The development and validation of a test of English-as-a-Second-Language (ESL) proficiency are described. The measure is a multiple-choice test based on translation of a literary text from English to Arabic and vice versa. Intended for rapid student placement, it is seen as overcoming most of the defects inherent in traditional translation tests. The development process is summarized, including text selection, preparation of items, pilot testing with 240 university ESL students, to generate distractors appropriate to ESL students, and item analysis based on an administration of the test's final form to 92 freshmen ESL students in Egypt. Analyses of test reliability and validity, and item analysis indicate that both English-to-Arabic and Arabic-to-English sections of the test provide good assessment of ESL learners' translation ability. The piloted test, final version, answer sheet and key for the latter, and a revised form are appended. These items are in both Arabic and English. (MSE)

ABSTRACT

This research project presents the various procedures of developing and validating a multiple-choice translation test to be utilized for assessing ESL learners proficiency level in translating literary texts from English into good Arabic and vice versa, and it could be used for quick placement. This kind of test overcomes most of the defects inherent in traditional translation tests used nowadays in schools and colleges. The development of the multiple-choice translation test had undergone different steps which can be summarized as follows: (1) Text selection; (2) preparation of test material; (3) pilot test administration to generate the necessary distractors from ESL candidates; (4) scoring pilot test which was administered to 240 ESL college freshmen at two Faculties of Education: Kafr El-Sheikh and Tanta on March 10, 1993. The purpose behind piloting the test was to generate the necessary distractors with the aim of employing them in the experimental forms of the multiple-choice translation test (Part I, Translation from English into good Arabic; and part II, Translation from Arabic into good English). The experimental forms of the test (Part I & II) were administered to 92 ESL College Freshmen on June 6 of 1993 at Kafr El-Sheikh Faculty of Education. The purpose behind the experimental testing was to collect item analysis data; calculate test validity; estimate test reliability; determine translation levels and determine test optimum time limit. The test validity was calculated through using content, validation, intrinsic validity and item validation using Point Biserial Correlation. The test validity for part I is 0.81 and it is 0.82 for part II. The test reliability was achieved through employing Guttman’s equation. The reliability of Part I of the test is 0.66 whereas the test reliability of Part II is 0.67 The reliability of test items was achieved through using Point Biserial Correlation.

In conclusion, the test validity, test reliability and test item analysis data show that the test (Part I & II) as a whole provides good assessment of ESL learners, translation ability (15 Tables are included)
INTRODUCTION

Schools and colleges are among the largest test users in the world (Strenio, 1981). The classification of candidates with reference to their skill to benefit from different sorts of instruction, the selection of candidates for placement into specialized sections, are among the many uses of language tests.

Nevertheless, some schools and colleges seem to have overlooked, for quite some time now, the significance of measuring candidates prior to admission into certain sections with valid and reliable language tests.

The problem of ignoring the significance of measuring the language proficiency of ESL candidates has become increasingly evident since the seventies. The same applies to measuring ESL learners translation level. Remarkable deterioration in the standard of ESL college freshmen in some English sections translate sentences or passages from English into good Arabic and vice versa is quite obvious.

It appears that to date no one-as far as this researcher is acquainted-has attempted to find a solution for this state of affairs. Most chairpersons in some faculties have not been able to deal successfully with this critical problem because valid and reliable translation tests have yet to be specifically developed to measure ESL candidates’ ability in converting literary sentences or passages into good English and vice versa.

To this researcher’s knowledge, no one has ever attempted to develop a multiple-choice translation test to help assess ESL learners in this skill. Clearly, it is the responsibility of staff members to design language tests, especially valid and reliable translation tests for this population.

For many years, this researcher taught and supervised many groups of ESL learners in prep and secondary schools. These ESL candidates were not found to be proficient in translating sentences or passages into good Arabic or into good English. The problem is that these ESL learners were admitted to the English section solely on the basis of scores obtained on the final secondary school leaving examination, viz, the General Secondary Education Certificate Examination. These GSECE tests, particularly the translation tests are not, by any means valid, or reliable or even practical measuring instruments for assessing ESL candidates skill in translation.

