Aimed at helping students in grades 5-8 read and enjoy more varieties of literature as well as promoting more writing, this guide offers materials which use a thematic approach to reading, writing, and literature. The guide provides reproducible and hands-on activity ideas plus bibliographies for the genres of realistic fiction, animal tales, biography, historical fiction, nonfiction, news reporting/media, mystery, science fiction and fantasy, poetry, and plays. Activity ideas for Newbery Award winners are also provided. The book uses a whole language approach to the teaching of reading and writing to middle grade students—an important element involves helping students understand how they learn (metacognition) and developing strategies that encourage organized learning. The book is divided into sections corresponding to each literary genre with a bibliography at the end of each section. Appendixes contain assessment pages, vocabulary worksheets, Bloom's taxonomy, reading conference questions, and author style worksheets. (NKA)

Introduction

Welcome to Genres of Literature—an exciting approach to reading, writing, and language arts in the middle school. By fifth grade, most students are reading well. Therefore the primary need for middle-schoolers is to refine their reading skills and practice using them. As with any activity, whether it be physical or mental, to become better, one must practice! The lessons in this program are designed first and foremost to provide practice opportunities for students to read and enjoy literature.

What Is a Genre?

A genre is defined as a particular type of category. In literature, this applies to such categories as science fiction, animal stories, biographies, real life, nonfiction, mystery—these are all genres.

Since by middle school many students have identified a favorite type of reading, it is often difficult to tempt them to read anything else. And yet it is important that they not lock in to one genre too early—thus missing the joys of many other forms of literature. It is worth a little push to get them to try something else. By using Genres of Literature, students will explore a variety of genres throughout the year.

The Whole-Language Approach

This program uses a whole-language approach to the teaching of reading and writing to middle-grade students. Being literature based, the primary objective is for students to read and to write. An important piece of this program involves helping students understand how they learn (metacognition) and to develop strategies that encourage organized learning. Diagramming stories, planning a writing assignment, and applying the strategies of Bloom's Taxonomy are just a few of the ways suggested to enhance students' skills.
Reading and Writing Logs

Each student should keep two pocket folders—one for reading and one for writing. The folders will contain materials for students to use as references, such as lists, potential writing topics, assignment sheets, and so on, as well as current works in progress. In addition, students will need a spiral notebook for each subject. The Writing Notebook will contain all prewriting and rough drafts of pieces in progress. The second notebook will function as the Reading Journal.

Other Skills

Skills such as spelling and oral expression are incorporated into the reading and writing lessons rather than taught as separate subjects. Have students create their own personal word books early in the fall. Then, as they come across new words in their reading, instruct students to enter the words in their logs. Weekly spelling lists can be selected from students’ individual word books.

Overall Purpose

One of the best lessons you can teach your students is that reading is fun. I hope the lessons in Genres of Literature open their minds to the writer's craft and help them use active reading strategies for better comprehension. Above all, I hope the genre approach will induce students to explore and discover new worlds of literature.
Reading Lessons

Getting Into the Genre

Each genre begins with a reading assignment. Students are encouraged to choose books from those you provide, from the school or public libraries or bring in their own. A bibliography follows each genre.

Structure is important when setting up reading and writing activities. Try to make due dates an integral part of each reading plan. Tell students what is expected, such as when a book should be finished, ahead of time. Encourage students to pace themselves appropriately so they will have the book read, the basic assignment done, and their projects completed.

Use a point system for evaluation. Each topic or activity earns a maximum of 5 points. This provides a quick and easy reference to see which students might be falling behind. A sample point sheet is provided on page 9.

Each class period might consist of two or more of the following activities.

- Read-aloud time (teacher reads to class)
- Sustained silent reading (students read to themselves)
- Journal time (students express thoughts in reading journals)
- Sharing and discussion time (students share with small groups or class)
- Mini-lessons (short teacher-directed lessons)

Read-Aloud Time

Since not all students will be familiar with each genre, present an introduction to the style. You might wish to share excerpts from books listed in the bibliography to highlight examples of the genre. Three books have been selected to serve as examples of the literature. Choose a book to read in whole or part to the class. You may wish to

- Challenge students to tell you which genre the book represents.
- Elicit from students a list of features prevalent to the genre.
- Encourage students to evaluate this type of literature.

