Speeches/Conference Papers (150) -- Guides -- Non-Classroom Use (055)

*Child Abuse; *Child Neglect; Elementary Secondary Education; *Intervention; Prevention; *School Role; Sexual Abuse; Student Characteristics

This paper provides an introduction to the nature and extent of the various forms of child abuse, including physical injury, neglect, sexual abuse, and emotional maltreatment. It identifies the behavioral, emotional, and physical characteristics of abuse and neglect, as manifested within the school setting; lists factors that pose a risk for physical abuse; describes characteristics of handicapped children and characteristics of families with handicapped children; and briefly reviews the role of schools in child abuse prevention/intervention. Abuse and Neglect of Handicapped Children: Identification and Intervention by School Personnel

Abstract

Child abuse and neglect may be the most significant social problem facing the United States for the remainder of the century. In 1987, more than 1.7 million cases of child abuse/neglect were officially recorded; it is estimated, conservatively, that at least 2 to 3 times that number of children and adolescents actually experience significant abuse.

As a major social problem, child abuse and neglect rightly commands the attention of most segments of professional and lay community. Traditionally, within the professions, medicine, psychology, and social welfare, together with the courts, have been most directly involved in responses to the problem. The primary interface with professional education has been the level of identification and reporting. While this is a necessary and legally mandated response for all educators, a more profound role is envisioned: that of early intervention and systematic, proactive programming, throughout the curriculum.

A psycho-educational commitment by educators is warranted and imperative on professional grounds: by reason of the devastating negative impact of abuse and neglect on social, emotional, motor, and academic development. For education to fulfill its professional responsibility to every child in its care, to ensure their rights to optimum growth and realization of potential, then a decisive, seasoned approach to the problem as it is manifested in school becomes an ethical and professional responsibility for all educators.

The purpose of this session then is to:

(a) provide an introduction to the nature and extent of the various forms of child abuse, physical injury, neglect, sexual abuse, and emotional maltreatment.

(b) offer guidelines for identification and reporting within educational settings of suspected child abuse.

(c) identify the behavioral, emotional, and physical characteristics of abuse and neglect, as manifested within the school setting.

(d) discuss a "best practices" model of educational responses to abuse, considered within a psycho-educational framework.

(e) outline various interdisciplinary and community-based approaches, e.g. family and school linkages, mental health and school-based professionals.
WHAT IS CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT?

"The physical or mental injury, sexual abuse, negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child under the age of eighteen by a person who is responsible for the child and under circumstances in which the child's health or welfare is harmed or threatened thereby."

Federal definition contained in Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act (Public Law 93-247, 93rd Congress, Senate 1191, 1974)

Important Points:
1. under eighteen
2. responsibility of caretaker (not strangers)

TYPES OF ABUSE

A. Physical Abuse: Non-accidental injury evidenced by bruises, broken bones, burns, abrasions, cuts, bites, and other physical injuries that need medical care.

B. Sexual Abuse: Includes any inappropriate sexual interaction with a child either physical or nonphysical and includes any attempts to exploit the child sexually. Incest, rape, and sodomy are violent forms of abuse, but exposing body parts, suggestive talk, and subjecting children to degrading sexual innuendo are also abusive.

C. Emotional Abuse: Characterized by any interaction with a child that damages self-esteem or psyche. Teasing, ridicule, and belittlement are damaging to children, yet unreasonable parental expectations can be far more destructive. Overprotective, dependent, or dictatorial caregivers can devastate a child. Parents who do not understand a youngster's developmental capabilities may inflict harsh criticism and/or punishment.

D. Neglect: Defined as deprivation of proper nourishment, clothing, shelter, medical care, and/or nurturing. Neglected children are often left without proper discipline or supervision. Parents who neglect their child are often under tremendous stress and have poor coping skills. Many are barely able to support themselves and either cannot or choose not to give their children proper care.

Factors That Pose a Risk for Physical Abuse

Child Characteristics

- Prematurity and Low Birth weight
- Handicapping condition
- Chronic illness
- Difficult temperament
- Behavior problems
- Age between birth and six years

Parent Characteristics

- Personal history of family dysfunction during childhood
- Lack of knowledge of normal child development
- Unrealistic expectations of children
- Inadequate child management techniques
- Overreliance on threats and physical punishment
- Expects child to fulfill own dependency needs
- Inaccurate attributions about intent of child actions
- Marital dysfunction

Environmental Factors

- Social isolation
- Lack of available support systems
- Financial problems, unemployment
- High mobility
- Large family size
- Societal use of physical punishment
- Current crisis situation
Social-Emotional Problems of Abused Children

