how he was. I did not doubt his appreciation of the theory of nonviolence; I doubted his ability to apply it. He had never backed down from a fight. Even on those occasions when he'd been badly beaten, there'd been something inside him that would not admit defeat, a persistence that had driven much larger foes to attempts at conciliation, and finally to desperation and tears. I had heard enough about Mississippi to know that it denied the existence of men like Marcus; I knew he would go out of his way to confirm it. And he would be destroyed. I needed to say this to him, but I felt that to say it was to make it certain. So I just stood there, speechless and stupid, and then I asked if he were scared.

"Scared?" He grinned. "I'm scared to death."

His answer moved me. It was one of the rare times that I heard him admit to uncertainty or fear. Things were mixing in my gut, my own fear, great love, and when he looked at me his face seemed thin and brave and very young. I watched his face until I couldn't stand it.
"But what about Daddy?"
He shrugged and stopped smiling. "He does what he got to do. I do what I got to do."
Like countless others of my generation, he had joined the movement. Like many of them, he became a casualty. But his wounds did not consist simply of disillusionment, nor even of the bruises and broken bones of beatings. This would not have been enough for Marcus, who, in addition to his pride, or because of it, possessed an almost theatrical sense of the gesture, the statement made not with words but with action. Getting his brains blown out by a shotgun at point-blank range was a dramatic statement. But he was my brother, and it left him dead.
I did not know any of this that morning. Though I was afraid for him, I had not learned enough about the world to imagine his ending in such graphic terms. I don't think Marcus had learned enough, either. He only knew that he was young, strong, and committed, and that the world was out there, ready to be conquered.

FICTION: RECREATING THE EXPERIENCE

"We had the experience, but missed the meaning," T.S. Eliot writes in "The Dry Salvages." For me, writing fiction is an attempt to recreate my experience and to discover its meaning. I do not mean by experience simply what I've done or what has happened to me. Experience includes books I've read, conversations overhead, dreams, fantasies, and especially feelings. This definition, which expands rather than limits possibilities, can be helpful to student writers, many of whom claim they have nothing to write about. But it can also lead to protests that "this or that experience is too personal for print." To this I reply that everything is personal, and that the protest is nothing more than acknowledgement that fiction is revelatory.

This acknowledgement should not provide an obstacle to writing fiction. First, the result of recreating experience is not necessarily autobiography. Second, if the experience is uncomfortably autobiographical, there are fictional conventions (point of view, characterization, etc.), all of which are functions of technique and imagination, behind which the writer can hide. None need know that one secretly wishes to kill her brother, or, as a child, hanged the family cat. Create characters who despise felines or siblings. The reader won't suspect the author.

This reassurance, however, skirts the issue. How much of our experience is so uniquely awful as to warrant keeping it hidden? Sometimes I ask students to think of three "personal secrets," and to write down the least threatening of the three. Then I read them out loud, anonymously. Students are struck by the fact that many of the "secrets" are similar. Several are met with mild derision: "How could anyone be embarrassed about that?" Occasionally, there are one or two "secrets" whose nature captures everyone's attention because they are unique and, therefore, interesting. I read them James Baldwin's statement: "It is precisely the point at which the writer feels that he is revealing too much of himself that he becomes interesting."

Of course this discussion leaves the students still facing a number of questions. What experience will be recreated? Who will be the narrator? How will the tone, the mood, the rhythms of the narrative voice be arrived at? Seldom can these questions be answered without trial and error.
Begin, I suggest, with freewriting. Discover what's interesting to you. Resolve to tell the truth. Get that first draft completed without worrying about how things hold together. At some point, maybe the third draft or the seventh, you'll recognize that it's working. If not, don't despair; try something else.

The preceding excerpt from a novel in progress is one example of how I answered the above questions for myself. It tells of the impact of the summer of 1964 on the lives of several Civil Rights workers who were active in Mississippi. Eight years later, the narrator, Jason Strong, is recreating the history that contributed to his brother's decision to go to Mississippi, which resulted in his brother's politicization and recent death.

I've never been to Mississippi. Neither has any of my brothers. But I've been interested in the subject for many years. I've talked to people who were in Mississippi in 1964; I've read about the experience and have imagined being there. I am familiar with rage, fear, racism, death, and love, and the consequences of these in my relationships, particularly those between my father and me, and between me and my brothers and sisters. I wanted to recreate these emotional environments so that I could understand a little more of who I am and, in the process, tell a story.

The other questions: voice, tone, mood, rhythm, became matters of characterization as soon as I discovered that the narrator would be Jason. Jason has always been detached, observant, controlled. Photography, his profession, allows him to exploit and justify his personality. Grieving, he is incapable of irony; here his tone is sober, objective. His rhythms are measured, broken now and then by a lyricism that is a component of his artist's vision. The mood of the piece reflects his mourning; it is elegaic, commemorative, and, at times, confused.

The rest is mystery.
THE WAY UP IS THE WAY DOWN
with some material from Robert Kelly and Ted Enslin

so often as if earth had a trachea
full of dust
I envision my sons Adam and Ari falling through
the street

'as if earth had a trachea'
that was your phrase but I envision my sons Adam and Ari falling through
the street;
that wasn't what you had in mind?

that was your phrase but
I was drawn to an image of falling;
that wasn't what you had in mind
father?