If interest holds and time allows, involve students in the cross-curricular activities that follow to further enhance their appreciation of the genre.

You might also choose to read aloud from the book each day for at least fifteen minutes or as long as is needed to complete a chapter or to find a natural stopping place. This activity soon becomes a favorite for most classes. Middle-school students still love being read to. Here are some guidelines for reading aloud.

- Read the material to yourself at least once before reading it aloud.
- Ask students to clear their desks. Writing, drawing, and other activities should be set aside.
- Use a variety of “voices” to keep students’ attention.
- Invite students to follow along in their personal copies of the book, if available.

Sustained Silent Reading

Sustained Silent Reading (SSR) works best when a specified time period is set—perhaps 15–40 minutes. You may wish to set a timer so everyone knows when the reading period ends. Try to schedule at least three SSR periods each week. SSR is for students to enjoy as they study genres firsthand. This can only be achieved if several rules are followed.

- Students may sit or lie on the floor if they wish—a comfortable distance from classmates.
- Everyone reads, including the teacher.
- No one talks or leaves their chosen spot.

Encourage students to thoroughly “get into” their books and the genre.

Reading Journals

Encourage students to jot down in their reading journals their thoughts, questions, and ideas about the literature after they have done some reading. You will find some suggested journal prompts for each genre to help guide students’ writings. You may also wish to have students complete the reproducible question-and-answer sheets for their books, as well as fill in their book maps during this time.

Sharing and Discussion

This may be a whole-class or small-group activity. Set up small groups on the basis of similar topics or book titles. Try to establish specific goals at the beginning of the discussion.

Groups may meet one to three times per week, depending on the unit. Encourage all students to participate. When sharing, invite each student to present the group with a quick (30 seconds or less) overview of the story. Afterward, suggest that they read aloud a compelling passage. Other members are then encouraged to ask questions or share comments on the reading, reflecting on the content.

Mini-lessons

These allow for skills instruction with the entire class, a small group, or individual students. Mini-lessons may consist of a brief lecture, a short review, a demonstration, or a group activity that reviews, reinforces, or even introduces specific reading skills. See the skills list below for some possibilities.

Skills List

Try to review, reinforce, or introduce some of the basic reading skills listed here during mini-lessons.

Elements of Literature
- Authenticity
- Characterization
- Conflict
- Mood
- Plot
- Point of view
- Problem, conflict, challenge

Writing in a particular genre usually begins after reading the genre for a couple of weeks. Once students have read the literature, invite them to try writing. The subject matter for the writing is the student's choice. A brief brainstorming session at the beginning will allow students to offer a variety of topics and exchange ideas with their classmates. Just as in reading, due dates are important for writing. Announce them well in advance so students can pace their writing and complete the project by the assigned deadline. Explain to students the criteria on which they will be graded so they know how to concentrate their efforts. Stress that perfection is not expected on all pieces, but you do expect progress. Students may keep finished work in portfolios.

Begin each class period with a quick check of each student to determine what he or she plans for the day. This takes about 2-3 minutes and encourages students to set their own goals. Goals might include (but are not limited to)

- Library research
- Prewriting
- Writing and drafting
- Revising
- Conference with ____________
- Editing
- Final copy

You may wish to keep a daily goal sheet on a clipboard at your desk.

Have students fill in one or two words explaining their goal for the day. If students are observed doing things other than their stated goals, quietly remind them that they are "off task." A sample goal sheet is found on page 12.

Invite students to keep lists of potential topics in their writing folders as ideas occur to them. Brainstorming sessions are helpful for topic ideas, but students should be encouraged to be alert for ideas everywhere. A conversation with a friend or relative, a personal experience, or an observation in the school lunchroom may all inspire ideas for new stories or essays. In addition, have students collect their story maps and reproducibles in their folders. These pieces will be used during the prewriting process.

