This manual's purpose is to help adult-education instructors to deal with addictive or preaddictive behavior in their Native American students. The impact of alcohol and drug-related social problems has been devastating to Native communities. It is essential to examine broader issues such as cultural identity, ethnic pride, self-confidence, and self-esteem when implementing addiction-prevention strategies. The manual consists of five units. Unit 1 discusses different types of addiction and characteristic addictive behavior. It also provides a brief explanation of the origins of addiction and a comment on the Native experience. Unit 2 revolves around the story of a fictional addict, while providing introductory activities for the other units. Unit 3 includes a variety of student handouts covering basic information on prevention of addictions, including issues of self-esteem, goal-setting, decision-making, peer counseling, and Indian identity. Unit 4 offers simple tools for identifying addiction problems of students or helping them to identify their own. Unit 5 helps educators decide whether or not a student should be referred to professional counseling and includes a list of treatment programs for Native people in British Columbia. Five appendices offer information on adult children of alcoholics, films and videos on alcohol and drug abuse, the Alkali Indian Band, nutrition for recovering alcoholics, and a bibliography of 20 items. Foreword

You must teach your children that the ground beneath their feet is the ashes of our grandfathers. So that they will respect the land, tell your children that the earth is rich with the lives of our kin. Teach your children what we have taught our children, that the earth is our mother. Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons of the earth. If men spit upon the ground, they spit upon themselves. This we know; all things are connected like the blood which unites one family all things are connected.

Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons of the earth. Man did not weave the web of life; he is merely a strand in it. Whatever he does to the web, he does to himself.

Chief Seattle, 1854

In dealing with individuals who have an addiction, educators must recognize their limitations based upon their own experience. If you have no training or core knowledge in the addictive process, proceed with caution. It is very important that you know your local resources so that the addictive individual can be referred appropriately.

Addictions, especially alcoholism, and Native people have a long history that spans many generations. Remember this when you are helping individuals who require self-esteem and self-discipline to deal with their addiction. You, as the educator, could be a catalyst for change by empowering students to recognize that change starts within themselves. The most powerful and successful learning is when the individual integrates all knowledge internally and takes responsibility for his or her own destiny. This is also true for successful addiction treatment programs.

This manual provides you with a basis for working effectively with Native students with addictions. It suggests things that you can do in your classroom to combat the underlying causes of alcoholism and drug addiction — poor self-esteem; difficulty in setting and achieving goals; conflicts around identity, culture, and self-image; and feelings of powerlessness. It also provides suggestions for building in peer support systems and intervening when addictions become apparent. But, while you can and must make a difference with all your students, especially those who have drug and alcohol problems, remember that you are a facilitator: facilitate change, don't do for the students what the students can do for themselves.

Preface

Adult educators can be the first people a student struggling with addictions comes to, and they can be the last. The informality, supportiveness and close interpersonal relations that typify the best Native adult education classrooms often encourage students to disclose and discuss their addictions, and, certainly, a pattern of serious drug and alcohol abuse is difficult to hide over a period of several months of classes.

For all these reasons, adult educators in general, and especially adult educators working with Native students, must have some background on the nature and identification of addictions, and they must have some strategies for helping students cope with their drug and alcohol problems. Unfortunately, virtually nothing addressing this serious problem has been designed for adult educators of Native adults.

Instructors in the field have had little in the way of information or classroom activities, they have usually had little or no training in dealing with addictions, and they are often unaware of the resources available to them.

The Native Adult Education Resource Centre recognized this need, and when the Ministry of Advanced Education asked for project proposals under their alcohol and drug addictions initiative in late 1988, we submitted a proposal to develop a handbook that would serve as a resource for adult instructors working with Native and non-Native addictive students. Approved and coordinated by the Centre for Curriculum and Professional Development, phase one of the project involved consultation with instructors in the field as well as other professionals and organizations working in the area of addictions. A writer, Janet Campbell-Hale, was hired, an outline was developed, and the manual began to take shape.

Phase two involved circulating the draft manual to adult instructors of Native adults and addictions experts and incorporating their response and feedback. Hopefully this resulting document will serve as a valuable tool for instructors who are struggling to cope humanely and effectively with the devastation and debilitation of drug and alcohol addictions in their classroom.

Introduction

The purpose of this manual is to assist instructors of Native people enrolled in adult education courses to recognize and deal with addictive or pre-addictive behaviour in their students.

It is of primary importance to create a supportive classroom environment that will foster self-confidence and self-esteem. People with problems of addiction share a lack of faith in their ability to affect the outcome of their own lives. They need to be respected for who they are, while encouraged to participate in tasks and activities that will help them develop respect for themselves. Success in activities designed to give them a stronger sense identity and self-worth can also give them the necessary courage to continue learning about and struggling to heal themselves. A knowledgeable and understanding instructor can help students overcome feelings of helplessness and isolation, and feelings of futility and inferiority.

While Native people do not have a monopoly on addiction, the impact of alcohol and drug related social problems, such as family violence and suicide, has had a devastating effect on Native communities. The history of colonialism and the denigration and destruction of traditional Native culture, historically and in modern times, are factors particular to Native people. These factors make it essential to examine such issues as cultural identity, ethnic pride, and what makes a person uniquely Native when implementing addiction prevention strategies in a Native adult education course.

It is possible to use this manual in non-Native and multicultural classrooms, as well as with Native adult students, for many of the activities are applicable to any adult education situation. In a cross-cultural setting, the activities and discussion topics suggested in this manual provide an opportunity for bringing together and strengthening bonds between students, and for preventing anyone from feeling isolated, singled out, or put on the spot. By using this manual creatively and sensitively, the potential exists to demonstrate the diversity of cultural, religious, and political systems, while showing that people, although unique in many aspects, are on some level the same. One of these commonalities is that people tend to respond to distress in similar ways — one way of which is addictive behaviour. It is important for Native students to understand that they are not alone and that turning to addiction, although not inevitable, is an understandable response to stress. It is also important for them to realize that in hundreds of Native communities across North America, people are sobering up, and both families and communities are struggling to heal themselves of generations of abuse and hurt.
How to Use This Manual

As the instructor, you may wish to use this manual in its entirety only if it is to be the basis for a course specifically on the recognition and prevention of addiction. If you are an instructor of English, social studies, or life skills, you will probably wish to adapt specific sections of this manual or work with certain items, such as information handouts, activity sheets, or suggested activities as required.

If you are an instructor of language arts, social studies or basic academic education, a word about the relevancy of this manual to your academic field might be appropriate here.

Remember that you are a teacher and not a social worker, professional family therapist, or psychologist, and counselling is not what is expected of you. The individual student, however, can be most effectively educated within the context of his or her community and its standards, and within the context of his or her personal circumstances. Students' problems (or potential problems) with drug and alcohol abuse, family violence, and other forms of addictive behaviour are most clearly your concern insofar as these problems become barriers to the students' receptivity to learning. Nonetheless, acknowledging and dealing with the underlying causes of addictions, such as low self-esteem and identity conflicts, can be a valuable and important contribution to forestalling addictive behaviour. Furthermore, it is likely that addictive behaviour will intrude into your classroom at some time, whether it be in the form of absenteeism, students attending class while intoxicated, under-achievement, personal disclosure, etc. Having some basic knowledge of addictions and strategies for dealing with them may help you cope more effectively with the problem and the attendant behaviours when they emerge.

It should be mentioned that some of the material in this manual focusses on the negative aspects of addiction and its impact on Native people. This is not meant to increase feelings of negativity, resentment, or anger, but rather to reflect the real feelings and conditions that exist for some people, and to acknowledge that such feelings are valid. By working through the activities and information in this manual, it is possible that a better understanding of their situation will develop, negative feelings will lessen, and a more hopeful and positive outlook on life will occur. To not recognize or write about the students' negative feelings and experiences, as well as the positive, could invalidate the intention and purpose of this manual. People learn to accept themselves, and at the same time believe change is possible, when they are given the chance to express their innermost feelings and opinions to people who are genuinely prepared to hear what they have to say in a supportive and non-judgmental environment.

To understand any individual addiction, one must ask, “What does this person derive from the drug and from experiencing its effects?” It may be that the drug fills time, structures a life, provides a reassuring ritual, and offers an identity. Then, we must find out how and why it reassures, and from what it offers relief. Only by comprehending these problems and how a particular drug creates an escape from them, can we get to the true nature of addiction for that person.

The activities suggested in this manual for the building of self-esteem (setting goals, visualization of desired results, examination of needs and how they can be effectively met) involve personal disclosure and can therefore make the participants vulnerable. Thus, you must proceed with caution. In addition, from the beginning and throughout your course, it is essential that you carefully and honestly examine your own motives as an educator and as a person of influence. It is equally important that you deal with your own feelings and attitudes regarding alcohol and drug abuse, ACOA, or co-dependence. (See Appendix 1 for more information on ACOAs and co-dependence.)
There are two gifts that educators can give students: information and learning. Information can come through lectures, books, visual aids, and discussion. Learning can occur through the relationship between educator and student, and fosters and encourages the natural capacities human beings possess to feel and think. When students come to terms with their addictions, they have in their grasp a great power that will influence their education (and consequently their attitudes and beliefs about who they are and what they want from life), and their ability to communicate that knowledge in their relationships, employment, and lifestyle. This manual will furnish you, as an adult educator, with information, ideas, and exercises to develop productive relationships with addicted students.

Organization of this Manual

The manual consists of five main units:

- Unit I: Information on Addictions provides a definition of addiction, and a description of different types of addictions and some of the characteristics of addictive behaviour. It also provides a brief explanation of the origins of addiction and a comment on the Native experience. This information will give you preliminary background information to help you understand the addiction process.

- Unit II: Introductory Activities provides one introductory activity for each of the other units in this manual (Information, Prevention, Identification, and Intervention). These activities can either be used at the beginning of a unit as an introduction to the subject area or as a supplementary activity to the unit.

- Unit III: Prevention is divided into five sections (parts): Information, Self-Esteem, Goal Setting and Making Decisions, Peer Counselling, and Indian Identity. For each section, a variety of handouts and activity sheets are provided that may be used with students. Please note, however, that in some cases the readability level of handouts may be rather high for A.B.E. students, so it is suggested that you discuss handouts and activity sheets with students in class, or have students work together to interpret the material. In addition, students could research and develop a glossary of those terms with which they are unfamiliar. Alternately, you may wish to record material from handouts onto an audio tape, which could then be supplied to students so they could read along with it.

One activity in Unit III has students researching into their own families. It is possible that students may uncover some disturbing and unwelcome facts when working on this activity. Thus, you should be aware of this possibility and be prepared to help, or to find someone who can help, students resolve feelings that may arise.

- Unit IV: Identification of Addictions provides a variety of simple tools to use in identifying students with problems of addiction. The first two instruments in this unit are for you to use in identifying students with problems of addictions, while the third and fourth instruments (in the form of questionnaires) are for students, so that they may realize the nature and extent of their problems. Recognition is, after all, the first step to recovery.

  Note: Although Identification Instruments 3 and 4 deal solely with alcohol, it should be understood that what relates to alcoholism can also be applied, to some degree, to other addictions and to the addictive process in general. Thus, these two questionnaires could be adapted for use in identifying other types of addictions.

- Unit V: Intervention provides you with a model to use when deciding whether to counsel a student yourself or to refer him or her to a professional. This unit also lists and describes the treatment programs available to Native people at various treatment centres in British Columbia.
• Appendices provides information on adult children of alcoholics (ACOAs) and co-dependence (Appendix 1), a short list of films and videos that deal with alcohol and drug abuse (Appendix 2), an article on the continuing story of the Alkali Lake Indian Band (Appendix 3), an explanation of the role of nutrition for recovering alcoholics (Appendix 4), and a bibliography and reading list (Appendix 5).

Note: The suggested activities in this manual appear in a variety of formats. Some activities are presented with step-by-step instructions, while for others a general description is given. This flexibility allows you to use the manual in a creative and experimental way, and to develop activities according to your professional judgement and to the needs of your students.

Please also note that student handouts and activity sheets are numbered sequentially within each individual unit.
Unit I: Information on Addictions
Addictive behaviour is like a fire that leaves families, communities, relationships, and careers smouldering or still burning in its aftermath. Although spiritual, psychological, and medical healing have progressed considerably in recent years, a complete understanding of the addictive process is still in the future. As our learning progresses, one striking fact stands out in all three areas of healing: addiction has a positive intent in the lives of addicts, even though the resulting behaviour is destructive.

Addicts are continually attempting to lessen feelings of pain and alleviate a sense of overwhelming difficulty in their lives. They believe that something outside of themselves will fill them and make them complete, and they explain their problems and pathologies in terms of forces over which they have no power or control. This illusion reinforces the destructive behaviours of addiction.

Addiction Defined

Addiction is a basic human problem. People are addicted when the use of alcohol, drugs, and/or other substances or activities interferes in any significant area of their lives. Addicts continue to use the substance or repeat the activity in spite damage to their emotional, physical, mental, and spiritual health.

Addiction has to do with the effect a drug or activity produces for a given person in given circumstances. What a person is addicted to is the experience the drug or activity creates and the fact that, while under its influence, the person does not have to deal with pain, anger, or even joy or love. This experience is usually a welcomed effect since it relieves anxiety.

Ann Wilson Schaef in her book When Society Becomes an Addict defines addiction as “any process over which we are powerless.” Schaef believes that addiction takes control over our lives, causes us to do and think things that are inconsistent with our personal values, and leads us to become more compulsive and obsessive.

We often hear of violence in Native communities and it is important that this is not seen as a cultural norm that supports negative stereotypes of Native people. Instead, the behaviour must be seen for what it is — a direct outcome of pain and anguish, rooted in socio-historical occurrences, that is masked by alcohol and other addictions. Alcohol and drugs lower inhibitions and cause people to act out frustrations, anger, and other powerful emotions that they would normally be able to control or channel in less destructive ways.

Types of Addictions

Addictions may be classified as chemical or non-chemical, or they may be divided into two main categories: substance addiction and process addiction. Both substance and process addiction function in essentially the same way and produce the same results. In today's society, addictions are common and most addicts have multiple addictions. Almost any substance or process in our lives can be addictive.
Substance Addiction
Addictive substances are mood-altering and lead to physical dependence. They are usually ingested into the body and are artificially refined or produced. Addictive substances include:

- alcohol
- sugar
- nicotine
- prescription drugs
- "street drugs"
- food
- caffeine
- over-the-counter medications

Process Addiction
The addictive process involves a specific series of actions or interactions and gives the person the same feeling of "a high" that he or she would get from a substance addiction. It is any everyday activity that takes control of our lives. Process addictions include:

- work
- helping others
- relationships
- making money
- gambling
- sex
- worrying
- exercise.

Characteristics of Addiction
The following are some of the common characteristics of substance and process addiction.

- Denial
  Denial is the refusal of the individual to believe or accept the reality that certain events have occurred, are occurring, or will occur. It acts as a protection for the addict. At the same time, as long as the addict denies his or her problem, the person thinks there is no reason to do anything about it and the addiction worsens. Comments such as, "No, I'm not alcoholic. I can stop anytime I want." reflect a state of denial. The same is true of comments that blame, project, and attack: "No, you're wrong." "It never happened that way." "It's your fault."

  There are several contributing factors to denial within the Native community. People who have lived through trauma and tragedy frequently develop extreme denial in order to survive. Loyalty to the community can make people reluctant to reveal problems to outsiders (R.C.M.P., Welfare, the legal/justice system), and fear of gossip, lack of confidentiality, and pressure from within an extended family or community can prevent people from dealing with problems. In some cases, it is possible for an entire community to be involved in a collective denial. This is possible, especially in communities where a large percentage of the people are addicted themselves. If the addiction has been going on over generations, members of a family may internalize the concept of "This is how it is" and become users as a matter of course.

- Self-centredness
  Addicts are obsessed with the need to drink or use, and will promise or do anything to maintain a constant supply of the drug. They only consider their next "fix," and attempt to make every activity an opportunity to use the drug. The alcoholic only thinks of the next drink, the workaholic the next item on the agenda, and the sexaholic the next euphoric fling. Over-involvement with any substance or process can lead to addiction, and, once addicted, the person develops an obsessive and self-centred focus on life.
• Confusion
Since addictive behaviour separates people from their feelings and thoughts, there can never be any certainty about reality. An addict is consistently inconsistent. There is often confusion as to exactly when and where events took place, and things said or done can not be accurately recalled. As long as confusion reigns, people remain powerless.

• Forgetting
As children and family of addictive people eventually come to realize, addicts will promise and say things while feeling “high” that they forget all about when sober. The addict's promises are always for the future and never deal with the immediate moment. They are the result of a temporary elation or of guilt and remorse — an attempt to “make good.” Black-outs (periods of amnesia) are a warning sign of addiction to alcohol. During a black-out, a person may do or say things (drive a vehicle, act abusively) of which they later have no memory.

Addicts often feel so discouraged by their inability to gain what they want from life that they use a drug to forget their failures and to put off obtaining their needs and desires. The continued and compounded frustration of being ineffective and incapable of accomplishing simple tasks drives them back to the drug even more frequently, despite intense, repeated, and negative consequences (such as rent and food money being lost to gambling, a diagnosis of liver cirrhosis, or family pain and suffering). An individual might excuse his or her behaviour by saying that it is a result of the drinking, and this not only helps the addict to avoid responsibility for his or her actions, but enables the abuse to continue.

• Unpredictability
At times, addicts may retain control of their behaviour, but more often than not the substance or process controls them. Thus, they and their loved ones live in a constant state of insecurity and tension, never knowing what might happen next.

• Dishonesty
Addicts learn to become capable liars. Out of the necessity, they learn to manipulate people and events so as to always have access to the drug. They also tend towards a style of magical thinking, half believing the falsehoods themselves, because they need to operate on a wishing-will-make-it-so basis; perhaps, in part, in an attempt to protect themselves from seeing the pain they inflict on others.

• Perfectionism
Addicts experience tremendous anxiety about not being good enough. They have difficulty forgiving themselves and do not regard mistakes as healthy learning opportunities, but more an indication of their worthlessness. They often have unrealistic goals and set impossible standards for themselves, thereby repeatedly setting up “no win” situations, which reinforce and, as far as they are concerned, justify their compulsion to use.

• Control
Addicts seek power and control over people and situations so as to prevent anything unexpected or unfamiliar from happening. Since addicts live in constant fear of failure, they strive to always know what people are thinking and feeling so that they can influence what might be said or done. Power gained through substance or process addiction gives a false sense of security, however, and the empty and incomplete sensation addicts carry inside themselves is filled only temporarily while they are under the influence of the drug or activity.

Unit I: Information on Addictions
• Approval from the outside
Addicts do not have a strong sense of identity, nor do they know how to approve of themselves. Consequently, they seek approval and self-definition from the outside. Negative self-image and low self-esteem are key points in the cyclical descent into an addiction. An addict welcomes the opportunity to resolve doubt and unease by being protected by some larger force, and a powerful drug does this for them.

• Hopelessness/Helplessness
Addicts believe that others control their destinies — that luck, fate, powerful others, and bureaucratic systems direct their lives and will either persecute or take care of them. Such thinking leads to a lack of responsibility. Addictive people feel inadequate to handle the complexity of the world they live in, and fear it is leaving them behind. Addiction fits into this pattern by giving users the soothing feeling that nothing more need or can be done to improve life as it is out of their hands. Users who believe that there is nothing they can do to change — that deep down they are powerless and “bad” — suffer from a sense of prolonged helplessness.
Substance addiction is generally considered by medical science to be physiologically rooted, not psychologically, and this physiological condition largely determines whether one person will become addicted or not. Hormones, enzymes, genes, and brain chemistry influence each other to create an abnormal addicitional reaction to a substance. Addictive behaviour is influenced by psychological, cultural, and social factors, but these are not the cause of the addiction.

