This module is part of a training program for foster parents and foster care workers offered at Colorado State University. The module's learning objectives address: (1) the position of the foster child as an outsider in the foster family; (2) foster parenting experiences with children from birth to 18 years of age; and (3) the process of psychological parenting, that is, the fulfillment of the child's psychological needs for a parent. The module consists of three lectures. Each lecture includes reading material and exercises for individuals or groups. Lecture 1 considers parents' experiences at the various stages of a child's development. Lecture 2 considers the position of the foster child as an outsider in the new family system. Exercises and charts for helping foster parents understand foster children's viewpoints are provided. Lecture 3 considers the special problems of nonnormative parenting, or parenting in which the parental authority is shared among biological parents, foster parents, and public or private agencies. The physical, emotional, social, and spiritual elements of psychological parenting, and elements involving family inclusion, are listed. A practice vignette allows participants to respond to a hypothetical foster child's problem. A list of 10 references is provided. A five-page form for evaluating the module is included. (BC)

About the Authors

Mona Struhsaker Schatz, D.S.W., serves as the project director for Fostering Families and Associate Professor in the Social Work Department. She received her master's in social work (M.S.W.) from the University of Denver (1979) and her doctorate from the University of Pennsylvania (1986). Since 1972, Dr. Schatz has worked in child welfare and children's services in Colorado and several other states. In the 1970's, Dr. Schatz served as a foster parent. In the 1980's she served on Greene County Missouri's Permanency Planning Committee. Since returning to Colorado, she has researched and written in the field of foster care.

David Glenn, L.C.S.W., is the Training Coordinator for Fostering Families and serves as a Clinical Assistant Professor in the Department of Psychiatry, Baylor College of Medicine. His career has been divided among teaching child development, training psychotherapists and his own clinical practice. His special interest is problems of early adolescence.

Kay Pasley, Ph.D., serves as a Project Faculty member for Fostering Families and Full Professor in the Department of Human Development and Families Studies at Colorado State University. She has authored numerous articles and books on family development and blended families.
Fostering Families, a specialized foster care training program, offers a distinctive learning opportunity for caseworkers and foster parents throughout Colorado. Unique because this program is designed with regular input from foster parents and social services people who regularly work to meet the needs of children in out-of-home placement. This training project continues to evolve because of the on-going training program. To achieve the high accessibility for foster parents, training sessions are held in the evenings and on weekends. To afford access to caseworkers, sessions are also scheduled on weekdays. Each week training sessions are held throughout the urban, suburban and rural regions of the State. Our goal is to create training situations where both foster parents and caseworkers are learning collaboratively in each session.

Psychological Parenting: The Foster Care Process has been created to provide an understanding of unique type of parenting which foster parents provide. "Psychological parenting" is a relatively new term which describes the perception of "parent" that children has when someone other than a biological parent is caretaking. Psychological parenting is what foster parents do, thus, we feel it is important to explore the complex nature.

Each manual is written to provide a wide range of information on the topic area being addressed. In the training session it is unlikely that the everything in the manual is equally addressed. We recommend that the manual be read completely soon after a training session. We have been told that this helps greatly toward gaining a full understanding of the issue at hand. In this manual, there are several helpful charts that summarize important ideas and can be reviewed often when involved with a poorly attached young teen.

Colorado State University allows participants the opportunity to gain university credit when a series of training sessions are satisfactorily completed. During the session, the training instructor will review procedures for applying for credit.

We welcome you to this Fostering Families training session. We encourage you to participate fully in the training; ask questions that help you (and others) in this interesting and challenging learning opportunity.

FOSTERING FAMILIES

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

1. Through the training process, participants will learn about the unique position of the foster child as the "outsider" in the fostering family.

2. Participants will identify parenting experiences with children from birth to 18, exploring specific foster parenting issues.

3. Participants will explore the concept of psychological parenting process.

4. Through a practice vignette, participants will consider the many issues of being a foster parent psychological parent.
Children depend on parents to provide the basic structures for healthy and productive growth. We can look at the parenting process at the various stages of child development to identify how various children's needs require different responses from parents. These different parenting responses must be based on the needs of the child as he/she grow and develop.

