This guide describes a quality process for external and internal evaluation of the elementary school education department. The term "pathway" is used to define routes through the quality process that describe any school administrative activity in terms of the indicators and examples of good practice. There are five pathways: process investigation; movement and dance; nursery/primary liaison; management of resources; and financial management. The first part of the guide presents each pathway in graphic form, with the quality pointers describing the focus of the particular pathway. Each graphic is then followed by examples of good practice supporting each indicator, which are then translated into success criteria. The second part of the guide then presents a framework for evaluation of quality based on the seven strands of the education department's mission statement. These strands are: (1) providing a full range of courses and services; (2) enabling all individuals to achieve their potential; (3) supplying suitable premises and resources; (4) encouraging access to education throughout life; (5) fostering genuine partnership in education; (6) promoting equal opportunity and social justice; and (7) supporting economic growth and prosperity. Each strand is divided into relevant quality pointers. (WP)

The term "pathway" is used by the quality assurance unit to define routes through the "Quality Process" that describe any establishment activity in terms of the indicators and examples of good practice. They are intended as a support in the managing of establishments. Pathways can describe more than establishment systems. They can also:

- describe remits of staff;
- describe tasks of working groups;
- assist with policy review and staff development.

Thus through the indicators and example of good practice key elements of any establishment activity can be described in terms of the mission statement. The pathways can be used to specify the focus for audit, to support development work and can provide explicit agendas for discussion or provide a template for evaluating documentation. Once an activity is described in pathway terms it can be monitored and evaluated.

In responding to requests from colleagues in establishments, the quality assurance unit has produced a number of pathways that deal with major aspects in establishment life, i.e. their 'core' activities. The list is not exhaustive and the unit continues to work in this area. Establishments will be able to lift pathways 'off the shelf', that will assist them in systematically addressing most of the aspects currently on their agendas. The material is still developmental and the feedback from establishments will assist with review. Using the "pathway process", establishments will develop their own approaches reflecting their own unique needs.

Each pathway is presented, on the front page, in a graphic way that shows the quality pointers describing the focus of the particular pathway. Below this, are listed the indicators that are selected from the specific quality pointers. The pages that follow the front page describe the indicators in terms of examples of good practice to support each indicator. These examples of good practice are easily transferred into success criteria. Thus establishments have ready-made descriptions of their activities in very specific terms.

The continuing work on pathways and the development of a system to manage quality assurance will provide support for establishments and assist in the use of current good practices of monitoring the quality of service provided. It is hoped that advice will be forthcoming in the near future, based on the pathways process, that will help establishments establish their own system for managing quality assurance as a self-evaluation mechanism.

Selected Examples of Good Practice

- The establishment has a curricular policy document on the process of learning including how children learn, the types of activities they will participate in and the skills they require to develop further learning.

- Communication and investigation are the key learning processes within the establishment.

- Within the key learning processes of communication and investigation:
  - learning is enjoyable
  - learning experiences for children of varying development stages are provided
  - children are encouraged to make choices and act independently
  - children's prior learning and current interests are the basis for future learning
  - the individual learning needs of children are identified and provided for

- Within the key learning process of investigation children extend their learning through:
  - spoken language
  - observation
  - touch
  - using tools, equipment and materials
  - listening
  - smell
  - experimenting

Within the key learning process of investigation children extend their learning by:
  - exploring
  - planning and designing
  - expressing and creating
  - sharing and recording
  - solving problems
  - collecting and classifying information
  - evaluating

- Meaningful learning contexts are built on:
  - children's previous experiences
  - quality of the learning environment
  - quality of interaction and relationships with others
  - the current experience of the child

- Children's previous experiences in:
  - the family
  - the establishment
  - the community
  - the wider world

- Planned opportunities are provided for children to develop in learning by:
  - predicting effects, consequences and outcomes (cont. over)

Selected Examples of Good Practice

- analysing and solving problems
- reflecting on issues, ideas and experiences
- making comparisons
- talking about their activities to other children and adults

* The learning and teaching situations make children think, challenge assumptions, promote understanding and explore a variety of solutions to problems
* The learning and teaching strategies used in the establishment promote investigation and problem-solving through activity
* Staff promote the development of investigative and problem-solving skills:
  - observational skills, through opportunities to look carefully at objects, pictures and activities and discuss what he/she sees
  - ordering skills, by encouraging children to arrange objects in a logical order along same dimension such as weight, age or height, and by matching one set of ordered items to another
  - understand the concepts of mathematical language such as big, long and smaller

* Cause and effect by encouraging children to:
  - ask questions regarding their activities, experiences and investigations
  - explore and discuss the indoor and outdoor environment of the establishment
  - undertake activities which encourage them to compare, evaluate, draw conclusions and solve problems

* The children have experience in the use of appropriate language to further their acquisition of investigation and problem-solving skills
* Children are encouraged to solve problems both independently and in small groups

* All staff are familiar with the regional 0-5 curricular guidelines

* Promoted staff evaluate the effectiveness and implementation of school policies

* A variety of learning and teaching methods which take account of individual needs are used in the establishment
* The curriculum is balanced in terms of the variety of learning and teaching approaches adopted
* Children are involved in a range of practical learning activities:
  - predicting effects, consequences and outcomes
  - solving problems, classifying and ordering
  - reflecting on issues, ideas and experiences
  - making comparisons
  - drawing conclusions
  - initiating discussion

Movement and Dance
Selected Examples of Good Practice

1. Content experiences are presented:
   - using an integrated approach
   - in a meaningful context
2. The content of the curriculum is characterised by:
   - breadth and balance
   - continuity and progression
3. The development of self awareness permeates the curriculum and is interwoven into each content and context area
4. The expressive and creative arts content includes the key areas of:
   - movement and dance

1. The curriculum is planned and balanced to promote self awareness skills and concepts:
   - the knowledge of bodily functions, for example, sleeping, waking, eating, toileting and running
2. Staff provide opportunities for the development of self awareness and emotional skills through role play, relevant language activities and play activities

1. Through the planned curriculum the children acquire and develop social skills:
   - the ability to co-operate through play
   - the ability to join with others already involved in an activity

1. Children are encouraged to communicate their thoughts, feelings and desires through music, movement, drama and play
2. There are experiences for children to enable them to develop skills and confidence in expressing themselves through:
   - music and movement to encourage expression of emotions and gestures through rhythm
   - taking part in large ring games, action jingles and rhymes
   - listening to different kinds of music to experience rhythms associated to different cultures
   - encouraging children to make sounds and rhythms with a variety of instruments and with their voices

1. Children are enabled to develop movement skills:
   - locomotion skills, for example, walking, running, crawling, hopping and skipping
   - static balance skills, for example, balancing on one foot with arms outstretched, standing on tip toes, balancing on two feet with body, arms and head at different angles
   - dynamic balance skills, for example, walking while carrying objects in their hands or on their head, pulling, pushing, building and climbing