In this respect, Anastasi (1982); Maculaitis (1982); Thorndike and Hagen (1977); Allen and Alan Davies (1977) and Gronlund (1971) concur that good tests, i.e., accurate and adequate measuring instruments, should possess three basic characteristics: validity, reliability and practicality.

From the previous discussion, it would seem that a proper and uniform evaluation of ESL learners' translation skill in some Faculties of Education is lacking. Two reasons for this problematical state of affairs are:

a. There is a non-availability of foreign/second language translation tests that have been designed to assess foreign/second language candidates' skill in translation with some degree of accuracy; and

b. the departmental tests of translation do not attempt to sample ESL learners' skill in actually translating English sentences or passages into good Arabic and vice versa. It appears that these tests never tap ESL learners’ English language background or cover a variety of everyday life activities or real-life situations.

It is evident that there are many factors involved in this critical problem, the present research work will only study the problem of lack of good translation measures for college freshman particularly, for candidates of the Department of English.

When discussing the question of specific types of assessment and evaluation instruments used to measure second language learners, Plakos (1971, p. 29) found that a clear need exists to design and norm instruments to those students who are not able to function competitively in the English language.

Baechers (1973) points out that "such a fast changing environment requires new instruments and new procedures of educational measurement, assessment and evaluation".

It is not difficult to imagine the inevitable consequences of this critical problem upon ESL learners themselves: improper placement, ineffective and uninformative diagnosis of strengths and weakness in the language skill areas, and in general in appropriate instruction.

The apparent consequences of this state of affairs is a general feeling of failure and frustration which takes the form of low achievement in translation and low educational standards. There is a clear need to develop a valid and reliable test to assess ESL learners translation skill.
Need for the study:

The need for such a research project was motivated by:

a. The inadequate testing as well as the little attention given to measuring the translation skill of the growing numbers of candidates who would like to join the English Department in the Faculties of Education.

Translation has its own functions, techniques as well as its own evaluation system. Thus, one sees that although the problem of assessing the translation skill of ESL learners is urgent and indeed fundamental, most lecturers and professors of English do not recognize it as such. There is a clear need for assessing these candidates skill in translation so as to avoid disappointing results in the future.

b. The absence of valid and reliable measuring instruments to assess ESL candidates’ translation skill, is apparent at almost every academic level. In this concern, Allen and Alan Davies (1977, p. 6) maintain that "Language tests are often spoken of as through there were an abundant supply available. The number of published tests, however, is limited".

To add, the review of literature indicated that there is a clear need for constructing more valid, reliable and practical English language tests with particular emphasis on good translation tests.

Maculaitis (1978, p.4) confirms that much has been written about standardized tests designed for native speakers, and a review of such literature reveals a dearth of language measuring instruments developed to measure both the language skills and proficiencies of non-native speakers.

c. Faculties of Education as teacher certifying institutions are in a position to require a specific level of English language skills on the part of their candidates, the proposed translation test, Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test for ESL College Freshmen may serve as a means to having the highest standard in English accepted to the English Department in some Faculties of education.

Purpose of study:

This study is intended as a quasi-experimental research work and its purpose is to develop a translation test to measure ESL learners' proficiency levels in translation by employing a currently used technique of foreign/second language testing, that is, the semi-integrative procedure using four choice-multiple-choice items. Marshall and Hales (1972) maintain that the multiple-choice format is the most flexible and versatile of all proficiency type exams.

In brief, two main aims are set forth in developing this research work. The first aim is to develop a multiple-choice translation test for ESL college Freshmen whereas the second aim is to examine the statistical characteristics of the measuring instrument under construction.

Allen and Alan Davis (1977) consider the construction of a test as an experiment in which relevant experimental methods are used, and the statistical techniques applied. Testing, retesting and analyzing of the test results become the carrying out of the experiment and the final validation of the test, becomes, as it were, the test of the test experiment.
Research questions:

Since the main objective of this research work is to develop a multiple choice translation measuring instrument, the main research questions will deal with determining the statistical characteristics of this instrument. Specifically speaking, the following research questions are raised:

1. Is the test (Part I as well as Part II) a valid measure of ESL learners' translation skill?

2. Is the test (Part I as well as Part II) a reliable measure of ESL learners' translation skill?

3. Is the test (Part I and Part II) as a whole a valid and reliable measure of translation skill?

Text selection:

The first step in constructing such a test is to select the sentence(s) and the passage(s) to be used.

