The Center for the Learning and Teaching of Literature is a research and development center located at the University at Albany, State University of New York. The Center was established in 1987 with funds from the U.S. Department of Education, Office of Educational Research and Improvement, and from the National Endowment for the Arts. The Center's mission is to improve the teaching of content knowledge and critical-thinking strategies that contribute to literary understanding, particularly at the middle and high school levels.

Center-sponsored research falls into three broad areas: 1) surveys of current practice in the teaching of literature, including studies of both what is taught and how it is taught; 2) studies of alternative approaches to instruction and their effects on students' knowledge of literature and critical-thinking abilities; and 3) studies of alternative approaches to the assessment of literature achievement, including both classroom-based and larger-scale approaches to testing.

The Center also promotes good practice in the teaching of literature through conferences and seminars, through the development of computerized bibliographies on research and practice in the teaching of literature, and through publications that present the Center's own research and provide other resources for research and practice. Selected Bibliography of Materials and Approaches in the Learning and Teaching of Literature

James Bradley

Introduction

The following annotated bibliography was compiled from a search of the ERIC database, and from a review of other materials that have been brought to the attention of the Literature Center. The bibliography surveys professional publications concerned with curriculum and instruction in the learning and teaching of literature at the elementary and secondary levels. Only materials published since 1980 are included. Works published in foreign languages or concerning foreign curricula are included only if they are applicable to study in U.S. schools. Commercially available student materials are excluded.

This bibliography is a beginning in building a comprehensive bibliography of resources in the teaching of literature. We would appreciate receiving information about additional materials for inclusion in the database.

In our database, each bibliographic entry is indexed under several different topic headings. For the purpose of this report, they are listed under a primary index heading, so that all entries are listed only once. Upon request, the Center will conduct more detailed searches on specific topics. For more information, contact:

Adolescent Literature

1. Burns, P. (1985). Desperate in Peoria (how come everything we read has to be so depressing?). English Journal, 74(2), 76-77.

Burns suggests that real life can be depressing enough without subjecting teenagers to a steady diet of reading assignment whose content is largely negative. She laments that a search has turned up so few examples of "good" literature and asks for suggestions.

The articles in this issue of The ALAN Review focus on adolescent literature. The issue also contains a review of media materials for use in teaching adolescent literature, brief reviews of new books, and the abstract of a dissertation that surveyed the status of the young adult novel in the secondary school English classroom.

Intended for the junior high school or secondary school English teacher, the seven articles and features in this journal focus on young adult literature and the adolescent audience. Some titles of articles include: "Writing for Adolescents: Pleasures and Problems"; "Rural Youth: The Forgotten Minority"; and "Before 'Teaching' a Novel: Some Considerations."

The seven articles in this journal issue focus on adolescent literature. Topics include: a discussion of the treatment of outsiders, such as the mentally ill, in four Roy Brown mysteries; the image of the teacher in adolescent fiction; tracing the theme of disillusionment and despair from Catcher in the Rye to Cormier's novels; and an analysis of the recent works of Paul Zindel. The issue also contains a review of media materials for use in teaching adolescent literature.

The author describes what future teachers should know about the quality, opinions, developmental stages, variety, use and availability of adolescent literature in the years to come.

From a sample of young adult novels, this journal article describes how teachers are commonly portrayed in young adult fiction. Their primary roles are as objects of humor, love, and outright hatred, and as shrewd manipulators and innocent victims.

The author discusses several books that contain utopian elements. She finds that utopias act as catalysts to young people exploring issues of personal growth through reading.

The author states that reading Scott O’Dell’s popular juvenile book, The Island of the Blue Dolphins, can increase high school students’ comprehension and appreciation of Herman Melville’s The Encantadas, as both works are fictional treatments of the same historic event.

This document examines war and peace in adolescent literature. Adolescent literature, especially historical fiction, is described as an effective instrument for teaching about occurrences such as the Nazi Holocaust and the Vietnam War. The importance of authenticity in literature is emphasized as is the need to present students with realistic rather than glorified accounts of war. The work contains an annotated bibliography which consists primarily of fictional and narrative biographical accounts dealing with war and peace. Plot, theme, and style are analyzed with recommendations regarding individual and class use.

This work examines the nature of family social interactions appearing in contemporary novels written especially for adolescent readers. Topics include: (1) family structures and parenting behavior; (2) family decision-making processes; (3) autonomy; (4) affect; and (5) global-health-pathology. As a norm, families were not functioning optimally, but they were not dysfunctional.

The author reviews literature that reflects the emergence of adolescence as a recognized stage in human development. She describes both cognitive and stage theories of adolescence and medieval concerns as well as twentieth century interest.

This article contains a summary of research on young adult literature, including reading interest surveys, studies on the developmental stages of adolescents, analyses of characterizations in young adult novels, and approaches for using this literature in the classroom. The author provides a bibliography of resources about adolescent/young adult literature.

The authors review books of fantasy and science fiction written for young adults. They point out that fantasy exercises the imagination, helps readers clarify genuine problems, and allows for escape from everyday reality at the same time that it generates hope.

This journal article describes novels and poetry anthologies that treat the family with sympathy. There are stories of warm families, realistic stories of normal tensions, and stories that deal fairly with children estranged from their parents.

The authors list adolescent novels that dramatize the trauma of war for the young.

The purpose of this piece is to examine the effects of catalytic, symbolic, antagonistic, and melding New England settings as they reveal conflicts of values in fiction.

Humor in adolescent literature is the focus of the articles in this themed journal issue. Ten articles are included in the issue, including: "Of Fiction and Madness" (Paul Zindel); "I Want To Make Them Laugh" (Ellen Conford); "What Every English Teacher Should Know About Free Reading" (Dick Abrahamson and Eleanor Tyson); and "Fifty YA Books Out of the Past Still Worth Reading: Or, Enjoyment Is There if You Search for It" (Ken Donelson).