I was drawn to an image of falling--
the way up is the way down-- father
did you used to have such pictures?

the way up is the way down
so often
did you used to have such pictures
full of dust
THE BROTHERHOOD AND THE SENSATIONS OF HAPPINESS with materials from Milarepa and from second-and third-order American and Italian computer-generated Shakespearean monkeys to dea now nat to be will and them be does doesorns

when I think of this my heart is filled with grief
I open the words True, House, Hill, Porcelain or soon will fade or vanish.

when I think of this my heart is filled with grief
the gluepot of mind orders the rose or soon will fade and vanish as toise mosen to all yours you hom to to the gluepot of mind orders the rose self-control will still be hard. Though now you feel as toise mosen to all your you hom to to

I can't touch you

self-control will still be hard. Though now you feel like my teacher, crystal skull increasingly transparent,
I can't touch you
eselices hall it bled speal you...

like my teacher, crystal skull increasingly
transparent,
the stoned rhetor in me divagates
eselices hall it bled speal you...
unattached to any home

the stoned rhetor in me divagates:
I envision my sons Adam and Ari falling through
the street
unattached to any home
entre trintior e e desultto isenore si itolanon
I envision my sons Adam and Ari falling through
the street
how I love the sensations of happiness entre trinitò e e desulto isenore si itolanon quanta

how I love the sensations of happiness
I feel they deliver quanta
of light

I feel they deliver to see now nat to be will and then he does doesorns
of light
I open the words True, House, Hill, Porcelain

The two poems above, pantoums--an old Malaysian form--are composed in the most rigorous of the paradigms presented in poetry "handbooks." Note how the lines are repeated in a set pattern. The last stanza must contain no new material. These two poems came (in) directly out of work done with 4th- 5th-and 6th-grade children in Poets-in-the-Schools programs. Obviously I've played with the form in my versions, introduced further variables, but the pantoum is a natural for working with children: it provides both structure and "accident."

I'd expected a little period of warm-up, or necessary repetition, but the children caught on quickly. I think some aspects of their Pac-Man and Ms. Pac-Man eye-hand-mind development pre-dispose many children to skilled and accustomed acceptance of symmetry, mathematical pleasures, abstract paradigms—all in the context of Game—that is, a profoundly poetic matrix.

That line 2 becomes line 1 of the following stanza (line 4 becoming line 3) pleases many children all the more when they are given the liberty of disposing of any rhetorical level for their "original" contribution in lines 2 and 4 of any new stanza: colloquial, technical, hieratic language, whatever.... The pleasures of the relatively random.... Not quite that "anything can follow anything" but almost. And such openness helps penetrate the rust of habitual image-thought-feeling attachments.

The nearly magical "found" final stanza underlines for the children the extent of the potentially "meaningful." Since none of the lines of the final stanza is written by the poet particularly for that stanza, since in fact they must all come from, be born out of, the preceding or subsequent (first) stanza, a kind of hunter's game ensues. Which "last" of the possible "last" stanzas will actually work, and what does it mean to work, to "end"? So the whole question of absolutistic unitary "meaning" imposes itself. In a certain sense, almost anything works somewhat. But, observably, some "endings" appear more relevant than others. Thus, some pantoums arrive at their end in three stanzas, whereas others require, say, 7, 9, 14.

The pantoum form encourages punctuation to acquire a dramatic character. In the "brotherhood" for instance, line 4, which precedes a period and also ends the stanza, takes on a different character, periodless, in stanza two as it leads in to the "meaningless" monkey morphemes of line 8. Quite often a "last" stanza becomes possible through the use of strategically situated punctuation or italics.
My use of the form partakes of a greater degree of complexity than the usual class poem, but the added variables, found materials from areas of interest to me, the cannibalizing of one poem by another, great variations in line lengths, the use of quotation marks for distancing, resessing lines from the linear course of expected flow—all such processes become increasingly available to students, on whatever level, as they open to the limitless adventure of making/finding poems.

Sometimes we work as a group. Here's a 5th-grade pantoum:

hang in there baby
since green cars tend to hit red cars
get a bike or a camel and change your life
pray for snow

since green cars tend to hit red cars
how can I get through the day?
pray for snow
maybe stay in bed and dream

how can I get through the day?
too many bad news bulletins
maybe stay in bed and dream
blue cars, happy days, steak and mushrooms

how many bad news bulletins
hang in there baby
blue cars, happy days, steak and mushrooms
get a bike or a camel and change your life
The Harley Davidson Motorcycle Company didn't buy Garland's essay, but they did send him a hood ornament in the shape of an early, classic motorcycle. He brought the letter from the company to school, and we had a big discussion about how it differed from the business letter paradigm in our textbook. Gail was particularly offended by the absence of paragraph indentation. "Mrs. Morgan!" she said to our 'archer, my mother. "Look at this! They skip space instead of indenting. That's just plain wrong."

"How can it be wrong?" said Garland. "It's a business letter, and they're a business."

"What does a motorcycle company know about grammar?"

"What does a grammar book know about business?"

