VOLUNTARY PROFESSIONAL CREDENTIALING PROGRAMS
A Resource Handbook for Continuing Educators

March 1989

Ohio Continuing Higher Education Association
Community and Governmental Relations Committee
INTRODUCTION

Voluntary credentialing programs have become increasingly popular in recent years. In a credential-conscious society, many professions and occupations view professional designations as a means of enhancing practitioner competence and improving the field's status. While state licensure serves a similar purpose, it affects only a relatively small number of occupational groups. Thus a growing national system of voluntary credentialing has developed, primarily in fields that are not subject to state licensure. Even some licensed professions have adopted voluntary credentialing programs, as evidenced by the number of specialty certificates available to nurses, physicians, dentists, and real estate professionals.

Typically, voluntary credentialing programs are offered by professional associations, sometimes in conjunction with an independent yet affiliated certifying board. Credentialing assumes a variety of names, depending upon the field. Practitioners might be certified, registered, or chartered, or might attain fellowship status, for example. Although the term "accreditation" normally applies to academic programs rather than to individuals, some associations have adopted it for use in individual credentialing.

Credentialing requirements vary widely from one field to another. Often, however, requirements include specific educational and experience background and an examination. While some credentials are valid for life, many require periodic renewal, frequently through participation in continuing education activities.

Why is information about voluntary credentialing important to continuing educators? The information will assist colleges and universities that wish to serve specific professions and occupations more effectively. First, continuing education might be a useful means for an individual to attain the educational prerequisites or to prepare for an examination needed for initial credentialing. Second, colleges and universities may well have a role to play in providing the ongoing educational activities needed for credential renewal.

In 1987, the Ohio Continuing Higher Education Association compiled information on Ohio's professional and occupational licensure requirements. A second association goal has been the compilation of a similar resource handbook on voluntary credentialing. The Community and Governmental Relations Committee undertook this responsibility over the past one and one-half years. This resource handbook is a result of those efforts.

Information has been obtained from professional association in a wide range of professions and occupations that were known to offer voluntary credentialing. Because of the magnitude and duration of the effort, some of the information included in the publication is over a year old. Coupled with the rapidity with which credentialing and recredentialing requirements change, that fact prompts us to strongly encourage OCHEA members to regard this document as a starting point rather than the final word. The organization offering a given credential is obviously the best source of thorough and current information.
Despite the comprehensiveness of this handbook, there are undoubtedly many credentialing programs inadvertently omitted. The committee anticipates periodically sending members information on additional credentials. Any new information will be produced in such a way that it can be inserted into the current handbook. We welcome suggestions of additional credentials that should be included.

Any effort of this scope requires an extensive amount of work. Particular thanks go to committee member Mary Rose Zink and her secretary for their efforts during the earlier stages of obtaining and compiling information. More recently, Cindy Sweet in Ohio State's Office of Continuing Education has been instrumental in readying information for inclusion. The handbook would not have been completed without her help.

It is the committee's hope that this handbook will become a useful resource for OCHEA members.
