Information about 191 art education organizations is provided in this guide. The entries are arranged in six sections: State Arts Agencies, State Departments of Education, State Arts Education Alliances, National Arts Education Associations, National Arts Service Organizations, and National Education Associations. Each entry includes the organization's name, address and telephone number; the principal arts education contact and other staff involved in arts education activities; a brief statement of arts education goals; the annual operating budget and the proportion devoted to arts education; the arts education services and publications provided; and the different art forms served. The diverse and creative efforts on the part of arts educators nationwide play a vital role in enriching the lives of young people and building audiences for the future.

Our emphasis has always been on artists and arts institutions, but in this case we are putting the emphasis on the kids. Our premise is that arts education, to be meaningful, must be made an integral part of basic education. It must be serious, it must be systematic, and it must be sequential.

Acknowledgements

First and foremost, I would like to thank Tom Becker, project assistant, who spent many patient hours editing, securing the last few forms (the hardest to get), and mastering the software program that had been chosen.

Much appreciation is due to Hilda Smith (Council of Chief State School Officers), David Humphrey (Alliance of Arts Education), and Jonathan Katz (National Assembly of State Arts Agencies) for furnishing their mailing lists to ACA for use in sending the original surveys.

Special thanks are extended to Ed Jones of the Metropolitan Life Foundation, who believed in the project and helped to secure funding, and to Joe Prince from the National Endowment for the Arts, who also assisted with the details of funding.

Finally, I would like to thank Robert Porter, ACA's publications director, and his assistants, Karen Severns and Amy Jennings, for their patient support of this project and help through a first publishing venture.

This guide is dedicated to all the leaders at the national and state level who have put aside past differences to work together. It is through the efforts of these many unsung heroes that we can truly hope for a better education in the arts for all of America's youth as our country prepares to enter a new century.

About ACA 82
ACA's Initiative in Arts Education

During 1984 and 1985, the American Council for the Arts (ACA) conducted a series of regional hearings across the country. The purpose was to determine key issues for the arts today and to formulate an agenda for a national conference. As a result of these meetings, the national steering committee which planned the conference identified arts education as a key issue for discussion.

The conference, "Connections: The Arts In A Changing Society," was held in Washington, D.C. on September 22-24, 1985. Francis Hodsoll, chair of the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA), delivered an address in which he announced the NEA's new direction in art education. The conference also included a session, "Arts in Education: Student Audiences," which dealt with some of the major problems in arts education from a variety of perspectives. Moderated by David Rockefeller, Jr., this informative session included: George Ayers, president, Chicago State University; Dale Chihuly, artist-in-residence, Rhode Island School of Design; Leilani Lattin Duke, director, Getty Center for Education in the Arts; James M. Jeffords, vice chairman, Congressional Arts Caucus; Samuel Lipman, publisher, The New Criterion; and Susan Morehead, executive director, Texas Arts Alliance.

ACA's board of directors began to formulate specific plans for a national policy agenda based on recommendations made at the conference and at the regional hearings. As a result, arts education became one of four major issues to be addressed, along with the originating artist, private sector initiatives and international cultural relations.

As one of its first steps, ACA merged with The Arts, Education, and Americans, inc. (AEA) in January 1986. The merger enabled ACA to expand the arts education offerings in its publications catalog through the addition of a number of excellent AEA publications. AEA had produced the landmark study Coming To Our Senses in 1977, along with a series of monographs which addressed specific arts education topics. More importantly, however, AEA's arts education library was incorporated into ACA's arts management collection, thereby providing the foundation for one of the more comprehensive libraries of arts education materials in the country.

In conjunction with the Music Educators National Conference, ACA took another major step when leaders from thirty national groups representing arts education, services and advocacy were brought together March 24, 1986 in Philadelphia. At this meeting the group drafted, and later adopted, the "Philadelphia Resolution" which follows. The resolution puts forward some basic precepts that underlie arts education.

This unique group of leaders, formally known as the Ad Hoc National Arts Education Working Group, now meets every three or four months. As this diverse and historically differing group continues its commitment to communicate with one another, arts education in local communities across the country can only be strengthened.

An educated populace is one of society's most valuable resources, and arts education is a cultural tool with which to understand, and to participate in, society. Because the arts are a way by which society enriches itself, both individually and collectively, the American Council for the Arts has made a firm commitment to arts education.