The general technique to assess ESL learners' translation skill consists of presenting literary sentences or passages to be converted into good Arabic or vice-versa. The task of locating appropriate literary sentences or passages that were interesting and represent some real life situations was quite time consuming. Sentences and passages were selected from "Everybody's Conversational English" by Mahmoud Ezzat (1967).²

The sentences or passages, for the most part, were informative and covered a wide range of daily life situations and activities such as modes of address, going abroad, in town, shopping, some every day life activities, health, sports, amusement, people and society and news and politics.

Length of test sentence(s) and passage(s):

One significant consideration in a research work such as the present one is the amount of student time required for testing. The sentence(s) or passage(s) used in part I as well as those utilized in part II were appropriate in length. Therefore, they could not be so long as to be prohibitive for assessment purposes.

Difficulty level:

The translation test was designed for ESL college freshmen, candidates of the Department of English, therefore, the sentence(s) as well as the passage(s) had to be included which were easy enough for the poorest interpreters and difficult enough for the best interpreters. To insure that the sentence(s) and the passage(s) used were these of appropriate difficulty level in terms of vocabulary and structural level, they were submitted to a committee of language experts3 to determine the appropriateness of the difficulty level of the chosen sentence(s) and passage(s) for college freshmen. The sentences and the passages were found appropriate for the grade level. However, some of them were revised and adapted according to the committee’s recommendation. In this case subjective judgement was used until data from the field testing could provide difficulty indices which would indicate the appropriateness of the test items for ESL learners at this level.

The experts read the sentences as well as the passages, commented on poor passages, and made suggestions for the adaptation of some passages.

Both test sentences and test passages were then revised and some were eliminated in the light of the suggestions offered by the team of experts. Fifteen sentences/passages of the original fifty-five passages selected for translation from English into good Arabic were eliminated and ten sentences/passages of the original 55 chosen for translation from Arabic into good English) were omitted for some of them were found to be easy and others were too difficult. Finally, the passages were assembled into Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test for College Freshmen, Part I and Part II. (See Table 1 & 2).

Test Directions:

Since most ESL learners taking any test are working under certain mental pressure, it is significant that all directions and specific instructions are clearly written and that examples are provided. Recommendations given by Heaton (1975, p. 160) and Marshall and Hales, (1972, p. 15) were taken into account when writing test directions and instructions. This researcher used brief, clear directions, simple to understand and free from possible ambiguities.
Time Limit of Test:

Suggestions provided by Heaton (1975) concerning time limit of the test were taken into consideration. However, the examinees were encouraged to work on the test and were told that the aim behind the test was not for grading them but rather for testing the test. The subjects were given ample time to finish the test since our purpose is to get the distractors from the subject themselves with the aim of using these distractors in the development of the field test, namely the multiple choice translation test under consideration.

In addition, the time required for 90 percent of the examinees to finish the test will be used as the basis for determining optimum time limit for the final test.

Preparation of Test Material:

After the sentences as well as the passages had been assigned to either part I or II of the translation test, complete directions and one sample item were presented at the beginning of each part of the test. Blank spaces of about three lines for ESL candidates to write on were provided to assist the subject in writing their responses to the test items.

Since no information pertinent to the difficulty of the test items was yet available, there was no way to arrange test items in order of difficulty. These data would be available after the try-out test administration and could be utilized for arranging items in the final form.
Sample:

On March 10 of 1993, the two parts of the test (Part I, Translation from English into good Arabic; and Part II, Translation from Arabic into good English) were administered to 240 ESL college freshmen males and females at two Faculties of Education: Kafr El-Sheikh and Tanta who were available on the day of test administration. The two parts were randomly assigned to the subjects. So approximately 120 subjects took each part. The subjects are currently enrolled and studying English as a second language in their colleges at Tanta and at Kafr El-Sheikh, in addition, the students in the sample group have studied English as a foreign language in Egyptian government schools for six years and their ages range from 17-19 years old.