According to this model, the addicted person no longer has to admit moral inferiority, but recognizes the nature of the disease from which he or she suffers and becomes aware of the availability of support available to deal with it. Since self-esteem is not attacked, a person is likely to seek help earlier and be better able to make use of it.

There is, however, concern that the biochemical approach alone prevents addicts from recognizing and using internal healing mechanisms. It has been suggested that the disease model may be useful in the early part of treatment, when it is essential to reduce guilt and blame, but that in the long run there is a danger of it undermining the addict’s autonomy and will to change, thereby exacerbating the problem. Labelling the addict as “diseased” and “helpless” delivers the message that he or she might as well drink, since the ability to refrain is lacking.

Process addiction, on the other hand, is thought to be a learned addiction. This addictive behaviour has physiological aspects in that the process produces a “high,” but it is primarily influenced by culture and social factors, as well as the psychological state of the person. Process addictive behaviour can be traced to the family of origin and has to do with nurturing, role modelling, family structure, society as a whole, and how the individual interacted in these situations. Parent figures (mothers, fathers, grandparents, uncles, aunts, older brothers and sisters, priests, nuns, teachers, community leaders) can be convincing teachers, and children in their formative years (0-7 years) are quick learners. If one or more parent figure displays addictive behaviour, it is likely the child will imitate the pattern, and so addictive behaviour is passed on.

Addictive tendencies develop when children experience emotionally painful events such as sexual abuse, physical abuse, neglect, etc. If there is no opportunity to talk, think, or play out these traumatic experiences to a healthy conclusion, the child’s emotional growth becomes stunted or frozen. Examples of frozen development in Native culture have occurred in children taken from their lands and families to residential schools. Rules at these schools were such that Native languages and traditions were abandoned. Brothers and sisters were segregated and not allowed to speak to each other for months at a time. Children were required to deny their culture and numb feelings toward their family and heritage. When children suppress their feelings, they commonly act out their feelings in self-destructive behaviours such as bed-wetting, violence, inattentiveness, nightmares, depression, suicide, and use of addictive substances and processes.

Healing these wounds can only occur if the individual has the opportunity to talk about the memories and feelings and accept them, no matter how painful they may be. Adults who have not come to terms with their unpleasant past may find themselves using substances or processes to manage the painful feelings.

Unit I: Information on Addictions
Addicts are in a constant state of fear, and their focus is on survival rather than on creative living. Childhood experiences have taught them that they are in danger and that to ensure their security they should maintain controlling behaviours at all times. Fear slows or stops the process of change by creating messages of self-doubt, which attack the addicts already frail sense of self-worth.

A Comment on the Native Experience

There is a striking connection between the Native experience and addictive behaviours. For Native people, the void that occurred as a result of cultural and spiritual loss, and the parallel loss of control over economic and social institutions, have contributed to addictive behaviours. This loss and the continued threat of loss of their history and language has left contemporary Native people confused and without guidance in important rituals and traditions. The assimilation and conversion policies pursued by the Canadian government for more than four generations have denied and devalued Native cultures and have correspondingly reduced self-esteem for Native people. This devastating combination of factors is a blueprint for addiction.

As Dan Dodson writes in Power as a Dimension of Education,

> It is impossible for a youth who is a member of a group which is powerless in the community to grow to maturity without some trauma to his perception of himself because of the compromised position of his group in communal life...as a result of this trauma, children often develop apathy, low levels of aspiration and a sense of low self-worth.

Cultural self-hatred leads to a sense, deep in the core of the being, that there is nothing that can be done to make up for the void in oneself and the belief that one is deeply and profoundly unlovable.

Native communities are beginning to realize that treatment is only one step in the healing process, and, as they move away from chemical dependency, they are becoming more aware of their co-dependent patterns. (See Appendix 1 for more information on co-dependence.) At the personal level, alcoholics have to deal with the hurts and insecurities that alcohol used to cover up. At the family level, they have to rebuild relationships and recognize addictive patterns, and, at the community level, they have to create opportunities for a sober lifestyle, including employment, recreation, and relevant social services.

Changes in Native society resemble the process of recovery from an addictive state. Strong and sober challenges have been made in the area of land claims and self government, thereby re-establishing Native society as unique and separate. The process of loss of control and power in their lives has contributed to addictions, but as loss and alcoholism are overcome, Native people are rebuilding themselves, their families, and their communities.

It is important that students become familiar with the achievements of these communities and of the individuals who have proved that Native people are committed to and capable of change.

Unit I: Information on Addictions
Unit II: Introductory Activities
Introductory Activities

The step-by-step introductory activities in this unit revolve around the story “Wynette,” which was written especially for this manual by Janet Campbell Hale. The story centres on an Indian woman’s coming to terms with her dysfunctional use of alcohol through her experiences at a Native treatment centre.

“Wynette” is designed to introduce students to the four main elements or components of this manual: (1) information on alcohol abuse and addictive behaviours; (2) methods of prevention that may be used in an adult education classroom; (3) identification of addictive students; and (4) intervention techniques and referral information.

“Wynette” could be integrated into an English, social studies, or life skills course. It could also be used as an introduction to a specific module or course focusing on addictions. For students with minimal reading skills, the story could be read aloud or recorded on a tape recorder.

Once the story has been read by the students, either orally or individually, use a mapping diagram to show how it relates to the manual’s four main elements. For each component, an activity based on the article has been designed to introduce the concepts, assess existing knowledge and feelings about key issues, and interest students in further exploration.
Information Activity

1. Before the students have read the story, have them do a 10-minute “quickwrite” (uninterrupted, continuous writing; no pauses for thought or editing) on what they know or think they know about alcoholism and alcohol treatment.

2. Have students form triads (groups of three) and share their papers, comparing information, beliefs, attitudes, knowledge, feelings, etc.

3. Then re-form as a class and ask,
   - What did people discover they knew about alcoholism? Didn’t know?
   - What did they learn from each other?
   - What are they uncertain about?
   - What do they need more information on?

4. Then have students read (or read to them) the story, “Wynette.”

5. After reading the story, have students write another 10-minute quickwrite responding to the story. (How did they feel when reading it? What did they learn? What did it make them think about?)

6. Have students re-form their triads and share their responses.

7. Finally, debrief the activity by focussing on what students have learned and what more they want to know about alcoholism and alcohol treatment.

Prevention Activity

1. Form students into small groups of four or five. Give each group a large sheet of chart paper and a felt pen. Have each group select a Recorder and divide the paper into two columns: Possible Factors and Prevention Strategies.

2. Based on the information in the story and the students' own experience, have each group identify as many factors as possible that might have contributed to the writer's dysfunctional use of alcohol (e.g., inability to cope with stress effectively, poor self-concept, no support system) and record those in the “Possible Factors” column.

3. Then have students think of strategies that might have helped the writer overcome those factors and develop more effective and constructive attitudes, skills, and knowledge. Have them record these strategies in the second column, in line with the problem they are designed to remediate. Note that there may be several strategies for a particular problem, and a single strategy may apply to several problems.

4. Have each group display their chart to the class and explain their conclusions and the discussion that went on in their group.
5. Debrief by focussing on the causes that underlie addictive behaviour and the kinds of preventive measures that could be built into the home, community, and school (and especially an adult education program) to prevent these underlying causes and their resulting dysfunctional behaviour.

Identification Activity

1. Divide a piece of chart paper or the board into two columns: Typical Characteristics and Writer's Characteristics.

2. With the class, brainstorm a list of characteristics of the "typical" alcoholic (e.g., drinks cheap wine, is unemployed, drinks daily).

3. Then have students identify the characteristics of the writer of the story. List these in the second column.

4. Using this data, debrief by contrasting the stereotype with the reality. Ask,
   - Where have these stereotypes come from?
   - How do they limit us?
   - How can they be a defense against confronting our own drinking problems or those of those near us?

Work toward evolving a definition of "alcoholism" as any dysfunctional use of alcohol (i.e., any use that interferes with a person's life). From this understanding, extend it to other addictions (sexual relations, drugs, bingo, work, etc.) and have students answer the question, "What is addictive behaviour?"

Intervention Activity

Note: Role taking is a powerful teaching strategy. In this activity, it is designed to help students understand what skills and information are necessary in working with addictive persons, to practice and develop some of these skills in a safe environment, to make the discussion on addictive behaviour concrete and personal, and to gain some insight into the motives and behaviours of those who suffer from addiction.

1. Explain the idea of role taking and its purpose. Then use the story as background for the role-taking exercise.

2. Ask for volunteers to play two roles, an addictive student and his or her friend, and give them the following scenario.

   The addictive student has been arrested on two impaired charges, often comes to class smelling of liquor, has passed out at several parties the friend has been at, and has recently admitted beating his/her child while drunk. The addictive student, however, feels that he/she drinks as much or as little as all his/her friends, and, although admitting to drinking one or two cases of beer or a bottle of whisky over a weekend, he/she does not consider her/himself a "drunk." He/she blames the beating of the child on the child's insolence and disobedience.
Designate which student is to play which role, and then tell them that the friend has decided to confront the drinker with his/her problem and hopes to persuade the addictive student to get help.

With the situation explained, have the two volunteers sit down and begin the role-taking exercise. (Remind them to stay within their roles as outlined.) Have the rest of the group place themselves so that they can observe the interaction. Ask the group to note what techniques the helper used effectively and ineffectively, what else he/she could have done, how the drinker reacted, what additional skills and knowledge the helper needed, etc.

3. Start the role taking and let the situation develop unimpeded (unless the participants stop, it is best to stay out of the way so you can write down your own observations).

4. After about 10-15 minutes, or when things seem to have reached an impasse, put an end to the role taking with something like, “You seem to have reached a point where we can break.”

5. Debrief the group on what they saw by asking,
   - What counselling and communication techniques were used effectively? Not effectively?
   - What was needed?
   - What would you have done?
   - How did the addictive student respond? Why?

   Use student responses to develop some consensus about how to work with addictive persons in an effective way. (Have them link the role taking scenario to their own lives by asking, “Have they been in similar situations?” “What happened?” “What could they have done?”)

6. As a final exercise, have students break into triads and have two of them take the roles described above, while the third acts as Observer/Reporter. After the role taking, the Observer/Reporter provides feedback on the interaction, and the three discuss the exercise.

7. Finally, have the Observer/Reporter share what happened in the triad with the class. Ask,
   - What approaches were used?
   - What needs to be learned or improved?
   - What knowledge of addictive behaviour and resources did people have?
   - What knowledge of addictive behaviour and resources did they need?
   - How could the skills and knowledge be useful in people’s lives?
The Indian sweat lodge at Three Rivers Alcohol Treatment Centre is a round structure, built close to the ground and covered with canvas. It was here, on the ground in the dark around a pit containing glowing lava rocks, that I learned to pray.

I have returned to the sweat lodge several times since I finished my time at the centre last August. This last time, the day before the New Year, 1983, I reflected on what had happened to me and what it meant to my life and well-being.

The now-familiar glow of the red lava rocks was comforting as the sweat began this night, and I was glad I had made the long trip from Davis to Manteca.

It used to be that I would be “driven to drink” by a painful lump in my throat, an oppressive weight on my chest, and a feeling of unbearable anxiety and psychic turmoil. Alcohol had been my escape.

I am a 35-year-old native Indian woman. Although the sweat lodge is an ancient Indian ritual, I knew next to nothing about it, since I was raised Catholic.

I am finishing my graduate degree at the University of California at Davis, teaching class, and writing my thesis. I am a single mother. I was arrested for drunken driving on New Year’s Day, 1982 (I had “hesitated” at a controlled intersection with two squad cars looking on).

It was my second offense in five years and under California’s tough new law I was sentenced to serve 90 days in jail, but was given the opportunity to serve those days at an alcohol treatment centre, if I wished. After doing some research, I chose Three Rivers, because it was out in the country and because of its Native American orientation.

I did not want to go to an alcohol treatment centre. I did not consider myself an alcoholic. I had never been to jail or in any trouble, except in my own mind and heart. I experienced no terrible craving for alcohol, such as I’ve heard alcoholics have, and I was not one of those compulsive gotta-have-a-drink types. I only drank every four or five months (except during the Christmas holidays when I liked to drink more often). And, when I did drink, it would only be for a single evening. That is not what an alcoholic is, is it? I never missed a day of work because of drinking. I never had “the shakes” or hallucinated. I never had needed a “detox” centre. And I had been drinking for 18 years, more than half my life (and didn't they say that alcoholism is a “progressive disease”?) So, I had broken the law and had driven my automobile on a public highway when I'd had too much to drink (again). But that did not mean I was an alcoholic, did it?

I had decided, before sentencing, that come what may I would not accept a jail term. I did not wish to abandon my graduate program and fellowship at Davis (at 35, I knew I might not have another chance to do an M.A.) and I did not wish to uproot my children. But, if I were sentenced to serve jail time, I was prepared to run away from California, whatever the cost.

It was with great reluctance that I sent my children to live with their father, sublet my apartment for the summer, and headed for Manteca. I was filled with dread of the unknown, and with resentment that I had to do this thing (or go to jail, or run away), and I felt . . . grubby . . . a grubby little drunk getting packed off to a grubby little Native drunk place. (I'm just society's child.) “Ninety days isn't very long. A drop in the bucket,” one friend said. The State had me under its thumb and now the treatment centre folks would too. I felt like a squirming bug. “You can turn it into something positive, if you want,” one of my EST-type friends said. “You can turn it into a personal triumph!” . . . Like a squirming bug. I hated myself for being so stupid as to risk driving under the influence. This was a revolting situation: the lodge, or jail, or running away. Three Rivers was simply the least of three evils.

I hated the treatment centre at first, purely hated it. I felt out of place. I also felt sorely out of place at Davis for various reasons. I am from the working class, I am a member of an ethnic minority, and politically I am decidedly liberal, whereas Davis is white, conservative, and middle-class. (The Chairman of my Department, English, thought it humorous to refer to me as “Pocahontas” or “The Indian Princess.”) I was terribly lonely and I longed for my own kind (the friends I mentioned do not live in Davis, but in Berkeley or Sacramento and are from “before”). But, these people, the other inmates, though Native like me, weren't my kind. Three Rivers, I thought, is certainly no place for a person like me.

My roommate at the centre had arrived one day before me and was still going through withdrawal, hallucinating. She saw figures standing outside looking in our window. They were Sasquatches she said, and, even though she knew they weren't really there, the way they stood peering in our window gave her the creeps. She found some heavy material and made a set of drapes for our window and asked me, “Well, what do you think?”
"I think," I told her, "some certain Sasquatches are going to be disappointed." She laughed.

She talked about having been in "the joint" for seven years and told endless stories of her sordid childhood, about robbing people and being in jail, about her life as a wino on skid row. She was only 40, but she was so haggard and careworn in appearance that she could easily have been 60.

Most of the residents at Three Rivers knew something of life on skid row, about panhandling and hobo jungles and riding freight trains, and they seemed to look down on me because I did not.

I was once told, for instance, that I didn't have the right to call myself a "Wynette" (female wino), I hadn't earned it (my Wynette stripes, as it were).

I remember one young man who seemed to hold himself far above the others. He was a 27-year-old Eskimo. He said he had never had to sleep under a bridge in his life and didn't know how a human being could live that way. He always had managed to keep a roof over his head, he said, by being in a job-training program, or a government-run boarding school, or an alcohol treatment centre. He considered yardwork "demeaning" and usually managed to get out of it at the centre by pretending to be sick or having to keep an appointment for welfare eligibility (I paid for my own food and I had student health coverage, while everyone else had to apply for State welfare health and federal food stamps).

Yardwork was nice, I thought — out in the fresh air and sunshine, making our place nice and neat, weed-free, and green — and it was a means of bonding with the others and, making such an investment, made Three Rivers seem more like "home." To the Eskimo, though, yardwork was "demeaning" and "nothing but shit work." At 27, he had never held a regular job, although he'd been in many job-training programs. After a month, he was caught drinking and made to leave Three Rivers.

Sometimes, in the evenings, during the first week or so, I would be filled with a longing to be free and I would feel like crying. Then someone abandoned three adolescent puppies near the lodge, and we adopted them. One puppy was my companion every evening when I took a walk in the almond orchard out behind the centre and I wasn't so lonely any more.
At night, I consulted my I Ching, an ancient Chinese text used for divination. I asked how I could bear it another day. The I Ching advised me that I was where I was for a purpose and needed to hear what was being said to me.

Maybe so, I thought, and anyway, I was tired of arguing over such issues as “it doesn’t matter what you drank only that you drank — you drank to get drunk.” I felt that it did matter that I liked only fine wine — but maybe it didn’t matter that it mattered. I began to listen without a need to correct the speaker’s (many) errors.

We were awakened by a buzzer at 6 a.m. each day. I scrubbed floors and washed what seemed like a million dishes and hated being under someone else’s thumb.

A big, vulgar-spoken woman who was “bookkeeper” made it her business to check up on the goings on inside the lodge. She heard I was taking a plate of food into my room and confronted me (actually it was my roommate, but I didn’t snitch on her). The bookkeeper also sneaked into my room one morning to bust me for not making my bed, which made me angry. How dare she violate my privacy and judge my housekeeping! The afternoon I was busted for being untidy, I spoke with indignation at a group rap session.

“The very idea. That gross, ignorant, trouble-making woman! And here I am under the thumb of a dumb person like her — what an outrage! She’s so sinister — whenever you see her lurking around, you know she’s up to no good! You almost hear the theme music from “Jaws” when you see her. (“Jaws” became her nickname from then on.) I hate her. I hate being here.”

Beaver, my counsellor, let me vent my rage. When I was finished he said, “Jaws is doing you a favour. The trick, you see, is figuring out how you came to be under the thumb of this ignorant, gross woman and how you, not “fate,” can take steps to avoid ever having to go through this sort of stuff again. Think about it. And be grateful to “Jaws” that she isn’t making your stay here enjoyable, lest you tend to make a habit out of alcohol treatment centres. There are those who have that habit, you know.”

Time passed. The summer wore on. The other residents became, sort of, like family. I got not to mind coarse language and to enjoy, a little, stories about “on the street” and “in jail.” But I was still counting the days until my release. I still didn't think I was like the others, that I "deserved" to be in a place like that.

In group rap sessions, I would watch the other residents as they sat idly thumbing through old copies of Reader's Digest or even snoozing, and I would think how they weren't really there seeking help at all, as badly as they all needed it. They were only there for respite from "the wars," for a little Rest and Relaxation. They would soon be back on the streets, leading lives of stupid desperation.

Yet, I thought, wasn't I doing the same thing myself? I wasn't there to learn how to live without alcohol. I was there to avoid going to jail or having to run away from California.

"Examine your motives," Beaver, would say. "Look inside yourself."

Once, during a rap session, the houseman told his life story. He had ridden a freight train into Stockton one day years ago and had survived by panhandling and scavenging in garbage cans before being saved by AA and Three Rivers. He ended his testimony by saying how he was never tempted by alcohol any more. When he went down to Wino Park to check up on his former associates, he would not be tempted to drink from the jug they passed around.

