How students, parents, and teachers reacted to the Channel One school news broadcast was studied in eight high schools and seven junior high schools in three school districts. Subjects included 581 teachers, 2,457 students, and 652 parents who were surveyed at the beginning of their experience with Channel One and at the end of the school year. The decision to adopt Channel One had been based on the promise of equipment and cabling rather than a specific curricular need or curricular content. Teachers felt little investment and did not seem concerned about making a serious effort to implement the broadcast in a meaningful way. In some schools, staff believed that school-produced programs and announcements made possible by the system were more valuable than the news program. In general, students at the junior high school level liked the broadcast more than did the high school students, and teachers liked it better than did students. Parents did not seem to know much about Chapter One. Parents and students were more likely to think that the advertisements on Channel One would have adverse effects than were teachers. As teachers and students gained experience, they were less inclined to believe that Chapter One teaches critical consumerism. Experience increased teacher approval of the program, but decreased student and parent approval. Four tables and two figures illustrate study findings. The surveys are also included. Title:
Channel One: Reactions of Students, Teachers and Parents

Author:
Nancy Nelson Knupfer
In the flurry of activity surrounding contractual agreements and installation of equipment to support the Channel One news broadcast, many people have neglected to ask critical questions concerning the implementation of this innovative educational program. The program is designed to be used as a complete, twelve-minute broadcast, but the literature on educational media contains ample evidence showing that teachers frequently use only specified parts of media products rather than entire sequences as they are packaged (Cambre, 1987). Past experience demonstrates that rushing to place technology in schools without adequate planning can lead to failure of an innovation (Cuban, 1986; Pullan and Pomfret, 1977; Goodlad, 1975; Knupfer, 1988; Rogers, 1983). Like any other educational tool, the success of Channel One will not rest solely within the product itself but will depend upon how it is received by the key people who use it and the way in which it is implemented.

It follows then, that some key questions need to be addressed such as: Does Channel One offer a product that is worthwhile? Is it answering a need in the curriculum? How do the teachers implement the 12-minute news show? What are teachers doing to reinforce the news teaching and to teach critical viewing of advertisements? In order to determine the answers to these questions, it is important to investigate how Channel One is being utilized within schools and what the parents, teachers, and students think of it.

The purpose of this study was to examine how students, teachers, and parents reacted to the Channel One news broadcast initially and after experience with the program. Students, teachers, and parents in three school districts were surveyed to gather information about how the news broadcast was initiated in their school, how it was implemented, what they thought about Channel One, and their habits concerning news consumerism.

These groups were surveyed twice; once at the beginning of their experience with Channel One and once at the end of the school year to see if their opinions of the broadcast or their news-related activities changed after experience with the broadcast. Spot checks were done in the form of interviews and classroom observations to see how the broadcast was being implemented and if it had any effect on students' interest in the news.

RESEARCH QUESTIONS

1. Were decisions to adopt Channel One based on curriculum support?
2. Were decisions to adopt Channel One based on opportunism?
3. Who made the decision to adopt Channel One?
4. What factors most influenced the decision to adopt Channel One?
5. How has the broadcast time been accommodated within the schedule of the school day?
6. How are teachers implementing the content of Channel One?
7. What are the opinions of teachers, students, and parents upon initial introduction to Channel One and after experience with the program?
8. Do senior high school students react any differently to Channel One than do junior high students?

METHODOLOGY

Subjects

A sample of high schools and junior high schools was selected based upon which schools in three districts received the Channel One broadcast. All schools that received the broadcast within the three chosen districts were surveyed; this included eight high schools and seven junior high schools.

Cooperation of the administration was secured to provide for smooth distribution and collection of survey instruments. It was hoped that this strategy would provide the best return rate.

Subjects included 581 teachers, 2457 students, and 652 parents from junior high and high school within three different school districts. The subjects were selected randomly within each school.

Materials and Method

Three sets of written survey instruments were developed for use with the teachers, students, and parents respectively. Each instrument contained questions that were measured on a five-point Likert-type scale as well as open-ended questions intended to draw out more information.

Each group was surveyed twice, once after two weeks of experience with the Channel One broadcast and again two weeks prior to the end of the school year. Each set of survey instruments for the parents and students remained identical between the pre and post experience. The post survey instrument used for the teachers was slightly different from that used in the pre survey.