Pilot Test Administration:

The purpose behind piloting the test is to find out information about any problems related to the sentences and the passages utilized in the test and to generate the distractors from the candidates themselves with the aim of employing these distractors in the development of the field test under study namely Tanta University Translation Test for ESL College Freshmen. Before the try-out test was administered to 240 ESL candidates, males and females in two Faculties of Education, Kafr El-Sheikh and Tanta on March 10, 1993, the author introduced the idea of a "new kind of test," that is, a multiple-choice translation test. The participants were encouraged to work on the test, were given ample time to finish the test, and were told that the purpose behind the test was not for grading them but rather for testing the test itself. It would seem necessary, however, to mention that this test was not a speed test but rather it was a power test that should have no time limit.
Scoring:

The try-out test (see Appendix A) was scored by this author. This preliminary test (Part I and Part II) in fact, was administered to get the previously stated information about the test itself. Since the urgent purpose was to obtain the distractors necessary for the field test, the author did not assign any grades or points to the subjects' performance or responses.

The author decided to utilize the most commonly committed mistakes by subjects in the development of test items. It was accepted that distractors should be selected by the subjects. If a distractor is not selected by any one, it makes no contribution to the functioning of the item and should be eliminated or revised (Gronlund, 1971, pp. 188-189).

In other words, distractors must be familiar to the subjects before they can serve as reasonable choices. That is why this author preferred to generate these distractors from the subjects themselves and not to rely on some artificially made up distractors. The quickest method was to administer the blank forms of the test and to tabulate the errors which occur most frequently. This provides a series of incorrect responses which are especially plausible for they are in the language of the subjects.

Final Format of Test:

From the frequent errors or incorrect responses made by the subjects, the distractors were selected. Three distractors from the most frequent to the less frequent incorrect responses were chosen, and the fourth alternative was the correct response.
In this concern, it would seem significant to mention that 10 items of the original 40 items selected for Part I of the test (Translation from English into good Arabic) were eliminated and 15 items of the original 45 chosen for part II of the test (Translation from Arabic into good English) were also omitted because some of them were too simple and others were too difficult, viz, the whole sample either got the item correct or got it incorrect.

Finally, the items were assembled into the two parts (I & II) of Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test (See Table 3, 4 and 5).

Experimental Test Administration:

Tanta University Translation Test was administered to 92 college freshmen at Kafr El-Sheikh Faculty of Education on June 6 of 1993. The purpose of this test administration was to: (1) collect item analysis data as that unsatisfactory items could be identified and discarded or revised for use on the final test; (2) calculate the test validity; (3) estimate the test reliability; (4) determine levels of proficiency; and (5) determine the optimum time for the test.

Scoring of the Test:

Since there are no computer facilities for the handling of the test data, candidates responses to the test items were recorded on separate answer sheets (See Appendix B) which was then scored by this author using a punched answer key.
I. Item Analysis:

a. Item Difficulty:

To determine the appropriateness of the test items for ESL candidates difficulty indices were calculated for each item using the following formula: \( D = \frac{R}{N} \) (Marshall and Hales, 1972, p. 78). Accordingly, the difficulty index for each item is shown in Tables 6 and 7. As a whole, the test items (Part I & II) were found to be of appropriate difficulty as shown in Tables 6 and 7. It seems necessary to point out that Ebel (1965, pp. 55-58) and Lindquist (1951, pp. 20-24). Indicated that items of appropriate difficulty are those with difficulty indices ranging from .30 to .70. See Tables 6 and 7. It is recommended, however, that the starred items in Tables 6 and 7 be polished and revised because of their difficulty.

b. Item Discrimination:

Consideration was also given to the items, discriminating power. Generally, the better items display positive high discriminating power, that is, students with high total scores answer the items correctly. Index of discrimination was calculated by using the following equation:

D = \frac{(R_u - R_l)}{N_u}

(Marshall and Hales, 1972, p. 82)

On the basis of applying the above equation, results from the item analysis are shown in Tables 8 and 9.

