Topics related to race and gender have begun appearing with increasing frequency in the adult education literature. The most prevalent trend in the literature is a focus on creating learning environments for diverse audiences, including appropriate strategies for teaching and learning and debate on whether separate approaches and/or special programs based on race and/or gender are needed. The intersection of gender, race, and class and their role in shaping how adult learners view learning and knowing is receiving increasing attention, and discussions of race and gender are being framed within the larger contexts of power structures and power relations. Among other gender- and race-related issues receiving increasing attention in the adult education literature are the following: how the field of adult education perpetuates racism and sexism, how adult education portrays women and gays/lesbians, how the role of women and African Americans can be reclaimed in the history of adult education; and the relationship between women and literacy. To date, topics related to race or multicultural issues have not received as much attention as topics related to gender. (Annotated lists of 22 print resources and 2 resource organizations concerned with issues of race and gender in adult education are included.) (MN)
Race and Gender in Adult Education
Trends and Issues Alerts

Susan Imel

ERIC Clearinghouse on Adult, Career, and Vocational Education
Center on Education and Training for Employment
College of Education
The Ohio State University
1900 Kenny Road
Columbus, OH 43210-1090
Race and Gender in Adult Education

Topics related to race and gender have begun appearing with increasing frequency in the adult education literature. Part of the growth in this literature base is due to adult educators’ awareness of the need to address cultural diversity or inclusive approaches to education. However, a growing number of publications examine the relationship between adult education and "issues of prejudice, power, and privilege" (Hayes and Colin 1994, p. 1), bringing a critical perspective to bear not only on current practices but also on the field’s theoretical foundations. Until recently, much of the literature on race and gender was reported in conference proceedings, giving it limited visibility. Although now available in more mainstream publications, the topics of race and gender are still not widely discussed within the field of adult education. Fortunately, enough adult educators are committed to developing a knowledge base on race and gender that the literature is developing rapidly.

The most prevalent trend in the literature is a focus on creating learning environments for diverse audiences, including appropriate strategies for teaching and learning (e.g., Colin and Preciphs 1991; Collard and Stalker 1991; Hayes 1989; Ross-Gordon 1994; and Tisdell 1993a). An issue related to teaching and learning is whether separate approaches are needed, that is, should special programs based on race and/or gender be created. Although some adult educators support distinct approaches (e.g., Carmack 1992), others are advocates for "restructuring learning environments to empower all kinds of learners" (Kerka 1993, p. 2).

The call to empower all kinds of learners should not be interpreted to mean adult educators are not sensitive to differences among learners. The intersection of gender, race, and class and their role in shaping how adults think about learning and knowing are being acknowledged (Caffarella 1992; Luttrell 1989). Discussions of race and gender are also being framed within the larger contexts of power structures and power relations (e.g., Stalker 1994; Tisdell 1993b).

How the field of adult education perpetuates racism and sexism is also being addressed. For example, Hayes and Colin (1994) edited a volume in which contributors not only examined a number of racist and sexist assumptions related to the field’s knowledge base, graduate education, staff development, and professionalization but also provided examples and techniques to change racist and sexist practices.

Other trends include examining the adult education literature to uncover how it portrays women (Hayes and Smith 1994; Sattem 1993) and gays/lesbians (Hill 1995); reclaiming the role of women (Hugo 1990) and African-Americans (see Section I of Sheared, Colin, and Guy 1993) in the history of adult education; and women and literacy (Carmack 1992; Fitzsimmons 1991). Topics related to race or multicultural issues have not received as much attention in the literature as those related to gender. However, publications such as Hemphill (1992), Ross-Gordon (1994), and the proceedings of the African American Adult Education Research Conferences (Guy, Colin, and Sheared 1994; Sheared, Colin, and Guy 1993) are helping to fill gaps in the database. Further information about race and gender in adult education can be obtained by consulting the resources and organizations listed here.

Print Resources

Three themes emerge from this review of female developmental models and studies: the importance of relationships, the diverse and nonlinear patterns of women’s lives, and issues of intimacy and identity. Examples of the use of these themes in the practice of teaching adults and developing women as leaders are provided.