Students' reading journals are another possible source of ideas to incorporate into new fiction or non-fiction stories. Encourage students to refer to their journals as they write to prompt memories and ideas about the genre. Class periods might consist of two or more of the following activities.

- Concentrated writing time
- Conferences with peers or teacher
- Editing and revising
- Publishing the final draft
- Daily language activities
Concentrated Writing Time

Set aside a specified time period of 15–40 minutes for students to write in their writing notebooks. You may wish to set a timer so everyone knows when Concentrated Writing Time (CWT) is over. Students may then switch to another activity, such as conferences, editing, or researching, or continue to write, if that is their plan for the day. Encourage students to let their thoughts flow as they write. This is the time to get their ideas on paper. It should be a creative and rewarding session.

To make CWT most profitable, try following these guidelines.

- Students should be encouraged to get comfortable.
- Everyone writes, including the teacher.
- Everyone stays in one spot.
- No one talks.

Conferences with Peers or Teacher

Students may wish to discuss their work with you or with their peers. Before meeting, instruct students to choose an area or two that they would like to discuss, such as spelling, punctuation, content, or another specific skill. This allows you and the students to focus your concentration rather than become overwhelmed with too many aspects of a piece of writing.

If students choose to confer with each other, they should seek peer response to the content of their writings or editing help with punctuation, spelling, form, and so on. Stress to students evaluating their peers’ work that comments should be helpful and insightful. Before students meet with their classmates, instruct them to prepare three or four questions about their work that will help the peer-review process.

Questions might include:

- What type of language do you hear? (descriptive, idioms, words with double meanings)
- Does my sequence of events make sense?
- Is there anything you don’t understand?
- Did I use any words incorrectly?

As students review each other’s work, suggest that they present at least two grows and two glows. A grow is a comment that will help classmates improve their work. A glow is a comment recognizing something a classmate does well. Both students benefit from grows and glows as the respondent must be able to name specific skills that need improvement or represent achievement.

Oral Presentations

Speaking in front of a group is a valuable skill for students to develop. A natural place in which to develop the skill is in the classroom, among friends. Although most oral presentations will be assigned in advance, you may wish to occasionally heighten the challenge by assigning some spontaneous presentations. In this case, you would omit the fourth item from the evaluation criteria. Here are some guidelines for developing public speaking skills in your students.

Requirements for Assigned Presentations

- Try to plan for two oral presentations per student per quarter. One may be spontaneous.
- One presentation should be done solo.
- Presentations should be between two and five minutes in length.
- Topics may not be repeated by the same student.
- Presentations may include visual aids, such as costumes, pictures, charts, or models.
- Post a blank schedule and invite students to sign up for the time slot they wish.

Requirements for Spontaneous Presentations

- Select students at random in whatever fashion you choose.
- Invite each presenter to select a topic from your topic supply (brainstorm these topics at the beginning of the year with your students).
- Remind students that if they are uncomfortable with their first pick, they may pick one more time.
- Give students one minute in which to prepare their presentations, which should last approximately two minutes.
- Try to have each student give one spontaneous presentation each quarter.
- Aim for three or four spontaneous presentations each week.
Ideas for Assigned Presentations

- Research report
- TV commercial
- Book or movie review
- Profile of famous person

- Book report
- Skit
- Demonstration
- Current events discussion

Feedback

Encourage students to provide feedback at the end of each presentation using grows and glows. A grow is something that will help the presenter improve his or her work. A glow recognizes something a student is doing well. Both grows and glows should be stated in specific terms. The following criteria may be kept in mind for evaluation purposes.