And the boys in the back clapped and cheered for Garland. They seemed to have grown taller and more colorful during the argument. In the end Mother ruled that both forms would be hereafter acceptable, and the boys shook one another's hands as if they'd won some kind of victory.

To tell the truth, I thought they had. That night Mother told Daddy all about how she had the boys writing letters to gun manufacturers and car companies. "You should have seen them, Lloyd," she said. "Garland Odell and that big Nathan Critch discussing whether to sign a business letter 'Sincerely' or 'Yours truly.'"

"That must have been real edifying," said Daddy, who didn't very much like her having success with boys he'd written off as troublemakers.

"What gets me," I said, "is that the girls study hard all the time, but the minute some boy does his homework you teachers run out and kill the fatted calf." Daddy chuckled, so I went on. "Nobody gives the girls credit for doing their homework night after night, year in and year out--"

"I believe," said Mother, "that the credit for doing homework is to earn a satisfactory grade. I believe that that is generally considered credit enough for most people."

"It isn't just grades I'm talking about. It's the way you all get excited about the boys and try harder for them. It's just like the prodigal son; that parable always sounded to me like a recommendation to sow wild oats."

"Hear, hear," said Daddy. "Get that girl a soapbox."

By this time I knew he was making fun of me, but I plunged ahead. "It's always like that. The geometry teacher would draw baseball diamonds on the board and have us find the angle of the baselines at home plate. Anything to attract the boys' attention."

"Equal time for girls!" called Daddy. "Assign them to write recipes."

"I just don't like special treatment for boys, that's all," I said. I had a vision of Daddy as the kind of kid who snickered with his friends over women and others who took things seriously. He would have put a mouse in Mother's desk, I thought, or chased me with a worm. The kind of boy who, in the end, would never listen to what you really had to say.

(From Higher Ground, Charles Scribner's Sons, 1981)
SOME THOUGHTS ON DIALOGUE WRITING

The longer I teach, the more I see the interconnections between my fiction writing, my teaching, and my reading. Thus, while I don’t use my own work as a model for student writing, I do use work by adults that I admire and emulate. I find myself teaching the same techniques and themes that concern me in my own writing.

Dialogue, for example, is often central to my work. A typical novel chapter of mine begins with a reflective, relatively dense and metaphor-rich passage mixed with necessary narrative material, then moves through various actions to culminate in some face-to-face confrontation in which people speak directly to one another. Dialogue, then, is often the dramatic heart of my fiction, as well as its most naturalistic element.

I find dialogue to be an excellent point for many students to begin writing because of this potential for drama and this approximation of everyday language. Children don’t have to be instructed about what conversation is. They can improvise one on the spot, remember one, write one. It is a natural connection between the spoken word and the written word. The assignment can be as simple as to dictate to yourself an actual conversation you have overheard or participated in. The immediate success of this approach is especially attractive for students who are behind in their academic skills. With younger children you can do something further with the dialogue—act it out, make a play, make a comic book. Perhaps best, however, is that dialogue can realistically and directly express some of the great themes of human interaction: love, family conflict, hate, reconciliation.

One of my absolute all-time-favorite-most-successful lessons uses such a passage of dialogue-centered fiction from Tillie Olsen's Yonnonidio: From the Thirties (Delacorte, 1974). I organize the lesson in the traditional way—reading the passage aloud, letting some students take a turn reading aloud, then leading a short discussion about it.

No one greeted him at the gate -- the dark walls of the kitchen enclosed him like a smothering grave. Anna did not raise her head.

In the other room the baby kept squalling and squalling and Ben was piping an out-of-tune song to quiet her. There was a sour smell of wet diapers and burned pots in the air.

"Dinner ready?" he asked heavily.
"No, not yet."
Silence. Not a word from either.
"Say, can't you stop that damn brat's squallin'? A guy wants a little rest once in a while."
No answer.
"Aw, this kitchen stinks. I'm going out on the porch. And shut that brat up, she's drivin' me nuts, you hear?" You hear, he reiterated to himself, stumbling down the steps, you hear, you hear. Driving me nuts.

Something about this piece sets off strong reactions in many diverse people. It is beautifully written, and it uses many fictional techniques: it creates an atmosphere with powerful sense impressions; it contrasts the speaking styles of the man and the woman; it has an internal monologue that intensifies the drama and uses repetition to good effect. There is even a neat grammar lesson available in the variant spellings of "squalling" as . "driving." One writing assignment is to write a conflict of Your own, real or imaginary, or to continue this passage or write what came before it. Many people, even very young children, assume that the man has just lost his job. I am always impressed by this awareness of what happens to a family when the economic machine catches the breadwinner in its gears. Some students like to give a happy ending, and others will send the man walking out on his family permanently. Others have the woman get up off her behind to come out and give as good as she got.

Leashawn Peaks, a seventh grader at an East New York intermediate school, continued the story this way:

You hear, he reiterated to himself, stomping down the steps, you hear, you hear. Driving me nuts. I can't take it here no more. First I lose my job, then I have to come home with this house smelling the way it do. Then on top of all that I have to hear this baby cry all the time. Don't you think a person gets tired of this all the time?

So what do you think I do? Do you think I sit on my butt all day long and relax and have a maid wait on me? No! I don't, I be in here working my hardest. I try to keep this house running.