I said I thought that was disgusting, that no matter how strongly I might desire a drink, I would never take a swig from a jug being passed around in a wino park.

Another counsellor, Billy R., asked me if the way I drank wasn't disgusting too. Hadn't it caused me and my children misery? Hadn't my drinking gotten me as drunk as those winos in the park, and hadn't it landed me in a alcohol treatment centre? Of course, all of this was true. I was not a denizen of skid row, not a candidate for "the joint," not a "Wynette" in the sense that my life was given over to drinking. But, I was a Wynette in the sense that I drank when life got too rough, that I did so even though it interfered with my life (caused my children anxiety, caused me to suffer terrible remorse and self-incrimination in the aftermath), and had caused the loss of judgment that had led to this 90-day sentence. I did not respect people who got drunk. Yet I got drunk myself. All the rest of it — whether or not I was on the road to sleeping under the bridge, seeing Sasquatches on Parade, dying of cirrhosis — was of no significance, really.

What mattered was that I had a problem with alcohol and I needed to get it out of my life. I had to accept that I was, then, a Wynette. (And, I would not indulge in any more discussions about who was or was not an “alcoholic.” It didn’t matter, all that criteria.)

It used to be that I drank because life’s burdens had become too heavy. I felt such a tightness in my throat — as though I would suffocate — and an oppressive weight on my chest. Alcohol would alleviate this emotional pain, take away my worries (indeed, impair my ability to worry), but it exacted too high a price.

I began attending the sweat lodge, taking my anxiety in there. And, although I didn’t believe in “God” (again, this was something, the God issue, that didn’t matter any more), in the sweats I prayed for both strength and endurance.

The intense heat inside the sweat lodge peels away layers of nonsense and helps one focus one’s thoughts quickly and clearly — to come to the heart of what it is, truly, that is the cause of concern. Pettiness and self-deceit is difficult to hang onto then. You suffer the heat. You sweat. You survive. You develop discipline and concentration.

In the beginning, it would take 20 minutes or longer in front of the steaming rocks before my feelings of turmoil subsided. After a while, that awful anxiety would dissolve as soon as I got a glimpse of the rocks. Beaver told me that eventually I would be able to stop that feeling simply by recalling the image of the rocks, but so far that hasn’t happened. I am able to ride out the anxiety, though, to endure the discomfort until it finally passes away, without having to turn to alcohol.

I have been free of alcohol for almost nine months now. On Thanksgiving, my little girl told me that this was what she was most thankful for. I return to Three Rivers every now and then to attend the sweats and talk with Beaver.

After the sweat that late December night, I felt calm and at peace. I sat outside on a bench near the fire in the bright moonlight and remembered my story — how miserable it was in the beginning and how meaningful it finally became. I remembered one evening in late summer when I sat out in the backyard chatting with Beaver and Jaws (who had come to sort of like her nickname), and Billy R., and some of the other inmates.
“Do you still hate it here?” Beaver asked me. I shook my head. “I told you, didn’t I,” said Beaver, “that someday you’ll look back on this as The Garden of Eden? You’ll tell your grandkids about it.”

“Yeah,” Jaws said, “They’ll say ‘Tell us, again, Grannie, about Three Rivers, about Beaver and Jaws and them’...”

“And I’ll say,” I said, “Well, it was the summer of ’82, that was back in the days when I was a Wynette...

It is beautiful out here at Three Rivers, I thought, a place where a person can learn to quit alcohol and set his or her life on the right track. “What we try to do here,” Beaver had told me the first day, “is to give you back to yourself.” I think Three Rivers has succeeded in doing this for me.

In sweats, I learned to endure and to have trust in my own strength and to not be afraid. Sometimes, the heat was so awful that I felt like I could stand it no more, but I would stay inside and endure and felt better for it. “So it is with life,” the sweat leader said. “You might think that you can’t take it, but you can.”
Unit III:
Prevention of Addictions
Part A: Information

Knowing that alcohol and drug abuse is "not good" is not enough to either prevent it from beginning or to stop it once it has begun. It is essential that both teachers and students possess accurate information regarding substance abuse in Native communities.

The five student handouts included in this section offer guidelines, statistics, and information about some of the consequences of alcohol and drug addiction, and are designed to generate thought and discussion amongst students. The handouts include:

- Student Handout 1: Introduction to Addictive Behaviour
- Student Handout 2: On Drinking Alcohol
- Student Handout 3: Alcohol and Pregnancy Don't Mix
- Student Handout 4: Narcotics and Stimulants in the Native American Past
- Student Handout 5: Summary of Alcohol Facts/Information

An activity sheet is also included (Activity Sheet 1: Reasons for Drinking: Healthy Alternatives) and is intended to challenge participants to look at reasons for drinking and plan alternative strategies. This activity can be done individually or in small groups. An Answer Key for the instructor offers suggestions that might be built into subsequent debriefing.

Unit III: Prevention of Addictions
Addictive behaviour is behaviour that is out of control. It is a process that takes control, causing us to do and think things that are inconsistent with our personal values and leading us to become progressively more compulsive and obsessive. A sure sign of addictive behaviour is the need to deceive ourselves and others — to lie, deny, and cover up.

Like any other serious disease, addiction is progressive, and it will end in death if not treated. The disease of addiction affects four areas of life — the intellectual, spiritual, emotional, and physical areas. At the emotional/intellectual level, addiction keeps us unaware of what we feel or think. We do not have to deal with our pain, anger, or joy or love because we do not feel them. We lose sense of what is real, and begin to rely on confused perceptions to tell us what to think and to feel. Over a period of time, this lack of internal awareness deadens our internal processes and allows us to remain addicted.

As we lose contact with ourselves, we also lose contact with other people and the world around us. As the addiction dulls and distorts our physical capabilities, we fail to respond accurately to the people we come in contact with and lose the ability to communicate and become intimate with others, particularly those people closest to us.

We are aware that something is wrong, but our addictive thinking tells us it's not our fault. This thinking also tells us that our recovery is in the hands of others. Addictive behaviour also absolves us from having to take responsibility for our lives. People with addictive behaviours tend to be dependent, feel bad about themselves, and have a sense of powerlessness.

Addictions in general can be divided into two main categories: substance addiction and process addictions. Both types of addictions function in essentially the same way and produce the same result. In today's society, addictions are common and most addicts have multiple addictions. Addictions eventually exhibit similar behavioural dynamics and processes.

Substance addiction are addictions to substances. The substances are usually ingested into the body and are artificially refined or produced. These substances are mood-altering and lead to physical dependence. Substances can include alcohol, drugs, nicotine/caffeine, or food.
Process addictions occur when a person becomes hooked on a process. The process involves a specific series of actions or interactions and gives the person the same feeling of a "high" that he or she would get from a substance addiction. Process addictions can include work, gambling (bingo), sex, religion, worry, and relationships.

As the addiction progresses, more of the addictive substance or action is required to give the desired "high," and in the later stages no amount is ever enough.

The addictive behaviour common to Native people, families, and communities is the result of experiences they have gone through over the years as their culture evolved. The changes they experienced have affected the physical, psychological, and spiritual parts of their beings.

Native people are now sorting out and redefining their culture, and in this process are adding many concepts of the non-Native culture and making these concepts their own. As a culture is continually in a state of change, the values and beliefs of the people are continually tested. Due to this instability and movement, people tend to take on addictive behaviours and addiction diseases.

How do we come to have addictive behaviour? The substance addictive behaviour is physiologically rooted, not psychological, and this physiological condition largely determines whether a person will become addicted or not. Hormones, enzymes, genes, and brain chemistry influence each other to create an abnormal addictional reaction to a substance. The addictive behaviour is influenced by psychological, cultural, and social factors, but are not the cause of the addiction.

The process addictive behaviour is a learned addiction. This addictive behaviour has physiological aspects in that the process produces a "high," but it is also greatly influenced by culture and social factors, as well as by the psychological state of the person. The process addictive behaviour can be traced to the family of origin. This addictive behaviour has to do with nurturing, role modelling, the structure of the family of origin, and society as a whole, and to how the individual interacted in these situations.

The addictive behaviour is a treatable disease. Recovery is a slow process involving a holistic approach to the disease. Recovery requires the "unlearning" of established behaviours and patterns, and the learning of new ones. The recovery process includes abstinence, education of the addicted person, and counselling. Many people aid their recovery with twelve-step programs developed by AA and other self-help programs.
This is an initial introduction to addictive behaviour. By gaining a basic understanding of what an addictive behaviour is, we can expand these concepts to specific addictions.
We’re not animals, but we act like animals when we drink. It’s no good. When you drink this stuff, you think you’re just playing with it, but you’re not... It controls those who drink it... When it controls us it really controls us and only wants us to do bad things, never good things. But Whoever made us breathe and created us should be the only One to control us. We should live His rules. Then things wouldn’t be so bad and there wouldn’t be anything evil in this world...

When they drink, people don’t know they’re stealing or breaking into someone else’s property. That’s why lots of our people are locked up. We don’t like it. This alcohol spoils everybody and it worries a lot of people...

Ever since we started to drink, our people drown, freeze to death or commit suicide. They pass away even when they’re in good health, when they’re not sick. They still die because of alcohol. Old men, old women, young boys, young girls, all alike pass away because of it. We wouldn’t mind if they pass away because of sickness. But it’s not like that.

Mary Madeline Nitsiza (Dogrib)

Alcohol and Drug Abuse are Symptoms

Just as a fever in the human body is a sign that the body is sick and is trying to purge itself of impurities, so the abuse of alcohol and drugs in Native communities is a sure indication that something is terribly wrong in the spiritual, cultural, social, and economic life of the entire community.

In Canada, we now spend upwards of $500 million a year in attempting to alleviate the effects of alcohol and drug abuse in Native communities. Unfortunately, the major portion of this money is spent in the hopes that the problem will go away. The actual elimination of alcohol and drug abuse among Native people is unthinkable, is it not? It is a disease. It has penetrated nearly every Native family in Canada. How can it be eliminated?

1 Adapted from Four Worlds Development Project, Understanding and Preventing the Problem of Alcohol & Drug Abuse.

2 This figure represents an estimate based on the annual budgets of all national and provincial alcohol and drug abuse programs that cater to a primarily Native clientele, and 70% of all Native health programs including hospital and extended care facilities. Hospital records show that between 60-80% of all hospitalization and deaths of Native people are alcohol related. As well, this figure includes Department of Social Service figures for agency costs related to family breakdown and child care where the cases are related to alcohol abuse, and Department of Justice figures for alcohol-related crime intervention, prevention, and detention. It also includes estimates of costs for special services in education ranging from diagnosis to remedial teaching in Native communities.
A report prepared by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development\(^3\) revealed the following disturbing statistics:

- Between 50 and 60 per cent of Indian illnesses and deaths are alcohol-related.
- In Saskatchewan, between 1970 and 1975, hospital admissions for alcoholic psychosis and alcoholism for Indians in the 25-55 age group were five times the national rate.
- About nine per cent of the prison population is Indian or Native, compared to population figures that indicate about three per cent of the national population is Native. A high proportion of the offenses are alcohol or drug related.
- Violent deaths among the Native population are three to four times the national level. Suicides, particularly in the 15-24 age group, are more than six times national rates.
- The life expectancy of Native people is ten years less than the national population.
- The current rate of perinatal and neonatal mortality among Native people is approximately 60 per cent higher than the national rate.
- Post-neonatal mortality among native Indians is twice that of the national rate.
- The proportion of Indian children in foster care is approximately five times the national rate.
- The incidence of fetal alcohol syndrome\(^4\) is significantly higher among Native children than the general population.
- Between 50 and 70 per cent of the Indian population receives social assistance (this varies from community to community).
- The level of Indian juveniles considered delinquent is almost three times the national rate.
- While total secondary education enrollment in the general population has more than doubled since 1965, the proportion of Indian children enrolled has been steadily declining since 1972/73.
- Successful school completion among Indian students remains less than one-quarter of the national rate.
- Indian participation in universities is one-half the national level.
- During the 1978/79 fiscal year, $5.5 million was spent directly in the area of Indian alcoholism by the federal government; $24.8 million on child care; $104 million on social assistance; $94 million in medical services; and $1.7 million on legal services and Native justice.

How Alcohol Affects Children

Perhaps the most heart-rending of these statistics are those concerning the number of children who appear to have been permanently damaged mentally, emotionally, and physically, (and ultimately spiritually), because their mothers drank during pregnancy, or because they were nurtured in a alcoholic environment.

When an expectant mother drinks, the unborn child drinks as well. Alcohol passes from the bloodstream of the mother through the placenta and into the bloodstream of the child. Even a small amount of alcohol can have serious effects on the development of the child in the womb. Since alcohol is a powerful depressant, it can greatly decrease the rate of growth, affect the development of the brain, and cause abnormalities. Children affected in this way are said to be suffering from "fetal alcohol syndrome."

Babies born to alcoholic mothers sometimes have so much alcohol in their bodies that they spend the first few days after birth experiencing all the symptoms of alcohol withdrawal — they are unable to eat or sleep properly, have constant tremors, and smell distinctly of alcohol.

As these children grow up, they show characteristics that are different from those of a normal child: they are born small and stay small for their age for many years; their heads and brains are small and they are often mentally retarded; and they are frequently poorly coordinated, have difficulties learning in school, and have a hard time controlling their behaviour and emotions.

Not all children who are adversely affected by their mother's drinking during pregnancy show all of these characteristics. Some children are affected only slightly, and parents or teachers may not realize that a child is suffering from fetal alcohol syndrome.

Alcohol also affects the physical, mental, emotional, and spiritual development of children by affecting the quality of the world they live in as they grow up. Children of alcoholics suffer directly from malnutrition, neglect, and abuse. Native children suffer when they see family or community members inflict violence on themselves and others. They suffer because no one takes the time to tell them the old stories and teach them a way to live with dignity.

Each of the problems illustrated by these statistics in this handout is a huge one in its own right. Taken as a whole, these statistics indicate massive failure. Why this failure? Is it a failure of the Native people to adapt to the world as it exists now? Is it a failure of non-Native people to allow the Native people to control their own destiny? Can we blame the government? The schools? Could it be that these problems are surface symptoms of a deeper underlying problem?
Current Alcohol and Drug Programs

There is no simple answer, no simple solution. Programs aimed at the prevention and treatment of alcohol and drug abuse in Native communities have largely been aimed at one of the symptoms illustrated by the statistics, such as family breakdown, violence and suicide, crime and delinquency, child neglect and abuse, fetal alcohol syndrome, medical problems arising from alcohol and drug abuse, learning disabilities, etc. Many of the programs are short-lived, because they depend on government grants that come and go according to the political climate. Other programs are so lost in theory that they have little or nothing to do with the everyday life of the people they are trying to serve. The content of many current programs has tended to be culturally inappropriate, preachy, and shallow in its grasp of the true nature of the phenomenon. It has tended to speak to the symptoms, that is drinking or drug abuse per se, and not to such issues as individual identity or spiritual, cultural, social, family, economic, and political development.

Fundamentally, most current treatment and prevention programs have failed to promote a human development process in Native communities that will eliminate the context — the root causes that give rise to Native alcohol and drug abuse. It is clear that the social, cultural, and economic conditions among Native people must change before alcohol and drug abuse can be eliminated. Unemployment among Canadian Native people is about 35 per cent of the working-age population, compared to approximately 11 per cent of the national labour force. In addition, 88 per cent of Saskatchewan’s Indians live in sub-standard housing, and the annual income of 88 per cent of Canada’s Indians was less than $3000 (including welfare payments), compared to $8874 for the average Canadian. These economic conditions, coupled with loss of identity and self-worth, have helped create a world of despair and pain for Native people from which escape, however temporary or damaging, is sought.

The situation is not hopeless, however. In recent years, Native alcohol education and treatment centres have been making tremendous improvements in treatment programs, in part because of the use of traditional healing ceremonies based on Native philosophy. School programs in alcohol and drug awareness have been providing information on the affects of alcohol and drugs, as have public and private agencies. The introduction of more culturally-based curriculum materials in schools is helping to support a positive self-image among Native children. We need to continue in these directions.

The approach, however, is still very piecemeal and, as such, is not sufficient. Spending an hour or two a week on alcohol awareness, Native studies, or building self-esteem, while the many other hours in school fail to meet the needs of the whole child, is like putting new screens on windows while the foundations of a house are crumbling.

Ultimately, the prevention of alcoholism and addiction can only be achieved by neutralizing the underlying causes of these problems. These causes are rooted in the way that Native people live their lives together in their communities. They are rooted in the lives of elders (some of whom have lost hope); in the relationship between the younger people and their elders; in the deeply troubled conditions of families; in the political power struggles that tear apart communities; in the economic dependency created by the loss of an economic base for the community; in the loss of a sense of dignity, of worth, and of hope for a better future; and in the spiritual forgetfulness that has lulled Native people into living their lives as if there will be no tomorrow.

It is ... the long-standing argument by Indian leaders that the rates of social pathology among Indians — that is, incidence of incarceration, alcohol abuse, and suicides — are in large part attributable to assimilation policies and the inability of Indians to control their own affairs.

Questions to Think About

1. How many people you know died in the past year of causes related to alcohol and drug abuse (liver disease, as the result of an accident, etc.)?

2. How many people you know have been arrested, charged, or convicted in circumstances related to alcohol and drug abuse during the past year?

3. Do you know any children in your community who are affected by fetal alcohol syndrome or the effects of their mother’s drinking during pregnancy?

4. How much money, do you imagine, is spent on alcohol by community members? How do you think this money compares with the amount spent on food? On education?
5. How much does the use of alcohol and drugs by your community members cost (through vandalism, health care, the cost of supporting people in prisons or treatment centres, the need for alcohol-treatment for employees [counsellors, workshop facilitators, sending these people to conferences, etc.], special education costs, and child care costs)?

6. From what medical problems do community members suffer because of alcohol and drug abuse (directly or indirectly)?

7. How many people cannot be gainfully employed because of their abuse of alcohol and/or drugs?

8. How many family breakdowns do you know of in your community that are at least partially due to alcohol and drug abuse?

9. What programs are currently available to your community members to help them overcome alcohol and drug abuse problems? What are the objectives of each of these programs?

10. What do you feel about the potential of Native people to heal their communities?
Can alcohol harm an unborn baby?

Yes. Research shows that alcohol can harm an unborn baby. Alcohol use during pregnancy is the third most common source of birth defects.

When a pregnant woman drinks, her baby drinks, too. Alcohol remains in the fetus’ blood twice as long as in the mother’s. The alcohol affects the unborn baby’s brain and nervous system.

Scientists have found that many children born to women who drank heavily while pregnant have a pattern of physical and mental defects. They call the more severe problems “fetal alcohol syndrome” (FAS).

Characteristics of fetal alcohol syndrome include

- small birth size; never catches up to normal growth
- small head size and small brain
- narrow eye slits
- a thin, flattened lip
- a short, flattened nose
- heart defects and problems in the joints
- behavioural problems such as hyperactivity
- mental retardation

Does alcohol affect each unborn baby in the same way?

No. We don’t know why this is so. Since it’s not yet possible to predict how a baby will be affected, women are urged to avoid alcohol completely during pregnancy.

How much alcohol is safe to drink when I’m pregnant?

No amount of alcohol is safe to drink during pregnancy.
But what if I just drink on the weekend – isn’t that OK?

No. Binge drinking (drinking a lot at one time) may be just as dangerous as an everyday habit.

Does the alcoholic’s baby go through withdrawal?

