This document presents an annotated bibliography of organizations that battle world hunger, seek to educate the public about the problem, and/or provide advocacy services. Among the groups that are described are the United Nations and other intergovernmental organizations, U.S. federal government agencies, U.S. congressional agencies, U.S. non-governmental organizations (NGOs), Canadian organizations, and domestic U.S. NGOs. The volume includes acknowledgments, a preface on how to use the book, and an index of nongovernmental organizations. The section on U.S. NGOs presents information about citizens' legislative advocacy, information and education related to world hunger, religious education and action programs, voluntary development aid, and policy oriented research and advocacy. The domestic NGOs section addresses nutrition and poverty policy, economic opportunity and economic alternatives, agricultural and rural development, and local assistance and advocacy action. (LBG)
WHO'S INVOLVED WITH HUNGER

An Organization Guide for Education and Advocacy

Fifth Edition

WHO'S INVOLVED WITH HUNGER:

An Organization Guide for Education and Advocacy

is dedicated to the women, men, and youth in these and similar organizations who persist

with hope and courage

despite adversity and against the odds

to build a world
for all people

where human dignity is liberated, human community, fulfilled
and a wounded Creation, healed.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many people have helped World Hunger Education Service bring this new edition of Who's Involved With Hunger to light.

Students Melanie Kim from George Washington University and Sara Lowden from the University of Maine carried out a major share of the new research on nongovernmental organizations. International Voluntary Services under executive director Linda Worthington, a long-time WHES Associate who edited the third edition in 1982, sponsored Ms. Kim's work. Ms. Lowden was sponsored by the University of Maine School of Social Work under the direction of William H. Whitaker, also a World Hunger Education Service Associate. John Moore assisted with research for the United Nations section.

Dr. Whitaker's suggestions significantly strengthened the section dealing with U.S. hunger and poverty, both as to substance and arrangement. Valuable guidance came also from Mary Ellen Lloyd, director of the Domestic Hunger and Poverty Working Group of the National Council of Churches from 1978 to 1990 and author of Ecumenical Domestic Hunger Project Network and It's Time to Shout!—History of the Program on Domestic Hunger and Poverty 1975-1990.

In the federal agency section we are indebted to Neal Peterson at the Economic Research Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture and to WHES Associate Antonio Gayoso at the U.S. Agency for International Development for their help with the bureaucracies of those agencies, particularly regarding USAID because of its administrative restructuring in 1991.

Linda Coffin, owner of PageCrafters in Minneapolis and another WHES Associate, skilfully met our "due last month" layout deadline without losing her sense of humor.

Thanks are due also to the 420 organizations included here for patiently supplying the information requested. The editor takes sole responsibility throughout for the selection of information and the accuracy of reporting, hoping that the errors inevitable in so much detail prove not to be unduly dire or numerous. An organization's inclusion does not imply endorsement, nor does omission imply lack of significance. This must be emphasized. Rather, unfortunate omissions are acknowledged as a consequence of balancing broad representation of the many, approaches to issues of hunger and poverty with the practical limitations of space.

PREFACE: HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Who is involved with hunger? Actually, anyone doing anything that affects someone's livelihood and access to food. That's a very broad statement but true.

Public policy? Inevitably and always, it's either part of the problem or part of the solution. The status of human rights? Again, part of the solution or part of the problem. Food production, processing, distribution? Obviously relevant. Unemployment and underemployment versus full employment and decent income? Inherently hunger issues. Access to land and other productive assets? There can hardly be a more fundamental livelihood issue. Corporate accountability to local communities? Another fundamental livelihood issue. Sustainable use of natural resources versus exploitive abuse? Clearly germane to a sustainable world food supply as well as to sustainable livelihoods. Population growth? Critical in both the employment question and sustainable use of natural resources. The status of children? Hunger hurts—even kills—children most of all. The status of women? Profoundly influences, and is affected by, all of the above.

Now: How to use this book.

Are you looking for a grant? You won't find it through this book, although some of the organizations here might have some tips. Better still, get some pointers from the Foundation Center in New York City, San Francisco, or Washington, D.C.

Do you want to volunteer in Africa or Appalachia? This book alone won't tell you how, but a few organizations in it do use qualified volunteers and at least two--Global Exchange and Institute for Food and Development Policy--publish books about volunteer opportunities.

Are you a job seeker? Career counselors in colleges and universities find Who's Involved With Hunger useful in the field of international development, agricultural economics, social change, political advocacy and a raft of related possibilities, and they should know (even though that isn't its intended purpose).

Are you a teacher or college instructor? And are you looking for materials you can use to teach about developing countries, hunger, sustainable agriculture, economic alternatives, etc.? Good! This book is for you.

Are you (or would you like to be) an activist? And are you looking for training in food and poverty-related social change, community development, or political advocacy, or for technical assistance, or for colleagues with whom to brainstorm about strategies or form a coalition? Good! This book is definitely for you.

Are you a policy-oriented researcher? And is your topic related to food policy, poverty elimination, global interdependence, a developing region, etc., because you are a college student, a journalist, assisting a member of congress, or for any other reason whatsoever? Good! This book is for you, too.

Are you trying to find out "what's going on out there" among activist researchers, practitioners, and policy advocates? Because (a) your boss needs to know and expects you to find out or (b) you want to know for your own sake? Good! You're starting in the right place.

There are two ways to proceed:

One way is to scan the table of contents and then begin to browse in the section that seems most likely to serve your purpose. This method is for someone who is looking for a certain kind of action (research? public information? legislative advocacy? group organizing? direct assistance?) or a certain kind of information (research report? newsletter? video? for a general audience? for a third grade class?) and wants it from a certain kind of organization (U.N. agency? U.S. government agency? religious denomination? citizens' organization? national? local? in Canada?).

The other way to proceed is to check the index. This is the method for someone who already knows the name of an organization she/he wants to find and who doesn't want to spend much time browsing to find it.

Incidentally, this second method will work only if the organization in question is nongovernmental and only if it operates at the national or international level. Local U.S. organizations are not indexed; look for them by state in the last section of the book.

U.S. federal agencies and congressional committees are easy to find by alphabetical listing alone, but locating a particular U.N. or other inter-governmental agency takes imagination. These are divided into groups according to focus; start with the introduction to the U.N. section.

No matter how you plan to use this book, one final word of advice: Browse a lot. Scan all sections of the book, including ones you don't expect to be useful. Interesting and surprising connections are guaranteed.

IV. Voluntary Development Aid Organizations

Most private voluntary organizations doing development assistance—called PV0s by the U.S. Agency for International Development—engage in efforts to educate Americans about development and developing countries as part of their mission. (A bias of self-promotion in materials that combine education with fund raising must be taken into account.) In addition to producing educational resources of their own, the American Friends Service Committee, Church World Service, and the Mennonite Central Committee also maintain lending libraries of films and videos from many sources. The following organizations are only a sample of the several hundred U.S.-based PV0s providing technical or financial assistance to poor people's groups directly or to nongovernmental intermediary organizations serving the objective of equitable, sustainable, and self-reliant development. For a fuller overview, contact the American Council for Voluntary International Action (InterAction) below.