Our first exercise in this module is to have participants identify some of the basic parenting experiences and issues that are common in parenting and foster parenting. Through this exercise, participants can begin to see the breadth of children's needs and how these needs change as the child grows and develops.

In early infancy through to toddler years, parents identify issues such as bonding, learning to communicate and talk, learning to eat solids, gaining mobility through to walking, sleeping and bed-time issues, and testing boundaries and rules, clinging to mom/dad. Many more issues are identified in this exercise.

Moving to early school-age years, parents often identify parenting experiences and issues such as sibling rivalry, competition and comparison within same-sex groups, interaction with peers and the establishment of a "pecking order" in clubs, groups, etc, issues of school...
Instructions:

1. Separate into two or three groups (approximately 4 to a group):

   Example:

   Group 1: Infants - 5 yrs
   Group 2: Middle Childhood
   Group 3: Adolescence

2. In the different groups, spend 15-25 minutes having group members identify various parenting issues and experiences they have as parents and foster parents.

3. Record the issues on newsprint or a blackboard so information can be shared with the entire group together as a whole.

4. As a large group, review the issues identified in each of the groups.

including school performance, gender awareness, identity formation, feelings of exclusion, and needs for emotional self-control among other development activities.

Continuing further, some typical issues of development for later school-age youth, maybe 8-13 years of age, we see children needing parents to help them sort out their competencies. School is a major focus of time and energy. Children who have trouble with their school work often begin to act out their frustration. Peer group pressure becomes more significant in this age group as the peer group moves to the position of primacy. Children still need their parents' support and guidance at this time. Within the family, sibling rivalry can be quite intense. These pre-teens are beginning to struggle with their more mature identity needs - needs to know who they are and accept how they feel about themselves. Pre-teens often become moody and parents tire easily of the emotional see-sawing.

As children move through puberty, major changes occur physically that affect emotional and social behavior. Parents often have many fears about their daughters as they reach menstruation and concern about their boy's need for new experiences of independence. In teen years, adolescents are faced with many challenges as they begin to become part of the dominant culture, gaining "some" distance from their family-of-origin.
Parents often experience this transition with emotional fits by the teen as they struggle for new independence by developing new social group alliances with their peers.

So much can be said about the many, many parenting experiences when looked at across 18 or 20 years. For foster parents, the parenting experiences and issues identified vary. Many times the foster child is not developing in patterns typical to the chronological order identified. Rather, many foster children experience delayed growth because of dysfunctional family patterns where parents did not have adequate parenting skills.

In discussing parenting experiences, foster parents continually remark how quickly many foster children progress when in the foster family, although such is not the case with all children. Through this initial activity, participants can give a broad perspective on the diverse parenting issues and experiences.
The concept of an outsider can be applied to the child who has been removed from his or her family and has entered a new family system. An outsider is someone who is equally physically present in an environment such as a family, but the outsider does not really know what is going on. S/he generally feels like they are watching a movie screen, except in this situation, they are not.

A foster child is an outsider to the foster family. To survive, most foster children, as outsiders, work quickly to learn the rules -- especially those rules that enhance their survival. Other rules, usually more subtle and foreign are not learned as quickly, if at all.

Exercise #2 can sensitize the group to the child’s experience of feeling like an "outsider. Some of the feelings of moving out of one primary group and into another are explored.

When a child is removed from the biological family and placed in a foster family or any other form of substitute care, that child is effectively the "outsider" -- lacking the knowledge of how to operate in the pre-existing group and knowing the least about what it’s like to live with these members.

Group Activity
Do Exercise #2 entitled, "Different Families??"
FOSTERING FAMILIES

DIFFERENT FAMILIES??

EXERCISE #2

Instructions:

1. Divide into small groups.

2. Ask group members to spend 10-15 minutes identifying how foster families are similar to and different from families with all biological members.

3. In the middle of the exercise, the trainer will select one group member to move to another group. The group experience will continue on, however, with no different task(s).