Well, it don't look like you doing a darn thing in this house. I'm leaving. (As he walks to the door.)

Where are you going?
Out.

She said, Wait, don't leave. You know you need me and I need you. We could work something out between us. I think we can patch things up. Let's give it a try.

OK, he tells her. You know I love you and I don't know how I could stay mad at you, because I need you.
All of a sudden the phone starts to ring. Hello, is Mr. Johnson there?
Yes he is.
Well, can I speak to him? Hello, this is Mr. Jones your boss. Hey man you got your old job back.
Thanks man, thanks alot. Hey Helen! Guess what? I got my job back. I knew that things would work out for us.

Leashawn began by copying the final words of the monologue—changing "stumbling" to a word she felt more comfortable with, "stomping" — then continued the conversation between the man and woman outside, as if the wife had followed him out. She immediately gets at the heart of the matter as she sees it. The husband and wife feel put upon, as if each were carrying the burden of the family completely alone. They have a reconciliation: an adolescent's hope that after all it is possible to work things out—and find employment as well.

The selection from my own writing that precedes this essay, an excerpt from my second novel, includes part of a teaching episode along with a family conflict. It was not, of course, written in the company of 30 or so other people in a twenty-minute writing session after hearing the selection from Yonnonidio. It does, however, show how dialogue is woven through my fiction. Several conflicts are going on simultaneously here, continuing things that happened earlier in the book, preparing for things to come later. There is a subtle competition between the parents and a more open tension between the narrator and her mother, and the narrator and her father. There is also a conflict in school between the "good" girls and the bored boys. No one screams or gets murdered, but the mode is of human voices speaking, expressing conflict and connection. This is, after all, why we write.
FROM NOW ON

There is no time to explain.
I realized there was nothing left in the L pocket of my accordion file.
I realized I could say nothing right,
the right way.
I realize I haven't changed my whole life
the warm pool John's uncle took us to in downtown London.
Even our school group went once to swim
at a private gymnasium & health spa.
Wickery girls I remember thru the mist rising with a chill off the tile their long hair cadenzaed under plastic caps.

I still go for the same old things, old hotels, history, fairy tales & working mothers, teachers, big brothers & dolls.

I told Linda Boswell she was a doll
We called her Bod's well or Bodswell 8th grade swimming party hot dog tanned cheeky fur machines out of control we played with razors & gushed around young women like Linda who came up late with a boy in his V-8

I still go for the same old stuff
   Rock & Roll, vision, deception, focus Deception is vision, vision is focus WHIRLAWAY
Short-Term Workshops with the Elderly

When I first started teaching a few years ago, with the Teachers & Writers Artists & Elders program, it was in long-term workshops. With recent funding cuts, though, I've been limited to workshops that consist of no more than three meetings. To match the kind of intimate searching and self-direction that evolve in a prolonged encounter, I have to be very focused, condensed, spontaneous, and demanding.

In so few sessions my main concern is to begin a process that will lead to an individual's continued writing. For several reasons, the journal is the perfect genre for this. The journal (or notebook) is an open form that allows for all kinds of writing: personal prose narratives, poetry, formal verse, dreams, domestic observations, reminiscences, and so on. Also, a long-term project such as the journal helps bind the group together by giving direction in the absence of a teacher, and sympathetic group members validate an individual's writing by reading and listening to each other's work and by suggesting ways the work might be improved.

Keeping in mind the people I am working with, I choose an author as a model who will appeal to them. This often leads me to consider work I would not ordinarily be drawn to, yet which may eventually inform my own writing.

In order to accelerate the gradual development process that accompanies journal keeping, I sort out recurrent themes or elements and propose them to the students. I ask them to make a list of these points of entry into the text and use whatever parts they feel comfortable with.

Such a list might include dates, dreams, quotes/old sayings, names, mini-portraits, colors, firsts, reminders, predictions, and an addressee/personal you. At this point I give some examples and ask the group to use the list in writing a brief journal entry. I use the list to create a work myself, and as we read our works aloud I find the group provides part of the anticipated reception necessary to create character in writing.

This is not an iron-clad list. To make the writing fun, convincing, and genuine I have to invent new elements for each assignment, to keep it exciting. This pressure forces me to understand the connections that justify the disjunct elements of such works.

I admit I have an inordinate curiosity about the people I work with. To satisfy this curiosity I encourage writing that is expansive in its brevity and depends on colossal leaps from one-liner to one-liner or stanza to stanza, emphasizing the silence between thoughts, but providing a few precise details which suggest a much fuller version of themselves. If you had found some gloves on a ship, what color were they and what was the ship's name? Such details give me a picture postcard version of the author's time and place. I ask all the students to title their works at the top (like a poem) and also to date them at the top (like a journal), which hints at considerations of merging all kinds of literary forms.

I think these journal-like works can be as evocative as a poem or short story and achieve a personal voice without the embellishments of formal verse and the restrictions of linear prose narrative.

In asking for this kind of writing I have had to examine what holds a work together, what unifying devices mesh the past and the present and promote a clear, honest voice.

As a final, consolidating step, I steer the students clear of generic titles, such as Rambling Thoughts, and suggest they pretend they are naming a boat, a racehorse, or a movie. W H I R L A W A Y is still my favorite of all these titles.