Selected Examples of Good Practice

* Pre-five staff are aware of policies and practices at the early stages of the primary school to ensure continuity and progression and vice versa
* The establishment considers feedback from the primary sector to see if there is a need to review practice
* There are mutually agreed liaison procedures with primary schools to enable continuous progression of children through curricular liaison and a planned programme of visits with appropriate staff
* Staff in pre-five establishments have an understanding of the curriculum of the primary sector
* Staff have a knowledge of the curriculum content and standards in primary schools
* A programme of regular contact between nursery and primary staff exists to inform curricular decision making
* Integrated nursery/P1 curricular schemes exist
* There are opportunities for social and curriculum interaction between children from the establishment and those from associated primary schools
* Staff from the establishment and associated primary schools visit each other to exchange information and views on curriculum content and methodology with appropriate staff

* The establishment agrees with the children's parents and its associated primary schools the information it will communicate about individual children:
  - social and family information
  - health
  - interests
  - results of objective assessment
* Significant information is passed to primary schools, for example, assessment records/child profiles and folders of exemplar work
* There is a transfer of relevant information with parental consent on children's progress to associated primary schools
* Sample folders of children's work are transferred to primary school

* There are mutually agreed liaison procedures with primary schools and parents to enable continuous progress of children through a planned programme of visits with appropriate staff and curricular liaison
* Pre-five staff accompany children and parents to the receiving primary school before the start of the new session
* Receiving P1 teachers visit pre-five establishments once a term to work in partnership with children and pre-five staff

* Close consultation exists between parents and staff in meeting the needs of the child

- The establishment supports and makes effective use of projects set up to help combat disadvantage.
Section 1
THE QUALITY PROCESS
Introduction
The education department is committed to providing education of the highest quality. The work of the quality assurance unit has confirmed that this is not an unrealistic target. Inspections have shown that Strathclyde is well justified in being proud of its education service. Highly competent staff providing an excellent service are to be found throughout the region. Quality assurance surveys confirm that by and large parents are also happy with the service. Of course, there is no room for complacency and much remains to be done, especially in providing educational support for those who, for one reason or another, find themselves in adverse circumstances.

Confidence in our work can only be justified if we have valid, standard criteria for monitoring and evaluation. Today we are quite rightly expected to be accountable and to be judged on evidence rather than on assertion. The quality process outlined in these documents provides that rigour within a professional context, but always with a positive emphasis on relationships, values and the personal satisfaction that should be associated with the pursuit of education.

Two points must be stressed. First, inspection based on a sound framework is a necessary form of external evaluation. However, self-evaluation against the same criteria can be equally rigorous and, because it is continuous, can contribute far more effectively to quality improvement. Second, education is a joint endeavour between staff in schools and other establishments and support staff in the education department. The quality process applies to all. Many of our problems require attention and support from departmental staff, who must also be accountable.

The direct link between the mission statement and the quality process has an important consequence. The quality pointers, indicators and examples can provide a secure and extremely useful framework for school audit, for preparing development plans and thereafter for monitoring implementation. This is the most positive aspect of quality assurance.

I hope that staff throughout the department will use this material to clarify aims, prepare development plans and assess the effectiveness of their work. The quality process has been prepared for the pre-five, primary and secondary sectors first. Material is in preparation for other sectors, including the department as a whole and indeed the quality assurance unit itself. I am sure that staff will find that the quality process provides a powerful developmental and evaluative tool for the education service.

I commend these documents warmly to you.

FRANK PIGNATELLI
Director of Education
The Quality Assurance Unit

The quality assurance unit was set up by Strathclyde Regional Council in 1990. Its function is to contribute to the aims of the education department as expressed in the mission statement by seeking:

- to promote quality in the department;
- to devise ways of assessing quality;
- to monitor the work of the department;
- to identify and disseminate good practice;
- to investigate issues of concern.

As part of the development of the unit, visits have been made to almost every pre-five establishment and school in the region, talking to staff, school boards, parents and children. In the period 1990-93, inspections have been carried out in over 100 establishments. Over 50 different aspects of educational provision within individual divisions and across the region have been reviewed and reports have been produced which highlight the considerable amount of existing good practice. Many establishments have invited members of the unit to help with the initial stages of self-evaluation and development planning. Inspectors have taken part in planned activity time, in-service courses and management training modules for headteachers. Inspectors, themselves, have been on the receiving end of advice and training.

The team, in collaboration with members of the educational development service and with help from practising teachers, has developed procedures and documentation for carrying out an external evaluation of educational establishments and services. This quality process was the subject of extensive consultation from May to October 1991, when almost five hundred pre-five establishments, schools, colleges and individuals made valuable comment. As a result the material was substantially revised. It was taken to the education committee on April 29th 1992 when the following recommendations were accepted:

- that the mission statement in its amended form be approved by the education committee as the basis for the work of the whole department and as the basis of the quality process;
- that the revised quality pointers and indicators be used by Strathclyde inspectors in their duties of evaluating the work of all educational establishments; and
- that the quality pointers and indicators be distributed for use in establishments to assist in setting a framework for development plans, establishment audit and self-evaluation.

The material is now offered to establishments and schools as support for the process of self-evaluation and development planning. It is not complete or perfect! There will be much to add, to delete and to argue about! Groups, comprising promoted staff from the appropriate sector, members of the educational development service and inspectors from the quality assurance unit, have been set up to revise the material over the coming year. In the meantime, we hope that you will feel free to adapt it for your own use and that you will find that the quality process described in the next few pages of some help in the daunting task of improving the education we offer to all our children.
Why quality in education?

The pursuit of quality has become a universal aim in the 1990s. In the public services there are at least five reasons why we care about quality. Firstly, we have to account for the billions of pounds spent each year on education not simply in financial terms but to ensure value for money. Secondly, although we know that the education we offer our children is generally of the highest quality we need to provide evidence of this to parents and the public. Thirdly, the education we offer must improve if we are to meet the demands of industry and commerce, not least in a single European market. Fourthly the law, through the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, demands that each education authority ensures that adequate and efficient education is provided in its area. And above all, we want to improve the quality of the education we offer for the sake of the children themselves.

What is quality?

Defining what we mean by quality is a controversial business! Of the many groups who have an interest in the education service – pre-five staff, teachers, parents, children, employers, members of the wider community, local elected members, members of parliament, managers of the education service – each has its own views about what constitutes good education. The quality assurance unit has approached the task from two angles: firstly, establishing a set of basic principles; and secondly, drawing on the considerable amount of research into what makes establishments effective.

