This overview of the use of educational technology in peace education discusses three questions: (1) how educational technology may be applied to increase world understanding and reduce intergroup tensions; (2) what strategies, within what contexts, have proven effective in integrating the study of peace across the curriculum; and (3) how motivated individuals might make use of leading edge technologies to enhance their voices in the global conversation on the future. Terms are defined and 10 strategies for using technology in peace education are presented. These strategies address the following topics: (1) simulations to practice conflict resolution; (2) teaming across curriculum through technology; (3) incorporating information technologies to study peace; (4) developing databases on global themes; (5) creating software on peace through cooperative learning; (6) initiating local electronic conferences and support groups; (7) linking students to national and international classrooms; (8) participating in a Kids-92 Newsletter's global conference; (9) supplementing software to widen perspectives; and (10) projecting 21st century curriculum themes. Information is then provided on 184 conferences that were listed for the keyword "peace" in the EcoNet database; each listing includes a brief description, the name of the sponsor, contacts, and keywords. How may educational technology be applied to increase world understanding and to reduce intergroup tensions? What strategies, within what contexts, have proven effective in integrating the study of peace across the curriculum? How might motivated individuals make use of leading edge technologies to enhance their voices in the global conversation on the future?

This paper and the forum, in which it serves as an overview, will continue the discussion generated by these questions. Educators attending the forum or reading this microfiche will be encouraged to become active in using technology in peace education by forming computer conferences on peace education, seeking out and using peace education resources, and playing leadership roles in the coordination of activities for global understanding activities for students of all kind.

Some definitions. Educational technology may be defined as the use of tools to communicate a specific, planned message. The message focused on in this discussion is peace.

Peace is not easy to define. In a world whose historic eras seem to be delimited by war years, peace often is globally identified by the intervals in which one's nation or people is free of war. Peace may also be identified on the individual level, through notions of inner-peace, contentment, or harmony. The ancient idea of shalom-salaam, of the power to create wholeness, justice and interdependence, through the careful stewardship of the earth and its resources, as suggested by Applewhite (1974), begins to complete a holistic definition of peace.

There seems to be an implicit dialectic contradictions when discussing peace education and educational technology. Technology, although only tools, is not always looked upon as a neutral agent in education. As McLuhan and Fiore (1967) noted, the medium is often a massage, providing a dominating context for the educational dialog. Technology often requires finite resources, gaining a status which becomes the message of the enterprise. Peace may not find its way across a field of antennas. Yet, this paper and this forum will celebrate present attempts to incorporate technology to learn about peace through learning about ourselves and others, either one's near or distant neighbors.

Ten strategies for using technology in peace education

Educational technology may range from low-tech strategies such as simulations and gaming to high-tech uses of telecommunications and video technologies. This section outlines ten uses of technology for peace education.
Using simulations to practice conflict resolution. A teacher-designed curricula for peace education, grades K-12, Educating for global responsibility (Reardon, 1988), describes several simulations which would generate discussion on world issues. World Assemblies, Mock United Nations, and simulations/games such as BaFa BaFa, an ethnographic simulation of cultural styles and interpretations, serve to generate student discussion on the role of individuals and groups in society. Computer software programs which use a workstation as just one center in a complex series of student learning conversations, such as with Tom Synder's Decision, Decision software series or The Voyage of the Mimi series, also simulate decision-making in an international arena. Although acknowledged as simplistic representation of complex world issues, simulations help students to begin to generate their own questions and conclusions about political situations within the classroom and with a generalized world community.

family," "our place in time," and "the miracle of individual life" through the use of satellite images and computer-generated atom-level perspectives. Integrating curriculum by studying the scientific roots of human progress and the social origins of scientific discovery through the use of current events, as practiced by educators making use of the science study questions outlined in the "telecommunicated" Cable News Network (CNN) Guides and its school-designed broadcasts and other teams of teachers with thematic projects, breaks down barriers placed between disciples and the nature of present and past knowledge.