These fourteen articles provide a serious look at literature for children. Subject matter ranges from the issue of gender bias in children's books to an author's view of children's literature in the elementary classroom.

The major articles in this journal issue deal with various aspects of young adult literature. The specific article topics are: (1) questions worth asking students about young adult novels; (2) the five major functions of adolescent literature in high school literature programs; (3) South-western literature for adolescents; (4) teaching literature of the Southwest to high school students; and (5) an approach to motivating adolescents to read. The issue also contains reviews of other resources that focus on adolescent literature.

Stereotypes and bias exist in literature, as in real life. Rather than protecting students from bias, teachers must prepare students to recognize and resist it.

Students are not mere passive gatherers of facts, but creators who bring their experiences and understanding to a dynamic interaction with a work of literature. With this in mind, the authors of these articles suggest works that can serve as partners in the vital interaction between reader and literature.

The work offers an appreciation of Tuck Everlasting, a young adult novel by Natalie Babbitt. The novel deals with death and the purpose of life, and the author recommends it particularly for reading aloud in the classroom.

This article explains ways that juvenile science fiction has changed and improved during the last decade. It includes a bibliography of titles popular with children and adolescents.

Booklists Elementary

The annotated materials contained in this list of children's books for 1981 have been selected for literary merit, usefulness, and balance among books to be enjoyed for free reading, those for reading aloud, and those recognized as valuable for individualized reading programs or as background and supplements to the school curriculum.

A committee comprised of children's book specialists from school and public libraries and a bookseller examined books published from November 1984 through November 1985, and compiled this annotated bibliography of picture books, fiction, and nonfiction.

This article provides an annotated bibliography of 70 examples of school stories for children chosen by three specialists in children's literature.

Learning magazine's children's book review editor presents an annotated bibliography of outstanding new children's books useful for both teachers and parents. Selections include picture books, books for beginning readers, and titles suitable for older children. Paperback selections are also listed.

An annotated listing of new books for children and juveniles is presented. Titles range from fantastical stories that will stir children's imaginations to realistic books, such as biographies of Pocahontas and of the first person to fly across the English Channel. Paperback books are also listed.

Intended to bring a broad range of titles of children's literature to children and young people, this annotated bibliography contains more than 1,000 entries. Each entry provides the author and title of the work, its publisher, price, International Standard Book Number (ISBN), and Library of Congress card number.

The annotated materials contained in this list of children's books for 1980 have been selected for literary merit, usefulness, and enjoyment. They are intended to reflect a year's publishing in a balance between books to be enjoyed for free reading, those for reading programs, or as background and supplements to the school curriculum.

Booklists Secondary

Nearly 1,200 new books of high literary quality and of high interest to teenage readers are described in this volume. The list explores a wide range of topics, selected from some 4,000 books reviewed by the Committee on the Senior High School Booklist, and includes books published between 1985 and 1987.

The author offers an annotated bibliography of books about and by Australians, recommended for use in American classrooms.

This journal article describes five categories of reading material appropriate for students in grades seven through nine. The categories are: books about daily life, stories in other media, books in a series, books within a genre, and guessing books.

The authors present an annotated bibliography of the 20 books found to be most popular in an annual survey of high school students' reading choices.

Noting that intermediate and junior high school students can be motivated to read if high quality, interesting literature is made available, this bibliography provides teachers, librarians, and resource teachers with a list of books published since 1980 that can be used to assist students in selecting reading materials. The annotations include publishing information and indicate appropriate school level and, in some instances, a readability grade level.

This work lists and briefly describes 24 books in several categories chosen by young readers as the best books of 1986.

The author annotates booklists of literature for young adults that were selected on the basis of their quality and interest. The topics include: (1) contemporary nonfiction; (2) fantasy, science fiction, and the supernatural; (3) titles for reluctant readers; (4) death and war; (5) love and teen sexuality; (6) science; (7) American and world culture; (8) Black culture; and (9) sports.

The books listed in this annotated bibliography, selected to provide pleasurable reading for high school students, are arranged alphabetically by author under 49 main categories. These categories include: adventure and survival; animals and pets; art and architecture; biography and autobiography; careers and jobs; cars, motorcycles, and racing; computers and microprocessors; death and suicide; drama and theater; drugs and alcohol; ethnic experiences; family conflicts; history; human rights; humor and satire; sexuality; sports; war; and women.

This journal article lists student oriented adolescent novels that fall under the categories of misfits, conformity, families in conflict, mystery, and addictions.

This fifth edition of NCTE's booklist for reluctant adolescent readers contains over 300 concise annotations. The books are organized into twenty-three categories, including fantasy and science fiction, fascinating facts, technology, self-improvement, and women of strength.

The books listed in this annotated bibliography, selected to provide pleasurable reading for high school students, are arranged alphabetically by author under 35 main categories.

This is the first in a series of annual annotated bibliographies of 30 newly published trade books chosen by students in middle, junior, and senior high schools throughout the United States.

Booklists General

The result of a review of fiction for young people ages 10 through 14, this bibliography contains titles of works of fiction that achieve the goal of combining a good readable story with sensitivity to a wide range of negative stereotyping.

With many annotations written or edited by students, this booklist contains 3,100 citations of fiction and non-fiction publications for adolescents. Most entries were published within the past few years, although well-written older books are also included.

Greenlaw lists sequels or books in series intended for grades 4-12 published from 1973 to mid-1985. Titles are grouped in six categories by author.

This 35-item annotated bibliography presents a selective list of historical literature for children and adolescents which addresses issues surrounding the Second World War that hold interest for both personal and curricular inquiry. Publisher, publication date, price and recommended grade levels are included.

This annotated bibliography of recently published children's books contains sections describing picture books, stories for younger readers, stories for intermediate readers, stories for older readers, folklore, poetry, plays, non-fiction, and books of interest to adults.