The following set of principles underpins our ideas of quality:

Quality is:
- keeping to agreed aims;
- continually trying to improve;
- caring for the needs of the people we serve.

Keeping to agreed aims

This principle encompasses two ideas: establishing aims and practices which the majority accept: and ensuring that everyone complies with them. For example, the aims of the whole establishment, the topics to be undertaken, the organisation of resources, how children's progress will be recorded, all these need to be agreed through discussion and consultation. Once general agreement has been reached, however, and written into policy, everyone is bound by that policy. All staff contribute to the establishment as a whole: to the variety of activities offered; to the involvement of adults and the training of students; to the relationships between children and adults; to the overall experience that children take away with them. If that experience is to be coherent and consistent all staff must conform to the decisions of the majority.

The quality process is an attempt to establish agreed aims and practices for all establishments in the region. We believe that if we can reach agreement, through consultation, on what is generally regarded as good practice, staff will wish to accord with that good practice and we will be able to offer a coherent and consistent education to all children in the region.
Continually trying to improve

This aim hardly needs explanation or elaboration: all staff want to do better for the children they teach. It would be foolish, however, to suggest that we ever attain perfection in education. We are constrained by lack of resources, time and energy; by the social conditions in which many of our children live; and by the necessary limitations of establishments as organisations. One of the contributing factors to stress in teaching is the frustration of not being able to achieve all that we would wish for our children. But that does not mean that we cannot improve anything.

In the quality process and materials which follow, we suggest that the only way to cope with the sometimes overwhelming task of trying to improve is to tackle a little at a time. We have attempted to sub-divide the overall educational provision of an establishment into different parts and to provide a means of deciding which aspects are working well and which need attention. Staff can then concentrate on the improvement of the weaker aspects, secure in the knowledge that the establishment as a whole is working effectively.

Caring for the needs of the people we serve

The third fundamental principal in the attainment of quality is the need to provide what the customer wants: if we don’t the customer goes elsewhere. In education we prefer to think of customers as partners in the educational process but the problem of defining who our partners are remains notoriously difficult. Even if we do, we are left with the problem of what emphasis should be placed on the differing views of partners and how they can be reconciled.

The materials which follow enable establishments to take account of the views of children, staff, parents, support agencies, the wider community and employers without abdicating responsibility for decision-making and overall management.

Effective educational establishments

There has been ample research on what makes one establishment more effective than another. The work of Reid, Hopkins and Holly, Rutter’s study of twelve London comprehensive schools and Mortimore’s study of London primary schools are particularly well known, although a plethora of books on evaluation and improvement, development planning, and quality assurance is flooding on to the market. The HMI series ‘Effective Primary Schools’ and ‘Effective Secondary Schools’; Starting with Quality: the Education of Children Under Five (DES); the Management Training Modules for Headteachers; and the Scottish Office Education Department (SOED) material ‘Using Performance Indicators in Self-Evaluation’ have been influential in Scottish schools. The research suggests that a core set of factors contributes to overall effectiveness:

- clear aims and policies
- planning and organisation of learning and teaching
- emphasis on curricular goals
- high but realistic expectations
- effective assessment, recording and reporting of children’s work
- monitoring of policies
making the most of learning time making the best use of accommodation good working conditions
varied teaching strategies and techniques
a good disciplinary structure based on rewards and praise

the leadership of the head of establishment effective communication good staff management and development
staff stability
children's participation in responsibility effective pastoral care
liaison between educational sectors effective links with parents taking account of the views of all those with an interest in education an ethos of mutual trust and co-operation active support of the education authority

The material which follows takes account of the research on establishment/school effectiveness and these core factors are clearly recognisable under the appropriate strands of the mission statement.

How do we evaluate quality?

(i) Performance indicators

Performance indicators are features of a establishment’s work which can be used to evaluate its performance. Some of these features can be measured (quantitative performance indicators). Some can only be assessed through experience, judgement and professional knowledge (qualitative performance indicators).

In education, quantitative indicators might include the number of children on the record of applications for a place in a pre-five establishment, the number of adults on courses organised by the establishment or the number of days of in-service training undertaken by staff. In the quality process described below the information provided by quantitative indicators can be scanned from data and documentation and these indicators are therefore called scanning indicators. Qualitative indicators could include evidence of good communication with parents, the existence of appropriate policy documents and the efficient use of resources. The ‘indicators of good practice’, described in the quality process, are qualitative indicators. Both types of indicator need to be carefully analysed, interpreted and evaluated by professionals either from within the establishment or by external evaluators. They also need to be set against norms for all establishments in the region.

Performance indicators are not the whole story. They provide ‘flashing lights’ suggesting aspects which could be examined more closely. They tell us something about the way an establishment is working as a whole. They are not a means of judging the performance of individuals.
These strands are too broad to be of use in systematic evaluation, so each has been divided into relevant sub-headings or quality pointers. Figure (1) shows the quality pointers for pre-five establishments for all seven strands.
(ii) A framework for quality in education

Educational establishments are such complex organisations that the process of collecting information, analysing it and drawing useful conclusions is too complicated unless it takes place within a systematic framework. Any such framework is artificial and the one described below is no exception! However, it does have the merit of being rooted in the overall aims of the education department as expressed in the mission statement. It is unique to Strathclyde establishments since no other system for evaluating educational establishments is based on the educational aims of Strathclyde Regional Council.

The framework is based on the seven strands of the department's mission statement.

Mission Statement

We aim to offer:

Education

OF THE HIGHEST QUALITY

We will seek to:

- provide a full range of courses and services;
- enable all individuals to achieve their potential;
- supply suitable premises and resources;
- encourage access to education throughout life;
- foster genuine partnership in education;
- promote equal opportunity and social justice;
- support economic growth and prosperity.
In turn, the quality pointers are sub-divided into statements which indicate what we should aim at to attain the aims of the mission statement. These are called indicators of good practice. Figure (2) illustrates this system more clearly.

As an example assume that it is intended to carry out an audit of the courses and services provided, in particular ‘Planning’. In such an audit the establishment would wish to evaluate a number of areas. Using the series of quality pointers and indicators, the framework for audit becomes:

\begin{array}{|c|c|}
\hline
\text{Mission statement} & \\
\hline
\text{STRAND 1} & \text{Provide a full range of courses and services} \\
\hline
\text{Quality pointer 1.1} & \text{Planning} \\
\hline
\text{Indicators of good practice} & \\
1.1.1 & \text{The establishment's aims are consistent with the education department's mission statement} \\
1.1.2 & \text{The establishment's aims are reflected in its policies and practices} \\
1.1.3 & \text{Curricular, cross-curricular and administrative policies have been drawn up} \\
1.1.4 & \text{The establishment has a development plan} \\
\hline
\end{array}

In this way the process of audit can be broken down into manageable parts. The examples which accompany each indicator of good practice describe ways of complying with the indicator.