Yes. Sometimes infants are born as alcoholics because their mother’s drank during pregnancy. These babies suffer from the early stages of liver disease and go through withdrawal symptoms after birth.

What happens if the father drinks?

So far, there is no evidence that alcoholic men will father children with fetal alcohol syndrome.

Does it make any difference to the unborn baby if an alcoholic mother stops drinking during pregnancy?

Yes, it can. When drinkers stop drinking during pregnancy, their chances of having a normal child or a child with fewer defects improve.
Early native Indian societies restricted the use of narcotics and stimulants to special feast days, such as weddings, births and death, special tribal days, and for religious and ceremonial use. Alcohol use was controlled. Alcohol abuse was not tolerated. Its use was not the focus of an activity but a complement to an activity.

Alcohol was used in Mesoamerica (most of Mexico and Central America), the Southwest, and in some areas of the Southeast. Beverages were concocted from agave and dasylirion, cacti, maize, mesquite and screwbeans, and persimmons, to name a few. Agave juice, however, was only three to four per cent alcohol, and was noted for its nutritional value (sugar, gums, heavy concentrations of vitamin B-6, and vitamin C). With its heavy water content, it was drunk during water shortages and when there was evidence of water contamination.

Tobacco is native to the Western Hemisphere. A dozen species of tobacco grew wild or were cultivated in those areas where maize was cultivated (i.e., Mesoamerica, the Southwest, and the East). Some Indians smoked tobacco in a pipe or as a cigarette in rolled cornhusks. It was also pulverized and made into pellets to be dissolved in the mouth or dissolved in a drink. One must remember, however, that tobacco at this time was pure and uncontaminated by all the chemicals used in the tobacco industry today. As with alcohol, tobacco was not used to the point of abuse. Shamans used tobacco in their religious ceremonies, and the medicine men and women used it in their healing ceremonies. Along with foodstuffs, white settlers sent tobacco back to Europe. It was a highly desirable commodity, like gold.

Narcotics consisted mainly of peyote (from the cactus family); jimsonweed, also known as thorn apple; the trumpet-shaped flowers of the datura plant; a narcotic mushroom; seeds and mescal beans; and a black drink made from the leaves of an illex cassine tree. Again, these drugs were used under controlled conditions by shamans for religious purposes, by medicine men and women for health care, and in ceremonies unique to each particular Indian society.

The general use of these substances did not occur in what is now the United States until the arrival of early European settlers. Even though Mesoamerica, the Southwest, and parts of the Southeast saw predominant use of alcohol and peyote, parts of the Pacific seaboard, the Pacific Northwest, and some of the Plateau area did not use any of these substances. Thus, when early settlers dropped kegs of whisky near Indian encampments in the Pacific Northwest, the results were devastating. The Indians had no cultural experience of how to use alcohol, so they used to deaden their anxiety, although temporarily, over the loss of their lands.
Student Handout 5

Summary of Alcohol Facts/Information

1. Alcohol is a psycho-active drug.
2. Alcohol is a depressant.
3. Alcohol is oxidized by the liver at a set rate, which cannot be hurried.
4. Alcohol is an anaesthetic.
5. Alcohol passes more slowly into the bloodstream if there is food in the stomach.
6. Very small amounts of alcohol are excreted via lungs, sweat, and urine (2 to 5 per cent).
7. Alcohol may relax you and make you less able to make responsible decisions.
8. Alcohol may cause mood swings.
9. Many criminal acts involve alcohol.
10. Alcoholic equivalent drinks: 1 beer = 1½ light beer = 1½ oz. liqueur or hard liquor = 3 oz. fortified wine = 4½ oz. table wine. (All contain the same amount of ethyl alcohol.)
11. Alcohol is likely to make you less cautious.
12. Alcohol impairs your ability to form judgments.
13. Alcohol affects vision by decreasing:
   - peripheral (side) vision
   - frontal vision and focussing
   - ability to recover from glare
   - number and speed of scans
   - depth perception
   - colour sensitivity.
14. Alcohol decreases your ability to react and reactions may be exaggerated.
15. Alcohol may make you less patient.
16. Alcohol impairs muscle coordination.
17. Alcohol lowers general body arousal and makes your body less alert.
18. Alcohol impairs hearing.
19. Alcohol impairs sense of touch.

Unit III: Prevention of Addictions
20. Alcohol impairs your memory.

21. Alcohol may give you confidence.

22. Alcohol may make you more aggressive.

23. Alcohol affects the higher centres of the brain. It will impair your reason, caution, memory, judgment, senses, and self-control before it affects coordination and balance.

24. Alcohol interacts with other drugs, and this can increase impairment.

Part B: Building Self-Esteem

Children of addicted parents have lower self-esteem than those who do not come from homes where substance/process addictions are present. Self-esteem is based on the amount of respectful, accepting, and concerned treatment people receive from significant others. It is logical to assume that the lack of these conditions in an addictive home would negatively influence an individual's ability to feel good about him or herself.

This section is designed to help students feel good about themselves as individuals, as students, and as members of their families and community. Building self-esteem involves helping each student to appreciate his or her uniqueness (in terms of physical characteristics, strengths, weaknesses, likes and dislikes, and personality). It also involves giving students opportunities to succeed in what they are asked to do, and to contribute meaningfully to the social units of which they are part (e.g., classroom, family, community). Building self-esteem, especially for students who are part of a minority group, includes feeling confident and proud of their identity as a member of that group. Finally, self-esteem is enhanced when students are able to identify aspects of themselves that they would like to change and when they feel confident in their ability to make those changes.

An adult education program can build activities that promote self-esteem into the curriculum. Such a program can also build self-esteem by making sure that the curriculum content of all courses reflects a positive image of minority groups. Community resource people can be very effective in helping a school assess how its current program may be affecting the self-esteem of the students and how it can become more supportive of student needs in this regard. The cultural values of the students can be reinforced in the way the school is organized and in the way that learning and teaching is approached.

A short introductory handout, Student Handout 6: Self-Esteem defines self-esteem for students, and is followed by three activity sheets. These activity sheets are

- Activity Sheet 2: Personal Strengths and Abilities. (To be filled out and discussed in class.)
- Activity Sheet 3: Building Self-Esteem. (To be filled out and discussed in class.)
- Activity Sheet 4: Rank Your Values. (To be filled out, reflected upon and, if students so desire, shared. This activity is designed to give students a deeper knowledge of themselves, and of their values.)

The final handout, Student Handout 7: Distinguishing Needs and Wants, is followed by Activity Sheet 5: Needs and Wants. (Note that students will need to read Student Handout 7 before completing Activity Sheet 5.

If teachers intend to work through this whole unit, it is suggested that they distribute and discuss the handouts and activity sheets in the order in which they are presented. For instance, after students have read Student Handout 7: Distinguishing Needs and Wants, ask them to write in their needs at the appropriate level on Figure 1: Maslow’s Need Pyramid. Invite students to share examples from what they have written. Then discuss the results by asking questions such as,

- Which needs levels have lots of entries?
- Which ones did not?
- Why do you think that happened?
- Are some needs more important than others?
- Can you think of needs you have that fit each level?
- Are some of the "needs" you have listed actually "wants" and vice versa?
- What do needs and wants have to do with alcohol/drug education?

Then give students a copy of Activity Sheet 5: Needs and Wants and ask them to read and think about the questions before answering them. Be sure to tell them that the answers they give are confidential. Remind students that they may certainly give critical answers to question 4, but that answers such as "nothing" and "a lot" are insufficient. Answer Key: Needs and Wants offers instructors some sample student answers.
Self-esteem is a term that has been popularly used for over 20 years. We all have a bit of a working knowledge, at this point, of what self-esteem means and why it is important. Self-esteem means having a high regard for oneself, self-worth, self-confidence, and self-acceptance.

In this section, we offer you the means by which you can gain greater self-knowledge — to help you, perhaps, clarify the answers to such questions as “Who am I?”, “Where do I fit in this world?”, and “What can I do?”

The way you feel about yourself colours the choices you make every day. These choices are related to friends, family, politics, religion, family, work, health, and the way you manage your life.

Here are some points regarding self-esteem to keep in mind:

- Every person, including yourself, has special strengths, abilities, interests, and values.

- When you feel good about yourself, you are more likely to make choices that improve the quality of your life.

- People who are important to you influence your self-esteem and self-image.

- There are ways to build up your self-esteem.

- Sex roles and race stereotypes affect self-image and your hopes for the future.

Why do we do the things we do? Why do we go to school? Why do we work? Why do we do anything?

In his famous work, Motivation and Personality, Dr. Abraham Maslow hypothesizes that everything we do is done for a purpose. That purpose, whether we realize it or not, is to satisfy our needs.

According to Maslow, everything we do is done to satisfy a need. We spend our entire lives — work, rest, and play — trying to satisfy our needs. If this is true and if we truly understand our needs, then we can understand our own behavior.

Needs and Wants

To begin, we should understand the difference between a need and a want. A “want” is a conscious desire for something. If you have a want, you know it — whether it’s wanting a vacation, a new pair of shoes, a date with so-and-so, or simply an extra piece of dessert. You always are consciously aware of your wants.

A “need” is something different. A need is a basic human requirement, but a person may or may not know that it exists. In other words, while a want is always conscious, a need may be conscious or it may be unconscious. If you need a drink of water, you are likely to know it, but if you need to make up a vitamin deficiency, or need recognition from someone, you may not be consciously aware of it. But, if Dr. Maslow is right, you will be motivated (driven from the inside) by your need, whether you are aware of it or not.

Five Basic Needs

If Maslow’s theory is correct and people work to meet their needs, it would be good to identify these needs. Dr. Maslow has suggested that people have only five needs; everyone has the same needs, and everyone spends his or her life trying to satisfy them, even though we may try to satisfy our needs in different ways. In a way, it is these needs, which are common to all people, that make us human. They seem to be a basic part of human nature.

The needs, which occur in the order shown below, can briefly be described as follows:
1. The Survival (physical) Needs
   It is our need for the basic body needs (food, water, air, rest, elimination, etc.) that keep our bodies alive. These needs come first. We must meet them or we will die.

2. The Security (safety) Needs
   First, we need to stay alive, and then we need to be safe. There are two kinds of safety needs: the need to be physically safe and the need to be psychologically safe or secure.

3. The Acceptance (love and belonging) Needs
   Once we are alive and safe, we then try to satisfy our social need — the need to be with and accepted by other people. We discover our need for love.

4. The Self-Esteem Needs
   After our first three needs are fairly well met, we try to satisfy a fourth need. This is a need for recognition and respect. This need has two parts: self-esteem (thinking well of ourselves) and the esteem of others.

5. The Self-Actualization (or “making-the-most-of-myself”) Needs
   The highest need of humans is to actualize the self — for each individual to achieve his or her full potential, to become all that he or she might be. This need is one that no one ever satisfies completely, partly because we are too busy trying to satisfy our lower needs.

If Dr. Maslow is correct, these are the five levels of things we are striving for and whatever we do is done in an effort to meet one or more of those needs.

Some activities are more rewarding than others in helping us meet our needs. The wise person will try to spend his or her time doing those things that are most rewarding.

The Need Pyramid

There are some additional things that need to be said about Dr. Maslow's theory. As you already know, Maslow suggests that human needs occur in the order mentioned above. A good way to visualize the order in which our needs occur, is to think of a pyramid, as shown in Figure 1.
You are always trying to climb the pyramid. You have to reach the first step before you can get to the second. You must reach the second step before you can reach the third, and so on. During a day or a week, things happen that tend to push you up or down the pyramid, but you are always trying to climb as high as possible.

Let's look at an example of people moving up and down the pyramid. Suppose that two friends are riding home from school on their bikes. It's a Friday afternoon, and they're laughing, horsing around, and talking about tonight's hockey game. They're probably somewhere in the middle of Maslow's pyramid, trying to satisfy their needs for Love and Belongingness and Esteem.

Suddenly, a truck roars around the corner at high speed and heads straight for them. What happens? Well, it is likely that they will forget all about Love and Belongingness and Esteem and start thinking about Safety in a hurry. Their Safety needs are threatened and they act accordingly.

Let's give the story a happy ending and say that the two friends escape the danger. What happens then? After they stop shaking, they will put their Safety need behind them and once again move up the pyramid to Love and Belongingness and Esteem. Later, they may even add a few details to the story to get a little extra Esteem from their other friends.

Thus, according to Maslow, each of us moves up and down our need pyramid every day. These movements usually are not dramatic, but we move just the same. We move down the pyramid every time we get hungry. We move up every time we try to impress somebody. But throughout the day, our basic drive is to climb as high as we can.

Needs and Wants

Read Student Handout 7: Distinguishing Needs and Wants and then answer the questions below in the spaces provided.

1. What happens to people who don’t get their needs met? What are some of the things they do?

2. What is a need in your life that is not met or only partially met?

3. What could you do to meet this need in a way that is helpful and positive for you?
Answer Key

Needs and Wants

Note: The following answers are only samples.

1. What happens to people who don’t get their needs met? What are some of the things they do?

- eat (as solace)
- have sex with inappropriate types (also, as solace)
- do dangerous things in order to intensify feelings of “being alive”
- drugs and alcohol (to kill emotional pain — to quiet nagging fears)
- become a political activist
- become an artist
- commit suicide

2. What is a need in your life that is not met or only partially met?

- respect and recognition
- accomplishment of an important goal
- love
- belonging
- financial security

3. What could you do to meet this need in a way that is helpful and positive for you?

- find some way to enable me to accomplish my goal
- write a new book, then respect, recognition, and financial security might follow
- accept that I might never have love again
- cultivate friendships
- give up the idea that I will ever “belong” — personal integrity is too important to belong to most groups, such as AA or ACOA
Part C: Goal Setting and Making Decisions

This section is on setting goals and making decisions. After the last section on self-esteem, it is possible that students will have a stronger sense of their values, their needs, and their wants. The next logical step is to begin to set goals (based on one's values, needs, and wants) and to make decisions.

While recognizing that no one is in complete control of their life, it is nonetheless important to feel that you do have a high degree of control and are not powerless or at the mercy of mysterious outside forces. This concept relates to the prevention of drug and alcohol abuse — when people feel that they have the power to influence the outcome of their lives, they are less likely to feel depressed or incapable of helping themselves and, in turn, less likely to turn to drugs and alcohol to alleviate these bad feelings.

All material in this section on goal setting and decision making is in the form of student handouts and activity sheets. While no single approach is suggested for teaching this section, do discuss each handout and activity sheet with your students and make sure they understand how to proceed.

This section contains two handouts and eleven activity sheets. Student Handout 8: Setting Goals is followed by eight activity sheets:

- Activity Sheet 6: My View of Goal Setting
- Activity Sheet 7: Life Plans
- Activity Sheet 8: Setting My Goals
- Activity Sheet 9: Writing Action Plans
- Activity Sheet 10: Making Action Plans
- Activity Sheet 11: Don't Get in My Way
- Activity Sheet 12: Helping it Work
- Activity Sheet 13: Realizing a Dream

Student Handout 9: Making Decisions is followed by three activity sheets:

- Activity Sheet 14: What If I Can't Decide?
- Activity Sheet 15: Visualization: Making a Decision
- Activity Sheet 16: Visualization: Choosing
Setting goals for yourself is an important part of living and growing. Goals are as varied as people, but some are similar — like the goal of getting out of bed at a certain time in the morning and going to sleep each night. Goals move us through our daily lives. Do goals move you in the direction you want to go?

Think of a goal as a destination you are trying to reach, usually to accomplish a certain purpose or objective. For example, pretend you are in a desert. You are very hot and thirsty and need to find water. Suddenly, you see a cool oasis (pool of water) in the distance. All of your mental and physical energy will be concentrated on reaching your goal (the oasis) to satisfy your thirst with cool water.

Sometimes, going to school or to work can seem like crawling through the desert. Even if you don't want to be there, you have to keep moving to get out. If you're in school, graduation becomes the oasis of relief. However, if you don't see graduation as something you need, you won't make the effort to reach it. On the other hand, if you understand that a diploma is practically as necessary to survival in our society as water in the desert, you will be motivated to get it.

To help you define what your goals are, you should begin by asking yourself some basic questions, like “What do I want?”, “Why do I want that?”, and “How can I get it?” This section is designed to help you identify your own goals and will show you how to work toward them. Once you have the ability to set goals and set them regularly, you will be more in control of your own life. When you are working toward your own goals, you will feel a greater sense of purpose, direction, and meaning in life. This will improve your sense of confidence in yourself and your self-esteem.

Setting goals and working toward them can help you in all areas of your life.

Activity Sheet 7

Complete the following sentences with whatever comes to mind first. Note: There are no right or wrong answers!

1. Tonight I would like to _________________________________.

2. My favourite thing to do on a weekend is _________________________________.

3. Next summer, I'd like to be able to _________________________________.

4. I'd like to have enough money to _________________________________.

5. Someday, I want to go to _________________________________.

6. I'd like to be the kind of person who would _________________________________.

7. One interest I'd like to develop further is _________________________________.

8. I'd like to have the kind of friend who would _________________________________.

9. What I want to change most about myself is _________________________________.

10. What I like most about myself is _________________________________.

11. It would be O.K. with me if I never _________________________________.

12. I want to finish _________________________________.

Activity Sheet 8

Setting My Goals

Part A: Questions

Answer the following questions.

1. What is a goal?

2. What have you done recently that you feel good about?

Part B: Steps for Setting Goals

1. A goal should clearly describe what you want to accomplish. It should be meaningful and valuable to you. (It does not have to be meaningful and valuable to your parents or friends.)

2. The goal should be realistic. It should be something you can attain. We often set too many goals or don't allow ourselves enough time to reach the goals we have set. This only makes us feel like failures, which doesn't help.

3. The goal should have a deadline date. This is the date by which you plan to finish the goal. You should give yourself enough time to be successful.
Part C: Three Goals I Have for Myself

Three goals I have for myself are:

Share these goals with a partner. Rewrite your goals, making them clear. Make sure to follow the three steps outlined above. Ask your teacher for help, if necessary.

3.

Now write two goals you would like to achieve for each of the time periods below. As you write each goal, think about the three steps you've learned.

My Goals for Today
Example: Wash my car and clean out my desk.

My Goals for this Week
Example: Find out if I can work part-time at the grocery store after school.

Writing Action Plans

Now that you have set your goals, you need to set objectives. To practice, write two objectives for each of the goals below. (Objectives describe the action you would take to reach the goal. In other words, what are the steps necessary to accomplish the goal?)

Example

Goal: I will read one novel this month.
Objective: This weekend choose the book I want to read.
Objective: Read one chapter every day.

Goal 1: Be in good physical condition three months from now.
Objective:
Objective:

Goal 2: Make one new friend by Christmas.
Objective:
Objective:

Goal 3: Complete two art projects by next spring.
Objective:
Objective:

Unit III: Prevention of Addictions
It's time now to think about your own goals. Today, you will have a chance to make action plans to accomplish some of your goals. This activity will give you practice writing objectives for your goals.

In the spaces below, write down your own goals and include two objectives for each goal. (A topic area is suggested for each goal.)

1. Write one goal and two objectives that relate to your current educational program.
   Goal: __________________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________

2. Write one goal and two objectives that relate to your job or career planning.
   Goal: __________________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________

3. Write one goal and two objectives that relate to your personal development.
   Goal: __________________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________

4. Write one goal and two objectives that relate to your friends or social life.
   Goal: __________________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________
   Objective: _______________________________________
Activity Sheet 11  Don't Get in my Way!