This annotated bibliography of recently published children's books contains sections describing picture books, stories for younger readers, stories for intermediate readers, stories for older readers, poetry, non-fiction, and books of interest to adults.

The work lists and annotates new books and stories for younger readers in the following categories: picture books; stories for younger, intermediate, and older readers; folklore; poetry; and non-fiction. It also annotates two books of interest to adults.

This annotated bibliography of recently published children's books contains sections describing picture books, stories for younger readers, stories for intermediate readers, stories for older readers, poetry, non-fiction, and books of interest to adults.

This piece offers an annotated list of books recommended for young readers (ages six to eight), intermediate readers (ages nine to twelve), and older readers (ages twelve through young adult).

The author annotates recent materials for younger, intermediate, and older readers. Included in this booklist are picture books, fiction, non-fiction, paperbacks, poetry, children's books of special interest to adults, and an annotation of one film.

This 19-item annotated bibliography cites literary materials for preschool and elementary school children, young adults, and parents that discuss the handling and prevention of child sexual abuse. A discussion of themes handled in the books and information on the publisher, price and intended grade level are provided.

This journal article provides an annotated bibliography of texts, periodicals, and tradebooks that focus on adolescent literature.

Focusing on readable books for young people about New England and on available materials around which to develop local history and social study units, this annotated bibliography addresses both the recreational reading interests and the research needs of young people.

In an effort to inform junior and senior high school students about mental illness, this document provides educators with an annotated bibliography of young adult fiction and a set of supporting activities.

This 40-item annotated bibliography lists ghost novels intended for fourth-grade to eighth-grade reading levels in the following categories: disturbed children, evil, family ghosts, restless spirits, time shifts, and weird phenomena. A discussion of the categorization of ghost stories and distinctions between poltergeists and apparitions is included.

This list of paperbacks contains publication information and references to reviews for books in the following areas: picture books, stories for younger readers, stories for intermediate readers, stories for older readers, non-fiction, and books of interest to adults.

Designed to help educators identify resources for teaching concepts of peace in both public and parochial social studies classrooms, this working bibliography lists 200 books, guides, brochures, catalogs, resource centers, simulations/games, and audio-visual materials. Most resources were produced between 1965 and 1984, and they include collections of stories, readings, poems, and plays.

This work is an annotated bibliography of newly published books chosen as favorites by students in middle, junior, and senior high schools throughout the U.S.

Cultural Diversity

   The author discusses whether it is better for a culture to be portrayed insensitively or not portrayed at all; whether books should aim at universality of focus on problems specific to a given culture; and how to determine whether a book is appropriate for its cultural context and readership.

   This work offers guidelines and activities to assist Iowa secondary school language arts teachers in integrating state-mandated nonsexist, multicultural education that can be adapted by teachers in all states.

   These activities for grades 4-8 are designed to promote understanding, appreciation, and respect for the diversity of cultures in the United States. Activities focus on four groups: American Indians, Blacks, Asian Americans, and Mexican Americans. Using an interdisciplinary approach, the material is appropriate for fine arts, language arts, home economics, literature and oral traditions, and social science. Literature readings include legends, coyote tales, Yoruba tales, Brer Rabbit, dragon tales, and Mexican Indian legends.

With today's most prominent black educators as contributors, this collection of forty-three original essays represents a significant effort to provide insight into and suggestions for working with black children who have rejected the current educational system.

A summary of factual data concerning the portrayal of Puerto Ricans in ethnic literature written between 1950-1970 reveals that the literature fails to meet the needs of adolescent readers because the books provide an inappropriate perspective, misrepresent reality, omit significant causes, and present rigid characters.

Although most educators agree that cross-cultural education is a valuable component of the curriculum and that it offers students the opportunity to understand differences and commonalities among people, there is little agreement about how to teach such a subject. An anthroliterary approach to this subject helps students understand and appreciate other cultures through narrative portrayals of the lifestyles, customs, and values of different ethnic groups.

This unit introduces secondary level students to Chinese literature. The first part of the unit discusses poetry, introducing students to major Chinese poets and giving them sample poems to analyze. The second half deals with Chinese prose, which is dominated by historical and philosophical writings but also includes the popular tradition of fiction, drama, and storyteller's tales. The unit concludes with suggestions for further reading.

This annotated bibliography lists children's books by Australian authors and provides American libraries with a list of books that reflect many facets of Australian life as well as the work of Australia's many authors. The list is arranged by grade level, ranging from preschool to senior high.

Long presents the results of a study that supports the premise that children should read literature written for children in other countries to increase their knowledge and understanding of other cultures. A bibliography of Russian children's literature is also

This highly selective annotated list of works may be read with profit by the serious beginning student or casual reader interested in Japanese culture. Included are reference books, guides, fiction, novels, translations, research studies, essays, poetry, and periodicals. Entries are organized by the following categories: Introductory Readings; Reference; Geography and Travel; Sociology and Education; Government, Politics, and Law; Economics and Business; Religion and Philosophy; Literature; Drama, Theater, and Cinema; Arts; History and Biography; and Periodicals.

The author lists Hispanic-American legends, poetry, short stories, short essays, plays, fiction and biography and provides brief summaries emphasizing the general good points and drawbacks of each for secondary teachers.

This manual is designed to help secondary teachers integrate materials and perspectives concerning ethnic groups in the United States and their heritage into traditional classes in English, speech and communication studies, humanities, economics, psychology, and sociology.

The three narrators on this tape taken from the 1981 NCTE Convention Speeches discuss positive reading approaches that stem from a recognition of black culture, and stress that black children should be exposed to a greater variety of exemplary black literature.

This work suggests ways in which a firsthand knowledge about Japan can be brought into American secondary school classrooms through the study of various forms of modern literature. Each example of Japanese literature (short stories, novels, poetry, comics, etc.) is followed by questions for student discussion.