In a way I'm asking the writers I work with for what I need as a writer myself. I'm saying share your experience with me. Tell me this, this, and this. And although I'm programming them to give me data from their lives, from the books they've read that contain others' lives, and from the archetypes in their dreams, it's not all that predictable, really, because the exchange is too spontaneous to be preprogrammed.

TIT FOR TAT

You've shown me the back of your hand.
    You who are so bad.
You've shown me glass ships at Red Hook.
    I who have never sailed.
I showed you how to play chess.
We listened to Chopin's nocturnes.
We listened to the boys in the backyard playing rock.
    We listened to each other while the white jasmine slyly eavesdropped.

--Bensonhurst (N.Y.) Group

131
BASEBALL

We were only farm team not "good enough" to make big Little League with its classic uniforms deep lettered hats.
But our coach said
we were just as good maybe better so we played the Little League champs in our stenciled shirts and soft purple caps
when the season was over.

What happened that afternoon
I can't remember-- whether we won or tied.
But in my mind
I lean back to a pop-up hanging in sunny sky stopped nailed to the blue losing itself in a cloud over second base where I stood waiting.

Ray Michaud who knew my up-and-down career as a local player
my moments of graceful genius my unpredictable ineptness screamed arrows at me from the dugout
where he waited to bat:
"He's gonna drop it! He don't know how to 'catch,
You watch it drop!"
The ball kept climbing higher, a black dot
no rules of gravity, no brakes, a period searching for a sentence, and the sentence read:
"You're no good, Bill you won't catch this one now you know you never will."

I watched myself looking up and felt my body rust, falling in pieces to the ground a baby trying to stand up an ant in the shadow of a house

I wasn't there had never been born would stand there forever a statue squinting upward pointed out laughed at for a thousand years teammates dead, forgotten bones of anyone who played baseball forgotten baseball forgotten, played no more played by robots on electric fields who never missed or cried in their own sweat

I'm thirty-four years old.
The game was over twenty years ago.
All I remember of that afternoon when the ball came down is that I caught it.

WHAT THEY TAUGHT ME

I always balked when students wanted to see the poems I wrote. I fended them off with promises I never kept. Bringing them my own work seemed like an ego-trip. The classroom wasn't the place for career advancement. Then one day it dawned on me that I couldn't show them my poetry. What would a fifth-grader make out of lines like these?

Lexicons provoke a kind of madness in me,
Of the quality of too white, too clean sheets.
How many words, like brides, must I lay my head against Until I can talk again, until I can reach up and seize
A radius of day larger than mind, unlike the clown
Shot and bandaged on the floor of my father's face?

This work was tough going, grist for the adult intelligence. Some of its meaning escaped even me, though I believed in every word. Out of desperation I sat myself down and wrote several poems that I could read to kids. I tried to make them funny, colorful, mysterious, full of details and metaphors. The poems proved successful enough, but after a while I stopped using them. Most poems written by adults for children strike me as phoney, and finally so did mine. I don't like the spirit of enforced cheeriness that pervades them, like a disinfectant used to mop up life's stronger smells. If I couldn't bring my "difficult" poems to class, I wasn't going to turn myself into a spiritual janitor.
The difficulty in my work that my teaching had revealed came as a blow. I had labored long and hard on my poems, assuming that the images discovered by my diligence would effectively communicate my thoughts and feelings. The blank expressions on audience faces when I read my "serious" work away from the classroom (including "The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life" quoted above) compounded my uneasiness. I knew the arguments by which I could shake off this unpleasantness. One of them contends that the audience is always years behind the poet (an appeal to snobbism). Another shifts the burden to the reader. A lot of poetry is difficult, says this defense, and it isn't the poet's duty to explain. A third asserts that poetry has always had a small audience, so not to worry if the hall is empty or your book doesn't sell. All of these arguments have merit, and all of them pass the buck. It was never the fault of the writer if his work went unread or unappreciated. The poet discharged his responsibility by producing the poem. Case closed.

But the puzzled classroom faces that I coaxed through contemporary poems fused in my mind with the frozen stares of the poetry reading crowds. Mine weren't the only poems receiving blank looks. The work of plenty of my contemporaries and even well-known poets usually found itself greeted by a puzzled silence often interpreted (by the poet) as reverential awe. Puzzlement can be an extremely productive condition. It is not, however, the only reaction that a writer might hope to induce. The only measurable reaction at readings was laughter, but laughter leaves many things untouched. As I began to examine poetry from the perspective of a non-poet, much of it struck me as introverted to the point of narcissism or reserved for cliques. Few poets wrote about a recognizable world. There was a good deal of '60s
"canyons of my mind" surrealism and even more word-play. Where were the faces, places, jobs, families, love-relationships, delights, and struggles that made up our lives? What had happened to story in poetry? Most of us poets behaved like amnesiacs wandering through the corridors of the thesaurus. I had spent a lot of time hiding in and behind words rather than using them as conscious instruments. For me, language had become a screen to filter out direct examination of my life. I had become adept at scooping up the dream and fantasy images bubbling from my unconscious, but not very skilled at writing about what I saw when I was wide awake. Perhaps my preoccupation with the oddball and the hallucinatory had something to do with the zeitgeist. America was pretty looney in the late '60s and early '70s, with its Vietnam War, drug culture, rock music, and endless waves of every kind of revolution. Then too, my religious background had tilted my gaze upward away from this "vale of tears." Likewise, the school of poetry in which I took my flight training had as its insignia the flaming metaphor. By the time these things became clear to me I knew that I had to pull my head out of the dream. I had to wake up.