PHILADELPHIA RESOLUTION
March 24, 1986

WHEREAS, American Society is deeply concerned with the condition of elementary and secondary education; and

WHEREAS, the arts are basic to education and have great value in and of themselves and for the knowledge, skills and values they impart; and

WHEREAS, the arts are a widely neglected curriculum and educational resource in American schools; and

WHEREAS, every American child should have equal educational opportunity to study the arts as representations of the highest intellectual achievements of humankind;

THEREFORE, the undersigned individuals, representing a broad cross-section of national arts organizations, agree:

THAT EVERY elementary and secondary school should offer a balanced, sequential, and high quality program of instruction in arts disciplines taught by qualified teachers and strengthened by artists and arts organizations as an essential component of the curriculum;

THAT WE PROMOTE public understanding of the connections between the study of the arts disciplines, the creation of art, and development of a vibrant, productive American civilization;

THAT WE URGE inclusion of support for rigorous, comprehensive arts education in the arts development efforts of each community;

THAT WE PURSUE development of local state and national policies that result in more effective support for arts education and the professional teachers and artists who provide it.

Arts Education: Needs and Projects

As during the late 1960s and early 1970s, arts education has again come to the forefront of discussions in the education community as well as in the arts community. The discussions today however, suggest a more serious and broad-based effort to succeed than those ten years ago. At the national and state levels a great deal of activity exists to improve teaching of the arts in local schools.

A number of powerful resources are in place that can be used to convince local school boards of the importance of the arts to the total curriculum of a school. Among these:

- In 1983, the College Board released Academic Preparation for College: What Students Need To Know and Be Able To Do, the results of its ten-year Education EQuality Project. The report determined that "the basic Academic Subjects are English, the arts, mathematics, science, social studies, and foreign language." The College Board followed this up in 1985 with a book on the specifics of what should be taught in each of the arts disciplines, Academic Preparation in the Arts: Teaching for the Transition from High School to College.

- United States Secretary of Education William J. Bennett released a report on elementary school education, First Lessons, in September 1986. In a section of the report which addressed teaching the arts, Bennett wrote that, as a part of the explicit curriculum, "the arts are an essential element of education, just like reading, writing, and arithmetic."

- Ernest Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, in his 1963 study on secondary education, High School, strongly advocates the need for the arts in the secondary school curriculum. He also points out the appalling lack of arts education in America's secondary schools. In 1934, John Goodlad published A Place Called School, the results of his "Study of Schooling." Goodlad's work, like Boyer's, points to the centrality of the arts to a student's education and to the current lack of arts education in the school. Both Boyer and Goodlad have been major advocates and speakers on the subject and have accomplished much in getting the education community to re-think the position of the arts in schools.

- The National Endowment for the Arts, under the leadership of Chairman Francis Hodsoll, has made arts education a major initiative in its overall programming and policy development. Sixteen states have been selected to participate in the initial phase of the new NEA Arts in Education program. These states have received planning grants to stimulate the development of serious curriculum-based arts education in local school districts in the participating states. The AIE program also awards grants for special projects aimed at improving arts education. Finally, the NEA is preparing a study on the state of arts education in this country to be presented to Congress in December 1987.

In addition, the research and resources to help improve arts programs at the national level continue to expand. The following can be included in these:

- Teacher associations devoted to arts education continue to prepare and disseminate resources on teacher preparation and certification standards, suggested curricula, and current research and theory in their individual disciplines. These associations include: the National Art Education Association, Music Educators National Conference, the American Association of Theatre for Youth, and the National Dance Association.

- Many national arts service organizations, such as Young Audiences and Opera America, are examining ways to serve schools and fit into the overall arts curriculum better.

- Many of the national education associations are also involved in developing resources or developing programs in arts education. Among these are the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development, the Council for Basic Education, and the American Association of School Administrators.

- Private foundations have funded a number of projects to improve arts education. Most prominent of these is the Getty Center for the Advancement of Teaching, which has brought much attention nationally to improving the teaching of visual arts through their discipline-based approach.

- Research in arts education has also proliferated in recent years. Harvard University Project Zero's Howard Gardner, one of the leading researchers in the field, recently has published Frames of Mind, which has wide applicability to the teaching of the arts. Project Zero is also involved with a number of other organizations in a project in the Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania School System. Through this project, called Propel, some of Gardner's theories are being implemented along with ideas in the College Board study. Betty Edwards, in her book Drawing on the Right Side of the Brain, took a giant step forward in relating the arts to current edu-
Arts Education: Needs and Projects

All of this arts education momentum at the national level appears to be the wave of the future for arts education. Types of joint efforts, especially at the local level, appear to be the wave of the future for arts education.