* The item has to be revised.

From Tables 8 and 9, the test items are found to be of appropriate discriminating power. Marshall and Hales (1972, p. 83) maintains that items with discriminating indices between .20 and .40 are of some value in discrimination between examinees. Items with indices between .40 and .60 are good discriminations. Those with indices above .60 are unusually good. This researcher, however, is not completely satisfied with the discriminating power of the starred items in Tables 8 and 9. They have to be revised before the test is administered to any population because it is wasteful to throw away the work that has already been done on the items.

Test Validity:

The validity of the test (Part I and II) was estimated through the use of different procedures.

a. Content Validity:

To provide some evidence of the appropriateness of the test items for assessing ESL candidates translation ability, the test sentences and passages were submitted to a team of language experts for analysis. Further, directions for the test were very specific and a sample item was provided to insure that examinees understood the test directions.

The data obtained from the experimental testing provided additional evidence of the validity of the test. On the basis of experimental testing, difficulty indices were calculated for each test item. The items were shown to be of appropriate difficulty for the student population (See Tables 6 & 7).

b. Intrinsic validity:

A second procedure was utilized to ensure the test validity. This is referred to as the intrinsic validity (El-Sayed, F., 1979, p. 553). The reliability coefficient of the test, part I was .66, hence the intrinsic validity is .81 whereas the reliability coefficient of the test, part II was .67. Hence, the intrinsic validity is .82.

In addition, a third procedure was employed to ensure the validity of the test. It was using Point Biserial Correlation (El-Sayed, F., 1979, p. 640) as indicated in Tables 10 and 11.

It would seem necessary to point out that insignificant test items in Tables 10 and 11 need some sort of polishing and revision. However, the results indicate that the test is a valid measure of ESL candidates translation ability.

Test Reliability:

Since it was not feasible in this research project to administer the same parts of the experimental tests twice, the reliability coefficient reported is based on one administration of one form of the test. Therefore, the reliability was determined through the use of Guttman's equation (El-Sayed, F. 1979, p. 530).
Applying the above mentioned formula, the researcher found that the reliability of part I of the test equals 0.66 which is a respectable and reasonable value for such kind of test. The reliability of part II of the test is 0.67 which is also a reasonable value for this new type of test. To add, the reliability of the two parts of the test indicates that the test provides good assessment of the translation skill.

Additionally, the test items’ reliability for parts I and II were also calculated using Modal Probability (El-Sayed, F. 1979, p. 650) as shown in Tables 12 and 13.

Determining Proficiency levels:

As was made clear earlier, one objective of this study was to employ the experimental test administration and test results to serve as a basis for determining the different levels of proficiency in translation, that is, beginner, intermediate, and advanced, achieved on the test.

To identify these levels, the following procedures were followed:

a.  $Z = \frac{(\text{Raw Score} - \text{Mean})}{\text{SD}}$

b.  $T = 10Z + 50$

(El-Sayed, F. 1979, pp. 198-202 and 198-202)
The results of these statistical analyses are shown in Table 14 for Part I of test and Table 15 for Part II.

In accordance with the data shown in Tables 14 and 15, the raw scores were divided into three different levels representing three levels of proficiency on Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test under study.
To clarify, it was decided that an ESL learner who earns raw scores ranging from 3 to 8 in Part I and 3 to 11 in Part II will be placed in a beginner level of proficiency, raw scores ranging from 9 to 11 in Part I and 12 to 15 in Part II represent an intermediate level whereas raw scores ranging from 12 to 14 in Part I and 16 to 23 in Part II indicate an advanced level. Stars are placed on Tables 14 and 15 to illustrate these three levels.

In closing, since this test was basically developed for ESL college freshmen, candidates of the English Departments, an advanced level of proficiency seems to be a must for admission to these specialized sections. An advanced level might guarantee that a candidate would perform well in all English-medium classrooms.