At the beginning of my work with children, I eagerly involved them in the crazy kind of poetry I loved. Nevertheless, I always had one eye on the kids who didn't take to it—and there were many of them. It disturbed me, but then and there I simply lacked the means to give them anything else. After twelve years of teaching, I've concluded that very few writers have a real gift for metaphor. Does that mean they can't become poets? Yes, if metaphor is the yardstick by which poetic accomplishment is measured. And I believe that in our schools it is. American education and the various poetry-in-the-schools programs have wedded creativity to fantasy, whose chief vehicle is the metaphor. The problem with metaphors is that they are mental constructs; though formed from the things of this world, they lead us away from it. To paraphrase Ezra Pound's famous little poem, faces that are also petals on a wet, black bough exist not in the Paris Metro but in the mind.

My work with children taught me that they are capable of seeing clearly and writing about what they see. As I began to immerse myself in this kind of "experiential" writing, I also encouraged my students to write about what had happened to them and what they remembered rather than only about their fantasies. I insisted that "imagination" included fantasy and memory. I haven't abandoned the "wild" metaphors I've always loved. I've sought to balance them with outer perceptions, and I try to equip my students to do the same. The poem called "Baseball," included here, dates from the mid-seventies and shows me learning how to be ambidextrous, how to mediate between inner and outer worlds.

I feel a little sorry for poets who don't teach writing, or who rarely read their work in public. In facing an audience I have had to reach inside myself or into the work of others to find poems that will call forth more than a giggle or stony silence. My students have forced me to extend myself by demanding authenticity of feeling and experience. They have brought me closer to reality simply by being there. No one can go consistently into the classroom and remain unchanged. And in responding to the faces before me, the old bond of poet as community voice finds itself somewhat restored. These are some of the things the children have taught me.
1981

Each year I make more money and my purchasing power decreases.
In this I am not alone.
Still, I have managed to acquire recently:
a watch, camera, answering machine,
coffee maker, shirts and sweaters.
I wonder how I got along before.
Sex is less important,
Or rather, it's more important
so I do it less.
Strangers call me "Mr."—nothing new but I no longer pause before answering.
My family has suffered no losses.
My sister has added two;
I, none.
I am in love but we are not together,
which is, I suppose,
better than the opposite.
I have accepted as fact that I will never catch up with work but most things get done eventually;
also, that summer is not as long as the rest of the year,
so expectations must be adjusted accordingly.
I worry less about colds and the flu,
more about cancer and heart attacks.
I am 34
and so is everyone else in my high school and college classes, though they can't all say as I can that they weigh the same now as then.
I don't get the desire as often to grab someone by the shoulders and say, "Listen to me, look at me, don't you understand?"
But when I do,
it's sadder when they don't.
At 16, Wordsworth wrote about
"dear delicious pain."
At more than twice that age
I no longer think pain is delicious, though some is palatable.
I no longer open my pores to everything simply because it's there,
but when I do,
I drink long and deep.

FOLLOWING MY OWN ADVICE

On an old Pete Seeger album, Pete tells of hearing his younger brother play a banjo tune "so pretty that he put me to shame." His brother explained to Pete that "it's nothing more than double thumbing while you're frailing," and Pete replied, "I talked about that but I never really knew how to do it." So, he went on, "I sat down and followed some of the advice I put in my own banjo book and I practiced." Sometimes my students write things that inspire me to follow my own advice. Other times, just having the opportunity to talk about areas in writing that are new and/or elusive to me enables me to sift, mull, and sometimes get a hold on something tangible that will inform my writing.

Such a case was the importance of notebooks as a repository for spontaneous thoughts and sights and sounds of the day, along with notes on possible writing projects--an ongoing internal monologue.

I had talked about that but I never really knew how to do it. I started giving my students notebooks that they could use as they saw fit, and many of them "put me to shame," notably Isabel Feliz, a sixth grader who filled two notebooks with stories, poems, plays, and diary entries. One of Isabel's entries was a response to my suggestion of writing occasionally to take stock of your life, an inventory of the things that are around you and inside you:

"I've often wondered who I am and where do I belong....I mean who am I truly inside and where do I belong truly inside?....It's not as if I'm a shy and lonely girl trying to find herself or as if I'm a rich person trying to be popular....I have a best friend, although we have grown apart in the last few months....Maybe sometimes I feel strange being alive, being able to talk, move, hear and see....

"When a friend asks you, for example, 'Do you like that hat?' you ask, 'Do you?' We ask them if they like it because we're afraid of saying yes when our friend might say no. Our friend might say 'You have bad taste!"

The students' prolific use of their notebooks gave me a "contact high"—in the hallway I'd see the books sticking out of back pockets, to be pulled out as if by electrical impulse to record a sudden thought, and I'd watch students choosing to do first drafts in their notebooks—which, after they were broken in, seemed more inviting than a single sheet of blank paper.

