First-year activities of Women in Technical Education, a project to develop a model for women in that field, were evaluated. A formative evaluation showed that intense development and implementation activity enabled achievement of first-year goals and objectives during the 1990-91 year. Procedures to accomplish objectives were effective. Recruitment of female students significantly increased, and retention of all women in technical education was up slightly. Although money was unavailable to contract with private consultants, the project leveraged community service and state resources successfully to expand program capability. Program impact was felt in the following areas: female student interaction with the Women's Resource Center; on-campus networking between faculty and project staff; department participation with the center; and volunteer participation. Indicators of institutional effectiveness and performance measures to evaluate effectiveness were being established. (Following the brief report is a longer appendix that details progress of objective achievement. A summary chart indicates first-year objectives, due date, and activities accomplished. More specific details of the activities are then provided in outline form.) (YLB)
Evaluation is viewed as an essential component in the development and implementation of Women in Technical Education at The Texas State Technical College at Waco. Funded by Carl Perkins discretionary money, first year program development and implementation included development of a formative evaluation process and program improvement. In addition, the formative evaluation will contribute to the summative design for final evaluation at the conclusion of this three-year model program for women in technical education.

It should be noted that the first-year proposal indicated that the summative design would be developed through assessment of:

* progress of objective achievement with stated timelines;
* effectiveness of procedures to accomplish the objectives;
* contribution of consultants(s);
* impact upon students;
* impact upon faculty and staff; and
* impacts of the project upon institutional effectiveness

Further, the proposal indicated that each area would be evaluated annually and integrated into a written report for project reporting, as well as used in planning for subsequent year activities. Development of the model for women in technical education has progressed beyond expectation through first year activity. This report is designed to present evaluation of first year activity in the areas identified in the following sections. This information will be included into the overall evaluation design currently in development by campus Institutional Research.

Progress of Objective Achievements with Stated Timelines

Extensive formative evaluation that is both quantitative and qualitative in nature has been conducted during the first project year for the stated goals and objectives. Clearly, intense development and implementation activity enabled achievement of first-year goals and objectives during the 1990-91 year. Some of the activities, however, are ongoing through the life of the program, and cannot be measured as final outcomes. Rather progress to date is noted with intent for continuation. As a result of first-year activities, college leadership and project staff realize that the potential to assist significant numbers of economically and educationally disadvantaged women move from dependency to self-sufficiency through technical education for non-traditional careers is even greater than anticipated. Progress of objective achievement is included in this report as Appendix A.
Effectiveness of Procedures to Accomplish Objectives

Project Director, Frances Worthey, and campus administration are certain that the procedures of this program are effective in the accomplishment of objectives. Ms. Worthey indicates that procedures have moved smoothly throughout the first year development, although in the coming year priorities will be established with a structured calendar of support groups, seminars, and workshops.

Clearly, the fact that this project is, indeed, ready to initiate second year objectives of both program outcome objectives—development of a comprehensive program for the recruitment of women into technical education and to research, design and implement a multi-purpose support program to meet the need of women in technical education—is indicative of procedure effectiveness. Creation of second and third year objectives as components in initial program design are often viewed as wishful thinking, and never keep pace with the designated timeline. This project, however, has successfully met established timelines of first year objectives with effective outcomes for female students on the campus.

Recruitment of female students has significantly increased with new populations of women targeted for specific recruiting. Retention of all women in technical education is up slightly from previous years. However, retention of women recruited by this program cannot be accurately measured until registration occurs during the fall quarter. Currently data collection is taking place to determine grade achievement of these women in relation to participation in the program. Data collected informally through individual and group discussion indicates that personal and family development has improved. Numbers of female students who request transportation assistance have increased, as have numbers of women interacting with social service providers.

Contribution of Consultants(s)

Money has been unavailable through the grant or the college to contract with private consultants. However, Women in Technical Education has, throughout the first year, successfully leveraged community service and state resources in a variety of ways to expand the capability of the program. Contacts have been made with other Women’s Centers to help provide content and form. The Department of Human Services has been particularly helpful through service to students and to project personnel. They have assisted in identifying the needs of women, as well as identifying available resources to meet those needs. McLennan Community College staff have shared knowledge and experience with the project director and campus staff. Advisory committee members have been extremely helpful through direct support, advice, and shared expertise. Finally campus personnel have acted as consultants on a number of occasions to provide expertise in areas beyond their professional responsibility.

Impact Upon Students, Faculty, and Staff

Impact of the program are found in (1) the number of females who have interacted with the Women’s Resource Center on the Waco campus—463 students and wives of TSTC students, potential students themselves; (2) on-campus networking achieved during the first year between faculty and project staff that have created stronger linkages, as well as a new awakening to the needs and concerns of Women in Technical Education; (3) the many campus departments that have participated, one way or another.
with the Women's Resource Center including, but not limited to Student Life, Financial Aid, Admissions, the IDEAS Center, Marketing and Communications, and Printing Production who have worked diligently together to "make things happen for women;" and (4) the number volunteers who were a significant part of first year activities for the recruitment and retention of women at The Texas State Technical College at Waco.

Other impacts of the project are found in a sound programmatic base. Workshops, seminars, support groups, and the first annual Women's Fair, created for women students the knowledge, understanding, and awareness of support that is available to help shape their lives, while also creating hope that gaining a degree from TSTC is possible, and will allow entry into non-traditional careers. Within this effort, campus orientation served 887 women and husbands of prospective female students. Moreover, recruiting efforts have been extremely active during year one. Women in Technical Education had contact with 4,502 women in off-campus workshops and seminars for high school teen parents, home economic classes, and social service agencies. Awareness of special support services for women seems to have enhanced recruiting, while positive outcomes have been noted as a result of "word of mouth."

Impacts of the Project Upon Institutional Effectiveness

The Texas State Technical College at Waco is currently in the process of establishing indicators of institutional effectiveness and performance measures to evaluate effectiveness. The indicators are:

* Student Educational Satisfaction
* Student Career Development
* Student Personal Development
* Staff Employment Satisfaction
* Professional Development and Quality of Staff
* System Openness and Technology Leadership
* Ability to Acquire Resources
* Organizational Quality

While performance measures are in the identification phase, The Texas State Technical College at Waco firmly believes that Women in Technical Education has had significant impact on its institutional effectiveness during the 1990-91 year. We are aware of student educational satisfaction and personal development achieved through the supportive efforts of the program. Reports indicate a significant number of women at average or above average grades which enhance their student career development. By their participation and comments, staff reflect satisfaction with a networking environment in support of women new to the field of technical education. Campus staff interaction, as well as faculty utilization of project staff for information and awareness of women in technical education for themselves, and male students, reflect organizational quality that respects and values students as individuals rather than from the perspective of gender differences.