Even the indicators, however, do not give the specific detail which establishments might find helpful in the pursuit of quality. Examples of what is meant by each indicator have therefore been included, partly to clarify the meaning and partly to suggest a checklist for taking action. These examples of good practice are not complete and you may not agree with all of them: they are provided as a starting point.

In section three, a complete page has been devoted to each of the indicators of good practice. The relevant mission strand and quality pointer is stated above the indicator, and the list of examples is given below. By putting all or most of the examples into practice, educational establishments can be confident that they are contributing towards the achievement of the education department's mission statement.
The structure of the framework is described in diagrammatic form in figure (3).

The Quality Process in Self-evaluation

The Strathclyde Region Quality Process was originally designed by the quality assurance unit as a means of externally evaluating establishments. This framework is now offered as a support for establishment internal or self-evaluation.

1. SELF-EVALUATION

Self-evaluation is an essential aspect of development planning, whether at authority, establishment or individual level. In recent years, materials for establishment and school self-evaluation have provided some support for promoted staff to respond to the demands for greater accountability, the pressures for quality and improvement, and the need to report what goes on in establishments to various bodies.

For example, the Regional Council's reports on "Managing Progress" (1986) and "Progress Through Self-evaluation" (1988) and the modules produced as a result of the national initiative 'Management Training for Headteachers' have provided a focus for discussion and practical help. Each establishment has been encouraged to start from the position in which it finds itself and to move towards a management style and development culture in which collaborative planning involves all members of staff and other interested groups as appropriate. A list of the components of a development culture can be found in appendix (2) of the director's report on development planning and is included in this paper as appendix (1).

Participation is crucial not only to draw upon the wealth of varied experiences which can inform an evaluation exercise but to generate a sense of ownership.

"The headteacher (or head of centre) must enable the work of the school (or establishment) to benefit from all sources of insights, ideas and expertise available to it. He/she must listen for helpful comment whenever it is spoken but will hear it more often when... an organisational structure which permits the participation of all teachers (and staff) in the development of school (or centre) policy is established. This will necessitate being open to the positive contribution that can be made by staff, pupils, students, parents and other well-wishers and/or critics."

"Managing Progress", Strathclyde Regional Council (1986) p.17

Contributions to an evaluation by individuals and groups within a establishment will vary according to time and place. How this is managed is a question of judgement for the head of centre and her promoted staff. Involvement in the process includes skills, knowledge and experience which will be new to many; staff and others should be encouraged to participate. With support, as part of their own or their group’s staff development programme. Certain other principles need to be kept in mind when developing a culture in which evaluation is "built in” to what goes on in the establishment:

- everyone needs to be clear about the purpose of the process;
- a sense of trust needs to be fostered;
- discussion needs to be open;
everyone should feel that their contribution is valued;

establishment self-evaluation should be seen to be practical and realistic; expectations should not be raised higher than can be fulfilled.

When and where an establishment begins is important but efforts to introduce a process of evaluation should not be delayed until the climate is “just right”. A sensibly chosen evaluation project linked to development planning (involving all, or only some, of the staff), suitably managed, could be the means to create a positive climate. Guidance in climate setting is available from a number of sources, including Management Training for Headteachers Module 6, “Monitoring School Effectiveness” (1990).
2. THE AUDIT PROCESS

The remaining sections will explain how the process of evaluation in an establishment can be carried out, moving through audit, establishment development planning and implementation.

An educational audit involves the collection of information, analysing it and using it for evaluation. It is part of the establishment development planning process as illustrated in figure (4).

![Diagram of the Audit Process]

- Mission
- Evaluation
- Specification
- Development Plan
- Planning and Implementation
- General Audit
- Focused Audit
(a) The Purpose of the Audit
An audit can help to establish a supportive and collaborative climate within an establishment in order to move positively towards improving its performance. Development planning needs to start from where an establishment is now and the audit will do that. The audit will enable the promoted and other staff to:

- determine how well the establishment is performing in relation to its aims and the mission statement;
- recognise strengths on which to build;
- recognise areas which need improvement;
- identify priorities for action in the short and long term;
- identify staff development needs and provide a basis upon which individual and group targets may be set;
- show areas which have improved.

The audit needs to be well-planned. Those involved in planning and organising the audit (the audit or development planning team) will have to face a number of issues depending on the purpose of the particular audit, such as:

- making the purpose clear to everyone involved;
- allowing as wide an involvement by staff (and other interested people) as possible;
- deciding what evidence is required to make a judgement on performance and how that evidence should be collected;
- agreeing what the agenda for the audit should be and which aspects of the establishment should be included;
- reaching agreement about the validity of findings;
- translating the findings into a plan of action.

(b) General Audit
A pre-five establishment might carry out a general whole-establishment audit of all key areas of its work as part of the cyclical process of development planning. This general audit would include all seven strands of the mission statement and use all of the quality pointers and corresponding indicators of good practice. The depth and detail of the audit would have to be agreed taking account of the resources available and the need for useful and valid information on which to base future management decisions.

The Strathclyde quality process with quality pointers and indicators of good practice offers the audit team the opportunity to involve all staff, and other interested partners where appropriate, in providing a detailed, professional evaluation of the work of the establishment as a whole.

Participants in the audit could be offered the full set of indicators as a proforma to evaluate the establishment’s performance across all indicators of good practice. The scale for quality of performance could be a four point one of "strength"; "satisfactory"; "weakness"; "problem area". A blank proforma of this type is included in the support pack and the case study in appendix (2) illustrates how this was used and completed in one establishment. A sample of the pro-forma Priority Rating Scale is included for your information and use.
The proforma using all the indicators can also be adapted to allow staff to judge each indicator in three other ways:

1) as a simple compliance indicator answering 'YES' it does exist or 'NO' it does not exist in the establishment;

2) as a measure of the stage of development in the establishment:
   - very well developed
   - quite well developed
   - early stage of development
   - requires attention

3) as a priority rating in terms of time:
   - immediate action
   - this term
   - this session
   - sometime

Blank forms for each of these methods is included in the support pack.

The promoted staff or audit team would be responsible for the collection and collation of the information under each indicator. The counting of the responses under each heading would establish a simple means of determining the main areas of strength and those areas requiring attention. On each of the proformas an opportunity should be given to staff or others to indicate three areas they consider to be the main strengths of the establishment and three areas requiring improvement. This would give some professional evaluation for the audit team to compare to the statistical data collated from the proformas.

Further investigation of those areas identified as requiring attention should be pursued through the techniques listed later in paragraph (d), such as use of questionnaires, surveys, discussion with a sample of individuals, evaluation of documentation, to identify the exact nature of the problem. The use of the examples of good practice for a specific indicator would allow the exact nature of the weakness to be defined clearly.