O.K. You've decided what you want to do and how to plan to do it. Now what? Can you foresee anything that might get in the way of your plans?

As you probably don't have to be told, things don't always go the way you plan. If you can foresee what might possibly get in your way, you can sometimes do something ahead of time to get around it.

Barriers to Setting Goals

We can't accomplish goals that haven't been set. First of all, you have to set a goal. Some people find this difficult. Do you?

What gets in your way of setting goals? Why don't you set goals for yourself? Check (✓) the statements below that apply to you.

1. I don't know how.
2. I keep putting it off.
3. I'm afraid I won't be right.
4. I don't believe I can accomplish much.
5. I don't have time.
6. I don't see any reason to set goals.
   Life just happens.
7. Every time I decide to do something,
   I always fail. I'm tired of trying.
8. It's too hard to set goals.
9. I just don't want to.

Barriers to Achieving Goals

O.K. So you've set a goal. What could get in your way of accomplishing it? If any of the words below are barriers or obstacles to your goal achievement, state how they get in your way.
Friends

Unrealistic Goals

Expectation of Failure

Parents

Spouse

Job

How I Feel About Myself

1. You've already identified the things that can get in the way of attaining your goals, so now it's time to identify the people and places that can help you in one way or another. To do this, answer the questions below in the spaces provided.

   a) Who or what helps you achieve the goals you set for yourself?

   b) How do they help? (What kind of assistance do they give you?)

   c) Would you like more help with goal setting?

In almost everything you do, you must make a decision and then act on it. You make decisions even when you're not aware of them. When you become more aware of your power to make decisions and act on them, you will feel more in control of your own life.

A decision is a type of choice you must make. Deciding what to do or what not to do, or what to say or what not to say are obvious types of decisions. We have to make decisions about what we are going to do right now, and we can also make decisions about what we want to do in the future — deciding what to do after graduation, deciding about what kind of work to be involved in, deciding what we want in our personal lives.

Many people decide by not deciding. They put off making an important decision and let “fate” decide for them. For example, a woman gets laid off her job and draws U.I. Her building manager informs her that the apartment building is being sold and she must move in 90 days time. Instead of actively seeking new employment and a new place (or, perhaps, applying for college admission and making plans to leave the area, both things she's wanted to do for a long time), she keeps putting it off. “Something will turn up,” she tells herself, until she is finally forced to move in with a relative.

It helps to have a system for making decisions — a system that you can use to help you make the best choice for you. Remember, if you don’t decide what’s best for yourself, someone else probably will or circumstances will take the matter out of your hands.

In this section, you will identify how you already make decisions. You can then either decide to continue using your own method of decision making or learn to use another model for making important decisions in your life. This model will help you look at the choices and alternatives, and at their advantages and disadvantages. A model such as this is more likely to lead you to satisfying results than other common decision-making strategies.
Activity Sheet 14

What If I Can’t Decide?

Many times, the decisions you must make are not easy. You may have all the facts, and you may have identified alternatives and their advantages and disadvantages, but you still don’t know what to do.

Here are some suggestions for the times when you just can’t decide. One, some, or all of them may help you with decisions you find difficult.

When I just can’t decide, I can:

- sleep on it, and see how it looks tomorrow
- pray about it
- talk over my concerns with people I trust
- ask myself if this is something I really have to decide today
- take a walk, read a book, do something I enjoy for a while
- set priorities for my goals and see where the decision fits in
- try to understand how I might benefit from not making a decision
- set a date by which I’ll decide, then decide by that date
- give myself permission to make a mistake, knowing I’m doing the best I can for now
- realize that I can change my mind; decisions are not set in concrete
- be alone and quiet for a while to look inside myself for my true thoughts and feelings.
Activity Sheet 15

Visualization: Making a Decision

1. Sit or lie down in a comfortable position. Uncross your legs. Have your arms at your sides.

2. Take three or four deep breaths. Feel your body relax.

3. Breath in deeply, slowly counting to ten. Then breathe out, counting to ten. Do this five to ten times until your body feels relaxed and your mind is calm. If your mind wanders, gently bring it back to concentrate on your breathing.

4. When you feel relaxed, picture yourself in a very safe place. You have a few pages of your favourite coloured paper and some pens in front of you. You are getting ready to use the planning strategy for making a decision.

5. Think of something you need to decide. It can be a small decision or a major decision. In your mind, write down what you have to decide at the top of one of the coloured pieces of paper. Congratulate yourself. You have completed the first step of the decision-making process!

6. Picture yourself writing down your values and goals related to this decision. You don't have to think of them specifically right now. Just see yourself writing on your page. Now, in your mind, write: My choices are . . . Make two columns under this heading and label them “Advantages” and “Disadvantages.” Feel yourself calmly going through the process of writing out the advantages and disadvantages, confident that you are able to look at your problem rationally.

7. Now imagine how it feels to make a thoughtful decision. Congratulate yourself for going through the process. Feel ready to act on your decision.

8. Take a few deep breaths and slowly become conscious of your surroundings. Stay relaxed and open your eyes slowly, knowing that you can practice this skill with any decision.

4. When you feel relaxed, picture in your mind a map of your life. It's a large map and you're standing on one part of it. Look to your left. See where you've come from. See the choices you have made up to this time in your life. See the paths you have taken. See the people who have been important to you on this path, too.

5. Now look around you, to where you are now. Do you feel contentment? What do you need to do to feel content? Put that next to you in your mind's eye.

6. Now look to your right, into your future. What do you see? What would you like to see on your path? Put it there. See it clearly and know that today you can take steps toward it. In fact, you just did! You are closer to reaching this desire when you can see it. Know that you can envision this goal in your mind whenever you want to, whenever you take the time to do it.

7. Take a few deep breaths and slowly become conscious of your surroundings. Stay relaxed and open your eyes slowly, knowing that each day your life path is one day longer, shaped by the choices you made today.
Section D: Peer Counselling

Peer support (support sought from one's peers rather than from a "professional") can be most effective in helping prevent addictive behaviour. It is not, however, meant to be a source of "treatment" or a method to help stop addictive behaviour.

The following material explains "peer counselling" as defined by Dr. Rey A. Carr and Mr. Greg Saunders of the University of Victoria in their Peer Counselling Starter Kit (1980). This material offers advice on how to go about setting up a formal peer counselling program and outlines what is covered in the 12 training sessions for the Peer Counsellors-to-be.

If you are interested in setting up a formal peer counselling program according to Carr and Saunders' guidelines, we refer you to The Peer Counselling Starter Kit (available from the Faculty of Education, University of Victoria) which provides very specific, detailed advice on how to go about it.

Following the material on peer counselling is a short sub-section on encouraging the creation of an informal "peer support" system.

Information on Peer Counselling

Peer counselling is a learning situation in which students listen to and help facilitate the growth and development of other students. It is a process in which trained and supervised students offer to listen and support, but little or no advice, to other students.

A peer counsellor is someone who cares about others and who talks to them about their thoughts and feelings. Rather than being an "advice-giver" or a "problem-solver," a peer counsellor is a sensitive listener, who uses communication skills to facilitate self-exploration and decision-making. The peer counsellor is not a therapist or a professional counsellor. Peer counsellors are students who have been trained to help other students think through and reflect upon problems that they might be experiencing. One major purpose of peer counselling is to increase the number of people in a school who are skilled in helping others, and to provide an informal and spontaneous source of assistance. While peer counsellors may have office hours or make appointments just as in traditional counselling, their main focus is within the existing social network of fellow students.

Their "counselling sessions," therefore, are most likely to be informal discussions, conversations, or "rap sessions." These sessions have, however, the added ingredient of students with skills specifically learned to help others express and deal effectively with problems or concerns.

Why a Peer Counselling Program?

The rationale for using a peer counselling program as a supplement to traditional counselling services is based on the following:
The number of certified professional counsellors is limited and the needs of students are more extensive than most professional staffs can meet.

Students provide a practical and economical means for meeting the increasing number of guidance and counselling needs.

Research indicates that student counsellors and facilitators can often be as effective as professional counsellors in many guidance and counselling activities.

Evidence also indicates that student facilitators are as accepted by student “clients” as are professional counsellors, and in some cases they are more readily accepted, especially in the initial stages of developing a relationship.

Sometimes, information can be presented to students in an informal and less intimidating manner when peers provide it.

Many times, adults do not understand the straight-forward language and customs of the younger generation; student facilitators can help bridge this gap and assist professional counsellors in gaining a better perspective on student problems and issues.

The range of guidance services can be extended in a school when peers are used as resources.

A peer counsellor program provides an “outreach” approach to counselling, which is most appropriate for contemporary times.

Peer facilitators can function as models within a work or educational setting.

Learning is more efficient when students assist other students and accept more responsibility for creating the learning climate.

The peer counsellor gains from being a facilitator (“training as treatment”).

Peer counsellor/facilitator programs are the heart of a developmental approach to guidance and counselling. In developmental guidance programs, skills are developed prior to a crisis.

How are students recruited and selected?

Since peer counselling is founded on the assumption that peers seek help from peers, it is clear that some students are already providing some kind of help to other students. For training purposes, it is helpful if these students can identify themselves through requests for volunteers who are interested in counselling or helping. Student leaders in the existing social network, not necessarily clubs or government (yet not excluding them either), can be encouraged to apply and/or be suggested by others. One approach is to do some advertising and then hold information meetings at lunch or before/after school to describe the program and ask for volunteers.

While teachers can be asked for names of students who they see as “helping” students, students also can give names of people they think would like to get involved. Student motivations for wanting the training may be quite diverse, and the only suggested screening is on the basis of interest and availability. Only those students who have gross emotional problems in relationships should be discouraged from taking the training. (They might benefit more from professional counselling assistance or group counselling.)

Screening can be done in individual interviews with each volunteer. It is important, however, not to reject students on the basis of troublesome “behaviour problems,” as often these students have leadership ability and perceptiveness.

It is also possible that potential drop-outs or students with poor grades may be interested and available. When these students are trained, other students struggling with the same problems or concerns can relate and accept alternative ways of dealing with the problem. It is also possible to view the training as a source of psychological development for the trainees, so a number of students who volunteer and are experiencing normal developmental problems can also be accepted. Since the major goal of peer counselling training is... to increase the number of students who have and use helping skills, the training should not be used as a substitute for group counselling or guidance courses.

What is the training model? What type of counselling skills are being taught, how, and how long does it take?

The training consists of two phases. The first phase includes 12 to 16 training sessions of one to two hours in duration, with the major emphasis on acquiring empathic listening skills. If the sessions can be scheduled twice a week, six to eight weeks will be necessary for training.

The 12 training sessions in the first phase cover the following areas:

- Session I: Introduction, Orientation, and Getting Acquainted
- Session II: Non-Verbal Attending
- Session III: Blocks to Effective Communication
- Session IV: Empathic Listening (Responding to Feelings)
- Session V: Empathic Listening: Role-Playing
- Session VI: Empathic Listening Practice
- Session VII: The Role of Questions in a Helping Relationship
- Session VIII: Self-Disclosing Messages and Messages That Hurt Relationships
- Session IX: Feedback: Giving and Receiving
- Session X: Values Clarification
- Session XI: Decision Making and Problem Solving
- Session XII: Confidentiality, and Referral

The second phase consists of a series of activities that resemble supervised practicum. Peer counsellors start working with other students so that they can apply the knowledge/skills gained during training. During that time, workshops are held to deal with the concerns or problems that the students (peer counsellors) are encountering. Workshops generally focus on skills such as feedback, confrontation (setting limits), support, or problem solving, and are based upon the peer counsellors' experiences, needs, and concerns.

Peer Support

The term “peer support” is similar to “peer counselling,” in that people seek the support of peers rather than of mental health professionals, for whatever reasons. “Peer support,” however, is less formal than peer counselling. In peer support, there are no formal selections of certain individuals who wish to be deemed “counsellors,” and no in-depth training sessions designed to render them fit for their new “counsellor” role.

“Peer support” is a network of friends and acquaintances who make an effort to be supportive of one another — a support network, as it were.
To the Instructor

Through reading and discussing the materials in this section, it is hoped that students will come to some positive conclusions regarding the importance of establishing and maintaining a peer support network and make a conscious effort to build a support network of their own.

Student Handout 10: Ramona: A Case History written by Janet Campbell Hale is about a Native woman student who found peer support more helpful than professional counselling. Following Ramona’s story are four questions designed to facilitate discussion on the importance of peer support. It is suggested that students read Ramona’s story and discuss the questions before undertaking the following activities.

The two suggested activities in this section are designed to help create an environment in which an informal supportive peer relationship might flourish. These activities are:

- Activity 1: Family History. This activity was adapted from an activity in The NESA Activities Handbook for Native and Multicultural Classrooms. It involves the writing of a family history.
- Activity 2: The Talking Circle. This activity is adapted from material put out by the Four Worlds Project in Lethbridge, Alberta. We hope that the Talking Circle will prove such a helpful and enriching activity that you will adopt it as a regular classroom tradition.

It is further hoped that these two activities, in as much as one requires an examination of Native heritage and the other is adapted from the traditions of some Native people, will provide a bridge to the following section, which deals with the development of a positive Native identity.
Ramona was a 21-year-old Native woman and the single mother of a little boy when she came to Vancouver to study at U.B.C. She soon became acquainted with other Native women students — some young mothers like herself, some not, some single, and some married. She was friendly with all of them. In that first year, Ramona was very much involved in her new life and she shared many activities with her new friends.

In the second year, Ramona met a man with whom she became so involved that she stopped participating in activities with her friends. She married her boyfriend and had another baby. Soon, she never saw or spoke to the friends she had made when she first came to university, outside of school. Ramona reasoned that she just didn't have the time to devote to maintaining friendships, because she was involved with her husband and children and her academic studies.

In the third year, Ramona came home from school one afternoon to find her husband had left her. He'd left a note behind telling her that he was sorry, that he was never coming back — which explained nothing.

Looking back on that time, Ramona says, "It came without warning. I thought we were happy. Devastated isn't even a strong enough word to describe how I felt. You could say I was like a zombie, except I don't think a zombie suffers such emotional pain. I was a zombie in that I was on automatic pilot, unable to feel any affection for my children, but able to attend to the physical needs. I was unable to take any pleasure or enjoyment out of life. I nonetheless walked around and went to my classes, my concentration so poor I was unable to read even a single paragraph or watch a TV show. I could not sleep at night. I could not eat at all either, until my son got me to by refusing to eat unless I did. I kept thinking, in the first few days: He'll come home. He can't just walk out on me, on us like that. I was wrong, though. I guess how I felt was worthless. What a worthless wretch I was that my own husband would treat me like this."

"Because I was covered by student health services, I went to a psychiatric clinic for counselling. This was after nearly two weeks had passed. I hadn't told anyone yet about it — nearly two weeks of emotional hell."
But the psychiatric social worker to whom Ramona was then referred didn't seem to be able to help much. He was nice enough, but he only had one 45-minute session a week, and she didn't feel he was able to really understand her situation. He kept saying things like, “And how did that make you feel?” when all Ramona really wanted was someone to listen to her and help her clarify her situation.

After a couple of visits, he diagnosed her as depressed and suggested that she try anti-depressants, but she never filled the prescription. She needed help coping, not medication. What she really needed was a friend.

“At long last, I called one of the women I'd been close to two years before and she surprised me by offering to come over that evening, because she thought I needed company.”

Ramona was surprised and grateful to find her old friends so supportive. They listened to her and shared similar experiences of their own; they insisted she get out and go to movies with them (one was a film about the children of Ireland, and for the first time in three weeks Ramona found herself involved for the duration of the film, with concerns outside her own life). Almost every evening, one friend came over to eat with Ramona or invited Ramona to eat with her. She was able to sleep again, finally, after a time, and get a normal night's rest. “I felt like a human being again, that I was not alone, that I was valued.”

After six weeks, Ramona's husband returned. She agreed to take him back, but there were a lot of changes from then on. She would no longer live a life structured around him. She made sure she was involved in her own outside activities — she made an effort, to be on hand to offer support to any friend who needed it, if she was able. It may be just a ride somewhere or help with a term paper, or just a need to talk and be listened to. From then on, Ramona made sure she spent at least one evening a week with friends “Whether anyone was in need or not; just to maintain our bonds.” This was something Ramona would always try to do, long after her university years were over.

Questions for Discussion

1. Can you think of any instances in which your friends were able to help where a “professional” could not?
2. How do you think Ramona’s sense of isolation contributed to her inability to cope when her husband left her?
3. Are there good reasons for being a part of a peer support system even if one never has to face the sort of emotional crisis Ramona had to face? List some of these reasons.

4. Can you think of some things a person could do to establish and maintain a support system?
Activity 1: Family History

This is a useful exercise for launching discussion into the nature of our multicultural society, immigration, population movement within Canada, the effect of new settlers on indigenous people, etc. Students should be encouraged to do a thorough job of investigating their family tree, starting with their parents. Suggest to students that they also talk to other family members and look at old journals, photo albums, and letters. Often, the information uncovered is a major revelation to students, and it should help them gain a better personal understanding of factors relating to multiculturalism and the Canadian mosaic. It is important to allow sufficient time for students to share their information so a complete picture of the diversity of their classmates' backgrounds can develop.

Also, be aware that students may uncover some disturbing and unwelcome facts about their family. Thus, be prepared to help or to find help so that students can resolve their feelings.

Goals

- To help students document and develop knowledge of their families' culture and history.
- To have students consider the role their family history plays in shaping their personal values.
- To relate students' family culture and history to the larger culture. (How is it similar? How is it unique?)
- To assist students in defining their role in a multicultural society through the knowledge and study of their families' culture and history.

Group Size Unlimited

Time Required Sufficient time for students to adequately research their family history and share their findings with the entire class.

Grade Level 9-12 (can be modified for lower grades)

Materials

- Activity Sheet 17: Family History Task Outline
- paper and pencil
- photographs, artifacts, documents, etc. (optional)

Procedure

1. Students research the history of their families (through to their great-grandparents on both sides) by talking with parents and relatives, reading through old journals and letters, looking through family photo albums, etc.

2. Students complete the family tree chart and prepare a written report on the information they have gathered.

3. Having completed their report, students make a presentation to the class on their family histories. Encourage students to bring in family photos or other artifacts to make the presentation more interesting.
4. Debriefing: The key to debriefing this activity is to encourage reflection on students' own cultural background and how the unique backgrounds of others have influenced them. Here are a few sample questions to ask:

- How aware were you of your cultural background before this exercise? What did you learn?
- Is it important to learn about our cultural background? Why?
- What is culture?
- How does it affect people?
- How has this study made you more aware of your role in a multicultural society?
- Canada is said to be a "nation of immigrants." How, except for Native people, is this true? What are the implications of this?
- Did some of your ancestors immigrate to Canada? Why?
- Why do people immigrate now?
- How is your family background similar to other students'? How is it different?
1. Research the history of your family through to your great-grandparents (on both sides of your family). Fill in the family tree below.

2. Complete a written report on the information you have gathered. Begin by describing your great-grandparents’ generation, then describe your grandparents’ generation, your parents’ generation, and then your own generation.

In preparing your report, you might include information on some of the following:
3. Share your family history with the rest of the class. You might use photos or other artifacts to help tell your story.
Activity 2: The Talking Circle

Learning aimed at changing attitudes and behaviour cannot just be cognitive. Indeed, whether we as educators recognize it or not, feelings are a part of any learning situation (excitement, boredom, pleasure, or frustration, for example).