Makes recommendations for gender-specific programming based on theoretical formulations for adult learning that focus on the mental construction of experience as it relates to emancipatory learning.

Suggests that rather than overtly confronting racism, adult educators focus on safe or nonthreatening issues such as low socioeconomic status, motivation, and participation.

Examines how institutional settings both create and mirror a learning environment that devalues and disempowers women learners.

Reports on a study that investigated the characteristics of African-American women who persist in literacy programs; all participants cited their own determination as an essential and possibly the most important factor in their persistence.

Contains 13 papers covering issues related to curriculum, community/employment, and institutions.

Hayes, E. "Insights from Women’s Experiences for Teaching and Learning." In Effective Teaching Styles, New Directions for Continuing Education, edited by E. Hayes, no. 43 (Fall 1989): 55-66.

Discusses elements of an alternative approach to teaching—feminist pedagogy—that is based on new understandings of women’s experiences and proposes its application in adult education.
An edited volume designed to enable adult educators to recognize the existence and consequences of racism and sexism in their own practice.

Qualitative content analysis of 112 articles in adult education journals identified five dominant perspectives of women as adult learners: deficit/assimilation, multicultural, empowerment, and collaborative. Women as feminist is an emerging sixth perspective.

Argues that adult educators should identify their perspective on diversity—deficit/assimilation, multicultural, or empowerment—and suggests ways to explore culture in practice.

Explores the dual emancipatory and oppressive roles that adult education plays within the gay and lesbian community, demonstrating that mainstream adult education reproduces heterocentric assumptions, social relations, and beliefs, at the expense of gay resistance discourse.

Argues for the inclusion of gender as a category of historical analysis by comparing the visibility of women in the historical literature and identifying mechanisms that foster women's invisibilities in adult education histories.

Examines theories of human development as they relate to adult education, concluding that there is a need for multiple models that expand the definition of adulthood to include those who have been missing in traditional theories.

Describes and analyzes how African-American and white working-class women define and claim knowledge. The women's perspectives challenge feminist analyses that have identified a single or universal mode of knowing for women.

Identifies a number of principles for teaching and learning based on a review of literature on multicultural education and related critical pedagogies.

Uses Tetreault's feminist phase theory (i.e., the evolutionary process of gender inclusion in academic settings) to examine publications in adult education, assess feminist impact, and place adult education gender-related literature in a theoretical framework.

Contains 16 papers divided into four sections: African American Adult Education History, Policy Issues, Womanist Perspective, and Forming Linkages through Culturally Contextualized Education Curricula.

Author uses her personal experiences to describe how she is trying to place women and the experience of women centrally on the adult education agenda.

Uses both feminist and adult education literature to create a framework that can be used to examine the adult education literature and research in terms of androcentricity (male centeredness).

Taylor, K., and Marienau, C., eds. Learning Environments for Women's Adult Development, New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education, no. 65 (Spring 1995).

An edited volume designed to help create learning environments that are more supportive of reentry women in their ongoing development.

Reviews two common strands of feminist pedagogy—the liberatory and gender models—and discusses implications for practice and theory building in adult education.

Reports on results of a case study that was guided by a feminist-materialist theoretical framework and that examined how power relationships based predominately on gender but including race, class, and age were manifested in adult higher education students.

Resource Organizations

American Association for Adult and Continuing Education, Unit on Women's Issues, Status and Education, 1200 19th Street, NW, Suite 300, Washington, DC 20036; (202) 429-5131.

Canadian Congress for Learning Opportunities for Women, 47 Main Street, Toronto, Ontario M4E 1V6; (416) 699-1909.

National Alliance of African American Adult Educators, c/o Dr. Scipio A. J. Colin III, Department of Adult and Community College Education, Box 7801, North Carolina State University, Raleigh, NC 27695-7801.

Developed with funding from the Office of Educational Research and Improvement, U.S. Department of Education, under Contract No. 9099002001. Opinions expressed do not necessarily reflect the position or policies of OERI or the Department. Trends and Issues Alerts may be freely reproduced.