(c) Focused Audit
A focused audit concentrating on a few specific areas can be used to identify exactly what the establishment is currently doing. The areas for the focused audit can follow from a general audit or from identification of a small number of priorities by promoted and other staff in consultation and discussion. A focused audit can also be used as a starting point where a full audit is not desired or where the promoted staff wishes to create the climate or to develop the skills and confidence required to carry out self-evaluation.
By using selected indicators and examples of good practice, evidence can be collected on each area by using the techniques suggested in (d) below. The indicators and examples supply an agenda for an audit of any chosen area and an organisational framework to allow the collection of evidence. This focused audit can help:

- modify priorities;
- identify what is done well in an area;
- identify exactly what is wrong in an area;
- examine what could be done to put it right.

(d) Techniques in Internal Audit

Some promoted and unpromoted staff may already be quite well advanced in setting up procedures for internal evaluation. On the other hand some may be only just beginning. In either case a good deal of informal evaluation will have already taken place in the establishment.

Those involved in carrying out the audit will have to consider a number of questions about how information for the audit is to be collected. The aim is to bring together reliable data from a number of sources. It is advisable to use a variety of methods of data collection so that information from one can help substantiate that from another. Questions to be asked are:

- what information is required?
- who can provide the information?
- who can collect it?
- how can the information be collated later?
- can existing information be used?
- what would be a sensible undertaking given the resources available?

Collation and analysis will depend upon the questions set and the techniques chosen. A major consideration is that the audit should be manageable. At the outset care should be taken to keep the audit within stated bounds of time and resources. The promoted staff or audit team will need to identify the most reliable sources of information.

A number of sources can be consulted to help with the identification and use of techniques. Skills in the use of these techniques may already exist in the establishment; some staff may seek to acquire such skills as part of their staff development. Some guidance is provided by the report “Progress through Self-evaluation”, (Strathclyde Regional Council, 1988). Consideration of the advantages and disadvantages of a number of ways of collecting evidence in an evaluation is also to be found in the “Management Training for Headteachers Module, Monitoring School Effectiveness, Unit 3, Evaluation Techniques” (1990).
The following is a list of possibilities:

- questionnaires and checklists
- discussions with individuals
- observation of playrooms
- analysis of children's work
- systematic reporting
- video or audio recording
- peer evaluation
- discussion groups
- use of external agencies
- existing documentation
- problem analysis

Support materials from the quality assurance unit, already used in inspection and external audit, for some of these techniques will be included as part of a further package to be issued later; establishments may wish to use them as they are or adapt them to their particular needs.

(e) Identifying Priorities for Action

The audit, whether general or focused on just one key issue, may identify any number of areas which seem to call for improvement. It may be interesting for the audit team to compare priorities for action identified by different groups - promoted staff, pre-five staff, other staff, children, parents and other groups consulted. The number of priorities may seem overwhelming at times but a choice has to be made. Everything cannot be put right at once!

Some of the questions which should help are:

- bearing in mind the resources available and timescales, how many priorities can be tackled?
- what are the current priority demands at regional and national levels?
- what skills will be required to bring about an improvement in an area designated as a priority for action? Some skills will already be available in the establishment, others will need to be acquired as part of staff development.

Once the audit is complete and the priorities identified and ranked the promoted staff may wish to present the list of priorities for action, with brief arguments to support the choice, to staff and others for further consultation. An outside view may be sought, for instance from the quality assurance unit. Once the list has been agreed and the establishment has declared a commitment to the priorities, detailed plans need to be drawn up to turn the findings of the audit into action through the establishment development plan. Even if the audit has been focused on just one particular priority, it will still be necessary to make a decision about staff development and resources. The education development service will analyse establishment development plans. Taking account of regional and divisional priorities the service will respond to establishment development needs.
Summary

As a result of the audit the establishment will be in a much better position to answer three questions.

1  Where do we want to be?
   Everyone involved in the audit and the accompanying discussion will have re-assessed what they consider to be the direction in which the establishment should move within the guidance provided by the mission statement and the quality pointers.

2  Where are we now?
   Management and staff will now be able to make a judgement based upon sound evidence, systematically collected. What do we do well? What are we not so good at? How could we do it better?

3  What do we need to focus on?
   As suggested earlier a means will have been found, perhaps after advice and support from the educational development service, quality assurance unit or the education directorate, to decide on a number of priorities.

The audit using the Strathclyde quality process will provide the establishment with:

- soundly-based arguments to justify the course it is taking;
- the means to acknowledge what it does well;
- assistance in moving towards a participative, collaborative way of working which involves all interested groups;
- help in planning to manage change effectively;
- the means to improve quality in general.
3. THE ESTABLISHMENT DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Development planning has been fully supported at regional and divisional level through the educational development service and staff college. The process of development planning and the structure, format and components of development plans have been detailed both in regional and divisional documentation and on in-service training sessions.

The advice given by the educational development service includes the following as the components of a development plan:

- the aims of the establishment;
- the self-evaluation processes;
- priorities for development;
- targets stemming from such priorities;
- resource allocation - human and financial - for each priority;
- expected outcomes/success criteria;
- the external in-service training and support needed.

As with the audit, the guidance provided by the quality pointers, indicators of good practice and examples of good practice can be used as an effective means of defining the criteria for success. Not only is the structure used similar to that for the audit but the detail provided will enable success criteria to be built in before implementation begins. The agenda for regular performance review is already set. Clarification of the concepts involved can take place at this crucial point and as monitoring begins instead of leaving it to later in the cycle. Setting success criteria at the beginning is an essential feature of the evaluation process. It will enable the establishment to answer the question, “How will we know that we have achieved the target?” Where quantitative indicators, such as the scanning indicators, can be used this is relatively easy. However, the use of qualitative indicators will still require the application of professional judgement but discussion and other evaluation techniques ought to be well structured, using the same criteria established during the audit.

As with the audit, drawing up the establishment development plan will provide opportunities to encourage a shared sense of direction and commitment by involving staff as widely as possible and drawing on their experiences and professional expertise. Development plans will enable establishments to organise their progress in a purposeful and systematic way. see figure 4 (page 11).

The aims of development planning should be:

- to improve the effectiveness of establishments particularly in relation to the quality of learning and teaching;
- to support establishments in the management of change;
- to develop the management skills of staff;
- to target existing resources more efficiently and to allocate them more effectively.