The current activity in arts education at the state level is a result of the 1983 report from the U.S. Department of Education, A Nation at Risk. This report alarmed the American public by pointing out serious deficiencies in its education system and led to a sweeping reform movement in the state departments of education. This reform movement caused the states to change their views on arts education, and a majority of states moved to enact changes in teacher certification, graduation requirements, and new curriculum mandates in the arts. The arts education initiatives undertaken by the states were reported in a 1985 study by the Council of Chief State School Officers (CCSSO), Arts Education and the States: A Survey of State Educational Policies. Currently, CCSSO is working to update some of the 1985 data, demonstrating that even more states have become involved in the question of educational reform in the teaching of the arts.

Many state departments of education are working in cooperative ventures with their state arts agencies or other organizations to help local districts to improve their arts education programs.

Nationally, the Alliance for Arts Education, funded by the U.S. Department of Education, has been active in improving local arts education programs through some of its state chapters. The Minnesota Alliance for Arts Education, in collaboration with the Minnesota State Arts Board, the Minnesota Department of Education and the Minnesota legislature, has created an innovative project to develop arts curricula at the local level. This program, CAPP (Comprehensive Arts Planning Program) seeks to "encourage improvement in arts education through cooperative, long-range arts planning" by assisting school districts with the formulation of five-year plans for developing arts curricula. The Illinois Alliance also has been active in helping local communities to implement the Illinois State Board of Education mandate that each district have a visual and music curriculum in place within the next two years.

Partnerships in arts education are evident throughout the country. Many local communities have collaborative planning and programming with their school systems and local cultural institutions and artists. These types of joint efforts, especially at the local level, appear to be the wave of the future for arts education.

All of this arts education momentum at the national and state level should indicate that the conditions for educating children in the arts are improving. This improvement comes after a series of severe cutbacks in arts education during the late 1970s, the result of fiscal crises in school systems (especially in large urban centers and rural districts) and of the emphasis on "back to basics" education. Educators finally have realized that the "basics" include much more than just reading and math, and educational reform reports increasingly have defined the arts as basic to a child's education.

Still, the status of arts education in local schools remains grim. States such as California and Massachusetts, through referendum tax reform, have eliminated arts education in their elementary schools. Even today, fiscal crisis threatens the jobs of secondary arts specialists in California schools. New York City has mandated visual arts and music curriculum in the elementary schools, yet has not mandated specialists to teach these areas. Chicago reports that there are only 28 specialists combined in visual art, music and dance who serve all of the elementary schools in that city. Presenter organizations which provide artists' residencies and performing groups to schools report that they are able to serve only two to five percent of the schools in many states. In many areas these residencies (of two to six weeks) -- visits to museums or cultural events, or in-school presentations by professional artists -- are the only formal arts education that students receive.

Additionally, other problems currently inhibit full inclusion of the serious study of the arts in local school systems. Many local school systems allow first- and second-level foreign language courses and industrial arts courses to fulfill high school graduation requirements in arts and humanities. Some districts offer their arts courses after school or as non-credit courses in which the arts do not figure into the cumulative averages of college-bound students. Colleges themselves do not give equal weight to arts courses when examining the transcripts of entering students. Certification standards for general elementary school teachers, when those standards do exist, do not adequately prepare those teachers to provide most of a student's arts education (as is currently the situation in many districts across the country).

Advocates for arts education at the local level often times do not exist. The advocates who are there do not have adequate information to convince superintendents of education or school boards of the need for arts education for students that includes cultural literacy as a main goal. Even school systems which have established arts education as an important goal lack the resources needed to design truly effective arts curriculum; therefore, principals, arts specialists and classroom teachers still are a long way from making the arts central to a student's school program.
These are some of the many problems facing arts education today. There are several others, including many of the special problems that face dance and drama, the disciplines which have had the most difficult time finding a place to fit into the school curriculum on their own rather than as a part of the physical education or language arts programs.

This is not to say that the picture is totally bleak. There are many efforts today from both the national and state levels that are attempting to address solutions to some of the problems mentioned. Some of these efforts include:

- developing in-service education to re-train existing arts specialists and classroom teachers in current theory and practice in arts education;
- leading informed advocacy at the local level which can present coherent arguments for arts education to local school boards and superintendents;
- improving dissemination of resources from the national and state levels to local school districts to help them plan the improvement of arts education and the development of arts curricula;
- stimulating collaborative ventures among the wide group of individuals and organizations involved locally with arts education, based upon similar efforts at the national and state levels.