I emphasized that the notebook is a place for students to do their writing, not to be judged or evaluated by anyone, including me, unless they requested it. It took me awhile, but now I utilize a notebook more than ever before. My 1981 poem grew out of a notebook entry which was an attempt to do my "inventory" assignment.

My teaching has served my fiction writing even more than my poetry. Though the possibilities for poetry are limitless, any given poem of mine tends to concentrate on one or two elements, such as description, internal monologue, or metaphor. In fiction, many ingredients go into each brew: characterization, setting, presentation and working through of conflict, dialogue, etc.

As I began to write more fiction I realized that writing a short story can be overwhelming and a novel megawhelming, so I started to teach its separate components, giving assignments that, though they wouldn't result in fully realized stories, would allow students to concentrate on specific areas. Meanwhile, I began to read fiction more sharply, to discern how writers make characters reveal themselves; what writers tell us about places so that we get a feel for that place without bogging down in superfluous detail; how they pace stories, speeding up and slowing down the narrative. As I discuss these issues in class, I am clarifying them for myself as well as for my students.

I have always found it extremely difficult to discuss the links between my writing and my teaching. Sometimes it seems that this is because they are so separate; other times because they are so intertwined. My concerns as a teacher are dictated far more by the needs of my students than by my needs as a writer. But the public act of teaching and the private act of writing rarely clash with each other, and mesh often enough to make the slash between writer/teacher a meeting point rather than a barrier.
Contributors

NEIL BALDWIN has worked with Poets-in-the-Schools, Poets & Writers, and Teachers & Writers Collaborative. He is the author of two volumes of poetry; a descriptive catalogue of William Carlos Williams' manuscripts; The Poetry Writing Handbook (Scholastic, 1981); and a forthcoming biography of Williams for young readers (Atheneum, 1983).

BARBARA BARACKS' writing has appeared in The Village Voice, Artforum, MS., Art Express, The Soho News, and other publications and anthologies. A 1977 CAPS Fellow, and author of No Sleep, she has edited and published a literary/arts magazine titled Big Deal, co-edited Sage Writings, and is currently a member of the Heresies editorial collective putting together Acting Up!: Women in Theater and Performance. She has worked in the T&W program since 1979.

JONATHAN BAUMBACH is the author of seven books of fiction, including most recently, My Father More or Less and The Return of Service. His stories have been anthologized widely, including both major collections of the best stories of the year. He writes movie reviews for Partisan Review and his fiction has been influenced by the dreamlike quality of film. He directs the MFA Program in Creative Writing at Brooklyn College.

JUDITH BINDER has worked in the T&W program for the past three years. She spent several years in San Francisco as a theatre artist and writer. She has collaborated on scripts with poet/playwright Nina Serrano, historian Paul Richards, and filmmaker Irving Saraf. Her plays have been produced in the U.S., Canada, and Latin America.
CAROLE BOVOSO is a journalist and poet. A frequent contributor to the Village Voice, she has written for many national magazines, such as Ms., New Dawn, Oui, Viva, and American Film. She is the founder and editor of Letters, and she produces "Letters" radio show on WBAI in New York. For PBS's American Playhouse series she is currently writing a screenplay based on her great-grandmother's 1868 diary.

NANCY BUNGE teaches writing at Michigan State University and is currently working on a series of interviews with writers who teach. Her articles have appeared in The San Francisco Review of Books, The American Poetry Review, and others.

ANNE CHERNER is the author of The Surveyor's Hand, a book of poems, and has taught for T&W for five years.

JACK COLLOM works in the T&W program. Born in 1931 in Chicago, he has lived for many years in Colorado, now resides in New York. He is the father of four children and is an ex-factory-worker. He has led many poetry workshops in Colorado, Nebraska, and New York. For 11 years he edited the little magazine, the. In 1980 he received a Poetry Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts Literature Program. His most recent book is The Fox (United Artists Books).

BARBARA DANISH'S work with T&W resulted in her book on teaching writing, Writing As a Second Language (T&W). Her poems have appeared in The Mississippi Review, Hanging Loose, and Aleph, and the Feminist Press published The Dragon and the Doctor, a children's book. She also teaches at the College of Staten Island.
RICHARD ELMAN is the author of ten novels, five books of journalism, three of poems, and a collection of stories, all under his own name, and numerous pseudonymous works. He has taught in the T&W program and at the university level. He is presently book critic for National Public Radio's "All Things Considered."

HARRY GREENBERG has worked for T&W and the New York State Poets-in-the-Schools Program for the last five years. He is co-editor of the literary magazine Some and the Release Press book series. His poems have appeared in Poetry Now as well as many other magazines.

WENDY JONES, a newcomer to T&W, is living in re-write land this year. She is rewriting a short story to send to Atlantic Monthly, rewriting a novella for the Quarterly West novella competition, and rewriting a novel for publication.

KENNETH KOCH's work with T&W resulted in Wishes, Lies, and Dreams and Rose, Where Did You Get That Red? He is also the author of a book of plays, A Change of Hearts; a novel, The Red Robins; and 10 books of poetry, the most recent of which is Days & Nights. He is professor of English at Columbia University.