Curriculum Materials

The author describes a teaching unit that involves students in reading and analyzing elements of humor in young people's literature. There is a focus on what makes quality humorous books funny as well as literary.

   This curriculum reform package seeks to find ways "into, through, and beyond the text." Methods, materials, and focus are concentrated on and amplified as the key factors in integrating literature into and beyond the classroom. Various methods are discussed for giving both the student and the teacher a more involved role in the appreciation of literature, and for making that literature a comprehensive, practical element in the lives of student readers.

   Noting that instructional films can serve as a valuable tool to motivate students and to help them organize, interpret, and evaluate concepts presented, this program guide is designed to assist teachers in planning instructional activities that will effectively integrate film into the English language arts curriculum. The first section of the guide presents an initial statement of purpose, instructions for use of the guide, and a lesson format and a graphic presentation of the format for each study guide. The remainder of the guide presents detailed lessons for works in diverse literary genres.

   Noting that most junior high level curricula do not take into account students' rapid mental and physical changes, the articles in this focused journal issue recommend works and teaching strategies that harmonize with these student needs.

   A specialized curriculum focusing on interrelationships of the rural resident, the land, and the small community, and offering an alternative to urban-based literature could include units on American folklore, fictional accounts of early settlements, displaced Americans, small community life, the ecology issue, the individual-land relationship, historical changes and trends, and local research.

   This article traces the development of a literature program for use in high school journalism classes in California. It contains an especially useful synopsis of the program units.

The purpose of this curriculum outline is to define the basic language arts requirements for junior high school students in the Oak Park (Illinois) school district. For grades 7 and 8 the topics covered in mechanics, spelling, capitalization, punctuation, parts of speech, language usage, and sentence style are outlined. In addition, a summary of the writing styles, composition skills, literature, vocabulary, and listening and speaking skills covered at the junior high level is provided.

The purpose of this language arts curriculum guide for grades K-12 is to present the approved curriculum that serves as the basic core of all language arts instruction. The guide components—reading, writing, speaking, listening, and thinking—can be treated as individual disciplines, each with its own body of knowledge and its own process skills, or they may be taught as falling into the areas of either encoding or decoding. Rationales and objectives are provided for literature, spelling, language, mechanics, composition, grammar, listening, speaking, and handwriting.

The instructional program described in this guide is designed to provide a sequential language arts curriculum for kindergarten through grade 12. Information contained in the guide includes language arts objectives for each grade level; learner outcomes for speech, drama, and advanced drama; learner outcomes in a variety of topics such as children's literature, discussion and debate, grammar and usage, career English, communication, and several other areas concentrated in specific grade levels.

These six informative articles establish the value of children's literature, and suggest practical ways of incorporating literature into the kindergarten, middle school, and high school curriculum. Ideas for using literature to aid in teaching other skills, such as writing, are also included.

As a reference guide for the selection of children's books, this book considers the appropriateness of such books for bibliotherapy as well as issues of a societal and developmental nature. Each of the book's chapters contains an introduction to an issue, a section relating particular books to the topic, suggestions for activities that teachers or concerned adults may follow, reading extension activities, an annotated list of sources, and a recommended list of children's books pertaining to the topic. The chapter topics include: family (with sections on siblings, divorce, adoption, and foster care); sex; gender roles; heritage; special needs; old age; death; and war.

This article outlines criteria for selecting books for a unit on moral thinking and presents a generic study of questions and activities to accompany a wide variety of appropriate books.

This article thoroughly discusses teaching strategies for a literature packet entitled "Personality Sketch."

Prepared to help instructors select the best available reading materials for children and adolescents, this bibliography contains short book reviews that have been previously published in the "Bulletin of the Center for Children's Books."

The authors present a literature unit for high school English studies designed to promote students' moral development through study of moral conflicts in novels and scenarios. The unit is based on Kohlberg's moral development stage theory. Assignments, handouts, and a test are provided.

Drama and Oral Interpretation

This article describes a method for involving poor readers with Shakespeare texts by means of reading aloud, writing and workshops.

Carroll provides a framework for planning an approach to text through drama and describes a lesson plan using this approach with Red Shift by Dorothy Heathcote.

Seven documents on oral interpretation from the ERIC system are summarized, and the author states that they can be used to show students the importance of reading aloud with skill. The assertion is made that they also provide suggestions for using oral interpretation in the study of many types of literature and contexts.

This book discusses putting performance at the center of the teaching of dramatic literature; it provides teachers with a practical guide to the theory and practice of theatre audience education, covering what to do before, during, and after taking students to see plays.

Investigated in this study are the effects of the following strategies on high school students' response to literature: (1) creative drama exercises; (2) teacher-directed literature discussions; and (3) self-directed small groups. The authors found no significant differences among these methods; however, there was adequate evidence to support creative drama as a viable learning approach.

Interpersonal communication and literature are two areas of knowledge that should be pursued together. Plays offer the opportunity to explore and to participate in the process of dialogue.

The work describes a classroom program in which students adapted and then produced a play based on the adolescent novel The Chocolate War. The author notes group improvisation strategies for adapting internal monologue to dialogue, and argues the advantages of such a project over class discussion and book reports.

The nineteen articles in this collection focus on new and innovative ways to teach Shakespeare. Among the topics covered are a discussion of Shakespeare's sonnets, some thoughts about an interdisciplinary approach from a comparative arts instructor, comments on how students can overcome the anxiety they may feel when first reading Shakespeare, general advice about how and why to teach Shakespeare, and creative ideas for teaching a number of his plays.

Noting that breaking off romantic relationships can be traumatic even when the end is welcome, this paper describes the strategies and stages of relationship termination and suggests ways for instructors of oral interpretation and/or interpersonal communication classes to illustrate such relational decay.

Exceptional Children

Eldridge explains six instructional components, based on a psycholinguistic view of reading, for teaching adolescent disabled readers to read.