These are a few of the issues with which the American Council for the Arts and other national groups are concerned. This Guide to National and State Arts Education Services is a first step in attempting to disseminate information widely about what is happening in other areas of arts education. In preparing this guide, surveys were sent to all the state arts agencies, the state departments of education and the state alliances for arts education. Surveys for the national data were sent to education associations, arts service organizations and arts education associations. The universe for the national organizations was gathered from ACA's existing lists of national organizations with a demonstrated interest in arts education. In the end, 191 organizations and agencies responded and are included in the guide. Regional and local organizations were not included because of the breadth of this universe, but in the future the guide may be expanded to include them.

ACA will continue to build its information resources by gathering curriculum materials, policy documents, research reports, statistical analyses, program descriptions and other pertinent materials from national, regional, state and local organizations involved in arts education. This information will be stored in the ACA Arts Education Library (formerly the library of the Arts, Education and the Americans, Inc.) and will be put onto an in-house data base to assist in answering telephone requests and to facilitate greater and more efficient use of the library by those who visit ACA's New York office.

ACA's goals in arts education from which new projects are being designed are:

- to promote awareness of and advocacy for arts education;
- to stimulate research and policy at the national, state and local level that result in the improvement of curriculum-based arts education; and,
- to explore and implement methods of providing technical assistance and resource materials to local communities which are looking to improve education in the arts in their schools.

ACA will continue its efforts to promote arts education across the nation and to reach local school districts. Working with other national and state organizations, it will strive to bring about the connections and to provide adequate resources for those working in the arts education field in a variety of settings around the country. Only with the strong effort of all those involved in arts education will local school systems be able to provide solid education in the arts for all students.

An Overview of Arts Education Activities at the State Level

Although meaningful statistical analysis of the information in this guide would be difficult, a look at some of the data from the state departments of education and the state arts agencies presents an interesting overview of arts education activity at the state level.

STATE DEPARTMENTS OF EDUCATION

Fifty-two departments of education (50 states, American Samoa and the District of Columbia) responded to the survey. Table 1 indicates the percentage of state departments of education which offer various information services and publications and the percentage which serve various art forms.

STATE ARTS AGENCIES

Fifty-three state arts agencies (50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and Saipan) responded to the survey. Table 2 shows the percentage of state arts agencies which offer various information services and publications and the percentage which serve various art forms.

The survey also gathered information on total organizational budgets and the percentages of budgets devoted to arts education in an effort to provide some measure of an organization's commitment to arts education. While few of the 52 state departments of education were able to furnish this information, nearly all of the state arts agencies did so. An average of 14 percent of the total state arts agency budget is spent on arts education by the responding groups, with nearly one-fourth (11) spending 20 percent or more. Table 3 lists the percentage of total budget allocated to arts education for each state.

The information contained in this guide is intended to help individuals and institutions easily locate the many resources available at the national and state level which can assist them in their work. For example, district arts curriculum staff can locate national or state organizations that have curricula which can be modified for their own needs. Or classroom teachers can learn the names of organizations which provide resources to aid in the daily implementation of arts lesson plans. Artists can find the names of organizations that contract residencies with school systems.

Information about 191 different organizations is included in the guide. The entries are arranged into the following six sections:

- State Arts Agencies;
- State Departments of Education;
- State Arts Education Alliances;
- National Arts Education Associations;
- National Arts Service Organizations; and,
- National Education Associations.

Entries in each of the three state sections are arranged in alphabetical order by the state postal abbreviation. The seven regional arts agencies (Arts Midwest, New England Foundation for the Arts, etc.) can be found at the end of the state arts agency section. In the three national sections, entries are arranged alphabetically according to organizational name.

Each entry includes: the organization's name, address and telephone number; the principal arts education contact and other staff involved in arts education activities; a brief statement of arts education goals; the annual operating budget and the proportion devoted to arts education; the arts education services and publications provided; and the different art forms served.

Each entry reflects the responses submitted by the organizations in each category. If a category is not listed, the organization answered negatively or did not answer the question. In cases where organizations did not provide budget figures, the category will be listed as n/a (not available).

To afford convenient use, two indexes have been provided: an organizational index and an index of arts education contacts. The organizational index lists organizations alphabetically, followed by the name of the section in which that organization appears. The contact index lists principal arts education staff alphabetically, followed by the name of the organization with whom he or she is affiliated.

Arts education goals: In 1976, the California Arts Council established the Artists in Residence Program to employ artists, develop the cultural life in California communities and increase the use of the creative process as a problem-solving tool. The program accomplishes this by helping to fund projects which bring professional artists into schools, social institutions and community organizations. In this way, Californians become active participants in the arts under the guidance of these arts.