PHILLIP LOPATE'S work with T&W is chronicled in his Being with Children (Doubleday), Journal of a Living Experiment (T&W), and his many articles for T&W Magazine. His books of fiction and poetry include Confessions of Summer (Doubleday), Bachelorhood (Little, Brown), The Eyes Don't Always Want to Stay Open (SUN), and The Daily Round (SUN). He teaches at the University of Houston.
DICK LOURIE worked in the T&W program in the late '60s and early '70s. For 16 years he has been associated with Hanging Loose Press, which published his most recent collection of poems, Anima. A founding member of the N.Y. PITS program, he is currently working in the Massachusetts PITS program.

CLARENCE MAJOR is the author of 12 books of prose and poetry. He is the recipient of fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts, the New York Cultural Foundation, and the Fulbright Commission. He worked in the T&W program in the late '60s; currently he teaches at the University of Colorado.

MIGUEL A. ORTIZ taught in the T&W program and was for many years Director of Publications at T&W. He is associated with Hanging Loose Press.

ABIODUN OYEWOLE teaches for T&W and the NYC public schools. An original member of The Last Poets, he writes plays (Comments), stories, poems, and songs. He performs with his jazz group, Griot.

RON PADGETT has been associated with the T&W program since 1969. With Bill Zavatsky he edited The Whole Word Catalogue 2 (McGraw-Hill/ T&W, 1977). Among his other books are Great Balls of Fire (Holt, 1969), Toujours l'amour (SUN, 1976), Triangles in the Afternoon (SUN, 1979), and Tulsa Kid (Z, 1979). He is Director of Publications at T&W.

GRACE PALEY was one of the founders of T&W. Widely published, her two most recent collections of stories are The Little Disturbances of Man, (New American Library) and Enormous Changes at the Last Minute (Farrar, Straus & Giroux). She teaches at Sarah Lawrence College.

RICHARD PERRY, a member of T&W for eleven years, also teaches literature and writing at Pratt Institute. He is the author of Changes (1974) and Sparkle (1976). His most recent novel, Montgomery's Children, is scheduled by Harcourt Brace Jovanovich for fall 1983 publication.

ARMAND SCHWERNER is the author of 14 books of poetry, the most recent of which is Sounds of the River Naranjana (Station Hill Press), which includes the two pantoums in his article. He worked on the early T&W program and with the Academy of American Poets 1967 prototype of PITS. Recipient of grants from the National Endowment for the Arts, he currently works in the New York State PITS program.

NANCY LARSON SHAPIRO is the Director of Teachers & Writers Collaborative, where she has worked since 1976. She has taught writing and English and been an editor for small presses and at Encyclopaedia Britannica.

MEREDITH SUE WILLIS has taught writing workshops for students from first grade through college and senior citizens. Her novels, A Space Apart and Higher Ground, are both published by Charles Scribner's Sons. She has worked for T&W since 1971.

JEFF WRIGHT is the author of Employment of the Apes (poems) and editor of Compass magazine and Hard Press postcards. For the past three years he has conducted writing workshops for the elderly, including T&W's Artists & Elders Project.
BILL ZAVATSKY has worked in the T&W program for many years. He has also taught writing and literature to university students and the elderly. Theories of Rain, his collection of poems, appeared in 1975. With Ron Padgett he edited The Whole Word Catalogue 2. He is currently completing a book about the film Rebel Without a Cause.

ALAN ZIEGLER has taught for T&W since 1974; he also teaches at Columbia University. His most recent books are The Writing Workshop (T&W) and So Much To Do (Release Press).
THE THINK/INK SERIES

The Point: Where Teaching & Writing Intersect
edited by Nancy Larson Shapiro & Ron Padgett
T/I 1/2 (double number).

Reading Your Students: Their Writing & Their Selves
by Anne Martin. T/I 3.

Poetry Comics in the Classroom
by Dave Morice. T/I 4.

Think/Ink Books are published by Teachers & Writers Collaborative, 84 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10011 (212/691-6590).
THE POINT
Where Teaching & Writing Intersect

Essays & Original Works by 25 Writer/Teachers

Edited by Nancy Larson Shapiro & Ron Padgett

What's the point of having writers teach writing? What do they know that others don't? Can it be taught? How does it all work? How do writers learn to teach? How does it affect their writing? How can teachers learn to do what writers do? How do writer and teacher blend to form the best teacher of writing?

These and other important questions are answered in teaching essays, with poems and stories, by 25 veterans of the Teachers & Writers program: Neil Baldwin • Barbara Baracks • Jonathan Baumbach • Judith Binder • Carole Bovoso • Anne Cherner • Jack Collom • Barbara Danish • Richard Elman • Harry Greenberg • Wendy Jones • Kenneth Koch • Phillip Lopate • Dick Lourie • Clarence Major • Miguel Ortiz • Abiodun Oyewole • Ron Padgett • Grace Paley • Richard Perry • Armand Schwerner • Meredith Sue Willis • Jeff Wright • Bill Zavatsky • Alan Ziegler.

Their insights also provide an excellent cross-section of what Teachers & Writers Collaborative has been all about in its first 15 years.

Teachers & Writers Think/Ink Books 1/2
ISBN 0-915924-33-1