This document represents the first of three volumes presenting a curriculum designed to help nonhandicapped students understand students with disabilities. It focuses on the use of literature to foster that understanding in junior and senior high. Literature that is advocated for use in this curriculum includes: Of Mice and Men, Flowers for Algernon, To Kill a Mockingbird, I Never Promised You a Rose Garden, and The Heart is a Lonely Hunter.

Kehler asserts that Shakespeare's plays are the apex of Western achievement in the humanities and as such afford a highly fertile mechanism for teaching gifted elementary and secondary students.

This journal issue focuses on instructional methods for teaching the English language arts to gifted and handicapped children. The articles discuss a variety of topics, including: (1) remedial language instruction; (2) improving a dyslexic student's spelling; (3) creative writing for the language disabled; (4) writing instruction for emotionally or mentally retarded mainstreamed children; (5) young adult literature featuring handicapped characters; (6) teaching ideas for exceptional students, including literature study and word origins; (7) writing enrichment opportunities for gifted students; and (8) decreasing testing in favor of more reading and writing.

This article cites 40 books for children and young adults which provide a sensitive treatment and understanding of the handicapped, depict cruelty often inflicted upon them, and in many instances foster a better understanding of the challenges faced by family members of handicapped people. Publisher, publication date, price, intended grade level, and brief annotation are included.

The paper reviews research dealing with spatial cognitive ability differences in gifted children and cites implications for reading instruction of gifted readers.

This booklet provides examples of selected literature which are important but difficult for mainstreamed students to understand, and which can be used as a resource for teaching content subjects more effectively to mildly handicapped students. Following an introduction, title lists are cross-referenced by topic and content area.

Gender Issues

This journal article outlines a genre study program, useful for undergraduate or graduate classes in children's literature as well as for adaptation for use with learners in grades six through nine. The author enumerates questions and reading assignments pertaining to changing gender roles, and also includes an annotated bibliography (by level and genre).

The author reviews new publications in Women's Studies and suggests applications for use in the English class.

This journal article outlines purposes, objectives, and reasons for a high school women's literature course.

Designed to help secondary teachers in British Columbia, Canada supplement the curriculum, the guide contains a series of units focusing on Women’s Studies. These units can be integrated into English, social studies, and guidance courses or used as a resource for the development of a Women's Studies course.

Interdisciplinary Approaches

The use of literature in a U.S. history class can revitalize the curriculum. The applicability of biographies, historical fiction, and contemporary fiction to history classes is discussed. A brief annotated list of appropriate sources, chronologically arranged for reluctant, average, and advanced readers is included.

Both literature teachers who take the time to teach historical background and history teachers who take the time to incorporate literature into their classes will help students discover that life is multidimensional. Some practical activities are suggested to correlate language arts with social studies.

Literary works that can help teachers of humanities and conflict-resolution courses lead their students to a better understanding of the problems of war and peace are summarized in this work. The author asserts two premises: (1) literature that captures the experience and the meaning of war leads to an understanding of that phenomenon; and (2) the literary imagination can help students gain insight into the requirements of any successful attempt to replace war with less brutal and destructive means of resolving political conflict. The specific conflicts examined range from the Trojan War to Vietnam, and offer a wide variety of perspectives.

This article describes a unit in which elementary students experience life in ancient Egypt by role playing different positions in society. Students research their role, prepare a paper doll dressed in the clothing of their role, analyze an opera, and paint a window in the stylized method used on Egyptian tomb paintings.

The author presents a case for incorporating humanities instruction into the study of literature and suggests activities by which teachers can go beyond literary devices in individual works to encompass the humanistic components of the cultures that produced them.

This paper discusses the role that geography plays in the enhanced comprehension of some literature. One way to demonstrate the value and utility of geography is to show how geographers can contribute to other fields and the interrelationships with other disciplines. Examples include: James Michener, William Faulkner, Phillip and Juliana Muehreke, Agatha Christie, Dorothy Sayers, and John Steinbeck.

To help history classroom teachers on the high school level make their classes more interesting, this article suggests that teachers incorporate short stories, books, poems, and excerpts from full-length novels into the curriculum. Examples of how literature of various types were successfully integrated into a history unit on the Civil War are offered.

The report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education concluded with scant information about a need for fine arts in the schools. Outlined is an interdisciplinary course that uses many art forms—literature, opera, and symphonies—to prevent the extinction of music and art education.

Teachers and students of economics and literature can learn about economics by studying concepts and topics in great literature and drama. Themes in literature deal with economic forces. A table of these themes is included.

Literature Instruction Elementary

Intended to help teachers decide which books to start with when incorporating children's literature into the reading program and to show them how to use these books with a variety of readers, this book provides a rationale and guidance for using "real books" to teach reading. The seventeen articles here aim to make the subject of children's literature approachable through an informal, conversational writing style. Titles include "Extending Multicultural Understanding through Children's Books" (Rudine Sims Bishop); "Enriching the Arts and Humanities through Children's Books" (Sam Leaton Sebesta); and "Resources to Identify Children's Books for the Reading Program" (Arlene M. Pillar).

McConaghy describes some of the discussions and writing that first grade children engaged in as the result of their exposure to literature read aloud.

Literature can and should be an integral part of helping students become thoughtful and motivated readers and should encourage them to develop critical-thinking and creative-writing skills. This book provides thirteen units that focus on a wide variety of topics. Background information is provided on how focus units can be used to create a context for literacy and on how to create one's own focus units using the book's guidelines for questioning.

Using a questionnaire, a study determined the titles and authors of fiction most used by teachers in the classroom, how the books were used, and the time spent on these books.

Leading educators in children's literature offer suggestions for effective classroom use of favorite children's books. The suggestions include ideas on which books and poems to use, how to structure the classroom, how to encourage writing, and how to stimulate children's responses to literature.