During the course of an adult education program, students will likely experience many feelings stimulated by what they are discovering about themselves and the world around them. Many people have learned to shut off their feelings when they hear about such things as prejudice and discrimination, addictive behaviour, etc. Since the students involved in this course are learning about these problems in a very direct and often personal way, they may well feel frustration, anger, hopelessness, and other strong emotions. These feelings should not be ignored.

The Talking Circle is a discussion technique that allows each individual in the circle to fully express his or her feelings without interruption. Students are free to react to the situation that has sparked the need to express feelings in any manner that falls within the guidelines: they can express opinions without being interrupted or judged, make analytical statements, or describe a personal experience or the emotions they are experiencing.

A Talking Circle will need a facilitator to ensure that the guidelines (see above) are being followed. As they gain experience with this approach, students will be able to serve as facilitators. Talking Circles can be set up with smaller groups of students (e.g., five to ten), with the whole class, or with an inner and outer circle. In this latter option, five to ten students sit in a circle. The rest of the students arrange their chairs in a circle around this inner circle. Only the people in the inner circle have the opportunity to speak. After they have finished, the two groups of students can exchange places, or the students that comprised the outer circle can become the inner circle the next time a Talking Circle is organized.

In a Talking Circle only one person speaks at a time. Everyone else listens in a non-judgmental way to what the speaker is saying. Some groups find it useful to signify in some way who has the floor. Going around the circle systematically is one way to achieve this. Another is to use some object (such as a feather), which is held by the person who is speaking and then passed on to the next person who has indicated a desire to speak. Silence is acceptable and no one should feel pressured to contribute. There must be no negative consequences, however subtle, for saying "I pass."

Some instructors have found that weekly or even daily Talking Circle sessions are valuable. Others use it when a particular issue or question arises that provokes a strong reaction or difference of opinion.

Either way, the Talking Circle is a way to create a safe environment for people to share their point of view with others. This process helps students gain a sense of trust in their classmates. They come to believe that what they say will be listened to and accepted without criticism. They also gain an empathetic appreciation for points of view other than their own.
Section E: Indian Identity

Our culture shapes (as we shape our culture) every aspect of our lives from the foods we eat to the way we bring up our children. For Native people, understanding and appreciating Native culture is especially critical, inasmuch as failing to develop a positive attitude towards being Native can lead to a lack of self-esteem and a feeling of personal powerlessness (characteristics that experts tell us is present in almost all substance abusers).

Native culture has been misunderstood by mainstream society and, at times, seriously devalued and defamed by it. It was believed for many years that the best way to deal with “the Indian problem” was to absorb Indians into mainstream society, and to help them assimilate (that is, to stop, as far as possible, being Indian). Today, we recognize that Canada is a multicultural society and we are all the richer for this diversity. Moreover, we recognize the value of ethnic pride, and that enhancement and self-esteem can be derived through the development of a positive ethnic identity.

Many Native Indians are unclear what Indian culture means in a contemporary context, and it is hoped that this unit will help them to consider the question “what is Indian?” and arrive at a meaningful personal answer. Thus, this section contains material designed to examine and illustrate cultural differences, and stereotypes, and show how cultural misunderstandings can develop.

Student Handout 11: Sure You Can Ask Me a Personal Question (by Anishinabe poet Diane Burns) is about mainstream stereotypical images of Native Indians. You may wish to use this poem to introduce your students to the topic of stereotyping, and/or as an additional poem to use in the exercise introduced in Activity 7: Dealing with the Expectations of Non-Natives. You might also compare it with the style and effectiveness of the poem “I Am Not Your Princess,” presented in Activity 7.

Seven activities are presented in this section, and each one is intended to encourage Native students to develop a strong sense of personal identity, and an understanding of what that identity means within the larger framework of being Native. The activities are:

- Activity 3: What is “Indian”?
- Activity 4: “Indian” Behaviour
- Activity 5: What Does it Mean to be Indian?
- Activity 6: Some Ways of “Being Indian”
- Activity 7: Dealing with the Expectations of Non-Natives
- Activity 8: The Medicine Wheel and Personal Growth
- Activity 9: What is an Indian, Anyway?
How do you do?
   No, I am not Chinese.
No, not Spanish.
   No, I am American Indi-uh, Native American.
No, not from India.
   No, not Apache.
No, not Navajo.
   No, not Sioux.
No, we are not extinct.
   Yes, Indian.
Oh?
   So that's where you got those high cheekbones.
Your great grandmother, huh?
   An Indian Princess, huh?
Hair down to there?
   Let me guess. Cherokee?
Oh, so you've had an Indian friend?
   That close?
Oh, so you've had an Indian lover?
   That tight?
Oh, so you've had an Indian servant?
   That much?
Yeah, it was awful what you guys did to us.
   It's real decent of you to apologize.
No, I don't know where you can get peyote.
   No, I don't know where you can get Navajo rugs real cheap.
No, I didn't make this. I bought it at Bloomingdales.
   Thank you. I like your hair too.
I don't know if anyone knows whether or not Cher is really Indian.
   No, I didn't make it rain tonight.
   No, I didn't major in archery.
Yeah, a lot of us drink too much.
   Some of us can't drink enough.
This ain't no stoic look.
   This is my face.
Activity 3: What is “Indian”?

In the 1960s, H.B. Hawthorne completed a study for the Canadian Government called A Survey of the Contemporary Indians of Canada. In this report, Hawthorne identified a number of characteristics of Indians, particularly relating to learning and child rearing. How valid are these descriptions of Native people?

The purpose of this activity is to begin the process of having students reflect on what it means to be Indian and to discuss popular perceptions.

Time Required 1 hour

Materials
- Activity Sheet 18: The Hawthorne Report

Procedure

1. Quickly introduce the objectives of the activity and the background of the Hawthorne Report.

2. Distribute Student Handout 18: The Hawthorne Report, and have students look at the 34 “Native Characteristics,” contrasting them with the Non-Native column.

3. Have students decide, on a scale of 1-5, how accurately they think these characteristics apply to Native people. (A “1” means very typical of Native people, while a “5” means not very typical at all.)

4. Have students get into small groups of about five and discuss the items. (Which do they agree with? Disagree? Why?)

5. Debriefing: After the small group discussions, come back together as a large group and discuss the exercise. Ask,

   - Were the characteristics accurate?
   - How generally do they apply?
   - Were they stereotypical?
   - Do they suggest some basic differences between Indians and non-Indians?
   - Was it easy to agree on how accurate the characteristics were?
   - Why or why not?
   - What is an “Indian”?

If time allows, you could also discuss the accuracy and appropriateness of the list of non-Native characteristics, and how Natives perceive non-Native people.
Activity Sheet 18

Using a scale of 1 to 5 (1 = very typical; 5 = not typical at all) state how accurately you think the following characteristics apply to Native people.

Activity 4: “Indian” Behaviour

There are two main purposes to this activity. First, it is designed to broaden the concept of Indian behaviour and to help participants see that many activities (e.g., potluck dinners) which aren’t obviously Indian are consistent with traditional attitudes and beliefs. Secondly, it is designed to help people see that “Indian behaviour” is what they do, not what the larger society thinks Indians should do. In this activity, be as inclusive as possible, since the purpose of this activity is to encourage participants to reflect on what individual and community activities are rooted in traditional behaviours.

Time Required 45 minutes

Materials
- Activity Sheet 19: Indian Behaviour Sheet

Procedure

1. Begin by discussing the issue of what behaviours Native people tend to engage in more than non-Natives. Ask,

   - What do Indian people do that make them “Indian”?
   - What community, family or individual activities are rooted in Indian traditions?

2. Have participants examine the Indian Behaviour chart in Activity Sheet 19, discussing the behaviours identified by asking, “Which contemporary behaviours do you engage in?” Then have them add their own contemporary behaviours in the blanks provided, based on their personal, community, or family experience.

3. In groups of four or five, have participants discuss the chart and explore their ideas of what Indian behaviour is, asking them to especially note the more subtle, non-material contemporary activities.

4. In a large group, debrief, being as inclusive as possible. Point out that “Indian” behaviour is what Indian people do, and emphasize the contemporary activities that, while adapted, are rooted in traditional attitudes, values, beliefs, and behaviours.

5. Debriefing: Focus on helping participants see that “acting Indian” involves far more than traditional material activities (beading, dancing, hide tanning, etc.) and that it involves many activities that are less obviously Indian, but which are nonetheless rooted in (or at least consistent with) Native traditions. Also, emphasize that the essence of being Indian is not what you can carry around in a box or what we can see — artifacts and material manifestations — but what you carry in your heart and head. Indian behaviour, whether it be how you treat other people or how you raise your children, are those things you do that are influenced by your Native perspective, experience, culture, beliefs, self-perception, etc.

   To close ask,

   - What is Indian behaviour? What isn’t?
   - Can you be Indian and not engage in Indian behaviour?
   - What things do you do that are rooted in traditional culture? Your family? Your community?
- Which of these would not be immediately identified as “Indian” by the larger society?
- What pressures have you felt to conform to other peoples’ idea of what being Indian involves?
- Where do these pressures come from?
- How can we deal with them?
- How do many contemporary activities serve to maintain traditional roles, values, beliefs, etc.?
  - How can many activities that are non-traditional (e.g., a spaghetti dinner) still meet psychological, social, spiritual, and emotional needs that are rooted in the past?
- Are some of these activities (e.g., bingo, sharing a bottle) negative?
- What are the alternatives?

Activity 5: What Does it Mean to Be Indian?

Again, the purpose of this activity is to get participants to focus on a range of feelings and attitudes and to realize that as long as they are happy and content with their definition of being Indian, other people are less critical. Note: the idea is not to define what being Indian means, but rather encourage participants to reflect on the question and help them feel good about their conclusions.

The purpose of this activity is also to encourage participants to reflect on what being Indian means to them and to help them clarify their attitudes and feelings about being Indian.

Time Required 1½ to 2 hours

Materials • audio cassette recorders and tapes

Procedure

1. Have students do a 10 minute quickwrite (ten minutes of unbroken writing) on the subject: What does it mean to you to be Indian?

2. In triads, have students share their writing, clarifying each other’s ideas and feelings.

3. Have students prepare a short — about 1 to 2 minutes — statement about what it means to them to be Indian. Then, in their triads have them record their statements on audio tapes. After everyone has completed this phase, play the taped statements to the group noting the range of comments on a flip chart or an overhead.

4. Debriefing: First, focus on the process of the participants developing their own statement by asking,

   • Was it hard? Why?
   • What made the task so difficult?
   • Would it have been easier if you’d had more time? Why?
   • Was it hard to think about the topic?
   • Was this a topic you’d thought about a lot before?
   • Did they make judgments on what they heard?

Then focus on the results, using the points you note on the flip chart or overhead from the audio tapes. Ask,

   • Was there a wide range of sentiments?
   • Did some comments affect your own thinking? Stimulate new ideas or suggest new perspectives?
   • Is it important to be clear on what it means to us to be Indian? Why?
   • How can it strengthen our self-esteem?
   • How can it help us deal with external expectations of what being Indian means?
   • How can it help us deal with stereotyping?
Activity 6: Some Ways of "Being Indian"

The purpose of this activity is to encourage participants to reflect on sub-groups within Native society, and to think about their own roles and the behaviours that reflect their society.

Time Required 1 hour

Materials
- Student Handout 12: A Model for Understanding Group Identity and Behaviour Patterns
- Activity Sheet 20: Classification Sheet

Procedure

1. Hand out Student Handout 12 to participants and have them read it. Discuss the five divisions by asking,
   - Are the divisions valid?
   - Do participants know people in each category?
   - Can you combine elements of one or more categories?
   - Are there other categories?

   Explain that the chart is for discussion only and is not to be viewed prescriptively.

2. Hand out Activity Sheet 20: Classification Sheet. Instruct participants to use the categories in Student Handout 12 to fill in top part of the recording sheet, according to what predominant role they played during each five-year period (include present period as well). In the lower part of each column, have them list the primary attitudes and beliefs they held about being Indian at the time, and the behaviours they engaged or are presently engaged in that are consistent with their attitudes and beliefs. Point out that a person might have several identities at one time.

3. After this, have participants get in small groups of 4-5 and discuss their charts. In their small groups, they should discuss the following:
   - How do they see themselves in the past? Now?
   - How do others in the group see them?
   - What behaviours reflect the categories they place themselves in?
   - Are their behaviours consistent with the way they see themselves?

4. Return to large group and discuss the experience in a debriefing session.

5. Debriefing: As a group, talk about the various sub-groups within Indian society. Addressing the categories on the chart, talk about what is the most desirable stance for Native people and how growth in this direction can be facilitated. Discuss the reasons why people get slotted into different categories and what can be done to get unstuck. (“How can they facilitate this growth and healing for themselves? For others?”)

Healing Process

1. Recognize the distinction of each group.
2. Determine dreams, wishes, goals, and abilities.
3. Be sensitive to the human processes of healing.

"Sleeping Elders" (those elders who have not undergone their own healing and therefore are unable to help their people) may be caught between The Traditionalists, New Traditionalists, or Lost Identities.

Traditionalists are a healthy society. In essence they are almost the same as International Human Beings. The one difference that makes Traditionalists unhealthy is that their inability to adapt to the environment of the twentieth century. Traditionalists and New Traditionalists view Assimilated Indians as having betrayed their own culture; however while traditionalist view Assimilated Indians with compassion, New Traditionalists more often view them with contempt.

Assimilated Indians will often view Traditionalists and New Traditionalists as "lost in the past," while at the same time may envy International Human Beings for the traditional knowledge that they possess. They will often work for Indian people in an administrative capacity but remain very insulated from the real problems of the people. Assimilated Indians are often more comfortable in non-Indian settings.

The problem for Indian families is that their membership may consist of several of the above categories which contributes to the family's inability to inter-relate or communicate.

An individual may have experienced more than one of the five categories, or a combination of two or three of the categories, in the search for self; since change is characteristic of growth, this may not be unhealthy—as long as the individual does not get stuck.

Activity 7: Dealing with the Expectations of Non-Natives

The poem used in this activity was written by Chrystos, a Native woman from San Francisco. In this poem, she expresses feelings that many Native people have regarding the constant demand to measure up to the larger society's expectations of "being Indian." Build your class discussion around the poem and the feelings it evokes.

The purpose of this activity is to encourage reflection of the effects of others expectations of "Indian behaviour."

Time Required 1 hour

Materials
- Student Handout 13: I am Not Your Princess

Procedure

1. Hand out copies of Student Handout 13: I am Not Your Princess to the participants and read the poem aloud.

2. Afterward, have students respond to the poem by asking,
   - How did you feel while reading it?
   - What points is the poet trying to make?
   - Are they valid?
   - How does the poet use poetry to illustrate her points?

3. Then relate the poem to student's own experiences by asking,
   - Have you had similar feelings?
   - What incidents have provoked these feelings?
   - What stereotypical expectations do Native people face?
   - How do they affect people?
   - What are the sources of these expectations?
   - What is the reality?

4. Then in debriefing, focus on strategies for dealing with external expectations.

5. Debriefing: In developing strategies, focus on the real-life situations your participants have experienced, exploring how students felt in these situations and why, how they dealt with the situation at the time, and how they might have dealt with it more effectively. Allow students time to reflect on their concrete experiences and share them. As Chrystos points out, positive stereotypes and expectations can be almost as crippling as negative ones. Explore this idea in depth by asking,
   - Is it hard for Native people to just be themselves?
   - What are the effects?
   - What is the answer?
Sandpaper between two cultures which tear one another apart. I'm not a means by which you can reach spiritual understanding or even learn to do beadwork.

I'm only willing to tell you how to make fry bread:

1 cup flour, spoon of salt, spoon of baking powder

Slap each piece into rounds. Let rest.

This is Indian food
only if you know that Indian is a government word which has nothing to do with our names for ourselves.

I won't chant for you.
I admit no spirituality to you.
I will not sweat with you or ease your guilt with fine turtle tales.
I will not wear dancing clothes to read poetry or explain hardly anything at all.
I don't think your attempts to understand us are going to work so
I'd rather you left us in whatever peace we can still scramble up after all you continue to do.

If you send me one more damn flyer about how to heal myself for $300 with special feminist counselling I'll probably set fire to something.
If you tell me one more time that I'm wise I'll throw up on you.

Look at me.
See my confusion. Loneliness. Fear. Worrying about all our struggles to keep what little is left for us.

Look at my heart. Not your fantasies. Please don't ever again tell me about your Cherokee great-great grandmother.

Don't assume I know every other Native-Activist in the world personally. That I even know names of all the tribes or can pronounce names I've never heard.

Or that I'm expert at the peyote stitch.

If you ever again tell me how strong I am
I'll lay down on the ground and moan so you'll see at last my human weakness like your own.

I'm not strong. I'm scraped.
I'm blessed with life while so many I've known are dead.

I have work to do: dishes to wash, a house to clean.

There is no magic.

See my simple cracked hands which have washed the same things you wash. See my eyes dark with fear in a house by myself late at night.

See that to pity me or to adore me are the same.

1 cup flour, spoon of salt, spoon of baking powder, liquid to hold.

Remember this is only my recipe. There are many others.

Let me rest here
at last.
Activity 8: The Medicine Wheel and Personal Growth

The purpose of this activity is to use the Medicine Wheel to facilitate human growth and development.

Time 1 to 2 hours

Materials
- flip chart paper and felt pen for each person in class.
- Student Handout 14: The Medicine Wheel
- Activity Sheet 21: The Medicine Wheel

Procedure
1. Distribute Student Handout 4, which explains the Medicine Wheel as a device for examining ourselves, our needs, and our goals.

2. Give each student a piece of chart paper and a felt pen, and ask each participant to draw a large Medicine Wheel on their paper.

3. Then ask participants to list their positive and negative qualities in each area: mental, physical, emotional, and spiritual.

4. When they have finished their wheel, they may present it to the class, if they feel comfortable sharing with the other students.

5. Have students then identify specific activities or steps they will undertake to achieve the growth objectives they have established in each sector (spiritual, mental, emotional, and physical).

6. Provide Activity Sheet 21 to each participant. Have him or her write in what he or she is doing in each sector each day for a week. After the week is over, come back as a group and have students present their wheels. Ask,

   - What areas are they making progress in?
   - What areas have been neglected?
   - What imbalance is there?
   - How can people build more balance into their lives?
The Medicine Wheel is a traditional symbolic circle used by almost all the Native people of North and South America. In Seven Arrows, Hyemeyohsts Storm writes, “In many ways this Circle, the Medicine Wheel, can best be understood if you think of it as a mirror in which everything is reflected. The Universe is the Mirror of the People, the old Teachers tell us, and each person is a Mirror to every other person ... For example, one person alone on a mountain top at night might feel fear. Another might feel calm, and peaceful. Still another might feel lonely, and a fourth person might feel nothing at all. In each case, the mountain top would be the same, but it would be perceived differently as it reflected the feelings of the different people who experienced it.” In other words, the Medicine Wheel would mirror for us what we cannot easily see for ourselves. Although an ancient symbol, it is still meaningful for Native people today, as they can use it as a metaphor to contemplate and reflect upon their lives.