Arts education goals: The primary goal of the Arts Support for Education Program of the Commonwealth Council for Arts and Culture is to provide quality experiences with arts and artists in educational settings for both students and teachers. These experiences provide opportunities to learn from, to interact with and to observe both contemporary artists and traditional craftspeople. To encourage the arts as basics to lifelong learning while promoting ongoing professional growth of artists are priority areas of concern for the program.

Arts education goals: The Artists-in-Education Program of the Delaware State Arts Council provides matching funds to place professional poets and visual and performing artists in educational settings for residencies of one week to one year. These residencies may be augmented by individual supplemental artists. The Program reinforces the value of artists and the arts as basic to the educational process. The work of artists with students, teachers, administrators, and other members of the state and local communities is the cornerstone of the Artists-in-Education Program. The Artists-in-Education Coordinators provide technical assistance in organizing, coordinating, and implementing all residency programs. Pre-residency workshops and slide/tape presentations of typical visual, performing and literary residencies are available.

Arts education goals: The Arts in Education Program is a nationwide program funded by the National Endowment for the Arts and the State of Kansas. Through the program, professional artists are placed in elementary and secondary school systems, community organizations and institutions to enable students to be directly involved in the creative arts. Priority of this program is to begin a process whereby over time, all students graduating from high school might have a general understanding of, and elementary literacy in, the major art forms. The Arts in Education Program strengthens this effort by providing support for the development and implementation of plans to make the arts an integral and sequential part of basic education for America's school children.

Arts education goals: Arts in Education is one of several program areas funded by the Louisiana State Arts Council and the Louisiana Division of the Arts. This program provides support for projects and residencies taking place in the state's public and private elementary and secondary schools. It is designed to provide students and teachers with the opportunity to participate in an arts experience within the educational setting. It is the long range goal of this program to foster advocacy and development of the arts as basic to education. Therefore, the Division of the Arts also funds initiatives that enhance cooperative planning with the State Department of Education, the Louisiana Alliance for Arts Education, the appropriate offices of state government, the Board of Elementary and Secondary Education and various boards of state colleges and universities.

Arts education goals: Consistent with its mission, the Washington State Arts Commission's role in Arts in Education is complementary to and addresses all educational settings. Access to the arts and artists should be provided to schools and beyond schools—in hospitals, prisons, nursing homes, community settings and programs serving special populations—wherever citizens live, work and study. State Arts Commission programs are designed to enhance Arts in Education, so that all may fully enjoy the artistic riches within the state. The Washington State Arts Commission makes a unique contribution to Arts in Education by augmenting basic curriculum through the presentation of qualified professional artists and recognized works of art of the highest quality.

Arts education goals: The Indiana Department of Education views arts education, in both traditional and non-traditional artistic disciplines, as allowing students the opportunity to express themselves as a result of perceiving, identifying, describing and analyzing each of the arts. To achieve this goal diverse methods of inquiry, teaching and experience must be used along with adequate evaluation of program to determine effectiveness in preparing arts consumers, artists and arts audiences. Quality arts education also depends on continued evaluation and improvement in the preparation of arts teachers.

About the American Council for the Arts

The American Council for the Arts (ACA) is one of the nation’s primary sources of legislative news affecting all of the arts and serves as a leading advisor to arts administrators, educators, elected officials, arts patrons and the general public. To accomplish its goal of strong advocacy of the arts, ACA promotes public debate in various national, state and local forums; communicates as a publisher of books, journals, Vantage Point magazine and ACA UpDate; provides information services through its extensive arts education, policy and management library; and has as its key policy issues arts education, the needs of individual artists, private-sector initiatives, and international cultural relations.

84 About the American Council for the Arts
Are you attempting to incorporate dance into your classroom? Planning a new visual arts program for your school district? Setting new curriculum standards for art disciplines in your state? Whatever your task, you may have spent hours searching for precedents... and found none.

This landmark guide has done all of your research for you. From 191 sources — state arts agencies, alliances and departments of education to national education associations — there is finally a compilation of information that is as comprehensive as it is easy to use!

A Guide to National and State Arts Education Services combines arts education materials as diverse and hard to find as policy documents, model curricula, regional and local guides, research and statistical studies and data on collaborative ventures in one convenient handbook.

Services: consulting and information services, conferences, curriculum development
Contacts: key staff specializing in arts education
Subjects: creative writing, music, visual arts, theater
Publications: directories, curriculum standards, instructional materials, bibliographies, manuals
Goals and future plans
Budgets and percentages for arts education