Literature Instruction Secondary

The seven articles in this focused journal issue are concerned with choosing books for teaching and the various constraints on those choices.

The authors report on the effective use of hierarchical and nonhierarchical reading guides with John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath. What they find indicates that reading guides improve comprehension, provide transferable skills, and create positive feelings about learning.

Intended to help the secondary school classroom teacher make use of some of the current research related to reading instruction, this book contains reviews of the literature on the various aspects of secondary school reading.

Cameron discusses the use of visual/aural stimuli in presenting poetry and literature. This article includes a step-by-step script for a slide/tape presentation.

This book offers suggestions of fresh approaches to the teaching of books widely regarded as classics. Some of the texts included: Beowulf, To Kill A Mockingbird, Pride and Prejudice, Romeo and Juliet, A Tale of Two Cities, Animal Farm, and The Scarlet Letter. There are suggestions for every grade level, as well as ideas for the literature-writing connection and for teaching multiple titles.

The theme of this journal issue is the development of lifelong reading habits and interests. The articles address questions of what to read, how to read, and why one should read. Bibliographies are provided, novels and poems are recommended, and teaching strategies and curricula are outlined. In addition, two student essays are offered on the question of censorship.

In the words of the editors, these eleven essays "affirm the explanatory power of reader-oriented theory, and in their range of concerns invite teachers to conduct their own explorations of the transformation of real texts by real readers in their own classrooms." Essays include: "Rendering Literature Accessible" by Lola Browr; "Reading/Writing in the Culture of the Classroom" by Clem Young and Esme Robinson; "Responding to Poetry: Create, Comprehend, Criticize" by Molly Travers, and "The Hidden Life of a Drama Text" by Roslyn Arnold.

These nine articles on reader response to literature mix theory, pedagogy, and specific teaching techniques. Poetry, narrative fiction, "clustering" techniques, and many other topics are covered.

The author discusses Stephen Tanner's model of using literary criticism as a discourse, asserting that it fails to train students to think, but only teaches them to discuss literature from an academic perspective. In contrast, Robert Scholes' model of textual studies offers both a workable methodology and a relevant curriculum.

This study seeks to answer the question: What happens in the transaction between adolescent readers and poems? The author begins with the hypothesis that students' antipathy to poetry has arisen essentially from their belief that they could not make sense of and appreciate a poem unless a teacher mediated that process. This study examines small, undirected discussion groups of 16-year-olds who are given poems to analyze on their own. The author comments on all stages of the readers' responses, and looks to define clearly identifiable individual patterns of reading.

This book is concerned primarily with presenting arguments for a re-examination of the ways in which poetry is taught in the secondary classroom. Focus is placed on reader response and teaching methods, and the implications of current theory and the authors' own research are considered.

Dominianni describes how Bradbury's work can be used in the classroom. He indicates how attitudes towards technology can be found in the work, and how these may be used to stimulate interest in mature students.

In this article, reasons are discussed for requiring high school English teachers to write rationales justifying the inclusion of all books (controversial or not) assigned and read in the classroom. The reasons given include communicating with students and parents, providing evidence of the teacher's concern and knowledge, and preparing for censorship disagreements.

Although the short story is brief and seemingly simple to comprehend, experienced teachers know from painful experience that students often read without "seeing" and that the only way to get them to "see" is to isolate some of the elements of the short story and present them in a different way in order to focus attention on them.

In this article, the author discusses the idea of using Grimm's fairy tales to teach students how to read critically for appropriate quotations and outlines the proper stylistics for including them in writing.

The instrumented team approach at St. John's High School, South Carolina, succeeds in getting general students to meet serious intellectual challenges because group learning counters the problems of poor reading ability, fear of failure, absenteeism, limited time, and underestimation of the importance of school.

Of the 19 articles in this collection, 15 focus on bringing literary theories into the classroom. All of the contributors discuss how literary theory gives creative vitality to the act of interpretation.

Using Maya Angelou’s I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings and Carl Sandburg’s Abe Lincoln Grows Up as their models, the authors provide specific guidelines and classroom applications for teaching biography and autobiography.

This work offers suggestions for student writing exercises before, during and after reading Shakespeare’s Henry IV. Hays cites specific passages useful for classroom examination, followed by discussion and writing questions centered on the conflict between Henry IV and his son, a "generation gap" theme to which students can easily relate.

The use of guided imagery meshes with recent insights into right and left brain learning. Guided imagery engages the right brain processes such as imagination, emotion, creative, and intuitive activities.

The author explores a few of the trends contributing to the apparent decline in substantive literature instruction. He suggests some teaching methods that can help restore the human element to literature.

Huband offers three reasons that justify the inclusion of the book Overkill on the British "O" level literature syllabus: (1) the nuclear bomb is the most important invention of the century; (2) the language provides a clear example of scientific writing and talking; and (3) the book is informative in helping students arrive at a decision concerning disarmament.

The six articles in this focused journal issue are concerned with literature teaching on the secondary and college level. The titles and authors include: "Discovery: The Role of Subjective Response in Initiating the Literature Discussion" (Susan Casper); "Inquiry" (Helen C. Lee); and "The Practical Book Report" (Randeane Tetu). Reviews of selected books for children, adolescents, and teachers are also included.

This article presents 10 practical teaching procedures to encourage students to develop formal reasoning skills. A twelfth-grade English course is used as an example. Procedures include pretesting, sequencing instruction, providing students with concrete experiences, discussing reasoning patterns and forms of argumentation, assigning argumentative writing assignments, and encouraging discussion and debate.

The author outlines a process approach to teaching literature which focuses both on meaningful writing and on the ways students respond to what they read.

In this work the author describes a study guide to help students read short stories, essays, novels, drama, and poetry, according to Bloom's taxonomy.

Mackey presents a rationale and framework for teaching values using quality works of literature.