This will enable establishments to contribute to Strathclyde Regional Council’s overall strategy for securing qualitative improvement in educational provision.
4. IMPLEMENTATION AND PERFORMANCE REVIEW

Within establishments progress should be reviewed regularly at team meetings, collecting evidence through observation, discussion, quantitative data, informed opinions and placing value on the professional judgement of staff. A great deal of informal evaluation already takes place in pre-five establishments: what is needed is to make this more systematic. Where this reflective and investigative approach is allied to the more formal approach using the indicators and examples of good practice, progress can be carefully monitored and improvement becomes continuous. Monitoring and evaluation are thus integrated with implementation as a performance review, and are not just something to be done at the end of the process. Both such formative and summative review processes should be built in at the planning stage.

Development planning and self-evaluation do not mean that establishments should carry out monitoring and review in isolation. The two-fold process of internal and external evaluation should complement each other. The relationship between an establishment and regional/divisional staff will develop over the next few years. There will be many occasions where regional inspectors of the quality assurance unit will join with establishment staff in the evaluation process, helping to identify priorities for action after an audit, assisting the establishment in developing audit techniques and supporting the establishment in monitoring its development plan. On other occasions, a formal inspection will be required as part of the authority’s on-going programme. In both cases, contact with the quality assurance unit should be an opportunity for professional colleagues to work together for the improvement of education in the establishment. Discussion between staff and members of the unit will be structured by the agenda of the mission statement, supported by the quality pointers and indicators of good practice. These quality pointers and indicators are a means of setting a common framework for meaningful debate. Viewed as such the whole series provides common ground which can, with a flexible approach, be amended as situations change and as experience of using the quality process grows.

Inspections carried out by HMI, using their own series of indicators, can be seen as a necessary and valuable external audit undertaken in a national context. Publication of the criteria by which inspections will be carried out has offered establishments and regional authorities the opportunity to join in the process much more fully. As a result the discussion needed to improve quality in establishments can be more meaningful.

5. LOOKING TO THE FUTURE

Through formal visits to establishments on inspections, regional surveys and divisional commissions, and through informal visits and collaborative working with staff, the quality assurance unit have seen plenty of evidence of the good practice in many of the authority’s establishments. However, no establishment is perfect. If we are sincere about our desire to improve the quality of education then a willingness to bring about change for the better in a planned and structured way is a vital first step.
APPENDIX 1

A DEVELOPMENT CULTURE
(director's report on development planning)

The introduction of a "development" culture in an establishment requires collaborative planning involving all members of staff.

Pre-five establishments which have a "development culture" are likely to have many of the following in place:

- a clearly understood participative management structure with remits for all posts of responsibility;
- effective channels of communication both laterally and vertically within the establishment;
- experience of collaborative and co-operative work both within and outwith the playroom;
- an open resource allocation system which is clearly understood;
- clear job descriptions and personal specifications which include within them specific tasks and targets for individuals;
- clearly located responsibility for staff development within the establishment with overall co-ordination lying with a senior member of staff, but with responsibility for staff development as part of the job of every member of staff with a promoted post;
- experience of organising in-service and staff development to meet identified needs;
- a needs-identification system which operates at individual, group and whole-establishment levels;
- records of staff development activity;
- experience of establishment self-evaluation into which the processes of staff development can be fitted.
APPENDIX 2

A PRE-FIVE ESTABLISHMENT CASE STUDY

This case study is based on an actual audit carried out in an establishment in Strathclyde.

Confidence in Greencraig Nursery School was growing. After considerable discussion over many months several projects were underway to begin the implementation of the region’s guidelines for the curriculum. Efforts were also being made to involve parents even more in what went on. The head of establishment had been in post for a year and a newly promoted colleague had been appointed several months ago. The rest of the staff had, for the most part, been in post for some years. The head of the establishment had avoided introducing dramatic management changes until now. She and her colleagues felt that they were performing well enough in many areas. As elsewhere in education, the pace of change had increased enormously. A number of changes in curriculum and methodology had already been introduced in the previous five years, sometimes hurriedly, sometimes with mixed responses from staff. After consulting the staff, the head decided it was time to take stock, to undertake a whole establishment audit. She had her own views of what needed to be done: but what did others think?

Several questions were posed when the audit was first discussed.

- Who should be members of the audit team to collect and collate information?

  It was decided that two members of the promoted staff should be members - the head of establishment and first assistant or depute who would be the convenor. Their presence would provide necessary status to the audit. Three other members would be asked to join: two other members of staff and a parent who was already involved in establishment activities.

- Who should be asked to contribute information?

  There was a general willingness to include as many groups as possible, even though this was a first major audit. Eventually the groups chosen were:

  - all pre-five staff
  - all support staff
  - the parents’ committee
  - visitors to the establishment over a two month period
  - sampling of children’s views
How was information to be collected?

The department of education's series of quality pointers organised under the strands of the mission statement provided a comprehensive list of features for respondents to comment upon. The first assistant or depute together with one of the staff in the audit team (who had recently completed a course which included a unit on observation and research techniques) devised a number of questionnaires for distribution to each of the groups above. The questionnaires were compiled from the list of quality pointers, a selection being made appropriate to the target audience. Staff were asked to comment on the full range of items.

Who was to be involved in the design of instruments, distribution and collation of responses?

Most of the design work was carried out by the member of staff who had just completed her course. Advice was sought from two other members of staff on specific issues. Limited trialling revealed several points which needed amendment to the form of question being asked. Final versions were discussed by the audit group before distribution. A covering letter from the head of establishment accompanied each questionnaire explaining its purpose. Respondents were asked to sign the questionnaire to allow follow-up interviews if these were found to be necessary. Responses could be made anonymously if people so wished.

Collation of numerical data was shared by three members of the audit team. This proved more straightforward than had been thought. Two members compiled a list of additional comments made in the returns, categorised them and wrote up their impressions with quotations, under the seven headings of the mission statement.

What form should the audit report take?

The report fell neatly into the sections indicated by the strands of the mission statement. Under each one a mixture of numerical and verbal evidence was provided. Sometimes a quotation was used to illustrate a point. A list of 21 areas requiring some attention was drawn up. These were presented in a five page report under the headings of:

- What we do well
- What we do not so well.

The promoted staff extracted their own responses and collated these separately. This enabled them to make a comparison with views held generally. They were surprised in some ways at the perceptions of others compared to their own; in other cases their own views were confirmed. They all felt the exercise was well worthwhile given the new insights they had into the life of the establishment.
How would a number of priorities for action be chosen?

Clearly, trying to tackle 21 aspects in one session was out of the question. Two of the areas were urgent, of major importance, and could not be avoided. Another five had pressing claims. It was decided that four areas were enough to occupy the coming year. At this point, the quality assurance unit was invited to be consultants acting on an agenda provided by the establishment. As a result, members of the unit widened the scope of the audit by undertaking interviews with samples of staff, parents and pupils and discussed the findings with the promoted staff. Suggestions were put forward to the team for three out of five priorities to be included in the list. The selection of a final list was left for the establishment to determine and include in its development plan. As a result of the whole audit process, which had taken place principally over six weeks in March and April, a number of skills required by audit staff had been identified. Training in these was built in to the coming programme of staff development and in-service.