Discussion Questions:

1. What were some similarities and differences in the foster family versus the biologically unique family?

2. When a group member was removed, how did he/she feel?

3. How did other members of the group feel when their member was asked to leave?

4. How did the new member feel with the new group?

5. How did the members in the newer group feel about having a new member?

6. What did the members of the newer group do to integrate the new member?
Helping such a "foster" child serves to extenuate this 'outside-ness.' The biological members of the foster family have a long shared history together; for example, they know what it's like to live in this family on a daily basis, and they know how celebrations and holidays are spent. It's important to introduce the foster child to the family's lifestyle and history early on, as well as encouraging the foster child to share his/her family's lifestyle and history (such as through the Life Books).

As early as possible, it is important to begin to build "common" history. The family can begin the process of identifying the family roles and rules so the reality of "outsidehood" wanes. Too, children of various ages experience outsided-ness differently. We have provided Chart A, "Charting The Outsider Status of Children and Adolescents" for you to explore some of the differences at home.

An at-home exercise on Chart B, "Sharing Past Histories," can allow foster families an opportunity to identify new ways to bring a foster child into their family experience.

This lecturette began with the experience of being moved around to allow each of us a slight sense of the foster child's experience. We end this lecturette building ways to take 'outsiders' and make them 'insiders' relatively easily.
To better understand the behaviors exhibited by children when they feel like an outsider, identify two (2) behaviors children might exhibit in each age group.

When the foster family shares its history, both history of the immediate family and then history related to other foster children, then the newly entering foster child can gain some ideas about how they can share their family history in ways that are informative and bring some ease to the newly entering child(ren).

Build on the ideas below by either talking among your family, working with foster parents in the community, or caseworkers to brainstorm ideas about sharing family history.

* Use family photo albums
* Talk about special memories
* Set aside special time for everyone to talk about themselves
* Use home movies, videos
* Explore a foster child's Life Book
Recently, Dr. Kathleen Eastman (1982) wrote about the non-normative parenting arrangement inherent in foster care. By describing foster parenting as non-normative she was referring to the sharing of parental authority with the birth parent, the public and/or private agency, and the foster parents. Other foster care experts concur with this thinking. They also discuss how foster parenting suffers because of the lack of the system identity, the lack of clarity regarding family memberships and the influence of the agency and biological parent(s), the lack of differentiation of roles and responsibilities, the lack of clarity of roles and the overall lack of consensus among the actors. This is then further riddled when cultural identities vary, ethnic or religious backgrounds are foreign to some of the actors, or language and other personal capabilities are limited.

Two aspects of family integration operate in foster care. One is the physical integration and inclusion process. This process we can observe in a family easily. The second process is the psychological incorporation of the new family "member." We know that for older adolescents, the process of psychological bonding is generally not a realistic expectation or practical goal in a fostering setting. Thus, for the adolescent psychological bonding relates to their feeling cared for, supported, and given opportunities for shared decision-making which can enhance the self-sufficiency skills they need.

In other words, the foster parent can become a psychological parent. Goldstein, Freud, and Solnit (1973) have defined the term in the following manner:

"A psychological parent is one who, on a continuing, day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills the child’s psychological needs for a parent, as well as the child’s physical needs" (p. 98).

In other words, children can and do develop meaningful relationships with substitute or surrogate parents. Therefore, the disruption of close relationships between foster children and foster parents can be and generally is a painful experience for both because of the emotional bonding that has developed. One might also speculate that the use of the terms "foster mother" and "foster father" bring about role confusion for the child in placement.

Psychological parents can and must aid children in understanding the power of these substitute parenting situations. What can become normative is the special quality of caring that foster children experience and rely upon over time in the foster care home. This is the special quality of the work done for children in need.

Psychological parenting is a term identified in the seventies (Goldstein, Freud, and Solnit, 1973) in order to address the unique nature of certain parenting relationships that are not biologically-created parenting situations instead these parenting relationships are psychologically understood to be parenting relationships with significance for parent(s), foster parents or otherwise, and child(ren). The following is a list of five major areas that make up the process of psychological parenting.