This teacher resource contains readings, discussion questions, and learning activities on the Holocaust for use with junior and senior high school students.

This journal issue presents teaching ideas based on the city of Chicago and the literary works of its citizens. The first article describes a combined social studies/English course based on the study of Chicago's influence on literature and history. The second article describes how Carl Sandburg's poems can be used to study the question "What does Chicago mean?" and to teach students how to read dramatically. The final article examines the song lyrics of Chicagoan Steve Goodman, and discusses their relevance to Chicago places and people and how they illustrate the effectiveness of precise detail and apt metaphor.

The articles in this focused issue draw attention to works of contemporary literature with classroom potential. Four articles suggest new approaches for the reading and teaching of such established writers as Robert Frost, Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., Eudora Welty, and Saul Bellow. Two other articles examine the best sellers Ordinary People and The Color Purple. Reviews and suggestions for teaching the fantasy writers Lloyd Alexander and Ursula Le Guin are presented. Theodore Strugeon's More Than Human is also discussed, as a classic of modern science fiction.

Focusing on young adult reading and instruction, this issue addresses teachers' concerns about recommended recent authors and books, integrating independent reading into the reading program, and student motivation.

This book offers over 200 ideas for activities that can be adapted for students in middle school, junior high, or high school. The ideas are grouped into eleven categories, including: Getting Ready to Write; Expressive Writing; Revision, Review, and Evaluation; Punctuation and Grammar; Speaking and Listening; and Talking and Writing about Literature.

Part One of this book provides a discussion of literature as event, as object, and as message, plus consideration of what makes good reading. Part Two details four models for teaching single works in which Miller demonstrates his encounter with the work as work, and then offers a program for teacher preparation, the use of audiovisual aids, and oral presentations.

The authors suggest a structured response format for interpreting literary characters in death-related literature using Kubler-Ross’s five stages of confronting death.

This journal article describes assignment sequence introducing secondary school students to finding and interpreting quotes from assigned literature by having students: (1) respond in journals to a quotation chosen by the teacher; (2) analyze characterization by illustrating character traits with quotations; (3) create a collage or mobile visually interpreting quote; and (4) discuss in class meaning of quotes selected in each assignment.

Neil describes the use of imitation exercises to expose students to selections from great literature and give them opportunities to practice certain English usage or conventions. He notes that imitation improves syntax and style.

The author describes the advantages of presenting students with novels designed for them and notes some recommended works with which students can be successful.

This work describes a method of writing across the curriculum that works and also identifies two Spanish-language young adult novels written by Hispanic authors.

This journal article provides suggestions for teaching multisyllable words to remedial readers, incorporating romantic fiction into a reading program, and using content writing activities in a biology class.

This journal article presents a way of interesting students in high school literature by starting with children's books. The technique involves teacher modeling, using illustrations to motivate writing, and linking a children's book with a more advanced work. on a similar topic.

   The authors present and analyze a high school student's story about fishing. They provide study guide questions intended to amplify the reading for students. Teachers are invited to use this story and study guide in their own classrooms.

   Owen discusses how fantasy books can be used in the classroom to provide exercises for the imagination, to allow students to see themselves more clearly, to allow them to escape, and to generate hope.

   C. Smith's "read a book in an hour" procedure for the development of listening and reading comprehension and B. Beyer's "hamburger writing" procedure for the development of composition skills formed the basis of a teaching technique that provided students with problem solving tasks, a procedure for writing compositions, and exposure to a classic adolescent novel within a limited time.

   The activities in this book are designed to help students learn to understand the language of Shakespeare by learning to recognize and translate unfamiliar words and syntactic patterns.

   Rouse probes William Wordsworth's relationship to the young reader. He concludes that although many young people today cannot have the direct, immediate experience of nature that overawed Wordsworth, they can, in a room where they sit down together and read a poem, "learn a contemplative solitude - and respond to [a] poem in their individual ways."

   The activities in this book are designed specifically to introduce students to new literature and composition assignments and to help them explore ideas that are unfamiliar and complex.

The unit of study offered in this paper is designed to guide the analysis of a representative sample of modern fiction from four English-speaking countries. Annotations of six novels are offered to show painful problems and also how the novels are useful for study by ninth and tenth grade students. The Pearl by John Steinbeck is an example.

By reading literature about wars, secondary students can learn about the values of different cultures and societies. Teaching approaches are suggested, and specific titles are discussed.

This journal article cites three strategies for teaching literature in journalism classes, including using literature packets as a class project and having students receive grades for the work they do on the literature packets.

The authors of these articles view the writer as the seed of literature and the critical response by the reader as the harvest. The collection covers such topics as writing about literature, integrating language and literature, developing literary criticism, and using drama as literature.

Literature Instruction General

Based on the premise that young people's positive attitudes toward reading and writing can be shaped through the use of literature which treats those activities as valuable, a content analysis was conducted of Caldecott Medal winners from 1938 through 1981 and of Newbery Medal winners from 1922 to 1981 to determine how these books dealt with reading and writing. The books depicted reading and writing as important activities for survival, enjoyment, and the gaining and sharing of knowledge. Summaries of the seventeen books are included, along with instructional strategies designed for use with reluctant readers and writers.

This handbook suggests ways to bring into the English classroom literature that deals with the human response to a nuclear threat.

This article describes the group intermix procedure, a prediscussion strategy in which students work in groups to process the content of a single book. The author suggests various classroom applications.

"Posacculturation" (positive acculturation) is the power of literature to deepen understanding and appreciation of the self and others. Works discussed in this paper for use in a "posacculturation" program include The Pigman, The Velveteen Rabbit, The Little Prince, The Door in the Wall, Charlotte's Web, All Kinds of Families, Harriet the Spy, The Outsiders, Nilda, Across Five Aprils, Blubber, and Grapes of Wrath.