Optimum Time Limit:

Tanta University Multiple-choice Translation Test for ESL College Freshmen (Part I and Part II) was administered in two fifty-minutes sessions. However, optimum time limit for use on the final forms of Part I and Part II of the test was based on calculations of the time it took 90 percent (Harris, 1969 and Heaton, 1975) of the examinees to complete each part during the testing sessions. Ninety percent of the examinees completed the entire test parts I and II in about 80 minutes. This author set 90 minutes for the 60 items of Tanta University Multiple-choice Translation Test, including 10 minutes for working on the sample exercise provided and answering any questions asked by the examinees.

A Final Word:

Tanta University Multiple-choice Translation Test seems to have good potential as a translation measure. A caution to keep in mind is that constructing a MC Translation Test is a considerably more complicated procedure than constructing an open-ended translation test. A multiple-choice translation test requires pretesting with an open-ended task to generate distractors. It is necessary to pretest the multiple-choice version to check item difficulty and discrimination. However, once a valid and reliable multiple-choice translation test is obtained, the time involved in administering and scoring the test should be less. A multiple-choice translation test can be easily hand scored or computer scored. However, since the difficulty indices and validity of some items in part I and others in part II are questioned, this researcher decided to eliminate them. These items were: 6, 10, 16, 17 and 26 in part I and items 6, 8, 15, 28 and 29 in part II. A revised form of both parts of test is available in Appendix (C) in this volume. Hence, the total items of both parts will be 50 instead of 60. In addition, the time allotted for these two parts is 80 minutes instead of 90.

Tanta University Translation Test
For ESL College Freshmen

Part I

General Directions:
1- Turn this page when the examiner tells you to do so. This test consists of 40 items and requires no definite working time.
2- Read the directions which are printed at the beginning of the test carefully, and proceed at once to translate the sentences as well as the passages into good Arabic.
3- Translate the sentences/passages very accurately in the blanks provided in your test booklet.
4- No questions may be asked after the examination has begun.
5- Do not talk to any one during the test.
6- If you make a mistake or wish to change an answer be sure to cross out your first translation and then give you new correct answer.

Do not turn this page until you are kindly told to do so.

When you are told to turn the page, read the directions and then go on to the questions.
TRANSLATION TEST
Part I

Directions:
This is a test to show how well you can translate prose sentences(s) or passage(s) from English into good Arabic. You should read the sentence(s) or passages(s) very carefully and then try to translate them into good Arabic as shown in the example given below.

Example:
1. Yesterday evening, I went to Cairo to watch "Hamlet".

Correct answer:

Yesterday مساء أس اثلى القاهرة مشاهدة مسرحية هاملت.

Translate all the sentences of this test in this manner.
Give only one translation for each question.
1. Thanks very much for showing me around. I'm really much obliged.

2. I'm so sorry, sir. Please don't hate me. I was a bit nervous.

3. May I give you a hand? Yes, please, I'd be grateful.

4. Have you ever been abroad? No, but I will be going to the States on a government mission.

5. Have you finished with passport formalities? Yes, I have.

6. What is your mother tongue? Arabic.

   Are you a foreigner? I am Egyptian.

7. The Capital is entirely covered by an extensive network of public means of transportation.

8. Indicate your name, nationality, permanent address, place, and date of birth, and sign.

9. I would like to go downtown. Which bus should I take?

10. Does this train go to Tanta? No, but you can transfer at Desouk. There, you catch train No. 33 which goes right there.

Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test
for ESL College Freshmen

General Directions:

1- This test consists of 60 items and requires approximately 90 minutes of working time. This test has two basic parts (I & II), the first part assesses your ability in translating sentence(s) from English into Arabic whereas part two is concerned with assessing your ability in translating sentence(s) from Arabic into English.

2- Read the directions which are printed at the beginning of each part very carefully, and proceed at one to translate the sentences into good Arabic or good English. Do not spend too much time on any one item. There is a time limit for each item.

3- No questions may be asked after the examination has begun.

4- Do not talk to any one during the test.

5- You must mark all your answers on the separate answer sheet you have been given by putting a circle around the same letter (a, b, c, d) as the answer you have chosen.