Low self-esteem
Oppositional behavior
Compulsivity
Unresponsiveness to praise
Lack of Motivation
Social Withdrawal
Hypervigilance to adult cues
School learning problems
Fearfulness, clinging
Haphazard dress, messy work
Difficulty in making decisions
An impaired ability to enjoy life, apparently due to ineffective and anxious efforts to please others
Psychiatric symptoms such as enuresis, tantrums, hyperactivity, depression, and bizarre behavior
Inability to depend on or trust others
Little confidence in their ability to influence their own experiences, particularly in avoiding negative outcomes
Excessive avoidance and denial in anxiety-provoking situations
Inability to understand subtle and complex interpersonal relationships -- rigid and literal in orientation
Pseudo-adult or precocious behavior
In older students a tendency to be troublesome, selfish, boisterous, and chronically dissatisfied
CHARACTERISTICS OF FAMILIES WITH HANDICAPPED CHILDREN

Stress and increased demands on parent(s) because of:

- Excessive financial costs
- Stigma of having a handicapped child
- Excessive time required for personal care of handicapped child
- Social isolation
- Limitations in recreational activities
- Difficulty in handling behavior problems
- Limited time and energy to maintain marital relationship
- Balancing parental time with handicapped child and siblings
- Pessimism about the future

There are also critical periods that occur in families with a handicapped child. They are:

- When the child is identified as handicapped
- When medical and educational decisions arise
- When younger siblings surpass the skills of the handicapped child
- Occurrence of an unusual behavior or a health crisis
- When issues of guardianship and long-term adult care arise

COMMON CHARACTERISTICS OF HANDICAPPED CHILDREN

1. Learning/Cognitive Domain: Academic deficits, limitations in intellectual functioning, attentional problems, memory deficits, difficulty in generalization of information, language difficulties.

3. Social Domain: Deficits in age-appropriate self-help skills, social withdrawal, social maladjustment, difficulties with interpersonal relationships.

The Role of Schools in Child Abuse Prevention/Intervention

With most social problems solutions require the cooperative efforts of professionals from the many disciplines or professions that interface with the phenomenon in question. In the case of child abuse/neglect the issue is no different. Thus, medicine, social welfare, psychology all have important responsibilities and contributions to make to the problem solution.

Education -- and specifically the school -- likewise, has both responsibilities and contributions to make. And this goes beyond the important task of primary identification of abuse/neglect and conformity to the reporting statutes of the State. This responsibility lies squarely in providing a positive, appropriate learning environment for the abused child, one which includes interpersonal and curricular innovations. Educators must respond to the abused child with the recognition that he/she is seriously at risk for personal, social and academic failure and that the school experience is vital in efforts at early intervention and primary prevention. The school experience in toto must be seen as a force for "good or evil" with respect to the abused/neglected child; that the school experience can prevent the worst effects of abuse from being realized.

The school environment contains unique elements for making positive contributions to children who are at risk or are already abused:

(1) School is basically a place where all children go, where, all things being equal, all children want to be.

(2) The Teacher, and other school-based personnel may be the only stable persons in the at risk child's life. (All of us are familiar with the reluctance of so many abused children to go home at the end of the day).

(3) School, for many children represents the only secure, predictable environment they know.

(4) The inherent human desire to achieve, to succeed, is best "played out" in productive school experiences. Education is still -- for most persons -- the avenue for social upward mobility and personal attainment.

(5) School "hold children captive" -- no other environment can demand the presence of the young for as long or as intensely as the school.

What opportunities exist in the school for productive interaction with the young? In concert with the other helping professions and in links to the family and broader community, education has both a singular and inter-disciplinary part to play in efforts at prevention and intervention.
RECEIVING A DISCLOSURE

According to Grace Y. Miller, Child Abuse and Neglect/Truancy Officer, Broward County, Florida, a disclosure may or may not be intentional. Regardless of the intent, there are a number of things to keep in mind during the discussion phase:

1. Believe what the child has told you.

2. Tell the child that you are glad he/she has informed you, and let the child know that you are sorry about what happened.

3. Be aware of your feelings during the disclosure, as children are sensitive to them at this time. Do not communicate feelings of horror, repugnance, or fright with the child. Your being quietly confident and comfortable are what the child needs most.

4. Communicate to the child that it is O.K. to talk about this to you. (The school is a safe place for this disclosure to take place.)

5. The child may feel guilty and need your reassurance that the abuse was not his/her fault. Do not attach blame to the child for the incident. Tell them that it’s not their fault. It’s always the older person’s fault.

6. Allow the child to tell you about what happened in a free and open manner. Let them proceed at their own pace, using language that is comfortable.

7. If it is incest being disclosed, any comments suggesting that he/she might be fabricating the story will activate fears of not being believed, and the child may choose to become silent. The abuser may have overtly or covertly threatened the child to remain silent.

8. Explain to the child that you are required to report it. State that the purpose of reporting is to get help for the family from people who work with this kind of problem so that it doesn’t occur again.

9. Make no promises or guarantees to the child that are beyond your control. Don’t promise to keep it a "secret."