Incorporating information technologies to study peace Information technologies - almanacs, databases, laserdisc and CD-ROM information storage and retrieval systems - provide individuals and groups with the power to create diverse syntheses of "facts." Major video producers, such as the National Geographic Society, or the American Broadcasting Corporation, are increasingly placing their files on laserdiscs, which allow for rapid retrieval of information and the juxtaposition of images for comparison and contrast. Particularly powerful is ABC's Holy Land laserdisc which presents graphic perspectives on key issues in the region.

Developing databases on global themes Using these information technologies, learners may collect international statistics to examine trends in resource management and in conflict resolution. GTV, a National Geographic Society electronic information system, and EcoNet, an environmental studies telecommunications project provide students and other scientists with a network to exchange data on acid rain, global warming, and other environmental conditions and to create a national database.

Creating software on peace through cooperative learning. With authoring tools, such as Hypercard or Linkway, learners may create their own on-going computer-assisted curriculum in peace education. Students may make use of video and audio recordings to create statements on issues which concern them. The process of creating media most often requires a cooperative effort, providing an object lesson in peace education.

Initiating local electronic conferences and support groups. Through the acts of sharing knowledge and skills in the use of technology, students tend to build local special interest groups. These support groups may be made available as local electronic conferences, which would serve to create a community defined by interest and not necessarily by location.

Linking students to national & international classrooms. Extending beyond these local conferences, several electronic information systems provide easy access to "telecommunicating" classrooms in the nation and the world. The Kids2Kids Newsletters provide geographic separated classrooms with the opportunity to work together on creating literary magazines, practicing writing for specific applications, and sharing perspectives across distance. FredMail, an international telecommunications system designed for students, has created a national academy for elementary-middle school learners which stresses communication skills.

Participating in a Kids-92 Newsletter's global conference Other presenters in this forum will focus on KIDLINK. Formerly known as KIDS-92 Newsletter, KIDLINK is a global network, organized by Odd de Presno (INTERNET address - opresno@ulrik.uio.no) in Saltrod, Norway, which notes that

KIDS-92 is a grassroot project aiming at getting as many children in the age group 10-15 as possible involved in a GLOBAL dialog.
The project will continue until May 18th 1992. In its simplest form, the dialog will be an exchange of personal presentations and views on the desired future of this world. The means of communication may be ordinary mail, fax, video conferencing, hamradio, or whatever. We hope that your children be allowed to participate more fully, so that they can join the other kids in the ongoing global discussion using electronic mail.

Supplementing software to widen perspectives  As de Presno suggests, other information software, including ordinary mail, fax, video conferencing, hamradio, video, audio exchanges, slides, photographs, and pictures/paintings, may be used to bring intercultural perspectives into the classroom.

Projecting 21st century curriculum themes  When the advent of increasingly more powerful technologies in decreasingly costly package, regional linkages through rapid video exchanges for language/culture, study space and Gaia studies on space platform, global problem management will be available. The ERIC microfiche version of this paper will include a listing of the 184 conferences which have peace as a keyword found on EcoNet and PeaceNet, two allied electronic information systems. It will also include a listing of the 100 conferences available on the Technology Resources in Education (TRIE) system, a project sponsored by the California State Department of Education, the California State University system, and AT&T. With the use of international telecommunications, made accessible through INTERNET, learners will share information and concerns rapidly throughout the world. Through telecommunications and other forms of educational technology, peace education will truly become a global education.

Fulfilling the Promise

As U Thant (1963) noted, "while the world is shrinking, humanity is multiplying, and each of us has to recognize his essential kinship to every other member of the human race." As outlined above, educational technology may aid in this task. Simulations and games, letter-writing, and photo exchanges are relatively simple and inexpensive means of bringing the world into the classroom. Student-created software and databases provide learner control over the synthesis of information. Telecommunications allows for the creation of community defined by interest and not distance. The massive variety of forums available on many issues, including peace, opens up global conversations which may lead to changes in one's self-definition and attitudes towards this world kinship.

The use of educational technology to stimulate peace education is only one means of achieving the promise and potential of a brave, new world. Optimism must be tempered with concerns about equity and access and the requirement of moderation in all forms of human activities. Still, peace education might effectively ride the current wave of interest in educational technology using the strategies outlined above. Conversations about peace may, with technology, drown out the drums of war and lead to a healthier and saner world for our children.