For younger children, there may be adverse effects for family reunification because of this role confusion. For the adolescent foster child, there is generally some ability to use these terms as the labels they are or they may find some acceptable substitute (e.g., use of first names).

Foster children then have "multiple parents. Reistroffer (1974a) suggested that multiple parents cannot be erased or ignored. These multiple parents include both the birth parents and the foster parents. Often a representative of the agency becomes an additional parent figure (Horejsi, 1979).

Lastly, children in placement often create what has been called "dream parents." Dream parents can be more significant and meaningful for the foster child because they represent the parents s/he wished s/he had (Reistroffer, 1974a). This has been portrayed in the video "Only People Cry" (See Early Decision Making which is a different Fostering Families Training module.)

In Chart D, "Psychological Parenting Process Depicted for Foster Care Parenting," the various aspects of psychological parenting are summarized. These include meeting physical, belonging, emotional-psychological and social needs, and spiritual.

Group & Individual Activity:
Examine Chart D, "Psychological Parenting Process Depicted for Foster Care Parenting."
Continually, workers and foster parents want to know what contributes to successful foster parenting experiences. Some research has identified factors that have been found to relate to greater satisfaction and success in foster homes and conversely, research has identified factors that adversely effect success in the foster parenting experience. These can be explored through Box One on the following page.

Thus, foster parenting is unique from parenting biological children. Also, we know something about the factors associated with satisfaction and success in the foster care home, as well as those factors which negatively affect the parenting of foster children.
FOSTERING FAMILIES

BOX ONE: FACTORS RELATED TO SUCCESS/ADVERSITY IN FOSTER PARENTING PROCESS

Factors that have been found to be related to greater satisfaction and success in the foster home include:

* The ability of foster parents to tolerate differences (Rowe, 1976).
* The ability of foster parents to self-disclose (Kraus, 1972).
* Foster homes which have a child-focus rather than a self or adult-focus (Kinter & Otto, 1984).
* The effective involvement of foster mothers and foster fathers with the professional worker (Cutley & Aldridge, 1973, 1975).

Factors which adversely affect success in the process of parenting foster children include:

* A high level of frustration with the fostering experience (Jorden & Rodway, 1984).
* A foster mother (and father) having difficulty separating from foster children, particularly infants and young children.
* Foster parents having a negative attitude toward the birth parent (Murphy, 1968).
As a large group, or in small groups of 4 to 6 people, consider the following vignette:

Kevin, 10 years old, is sitting in the hallway of your foster home. He seems very sad and afraid. You, the foster parent, sit with him and as you sit together, he discloses through his tears, that when he is bad at his home, his parents punish him by making him go without meals for the rest of a day. He then says that his parents don't love him. Kevin then says that he is confused because not only does your family eat all their meals, the meals are very good. (You are reminded that Kevin constantly complements your spouse on the good meals.)
PSYCHOLOGICAL PARENTING
PRACTICE VIGNETTE

These questions can help in working with the small chart on the previous page.

1. As a foster parent, consider what avenues of response exist and what are the implications of each response situation.

2. How do the different responses either help or hinder Kevin from gaining the learning that is available for him in at this point in his foster care experience.

3. How might we understand some specific aspects of psychological parenting from this exercise?
For information about family dynamics:

Aimed primarily for professional people who are working with families.

A clearly written, basic text for workers, but appropriate for non-professionals also. Deals with family process, expands ideas about self-worth, communications, systems, and rules within the family.

For information about parenting:

Filled with all kinds of useful information about the infant's needs and wants in the first year.

This is a useful daily reference on loving and living with small children. Parenting tips, activities for children of all ages and information for helping to understand children.

Like The Mother's Manual, this book provides basic information on the important aspects of fathering on a daily basis.
For information about special parenting situations which are helpful in fostering:

For specific information on foster parenting:

Discusses the legal problems and frameworks which involve children and the grounds for intervention.

Information is presented concerning the basic concepts and definitions, guidelines and the applications of "child placement" laws. This volume's emphasis pertains to the child's psychological needs.

Identifies useful theory related to the practice of fostering, particularly in relation to adolescents.

Using a question and answer style- extensive answers to common concerns from foster parents.