Three sample pages from the collation of the staff questionnaire used in the audit are included on pages 25 and 26.

form the agenda for the questionnaire:
- how the series of numbers in the left-hand column allows quick reference to the series of quality pointers;
- the way in which the rating scale enables quick response by the respondent and ease of collation;
- the case with which the audit team, promoted staff and inspectors can identify strengths, areas for development and possible priorities, once information from scanning indicators had also been taken into account.

Extract ii
Extract from the lists compiled as a result of the audit

- Things we do well
- Things we do not so well

It should be remembered that this is a case study of how one establishment undertook a whole establishment audit. It provided the promoted staff with reliable evidence on which to make a decision about priorities for action. However, there is no suggestion that such an undertaking is required other than perhaps every three years. Even so, some of the procedures could prove useful whether the audit covers the whole establishment or just selected features of it.

Summary of the responses from the staff on:

Things we do well or are good at
- Exceptional support staff
- Lack of overcrowding ... a feeling of space
- Friendly happy atmosphere
- An approachable and helpful management team
- Quick and effective release of documents to staff from outside agencies
- Well equipped
- Good mix of ages, background, past experience etc in staff
- Help given to SEN pupils
- Caring attitude of the establishment as a whole
- Knowing children as individuals and working as a team to promote their best interests
- Open door policy - parents and staff can discuss issues openly and are welcome anytime
- Good planning of playroom activities

Things we do not so well
- Failure to stimulate, challenge and stretch the more able children
- Need for stronger curricular links to primary schools
- Need to use community links more
- Need to involve fathers more where possible
- Links to secondary school courses could be strengthened: work experience
- Review of the activities for full-time children

Examples of Good Practice

The examples of good practice outlined in the following pages bring together to some extent the professional and public perception of what constitutes good practice in pre-five establishments.

They have been compiled by a team of inspectors from the quality assurance unit who have drawn on the professional expertise of colleagues in pre-five establishments and the educational development service.

The team also used a number of other sources, such as regional documents, Scottish Office Education Department (SOED) publications and educational research documents. A bibliography at the end of section 3 lists these sources.

The examples appearing under each indicator of good practice are meant:

1. to illuminate the meaning of the indicator and
2. to reveal a variety of possible ways of complying with the indicator.

It is hoped that the examples will provide establishments with confirmation and reassurance that much of what they are doing is indeed good practice.

Reference has also been made in the examples to Strathclyde education department's Standard Circulars, where appropriate.

The quality assurance unit will be grateful to receive additional examples to those listed in section three and spacing has been provided at the foot of each page for adding your own examples or notes. Additional examples or comments on the examples can be submitted direct to the head of quality assurance unit, education headquarters, Dalian House, 350 St. Vincent Street, Glasgow.

Quality pointer 1.1 Planning

Indicators of good practice
1.1.4 The establishment has a development plan

Examples

- The establishment has undertaken an audit within the framework of the mission statement and the quality process to determine the present situation, strengths, weaknesses and the starting point for development.

- Evidence from the audit is used to assist decision-making about the establishment development plan.

- The development plan is available for parents.

- An action plan involving targets, tasks and success criteria has been drawn up for each priority in the development plan.

- Staff are involved in the formulation of the school development plan for example through:
  - a core group
  - review/development teams
  - the observation of playroom activities
  - regular reporting by these teams
  - group discussion
  - the use of questionnaires
  - the use of external agencies

- The establishment development plan reflects the establishment aims and objectives.

- The establishment development plan relates to the education department's mission statement and associated quality pointers, indicators of good practice and examples of good practice.

- The establishment development plan:
  - identifies areas for development to be undertaken as priorities
  - outlines targets associated with the areas for development
  - gives a description of how developments will be implemented
  - specifies timescales
  - outlines responsibilities of individuals
  - identifies resources and staff development requirements
  - describes how developments will be monitored and evaluated.

- The priorities identified for development take account of:
  - the needs of children
  - developments already underway in the establishment
  - regional and national priorities
  - areas requiring attention through the establishment's own internal evaluation or external evaluation by the quality assurance unit or Her Majesty's inspectorate
  - individual development needs identified as a result of staff appraisal.

- Priorities, timescales and targets are formulated and stated clearly.

- Planning takes account of resource implications, training needs, the pace of change and recent curricular developments.

- The development plan is known by all staff.

- Staff know the role which they will play in implementing and evaluating the establishment development plan.

Examples

- Communication and investigation are the key learning processes within the establishment.

- Within the key learning processes of communication and investigation:
  - learning is enjoyable
  - learning experiences for children of varying development stages are provided
  - children are encouraged to make choices and act independently
  - children's prior learning and current interests are the basis for future learning
  - the individual learning needs of children are identified and provided for

- Within the key learning process of communication children learn through:
  - touch
  - body language
  - gesture
  - speech
  - signs and symbols

- Within the key learning process of communication children extend their learning by:
  - listening and understanding
  - responding and expressing
  - structuring language
  - interpreting and appreciating
  - describing
  - absorbing information

- Within the key learning process of investigation children extend their learning through:
  - spoken language

Examples

- Meaningful learning contexts are built on:
  - children's previous experiences
  - quality of the learning environment
  - quality of interaction and relationships with others
  - the current experience of the child

- The role of the adult in providing meaningful learning contexts involves:
  - careful questioning and answering
  - allowing time for reflection and discussion
  - giving praise and encouragement
  - providing opportunities to share and represent ideas
  - providing appropriate materials and resources
  - carrying out assessment and appropriate planning in order to provide differentiated learning for each child

- Children's previous experiences in:
  - the family
  - the establishment
  - the community
  - the wider world

  are used as a starting point to develop further learning

- In planning, learning and teaching staff motivate children towards further learning by considering their previous experiences

- The quality of the environment as a context for learning is marked by:
  - opportunities for children to explore and play in their own way and in their own time
  - careful curricular planning
  - clear and defined adult roles
  - flexibility in response to children's interests
  - appropriate and accessible resources
  - secure, calm and happy atmosphere
  - attractive playrooms which motivate children to investigate further and want to learn
  - a wide variety of opportunities which reflect areas of interest for every child
  - continuous evaluation of children's learning to promote progression

Examples

- The quality of interaction and relationships with others as a meaningful context for learning is marked by:
  - children's ability to make sense of other children's intentions, to work out the rules in any particular play situation and to participate in the imaginative play of other children
  - opportunities for children through play to express feelings
  - enthusiastic and positive responses to children by staff
  - praise and encouragement for all children
  - an empathy by staff with the children's intentions in play
  - support children in their play
  - sensitive intervention to extend children's learning
  - flexibility by staff in response to children's interests
  - knowledge and sensitivity of the staff to children's backgrounds