The wheel can stand for the four grandfathers, the four winds, the four directions, the four stages of life as well as other things that can be talked about in sets of four. The medicine wheel teaches us that the four elements — earth, air, fire, and water — are all part of the same physical world, just as the four symbolic races are all a part of the same human family. All must be respected equally for their gift of life. The Medicine Wheel also teaches us that human beings have four aspects to their natures, the physical, the mental, the emotional, and the spiritual, and that each of these areas must be developed equally in a healthy, well-balanced person through the use of our will power.

It is in this aspect of the Medicine Wheel that we are most interested for our purposes. The following activity is intended to give you an experience in using the Medicine Wheel as a model to analyse and reflect upon your life and to help you move towards achieving inner balance and harmony.

Unit III: Prevention of Addictions
Activity 9: What Is an Indian, Anyway?

This activity focusses on some of the conflicts Native people may experience in defining Indian for themselves — and others. Again, in this activity stress inclusiveness to students, but also focus on potential areas of conflict: wealth, separation from family and community, adoption of non-Indian social values, etc.

The purpose of the activity is to provoke discussion around the central issue of what being Indian means to each participant.

Time Required 1½ hours

Materials
- Student Handout 15: A Place on this Planet
- Activity Sheet 22: Response Sheet

Procedure

1. Distribute Student Handout 15: A Place on this Planet, and Activity Sheet 22: Response Sheet and have participants read them.

2. Then have students fill out the response sheet, circling their response to each question.

3. Next, break the group into smaller groups of 4-5. Have the small groups try to reach consensus on each question with individuals supporting and explaining their positions.

4. After the small group phase is over, have students come together as a whole and debrief. Solicit a report from each group on what had been discussed, what issues emerged, what points people agreed and disagreed on, and what this says about being Indian.

5. Debriefing

As this is the concluding activity of this section, help students focus on the central issue: What does being Indian mean to me? Since this activity, along with the others, is designed to clarify attitudes about being Indian try not to dictate a particular point of view. Emphasize the value of differences of opinion and stress the fact that what is important is that participants come to a position and understanding, based on reflection and discussion, that they are happy with. Also stress that this position should provide them with a solid, sustaining vision of what being a Native person means.

The following Culture Cluster can be used as an aid in debriefing this activity, or as a basis for a review discussion at the end of this unit.
Why do some people not respect cultures other than their own?

How do you view other cultures?

How do you view your own culture?

How important is your culture to you?

Why and how do cultures change?

What does culture mean to you?

Are all cultures equally valid?

How have your ideas about your culture changed?
Kaaydah Schatten, one of six children born to alcoholic parents, was a poor Native girl from a little Vancouver Island reserve. “We were poor. Just dirt poor. I went to school with holes in my shoes. Sometimes, I went hungry.” Today, the thirty-four-year-old Kwakiutl woman is a successful businesswoman (founder of Ceiling Doctor International Incorporated of Toronto — an acoustical tile cleaning business), worth upward of $5 million.

Many important factors went into the making of this wealthy, successful woman. One factor was her interest at a young age in other cultures throughout the world. “I came to realize,” she said “that the little reserve where I lived was not the end all and be all — that this was in fact a big world. When I realized that two-thirds of this planet was not Caucasian, I began to see that maybe I, Kaaydah, had a place on this planet. Maybe I didn’t have to be restricted by the racism and poverty I found in my own small world.”

Kaaydah had a friend and mentor when she was a child, a non-Indian woman who had knowledge of and respect for traditional Native culture. (Kaaydah’s first language is Kwakiutl.) This woman owned a hotel and tavern where Kaaydah’s parents would drink almost every night. The woman took Kaaydah under her wing and, when she was eight, gave her a job cleaning the tavern every morning. Because Kaaydah had a job, she was able to open an account at a little grocery store. From then on she would never have to go hungry. She saved her earnings and bought herself her first new outfit — all in red — “Red dress, red shoes, red sweater. I don’t know why the colour red. I think it had something to do with rage.”

As the years passed, the woman who owned the hotel and tavern taught Kaaydah about running a business. “And besides,” Kaaydah said, “I used my Native intuition a lot when it came to business.”

When Kaaydah was 17, she was in a car accident. She lost a lung and a hip in that accident and spent a year on her back because of it. “I was ignorant then,” she said, looking back. “Racism and bigotry is everywhere. To them (the insurance company) a Native girl’s hip and lung wasn’t worth much. I settled for $7000. Just $7000.” But she invested that money in real estate and was on her way. “I took something negative and made something positive out of it.”
Canadian Business Magazine, in an article on Kaaydah entitled “Vaulting Ambition” (January 1989), makes much of her jewels, furs, Maserati, Jaguar, Mercedes, etc., and states how “by flashing the trappings of her achievement, she hopes to inspire other Natives to pursue a lifestyle like hers” and that “her furs, cars, jewels, expensive ways, are the expression of a desire to convince people that if she could make it, they can too.”

That isn’t exactly it, Kaaydah says, though she enjoys the “flashy trappings” of her success and makes no apologies for “playing the white man’s game and playing it well.” She also has a strong sense of social responsibility.

“Rags to riches might make for an interesting story,” Kaaydah says, “but it doesn’t mean anything in itself. I see it as a means to an end. Through prosperity I can help other Native people prosper — to rise above all the racism and bigotry Native people have to endure. This way we can reinforce one another — we can together become strong and preserve traditional values.”

Kaaydah is currently working on a book (called The Double Braid) of profiles of Native people — five men and five women, in the arts, in education, in business (“I don’t advocate everyone’s striving to be an entrepreneur; I advocate their pursuing their own dreams and striving to succeed in their chosen field”) for young people in grades 6-8. She has hired a writer to work with her (she is dyslexic) and is financing the writing of the project herself. She hopes for a first printing of 250 000 copies in paperback.

“The Double Braid is a labour of love,” Kaaydah says, “I’m not doing it to make money. I want Native students to have positive role models and I want non-Native young people to learn about accomplished Native people.” She says she will make copies available to schools at a low price.

Unit IV:
Identification of Addictions
Introduction

This unit contains a variety of simple tools to help instructors identify students with addictive behaviour.

The first two identification instruments are designed to simply alert you, the instructor, to some of the behaviours associated with substance abuse.

The second two questionnaires are intended to help students identify for themselves (and in turn the instructor) whether or not they have a "drinking problem."

These are general guidelines only; they are designed to identify possible behaviours and patterns associated with addictions. They are only warning signs, not absolute descriptors.

Identification often requires little formal effort. Either students are aware of the problem and, as they learn to trust and become more comfortable with the instructor, seek help, or their dysfunctions intrude into the classroom in an obvious and devastating manner. Thus, the instructor is often the person most able to assist addictive students in seeing the problem for themselves, and may sometimes be the only significant person students interact with outside a circle of co-dependents who are unable or unwilling to confront them with the problem.

Identification — and the subsequent intervention — thus becomes a critical phase in working with the addictive student. It requires perceptiveness, sensitivity, and awareness. Based on careful observation and assessment, an instructor can decide whether and how to intervene.
Identification Instrument 1
Basic Screening Assessment for Alcohol/Drug Problems

This identification instrument offers a simple basis for an oral assessment of a student's abuse of alcohol. It can be used by the instructor to determine whether to conduct (or refer the client to) a basic comprehensive assessment that will, in turn, provide direction for treatment planning.

Areas of Inquiry                     Key topic
Alcohol/drug consumption:
(a) How much?
(b) How often?
(c) When during the day?
(d) What substances?

Effect of alcohol/drug consumption on:
(a) Health
(b) Marriage
(c) Family
(d) Work
(e) Involvement with the law
(f) Financial status
(g) Leisure activities
(h) Friends
Identification Instrument 2
Recognizing Addictive Behaviour
(Warning Signs and Symptoms of a Troubled Student)

General Behaviour
- withdrawn
- temper outbursts
- inappropriate giggling/laughter
- dramatic attention-getting behaviour
- irritability
- hyperactivity
- time and space disorientation
- inappropriate verbal responses
- depression (listlessness, disinterest, a sense of being "not really there")
- defensiveness about alcohol/drug use
- talks about suicide.

School Attendance
- frequently late
- skipping class before and/or after lunch
- frequent requests to leave the room.

Academic Performance
- change in classroom participation
- inconsistent daily work
- shortened attention span.

Social Problems
- changing group of friends
- deterioration of rapport with teachers
- loss of interest and involvement in hobbies, sports, politics (whatever student's particular interests happen to be).

Physical Warning Signs
- sleeping in class
- blood-shot eyes
- excessive nervousness
- rapid speech (extreme talkativeness)
- physical injuries
- slurred speech.

Name: ___________________________ Date: ___________________________

The following questions concern information about your use of alcoholic beverages during the past 12 months. Carefully read each statement, and decide if your answer is "Yes" or "No." Then, circle the appropriate response beside the question.

Please answer every question. If you have difficulty with a statement then choose the response that is mostly right.

Note: These questions refer to the past 12 months

1. Do you feel you are a normal drinker?
   (By normal we mean you drink as much or less than the average person.)
   Circle your response: Yes No

2. Do friends or relatives think you are a normal drinker?
   Circle your response: Yes No

3. Have you attended a meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) because of your drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

4. Have you lost friends or girlfriends/boyfriends because of your drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

5. Have you gotten into trouble at work because of your drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

6. Have you neglected your obligations, your family, or your work for two or more days in a row because you were drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

7. Have you had delirium tremens (DTs), severe shaking, heard voices, or saw things that weren't there after heavy drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

8. Have you gone to anyone for help about your drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

9. Have you been in a hospital because of drinking?
   Circle your response: Yes No

10. Have you been arrested for drunk driving or driving after drinking?
    Circle your response: Yes No

Twenty Questions\textsuperscript{8}
(Are You an Alcoholic?)

To answer this question, ask yourself the following questions, and answer them as honestly as you can.

1. Do you lose time from work due to drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
2. Is drinking making your home life unhappy? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
3. Do you drink because you are shy with other people? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
4. Is drinking affecting your reputation? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
5. Have you ever felt remorse after drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
6. Have you gotten into financial difficulties as a result of drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
7. Does your drinking make you careless of your family's welfare? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
8. Has your ambition decreased since drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
9. Do you crave a drink at a definite time daily? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
10. Do you want a drink the next morning? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
11. Does drinking cause you to have difficulty in sleeping? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
12. Has your efficiency decreased since drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
13. Is drinking jeopardizing your job or business? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
14. Do you drink to escape from worries or trouble? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
15. Do you drink alone? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
16. Have you ever had a complete loss of memory as a result of drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
17. Has your physician ever treated you for drinking? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No
18. Do you drink to build up your self-confidence? \hspace{1cm} Yes \hspace{0.5cm} No

19. Have you ever been to a hospital or institution on account of drinking?

20. Have you lost friends because of your drinking?

Scoring

One Yes = A definite warning regarding alcoholism and alcohol abuse
Two Yeses = Significant possibility of alcoholism and alcohol abuse
Three Yeses = Likelihood of alcoholism and serious alcohol abuse
Unit V:
Intervention
Knowing When to Intervene

Most of the material in this manual is designed to aid you, the instructor, in prevention rather than treatment of addiction in your students. Recognizing that Native students are at high risk of developing addictive behaviour and providing them with a supportive classroom environment might be the most effective contributions to the prevention of addiction that you can make.

Nonetheless, there may be times when it is necessary to do more. You may have to intervene directly in helping the addictive student recognize and deal with his or her dysfunctional behaviour. As an adult educator, how can you do this effectively?

Nurse-Counsellor Ruth Eyford (Addiction Research Centre, Toronto) in her article, “Early Intervention Goal of Clinic Project,” referring specifically to intervening in another person’s addictive behaviour, says, “Intervention is a way to show your concern for the person drinking or using drugs ... The first purpose of intervention is to assist the addicted person to see that he/she needs help.” The second purpose, she goes on to explain, addresses family members — to ensure that the family, even when the addicted person declines help, gets the support it needs in coping with the addicted family member.

In her article, Ms. Eyford refutes three common beliefs regarding the futility of attempts to intervene where destructive behaviour is present. These misconceptions are that

- “Nothing can be done until the person dependent on alcohol or other drugs is ready to ask for help.” In fact, it is possible to create a crisis in a constructive way to force a change.
- “An addicted person will not accept treatment unless the problems are so severe the person can no longer deny them.” In fact, the sooner one deals with drinking and drug problems the better the chance of recovery.
- “People have got to “hit bottom” and lose everything before help is effective.” In fact, people with jobs and support from family and friends tend to recover more quickly.

Intervention literature is not usually directed to adult education instructors, but rather to friends and family of the addict; that is, to those whose lives are most immediately affected by the addict’s behaviour.

Guidelines on the proper techniques or procedures of “formal” intervention often consist of planned group interventions based on the theory that the alcoholic/addict’s defense system is much more likely to crumble in the face of group solidarity.

Confrontation should involve the following seven steps:

- Persons important to the addict/alcoholic present facts to him or her.
- The data regarding events is descriptive and concrete.
- The tone is non-judgmental.
- The chief evidence is tied directly to addictive behaviour.
- The evidence of behaviour is presented in detail.
- Help is offered to the addict so he or she can accept reality.
- Available choices are offered.
Direct confrontation of this sort would generally be considered inappropriate on the part of an academic instructor. There may, however, be times when the urgency of the situation and/or the unavailability of more appropriate or professional help necessitates that an A.B.E. instructor intervene.

Examples of such a situation might be when a person comes to class obviously under the influence of alcohol or drugs, exhibiting signs of serious neglect, or clearly in a state of acute depression.

Situations that are not urgent but nevertheless indicate that a student is in need of counsel will undoubtedly arise. If there does not appear to be anyone else to whom the student can turn, you as an instructor will have to make a decision as to what can and should be done.

Questions you might ask yourself in deciding either to counsel the individual yourself or to refer him or her to an outside helping agency are:

- Do you think your counselling would be effective in this particular instance?
- Are you the best counsellor available?
- Do you have adequate skills?
- Are you willing and able to commit yourself to the time requirement involved?
- Is the counselling you are able to provide appropriate? (See the following A.B.E. Instructor Intervention Model.)

A.B.E. Instructor Intervention Model

When deciding whether to counsel a student yourself, use this model.
If you decide to refer an individual student, it might be helpful to consider the following model of a counselling technique.

Once you have decided to intervene, ask the client, "Is there a problem?" If the answer is "yes," ask "Do you wish to change the circumstances, the way things are, the way you live, the way you feel inside?"

If the answer is "yes," ask, "Let us think of a plan. What do you think? Can we come up with a plan? An alternate plan?" If the person responds positively, ask "And when this change is brought about, can we come up with ways to maintain it?"

If the student says "No" or is ambivalent in answering any of these questions, stop, consider, and reflect on how to proceed. But a "No" is not necessarily an end point.

If the individual refuses to accept your assessment, notice that the diagram of a decision-making system indicates "negotiate." Negotiating is where your skills and knowledge will be most critical in helping the addictive student come to some recognition of the issue at hand and be willing to move to the next step. This process of recognition implies trust, respect for the individual, and solid counselling and interpersonal skills on your part.

It is beyond the scope of this manual to offer guidance on how to counsel the addictive student. However, the compassion and commitment of a sensitive teacher is the most important factor in successful intervention.
In intervening and making your referral for treatment the following points should be considered.

- An individualized “empathic” appreciation of “drug dependency” (i.e., what is this particular person’s situation). More than one perspective for understanding drug dependence should be considered.
- The recognition that there are a series of stages of drug dependence that require different degrees of treatment.
- A careful analysis of the “generating factors” that contribute to a particular person’s dependence pattern. Appreciation of the “vicious circles” that perpetuate to drug use and contribute to relapse.
- Knowledge of “major modalities” available for treatment, in general and in relation to
  - actual client capacities
  - available treatment resources
  - the “best match” between client situation and available resources
  - some means of on-going facilitation and support of clients through the treatment system and follow-up care, i.e., continuing care/management.

Drug and Alcohol Organizations and Programs

In intervening, the likelihood is that you will need to refer a seriously addictive student to a centre or program specifically designed to help addictive persons.

Local mental health centres and alcohol and drug programs may be the only available services in your community, and although not specifically designed for Native people, they can offer real support and effective counselling. It is important that Native people are made aware of and feel comfortable using these services when no other resources are available.

There are, however, major provincial organizations and programs devoted specifically to working with Native addictions. Information as to whether a program will take non-Native clients can be obtained from contacting the individual treatment centre.

Most of the Native treatment centres/programs listed here do not charge a fee to clients, however, if there is any doubt, please contact the treatment centre in question.

9 Information in this section was taken from Directory of Substance Abuse Services in British Columbia 1989 (available from Kaiser Substance Abuse Foundation, 1900 - 1500 West Georgia St., Vancouver, B.C. V6G 2Z8). Since there are many other services, treatment centres, and programs available, please refer to the directory for further information.
This program offers individual counselling to Native men with alcohol or drug problems. Client referrals are accepted from the courts, probation officers, and liaison workers within penal institutions. Besides drug and alcohol counselling, a wide variety of services such as employment and education counselling are offered as well.

  Fees: $55

  Adult children of alcoholics or people from families with other major dysfunctions often have difficulty dealing with their anger. This workshop is designed for such individuals. Topics covered by the workshop include past anger, potential anger, expressing anger, and dealing with anger. This three-session workshop will be given on an on-going monthly basis. Individuals interested in attending should call for dates and times.

- Lil'wat Drug and Alcohol Abuse Program

  Program length: Varies according to individual needs

  Fees: None

  This program helps anyone with an alcohol or other drug abuse problem. Counselling is offered to band members and families. In addition, counsellors work closely with other community workers. As part of the prevention campaign, the counsellors speak to young people, show films, and organize workshops on the dangers of substance abuse. Appendix 1: Adult Children of Alcoholics

Adult children of alcoholics share many characteristics, emotions, and behaviours. They have come to realize that the confusing and often frightening feelings they had while growing up were not due to their own “craziness” or “badness,” but rather were the result of living in a dysfunctional family. Feelings of rejection, worthlessness, and uncertainty are common in families whose primary rules are don’t talk, don’t feel, and don’t trust. These feelings and rules can affect people for the rest of their lives.

One does not need to have come from an alcoholic family to belong to Adult Children of Alcoholics. Other types of compulsive behaviour such as gambling, drug abuse, and overeating come under this umbrella as do those who were adopted or were in foster care, lived with chronic illness or extreme religious attitudes, or in other dysfunctional systems. All these people find that they can identify with the characteristics of adult children of alcoholics.

Characteristics of Adult Children of Alcoholics (ACOAs)

The family of an alcoholic is directly affected by the alcoholic's behaviour and, unless family members are able to get help, they may get caught up in the consequences of the behaviour and become emotionally dysfunctional themselves. Although suffering manifests itself behaviourally in different ways, children of alcoholics seem to have the following characteristics in common.

Children of alcoholics

- have low self-esteem
- are easily discouraged
- are often and easily depressed
- feel isolated, unloved, and unlovable
- experience difficulty and frustration when attempting to express themselves or defend their inadequacies
- experience extreme self-consciousness
- are critical — judge themselves and others without mercy
- have difficulty with intimate relationships
- seek approval and affirmation from outside themselves
- are super-responsible or super-irresponsible
- are extremely loyal — even when that loyalty is undeserved by others.

According to research, children of alcoholics also run an increased risk of becoming an alcoholic, or of marrying one.