This article identifies the contradictions in some of the existing applications of literary tools to curriculum thought, indicates some of the problematic implications for curriculum practice, and sketches an alternative conception of literature as discursive practice.

Until recently the Holocaust was largely ignored in history books and literature, leaving most students without even the basic knowledge of a historical event that can and should have meaning for them. Ganz asserts that literature, because it is concerned with feelings and conveys emotions, can move young people to an empathetic awareness of the subject.

This journal article begins with the assertion that subjectivist literary criticism, which emphasizes readers' emotional responses to texts and adopts psychoanalytic classroom techniques, renders questionable such aspects of literature teaching as goals, evaluation, and teacher preparation. Literature teachers must abandon the scientific orientation of objectivism and subjectivism in favor of an aesthetic framework for interpreting and teaching literature.

Teachers of English.

Collaborative learning activities allow students to learn through "talk"; as students talk with each other and work together on various classroom projects and activities, they learn to develop their ideas, and their teacher becomes an active guide rather than just a source of information. The first section of this book provides guidelines for developing "Collaborative Learning Skills"; the second section contains activities for "Collaborative Learning and Literature Study"; the third offers ways to implement "Collaboration in Writing, Revising, and Editing"; and the final section, "Additional Collaborative Learning Activities," involves television, music, and scriptwriting.

   Intended for teachers, administrators, consultants, parents and students who wish to review and improve elementary and secondary educational programs, this handbook provides essays discussing educational research, teaching philosophies and methods, instructional materials, and curriculum planning strategies in relation to the teaching of literature.

This book discusses the teaching of literature from first grade through senior high school within a variety of theoretical perspectives, including structuralist, psychoanalytic, Marxist, archetypal, and feminist. The three principle sections are: "Readers: Student Responses to Literature"; "Texts: Interpretive Approaches to Literature"; and "Contexts: Social Dimensions of Literature."

This paper begins with the assertion that learning difficult literary concepts (such as point of view, unfamiliar content) while reading difficult and often unfamiliar content prematurely places too many demands upon middle school and high school students. Young adult literature allows students to address the demands of a new concept while reading more familiar content. One specific technique found to be beneficial when teaching new concepts is the double entry journal, which requires students to write affective responses to readings and to compare such entries with classmates. After discussion with peers and critical analysis of the literature in class discussion, students write a second journal entry synthesizing insights gained from discussion, analysis, readings, and writings.

This literature program promotes students' language development, positive self-concept, and mental health skills through fluent communication with a deaf student adviser who leads weekly discussion/storytelling for students from kindergarten through high school. Teachers report, among other positive effects, that the deaf educator is an excellent role model for classroom teaching techniques.

The 33 cases in this book have been carefully designed to present a full and comprehensive examination of the teaching of English language arts. The teaching of literature, language, and composition is explored, as is evaluation, censorship, materials selection, grouping, and a host of other aspects of the teaching of English.

This monograph consists of teaching guides for five junior novels: Tales of a Fourth Grade Nothing; Mrs. Frisby and the Rats of NIMH; Across Five Aprils; The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe; and Harriet the Spy.

Woodhead suggests that any attempt that the teacher makes to create a lesson where the student can engage the text runs directly counter to the whole drift of the secondary school curriculum as it exists today.

This book consists of a collection of seventeen articles that deal with the notion that students cannot be "taught" poetry, but can be introduced to it in certain ways and can learn to love it on their own.

Writing and Literature

The author suggests giving literature/composition students a set of declarative statements that enable them to define a thematic statement and then write a focused, fully developed analytical essay. The article includes such declarative statements from the novel Dinner at the Homesick Restaurant by Anne Tyler.

The author recommends using young adult literature to teach composition skills.

An approach to writing for junior high through college writing and literature classes is presented in this brief article. Author's Comment (excerpt): "Writing from literature, instead of only about literature, can provide creative approaches to the study of literary works."

A former editor of "Scholastic Voice" speculates on why one set of writing assignments, based on reader response to writings by a handicapped teenager, produced such outstanding results. Glixon describes the uncommonly high involvement of student readers, who wrote over 3,000 letters to the author, and undertook classroom writing with enthusiasm and concrete focus.

This volume brings together original essays that address the problematic gap between the teaching of writing and the teaching of literature. The essays explore both theoretical and practical aspects of the issues that underlie the decline in students' writing skills.

The authors present a set of sequences designed to teach students to support an interpretation, explicate an implied relationship, and analyze an author's generalizations. They provide a series of handouts which help students develop the skills of analysis and persuasion that are essential to writing about literature.

This collection of classroom-tested writing assignments offers innovative ideas for teaching a variety of literary works. The assignments focus on several different genres, including English classics, American novels, short stories, and poetry. The emphasis of the assignments ranges from understanding and mastering point of view, to learning to decipher multiple narratives.

Intended to provide teachers of poetry with both inspiration and teaching advice, this paper explains how one teacher developed a method for teaching poetry successfully in high school.

Taberski presents five strategies for helping elementary school students learn to write fiction: (1) stress topic selection; (2) use literature to teach fiction writing; (3) stress main character change or problem solving; (4) emphasize reality-based stories; and (5) encourage students to research their fiction.

"La dictée" is an effective, time-tested strategy for teaching writing based on the French method of writing from dictation. In addition to writing, "la dictée" incorporates thinking, listening, and speaking skills; relies on literature to provide instructional material; and stresses the interrelationships between reading and writing.

The author believes that poetry can be an outlet for expressing the strong emotions of adolescence, and that the teacher's role is to inspire students to write poetry by reading aloud exemplary student works. This book offers not only teaching designs, but also 18 different poetry assignments that the author has created and used successfully in the classroom.

Wentworth notes that when students are assigned writing topics requiring sophisticated reading, they circumvent interpretation by rewriting the text in their personal idiom. He suggests that since meaning is discovered through process, students should be given numerous opportunities to respond to the same text. This article offers several kinds of response activities.