6- Mark only one answer for each question.

7- If you make a mistake for wish to change an answer be sure to cross out your first circle and then put another circle around the letter you prefer to give as your correct translation.

Do not turn this page until are kindly told to do so.

When you are told to turn the page, read the directions and then go on to the questions.
Translation Test
Part I
(45 Minutes)

Directions:
This is part I of the translation test. It shows how well you can translate some prose sentences from English into good Arabic. This test consists of 30 items and requires approximately 45 minutes of working time. You should read the sentences very carefully and then try to choose the best translation for each sentence(s). Be sure to circle your answers nicely and carefully on your answer sheet. The sample exercise below shows you how to make your answers on the answer sheet.

Sample Exercise:
1. May I give you a hand? Yes, please, I'd be grateful.

   أـ. هل من الممكن أن أساعدك؟ نعم من فضلك، سوف أكون شاكراً لك.
   بـ. أريد أن أعطيك مساعدة؟ نعم أرجو، وسوف أكون ممتنًا لك.
   جـ. هل بإمكانك إعطائي أي مساعدة؟ نعم من فضلك، أكون شاكرا لك.
   دـ. أتمنى أن أتمكن أي مساعدة؟ نعم أرجو، أكون ممتنًا لك.

   الإجابة: أـ، بـ، جـ، (دـ)

ولكن توضح أن (دـ) هي الترجمة الصحيحة فقد تم وضع بائرة حول حرف الـ (دـ) كما هو موضح في المثال الأول. أجب عن كل أسئلة هذا الاختبار بالطريقة نفسها.

Appendix C

- Revised Forms of Part I and II of Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test for ESL College Freshmen
Tanta University Multiple-Choice Translation Test
for ESL College Freshmen

General Directions:

1- This test consists of 50 items and requires approximately 80 minutes of working time. This test has two basic parts (I & II), the first part assesses your ability in translating sentence(s) from English into Arabic whereas part two is concerned with assessing your ability in translating sentence(s) from Arabic into English.

2- Read the directions which are printed at the beginning of each part very carefully, and proceed at one to translate the sentences into good Arabic or good English. Do not spend too much time on any one item. There is a time limit for each item.

3- No questions may be asked after the examination has begun.

4- Do not talk to any one during the test.

5- You must mark all your answers on the separate answer sheet you have been given by putting a circle around the same letter (a, b, c, d) as the answer you have chosen.

6- Mark only one answer for each question.

7- If you make a mistake for wish to change an answer be sure to cross out your first circle and then put another circle around the letter you prefer to give as your correct translation.

Do not turn this page until are kindly told to do so.

When you are told to turn the page, read the directions and then go on to the questions.
Translation Test
Part I
(40 Minutes)

Directions:
This is part I of the translation test. It shows how well you can translate some prose sentences from English into good Arabic. This test consists of 25 items and requires approximately 40 minutes of working time. You should read the sentences very carefully and then try to choose the best translation for each sentence(s). Be sure to circle your answers nicely and carefully on your answer sheet. The sample exercise below shows you how to make your answers on the answer sheet.

Sample Exercise:
1. May I give you a hand? Yes, please, I'd be grateful.

هل من الممكن أن أسفاجك؟ نعم من فضلك، سوف أكون شاكرا لك.
أـ.
أريد أن أعطيك مساعدة؟ نعم أرجو، وسوف أكون ممتنًا لك.
بـ.
هل بإمكانك إعطائي أي مساعدة؟ نعم من فضلك، أكون شاركا لك.
جـ.
أتسمح لي بأن أمد لك يد المساعدة؟ نعم أرجو، أكون ممتنًا لك.
دـ.

الإجابة: (أـ) ، (بـ) ، (جـ) ، (دـ)

 Walton توضح أن (دـ) هي الترجمة الصحيحة فقد تم وضع دائرة حول حرف الـ (دـ) كما هو موضح في المثال الأول، أجب عن كل أسئلة هذا الاختبار بالطريقة نفسها.

لاقلب هذه الصفحة حتى يسمح لك.