Children who grew up in a dysfunctional family have suffered many losses that they have never had the chance nor the place to grieve. They have had to bury their sadness in an attempt to survive and cope. As adults, often unconsciously, they experience intense feelings of sadness and emptiness without understanding their source, and without knowing how to handle or express them.
Janet G. Woititz in Adult Children of Alcoholics writes that according to her own research, 18 year-olds and 12 year-old children of alcoholics see themselves in essentially the same way. They may behave differently, but they don't have different self-feelings. This fact indicates, she believes, that self-perceptions do not change over time without some form of intervention. To be healed, people need to grieve, for perhaps the first time in their lives, for the pain and suffering of their past.

Many people who are adult children of alcoholics have found help through treatment and through participation in support groups such as ACOA.

Co-Dependence

Co-dependents are people who live with an alcoholic and who tend to become addicted to the alcoholic in much the same way as the alcoholic is to alcohol. Sharon Wegscheider-Cruse in Choice-Making defines co-dependency as "a condition characterized by preoccupation and extreme dependence (emotionally, socially and sometimes physically) on a person or object. Eventually, this dependence on another person becomes a pathological condition that affects the co-dependent in all other relationships."

Anne Wilson Schaef in Co-Dependence: Mistreated and Misunderstood defines a co-dependent as a person who is currently involved in a love or marriage relationship with an addict, has had at least one alcoholic parent, and/or who grew up in an emotionally repressive family. Co-dependence can be seen as an addiction to another person or persons and their problems, or to a relationship and its problems. Co-dependent people find meaning in their lives by making themselves indispensable. Every addict is surrounded by a circle of friends or family that enables the addiction by picking up after him or her when things fall apart and by hiding the consequences of his or her behavior to the outside world. Co-dependents not only have relationships with addicts, but they exhibit many of the same characteristics as addicts. They are self-centred, dishonest, controlling, crisis-oriented, depressed, and stressed. They also have abnormal and dysfunctional thinking processes, frozen feelings, and have experienced a breakdown of morals.

Support groups of people meeting once or twice a week in a healing circle can be a place where an individual's true feelings can be shared and problems worked through. ACOAs can get emotional and spiritual help from other people who have had similar life experiences, but it is important that they make the commitment to recovery, rather than to a particular group. There are many different kinds of groups: AA., youth groups, women's groups, and sexual abuse survivor groups to name a few.
Appendix 2: List of Films and Videos on Alcohol and Drug Abuse

The following list offers a few suggestions from an over-growing resource of films and videos on alcohol and drug abuse treatment strategies and programs. It is also suggested that instructors write to the National Film Board of Canada (1045 Howe Street, Vancouver, B.C. V6Z 2A9) for a current catalogue.

- “The Honour of All, Parts 1 and 2” (Available from the Alkali Lake Indian Band, Box 4279, Williams Lake, B.C. V2G 2V3. Phone (604) 440-5611.)

  A highly successful and deeply moving story of the Alkali Lake Band's slide into alcoholism and slow, painful climb back to sobriety. Over a 15-year period, the community went from 100 per cent alcoholism to 95 per cent sobriety. This spectacular example of community development has made Alkali Lake famous across North America.

  But while “The Honour of All” is a dramatic and moving example of a community coming together to deal with its devastating problems, the story doesn't end there, as indicated in the article in Appendix 4 (Alkali Lake: The Story Continues).

- “Culture as Treatment” (Available from Round Lake Treatment Centre, R.R. 3, Comp. 10, Grandview Flats North, Armstrong, B.C. VOE 1BO. $30.00.)

  In this film, Wayne Christian, Executive Director of Round Lake Treatment Centre, describes the history and philosophy of the centre, while Lucy Louis and J.C. Lucas, who have gone through the program and since become counsellors, tell their life stories. This film is a testimony to the strength and courage of people who commit themselves to healing, and to the valuable treatment and support a centre such as Round Lake can offer.

- “Walking in Pain” (Available from Hy Perspectives Media Group, 401-1133 Barclay St., Vancouver, B.C. V6E 1G8.)

  An in-depth look at the counselling relationship, both on a one-to-one basis and within a Talking Circle. The film shows how Marge Mackey, a counsellor at the Round Lake Treatment Centre, works with various people on recognizing and overcoming their denial, re-experiencing their grief and pain, and committing themselves to sobriety and change.

- “All My Relations” (Available through Yukon Films, Whitehorse, Yukon.)

  This film follows a client through treatment at Round Lake Treatment Centre. She describes her life in her community and family, both before and after treatment, and talks about the importance of after care. It deals with the problem of denial and of commitment to healing.
Appendix 3: Sample Video-Based Activity

The following offers writing and discussion exercises that have been developed to use with the film "The Honour of All." The exercises focus on the issues of treatment for Native people within a community and cultural context. Any of the films listed in the previous appendix could be adapted to this format.

Questions for Discussion and Writing

1. Respond to all the following questions in writing.

   What did the film make you think about?
   Have you ever been to Alkali Lake or a similar community?
   What scene was most moving for you?
   How did you feel as you watched the film?
   Did you like the film?

After responding to any or all of the questions, form a small group with other students and compare responses.

2. Imagine that you visited an A.B.E. class in Alkali Lake and interviewed a student there about the changes he or she has seen in the community. Write the imaginary interview in question and answer form.

3. Use what you have seen in the video as a case study to discuss, one by one, each of the following key strategies or principles for successful community development and addictions treatment.
   - development from within
   - no vision, no development
   - the healing of individuals, families and communities goes hand-in-hand
   - learning is the fundamental dynamics of development.
Appendix 4: Alkali Lake
The Story Continues

Many of us are familiar with the Alkali Lake Story as told in the video, “The Honour of All.” It is a moving story, told by the people who lived it, of how one community went from 100% alcoholism to 95% sobriety of 15 years. The story of Alkali Lake has inspired many Native people across the country with the example that alcohol can be beaten.

But cleared from the haze of alcoholism, the people of Alkali Lake have had to face all the pain, the insecurities, the frustrations that the alcohol used to cover. We thought that these on-going challenges would be worth hearing about so we asked Phillip Johnson to go back home and ask people what happens beyond alcohol. Here is what he told us.

The Honour of All
The making of the video was an important step for the people of Alkali Lake because it gave them a chance to reflect on what they had achieved. Phillip Johnson commented that “the video gave people a pride in what they had done. It was something the whole community was a part of. People didn’t know what they had or what they were achieving until they saw it on the screen.”

The video has served a very important role nationally as well: It has demonstrated to people across the country that Native communities can beat alcohol. It is estimated that since its release in 1985, 500,000 people have seen the video. It has been used in workshops and trainings throughout North America. It has been shown on T.V. And very few who have seen it have not been deeply moved.

The video is not a blueprint of how to start a sobriety movement. Phyllis Chelsea says that the video is just a vision. “I wouldn’t say we’re an exact model that should be followed to the letter of how we’ve done things. And I think communities could get into some problems if that’s how they want to go about changing things in their community. They are a completely different kind of community, different people. They’ve been raised in a different way and only they will know what is the best way. They have to work within a community, with assistance from the outside now and then, to move from there, to change in their community. All we can do is come there and share our experience and give the message that it’s possible to do something and make a change.

Since the Video was released, the people of Alkali Lake have been overwhelmed with invitations to do workshops, give talks, and make visits. And they have been so generous in accepting invitations, maybe too generous. The invitations are accepted because of the feeling of obligation these people feel to help others with their struggle. But in helping others they are removed from Alkali Lake and its on-going struggle.

Rebuilding the Community
Alkali lake people went on to say that anything has to be rebuilt in the process of recovering from an addiction. First of all is forgiving ourselves for what we have done. Then we have to repair what we can of our family and community life. This may involve dealing with sexual abuse, unemployment, youth development, and many other things.

Alkali Lake has been struggling with many such issues since it has sobered up. But when asked what was the biggest challenge facing Alkali Lake, Phyllis Chelsea said that it was rebuilding the support and trust relationships in the community. “I think the biggest problem has been taking time to create over the years the support that each and every individual needs for them to take responsibility for the healing after sobering up. I still see a lot of problems that people are dealing with, things that have happened as a result of when we were still drinking within families and within the community.”

Nelson Johnson, a trainer for New Directions, had this to say about the challenges facing Alkali Lake since sobering up: “I think the biggest challenge right now is just for the community as a whole to keep together because a lot of times we come through financial problems. Right now some of the people tend to forget about how far we’ve come. And there’s a lot of back stabbing that usually goes on when that starts happening. The community has to stay together and learn to reach out and help one another.”

Fred Johnson said that the biggest challenge after sobering up is “learning to be involved in community life and to take responsibility for the young people. We have to heal the community and the families before we can start on other things like economic development.”

Youth Development
Nelson went on to talk about the youth “… and our young people, don’t forget about them. I’ve noticed that a lot of the young people that are running around in our community are the young people that have parents that go to bingo again. Also we need to start talking about expanding, about bringing other stuff into the community for people, such as something new for the young people, ’cause we don’t. Some of the things that have been going on this community have been the same and a lot of young people get bored with it. I’d say in the past year we had about 20 young people around there that go out drinking almost every weekend, smoking up and that’s started to be a problem. It is starting to make us look bad again.”

Phyllis commented: “Within the community I think there are some young people who are doing really great and are out there and are doing well in their lives, in their careers. Taking on responsible jobs within the community. But also there are a portion who are still involved in drinking and drugs and for those ones, they seem to be taking a little longer for whatever reasons, whether they’re getting back at their parents or they want to experiment, but that’s a day-to-day thing that we come in contact with here as we work with the school and work with kids that are placed here in the community. There definitely are a whole lot of things that need day to day work out there. But overall I think the bigger majority of our young people here are doing well.”

Fred expressed a lot of concern for the youth. While he figures there are maybe only five who are drinking and acting out, these youth can affect the others. Some of these kids have been abandoned by their families, others are affected by what they experienced when their parents were drinking. To help these kids “we must do healing. Right now we are doing family healing but it is a very slow process because of the shortage of funds for this kind of work.” Fred also pointed out that the example of the leaders and parents is critical for the youth. “Alfred [the recreation director] can only do so much, parents must take the rest of the responsibility. We are trying to get the parents involved in the school because their expectations are passed on to their kids.”

Alfred Harry is the recreation director for Alkali Lake. He feels that “generally, the youth are slowly falling apart. I can’t tell them not to drink. It is up to them.” After 18, the youth are out of school, able to drink legally, and unemployed.

Alfred is able to manage organizing recreation nights at the school gym most nights of the week, a lot of tournament trips, and the occasional workshop with youth from other communities.
But not much more because there just is not the money available. The Band recognized this problem and is helping Alfred to write proposals for more funding, and has offered the renovated community hall for use as a youth centre. Other than this, however, there is not much happening for the youth and many people in Alkali Lake are concerned.

Sexual Abuse

Another “Alkali Lake Story” is emerging. The Man Alive series in January told another story, or at least another chapter in the on-going story of their healing. The two-part show told of the heart wrenching process of dealing with sexual abuse.

The process began in 1986 when the community held a healing workshop on sexual abuse. During and after the workshop there were a lot of disclosures. The community is dealing with the issue by holding healing circles to which everyone is invited. There have also been a number of workshops facilitated by Maggie Hodgson, Dr. Cruz Acevedo and others. As well many families are receiving therapy from local therapists on a regular basis.

Phyllis reported that “as a social worker, I get to deal with sexual abuse about once a month. I am still involved in things that go on within different families, whether people are living here or in town [Williams Lake]. In that way there are still some investigations that do go on that I am involved with. But there is another level of people who are going through healing of things that have happened while there was a lot of drinking going on here 20 years ago, and those things are being dealt with here daily, whether they’re with professional people or between people supporting each other within the community.”

While some families are receiving individual counselling from outside psychologists, there is neither the money nor available psychologists to really deal effectively with the problem. The Band is currently trying to get money to hire a full-time psychologist who could work with each family.

The process of dealing with sexual abuse is not easy. Fred told us that “three people have been charged with sexual abuse in the community. That affects the climate of the community, the extended family – and we have big families – and the school.” He went on to say that “every year people are accepting more, they are more ready to deal with their problems. Different couples are beginning to work on their problems – problems like sexual abuse – and this is a really big step. We can deal more openly with our problems because we see them as a sickness. And if we don’t deal with our problems, guess who will be having the same problems 10 years from now – the young people.”
Appendix 5: Nutrition for Recovering Alcoholics

Nutrition is an important component of any drug or alcohol recovery program, but it cannot work miracles by itself. Recovery from alcoholism must involve a sequence of care — abstinence, body healing and counseling — of which nutritional therapy is an essential part.

Abstinence
Alcohol is the primary enemy. As long as the alcoholic continues to drink, nothing can restore him or her to health.

Body Healing
When alcoholics stop drinking, their bodies go to work helping the ravaged organs heal themselves. The brain, liver, stomach, and other internal organs need to stabilize and strengthen their defences. Thus, the need for good nutrition is particularly strong in the first few days and weeks of recovery, although alcoholics must continue to watch their diet throughout their lives. Good nutrition will enhance the quality of sobriety and greatly reduce the risk of relapse.

Counseling
Alcoholics need to understand their disease and need help putting their disordered lives together. When alcoholics are able to think clearly and rationally, somewhere between the second and third week of sobriety depending on how sick they are, they can begin to understand the nature of their disease and learn what they must do to return their lives to normal and to maintain their health and sobriety.

Many recovering alcoholics suffer from the affects of withdrawal and are in danger of relapse — not because they are weak or are fooling themselves about their disease, but because their eating habits contribute to their mental and physical complaints. Alcoholics can be spared mental and physical suffering if they avoid those foods that play havoc with their blood sugar chemistry, and if they concentrate on eating the right foods. Proper nutrition might, in fact, save their lives.

A sound nutritional program is essential to successful therapy. Given vitamins and minerals in correct amounts and proportions, the cells will be able to generate new cells, repair injured cells, and strengthen their defences against other diseases. A dietary plan to control blood sugar, restore chemical balance, and prevent such symptoms as depression, irritability, shakiness, headaches, and mental confusion is crucial. With nutritional therapy, addiction can be controlled and alcoholics will not be threatened by the craving for alcohol that often plagues them for months and even years after their last drink.

Alcohol: The Nutritional Vacuum Cleaner

Often, alcoholics do not realize that alcohol, in addition to its direct poisonous effect on organs such as liver, heart, brain, and stomach, works indirectly as a sort of nutritional “vacuum cleaner” that sucks up vitamins and minerals, leaving the body with numerous deficiencies. Nutritional deficiencies literally affect every cell in the body, causing a wide array of mental and physical symptoms.

The information in this appendix was developed by the Round Lake Treatment Centre, Armstrong, B.C. It is suggested that instructors adapt and include this information into student activities whenever it seems appropriate or might be helpful.
Body cells cannot survive without the essential nutrients that are used to energize them and keep them functioning normally. Cells cannot create these essential nutrients, and rely on food to supply them. The digestive system takes the food we eat and transforms it into usable nutrients.

When people drink large amounts regularly, they do not feel like eating nutritious foods, for the empty calories of alcohol satisfy their hunger. Alcoholics are plagued with stomach and intestinal upsets that repress their appetite for food, and any food that is eaten is promptly expelled through vomiting or diarrhea. Vitamins B-1, B-3, and B-6 work as appetite stimulants, and these vitamins are commonly deficient in drinking alcoholics. Low zinc levels are also low in drinking alcoholics. Low zinc levels cause loss of taste and smell and therefore a further lack of interest in food.

Basic nutritional therapy for the alcoholic patient means a nutritious and appetizing diet based on the individual's specific deficiencies and requirements. Frequent meals and high protein snacks between meals will help control unstable blood sugar and provide a source of slowly available glucose. Glucose is the body's main source of fuel and is found in carbohydrate-rich foods such as bread, grains, vegetables, fruit, beans, and corn. These foods are made up of long-chain complex molecules that are slowly broken down and changed into smaller simple glucose molecules. Keeping the blood sugar in balance requires a complex chain of events involving the digestive tract, pancreas, brain, liver, and endocrine glands (adrenals, pituitary and thyroid).

Caffeine use should also be eliminated or, at the very least, drastically cut back, since caffeine can aggravate stomach disorders and disturb blood sugar control, and can irritate and stimulate the central nervous system, heart muscles, and respiration. Extensive liver damage caused by heavy and prolonged drinking can cause caffeine to accumulate to toxic levels.

To relieve these problems and help repair and heal injured organs, the recovering alcoholic must

- avoid the three negative S's (sweets, stimulants, and stress) and, obviously, alcohol
- add nutritious foods to the diet and consume them on a regular and continuous basis (the three positive S's; snacks, supplements, and suitable diet)
- add vitamins and minerals (particularly vitamin C, vitamin B-complex, calcium, magnesium, and zinc) to help the body regain health and strength.

The Three Negative S's

- Sweets
  Cutting back or avoiding sugar altogether is essential because regular consumption of sugar disrupts nutritional balance.

- Stimulants
  Sugar is not the only substance that triggers hypoglycaemia (low blood sugar). Stimulants such as caffeine (found in coffee, tea, cola, chocolate) or nicotine can have an adrenalin-like action, stirring up the blood sugar. Alcoholics should avoid foods and beverages containing caffeine. The same is true for smoking tobacco.

- Stress
  Stress causes unstable blood sugar levels. The body responds to stress by pumping adrenalin into the blood stream, which in turn causes the blood sugar to fluctuate abnormally — causing more stress.
The Three positive S’s

- Snacks
  Snacks help combat the drop in blood sugar that occurs 2 to 4 hours after meals, thereby sustaining blood sugar levels between meals. Nutritious mini-meals of fruit and protein foods, such as nuts, seeds, cheese, or celery sticks with peanut butter, make the best snacks.

- Supplements
  Supplements are not a replacement for a good diet but they help to make up for vitamin and mineral deficiencies caused by long years of heavy drug abuse. Even after full recovery, there is a continued need for alcoholics to take supplements to maintain good health.

- Suitable Diet
  The diet recommended for controlling blood sugar is high in complex or whole foods, high quality carbohydrates (fruits, vegetables, and whole grains), fibre (bran, wheat germ), is low in protein, particularly meat protein, and requires a strict avoidance of concentrated sweets.

Additional Guidelines for Nutrition

Recovering alcoholics should also try to avoid

- Refined foods such as white flour, white rice, pasta (other than whole grain pasta), and breakfast cereals
- Processed foods such as sausages, bacon, cold cuts, hot dogs, and salami, which contain added preservatives, salt, and sugar
- Excessive salt, which can cause fluid and mineral imbalance and increase bouts of high blood pressure
- Canned foods, which usually contain added sugar and salt
- Condiments such as mayonnaise, ketchup, pickles, mustard, etc., which all have added sugar and salt.

Nutrition is a vast and complex science, and many people find that once they start learning about the effect of nutrients on health, they want to continue learning and practising what they learn. Good health tends to promote itself; the better you feel, the stronger your commitment becomes to staying fit and healthy. The diet for sobriety recommends cutting back on the use of red meats, increasing consumption of fish and fowl, limiting fats, and using dairy products, whole grains, vegetables, nuts, and seeds as supporting protein sources.

The guidelines are simply guides to a better eating lifestyle. They are not hard and fast rules. Every person will have to make adjustments to this diet based on his or her individual likes and dislikes, allergies to certain foods, family needs, career obligations, and cooking preferences.

Each recovering alcoholic should find out what works for him or her and then stay with an eating plan that gives sufficient calories and energy and makes the individual feel good. If a person is getting everything from his or her diet, that person will want to stay on it, and staying on it will make all the difference to his or her outlook on life.