- The current experience of the child as a context for learning involves:
  - building upon children's previous experiences
  - appropriate selection of content
  - identification of children's interests and feelings
  - meaningful, interesting, stimulating and motivating learning activities for the child

1.2.6 Provision is made for the development of social skills

Examples

- Playroom practice is in accordance with the establishment policy
- The curriculum is planned and balanced to promote the following social skills:
  - affiliation and social interaction
  - co-operation and resolution of conflict
  - kindness, consideration, care and affection
- Through the planned curriculum the children acquire and develop social skills:
  - the ability to co-operate through play
  - the ability to form good relationships with other children and adults
  - the ability to join with others already involved in an activity
  - the ability to identify acceptable and unacceptable social behaviour in themselves and other children
  - an appreciation of the reasons for constraints upon their behaviour in the establishment, at home and in other social environments for example, the supermarket
  - the ability to co-operate with others, for example, during an activity, free play and in large group situations
  - the encouragement and opportunity to be kind, sharing and generous
  - the encouragement and opportunity to help other people and accept the assistance of others
  - the opportunity to help in preparation of snacks
- opportunity to take responsibility for the care of, for example, seedlings, plants and animals
- an appreciation of the causes of disagreements and contentions and an awareness of the consequences caused by them
- the language to enable and assist in social interactions

- Forward plans detail how self respect, tolerance, conflict, resolution and caring attitudes are developed through contexts of learning
- There is a planned and effective personal and social development programme
- The staff promote the development of social awareness in children, for example, care of others, respect for people, animals, property and the environment
- Children are enthusiastic to show or tell visitors what they have done
- All learning is planned to take account of and build on the children's previous learning experiences
- Staff consistently take a positive approach to prevention of problems by careful observation and timely intervention
- Staff take a positive approach in reinforcing rules for social behaviour and safety

Examples

- Children are encouraged to develop language skills through speaking and listening in a relaxed and comfortable environment
- Children are encouraged to talk together
- Staff promote opportunities for children of different linguistic abilities to communicate and work together
- Staff encourage the development and acquisition of language skills by:
  - listening attentively to children and providing a supportive atmosphere
  - encouraging children to express themselves in their own way and at their own level
  - their attitude and behaviour assuring children that their linguistic attempts, contributions and actions are valued
  - through a variety of questioning techniques encouraging discussion, expression and understanding
  - using the children's own experiences and interests to promote communication, interchange, conversation and expression motivating the children to talk through their activities, actions and experiences
  - ensuring that children are stimulated and motivated to talk and use language through the learning environment and the opportunities provided in the establishment
  - assisting children through the provision of appropriate words to understand what they are doing, saying and hearing
  - providing opportunities for children to listen to adults and other children
  - providing opportunities for children to listen to and participate in a variety of texts, for example, stories, nursery rhymes and poems
  - encouraging children to make sounds and rhythms with a variety of instruments and with their voices
  - through dramatic play learning about people, society and the world they live in
  - Children are encouraged to communicate their thoughts, feelings and desires through music, movement, drama and play
  - There are experiences for children to enable them to develop skills and confidence in expressing themselves through:
    - music and movement to encourage expression of emotions and gestures through rhythm
    - taking part in large ring games, action jingles and rhymes
    - listening to different kinds of music to experience rhythms associated with different cultures
    - encouraging children to make sounds and rhythms with a variety of instruments and with their voices
    - making and playing with puppets
    - through dramatic play learning about people, society and the world they live in
  - Children are encouraged to express ideas and feelings through art by:
    - drawing with crayons, chalks, pens and pencils
    - painting with brushes, fgingers, feet and various materials
    - modelling with clay, dough and plasticine
    - undertaking collage work using a variety of man made and natural materials

Examples

- Children are enabled to develop movement skills:
  - locomotion skills, for example, walking, running, crawling, hopping and skipping
  - static balance skills, for example, balancing on one foot with arms outstretched, standing on tip toes, balancing on two feet with body, arms and head at various angles
  - dynamic balance skills, for example, walking while carrying objects in their hands or on their head, pulling, pushing, building and climbing
  - gross motor manipulation skills, for example, kicking, bouncing, catching and throwing
  - fine motor manipulative skills, for example, by threading, jigsaws, cutting, cooking, using tools, copying, pouring, building and construction materials

- Staff encourage all children to develop motor and perceptual skills through participation in creative activities and self expression

- Children are encouraged to think and talk about their own actions and those of other children

- The development of movement skills are encouraged through a balance of outdoor and indoor activities

- All materials for the development of motor and perceptual skills are imaginative, flexible and managed by staff to motivate and extend the children

- visual skills, for example, hand and eye co-ordination, recognition of shape in relation to background, perception of shape regardless of position

- tactile and kinesthetic senses, for example, touch, taste and smell

- Children are enabled to develop perceptual skills:
  - auditory skills, for example, listening to stories, poems, songs, opportunities to discriminate various sounds and words, experiences in rhythm and rhyme

- Staff encourage all children to develop motor and perceptual skills through participation in creative activities and self expression

- Children are encouraged to think and talk about their own actions and those of other children

- The development of movement skills are encouraged through a balance of outdoor and indoor activities

- All materials for the development of motor and perceptual skills are imaginative, flexible and managed by staff to motivate and extend the children

Indicators of good practice

1.2.9 Provision is made for the development of investigative and problem-solving skills (cont'd)

- work through simple routines and timetables throughout the day
- understand some conceptual language of time such as morning, afternoon, yesterday and tomorrow

Number skills by encouraging children to:
- develop one-to-one correspondence
- experience early cardinal and ordinal numbers such as 1, 2 and 3 and first and last
- compare simple amounts in the same materials, for example, some sand, more sand
- take part in simple number rhymes, jingles and songs

Spatial relationship skills by encouraging children to:
- increase their knowledge of their own bodies and how they can move
- compare pictures, photographs and drawings with reality
- work with materials which can fit together, join together using smaller items such as bolts and screws, and apparatus which can be taken apart and re-shaped or re-built
- through investigations re-shape and rearrange materials
- work with resources of varying size and shape

Cause and effect by encouraging children to:
- ask questions regarding their activities, experiences and investigations
- explore and discuss the indoor and outdoor environment of the establishment
- undertake activities which encourage them to compare, evaluate, draw conclusions and solve problems

The learning environment is attractive, encouraging and provides motivation for children to investigate and undertake activity learning

The children have experience in the use of appropriate language to further their acquisition of investigation and problem-solving skills

Children are encouraged to solve problems both independently and in small groups