Surveys were distributed to school principals who, in turn, requested the cooperation of the teachers in gathering the data. Students surveys were distributed to entire classes of students and collected immediately upon completion. Students who were surveyed were asked to take a survey instrument home to their parents. Return rates were one hundred percent for students, about 95% for teachers, and about 25% for parents.

Analysis

Data analysis was conducted with summary and nonparametric statistics. These allowed accurate comparisons to be made and visually diagrammed for presentation. Information collected by interview was analyzed qualitatively.

RESULTS & CONCLUSIONS

The decision to adopt Channel One was based on opportunism rather than on curricular content or a specific curricular need. Schools were interested in receiving something at a low cost, and personnel were especially excited about the possibility of receiving equipment and cabling. In some cases teachers were disappointed because the equipment configuration prevented them from doing the type of activity that they had envisioned.

In each district, the superintendent or the superintendent along with the school board made the decision to allow Channel One within the district. Each superintendent then allowed the final decision to be made by the individual school principals. Some of the principals consulted with the teachers and others did not.

The teachers had little investment and did not seem concerned about making a serious effort to implement the broadcast in a meaningful way. Those teachers who were involved in the decision to adopt Channel One seemed to be making a better effort to make it successful than those who were not consulted prior to implementation. In some schools the staff believed that the real value of Channel One was not in learning about the news, but instead was related to the outgrowth of activities attributed to the Channel One broadcast. For example, some schools used the system for school announcements, one school started its own within-school news program, and another one extended that idea outside of the school to support community events.

The twelve minutes of time was handled in various ways but all schools tried to implement the program in a way that did not subtract time from existing subjects. One district added twelve minutes to the school day for each school using Channel One. The other two districts provided the twelve minutes by a combination of shortening passing time between classes, shortening lunch period, or using homeroom time for the Channel One broadcast.

In general, students at the junior high level liked the broadcast more than did the high school students. Teachers had a more favorable assessment of the broadcast than did the students. Parents did not seem to know much about the broadcast. More parents responded to the second round of the survey which suggests that more parents became more aware of Channel One or possibility more attentive to Channel One issues during the school year.

In most cases, Channel One was implemented as a stand-alone topic rather than in accordance with curricular goals. There appeared to be little class time devoted to preparing the students for the broadcast or for discussions following the broadcast. Students' attention to and involvement with reading newspapers did not seem to increase over the course of the school year, but students appear to watch television news more frequently.

The attached graphics represent the percentage of respondents that agreed or strongly agreed with each listed topic. It is evident from the graphics that initially about 70% of teachers and 50% of students agreed that Channel One was easier to understand than other television news broadcasts, and each of those percentages increased by approximately 5% after experience with the broadcast. After experiencing the broadcast, a higher percentage of students and parents believed that advertisements can have too much influence on students; teachers were the opposite.

In general, as teachers and students gained experience with Channel One they were less inclined to believe that it teaches critical consumerism. When asked if the product is a very good quality teaching tool, teachers were the more enthusiastic than parents and students, and more of teachers agreed with this statement after experience with the product; students and parents were the opposite. In response to a query about whether their school should continue Channel One, teachers and high school students seemed to lose some interest while junior high students gained enthusiasm for the broadcast during the school year; a clear majority of all groups agreed that their school should continue.
In the interest of saving space in this publication, I will not discuss each of the graphics, but I shall attach selected graphics along with samples of the written survey instruments for the reader to study.

Write a brief explanation for each following question.

1. What problems could arise out of showing advertisements in schools?

2. Do you think it is okay to show advertisements in school? Why or why not?

3. Check all who were involved in making the decision to implement Channel One?
   - Superintendent
   - School Board
   - Principal
   - Teachers
   - Parents
   - Students

4. What factors influenced that decision?

5. Why do you think Channel One has caused such a controversy? Please explain.

6. In your opinion, what is the key issue that educators should be concerned about?

7. Are you attempting to fit the program into the curriculum or is it being used as a stand-alone topic? (check 1)
   - Fit into curriculum. HOW?
   - Stand-alone topic

8. What usually happens in your classroom after the Channel One broadcast is over?

9. How has your school accommodated the extra 12 minutes to view Channel One news? If there has been any change in daily schedule, how do you feel about it?