- The introduction catches and holds the audience's interest.
- The presentation is well-organized (has a distinct beginning, middle, end) and flows well.
- Correct language usage has been observed throughout.
- The presentation has been well planned and practiced.
- The presentation demonstrates originality and creativity.
- The conclusion satisfactorily ties together the important points of the presentation.
INTRODUCING THE GENRE

What better way to get students interested in reading than to have them read about children their own age? The main characters in realistic fiction could be from neighborhoods like those of your students or they could live lives totally unique to your class’s experience. The story could take place in someone’s backyard, in a school, or even a faraway country. But wherever the story is told, students may come to understand that they are not alone in the things they feel. By reading realistic fiction, students may learn that children all over the country—in fact, all over the globe—share thoughts, feelings, ideas, dreams, and hopes similar to their own.

- Page 16 provides summaries and suggested activities from three choice selections of realistic fiction.
- For more examples of wonderful realistic fiction, turn to page 24 for a sample bibliography.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 17-18.
- Writing activities begin on page 19.
Check Out These Titles

To get students into the genre, you may wish to share excerpts from one of the following books. Or, read the entire book aloud, encouraging students to listen for the components of this genre. The books below are suggestions. Feel free to use any others you deem appropriate. If time permits, invite students to participate in the activities that follow.

Philip Hall Likes Me, I Reckon, Maybe by Bette Greene (Dell Publishing, 1974). Beth Lambert has a problem—Philip Hall wins at everything. Could it be that she lets him win? (A Newbery Honor Book)

- Beth starts a vegetable stand to raise money. Have students work in groups to come up with their own ways to raise money. (math)
- Beth is allergic to dogs. Have students research why people have allergies. (science)
- Divide the class into groups to choose their favorite parts of the book and present their review to the class. (oral language)

Child of the Owl by Laurence Yep (HarperCollins, 1977). Students meet a young girl from San Francisco’s Chinatown who tries to find acceptance in both the Chinese and American communities.

- Research ethnic neighborhoods in their communities or in a community nearby. (social studies)
- Create a chart to compare Casey’s life with their own. (self-awareness)
- Investigate the precious stones and metals that jewelry is made from. (science)

Hello, My Name Is Scrambled Eggs by Jamie Gilson (Minstrel Books, 1986). Harvey Trumble’s family has taken in a refugee family from Vietnam. Harvey wants to teach Tuan all about America, but it’s difficult when Tuan sees things so differently from Harvey.

- Explore Vietnam and other countries of Asia. (social studies)
- Delve into what motivates the characters. (critical thinking)
- Debate the different things that Harvey and Quint teach Tuan. (analysis)

Journal Prompts

Invite students to write about the story you read to the class or the realistic fiction they read on their own. To get them started, suggest the following journal prompts. As students write about the literature, encourage them to think about writing a realistic-fiction piece of their own.

- Think about something that happened to the character. How would you have handled the situation?
- How does this character’s life differ from yours?
- If you could retitle this book, what would you call it? Why do you think this title is appropriate?
- Why do you think the characters reacted as they did? Find an example from the story and write about it.
- Did you learn a lesson from this story? If so, what was it, and how might you use it in your own life?
- Pretend the main character visits your town. What would you show him or her?
Think about a story you could write about events that might really happen. You might set your story in your own school or neighborhood, or challenge yourself to write about a different place you might have visited. Create a character who has a problem and write about it. End your realistic fiction with a resolution to the problem.

The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Before students begin to write, have them first jot down their story ideas. Pass out the reproducible on page 20 to help students thoroughly think through their pieces. You might also suggest that they plan their stories' events by using the map on page 22. Once students have basic ideas or outlines for their stories, encourage them to start writing.

Draft
Tell students that in the draft stage, they are to let their thoughts and ideas flow onto the paper. Stress that grammar and spelling aren't that important yet. What is important is making sure they adequately relate their story ideas.

Rewrite
Now have students read their stories to see if they make sense. Explain that at this point they should check any spelling or grammar rules they were unclear about. Encourage students to exchange their stories with peers, who will read them with fresh eyes. Have peer reviewers point out anything they find confusing or lackluster. Instruct students to go back over their stories to fix any murky parts.

Proofread
Have students read over their final versions, checking for spelling and grammar errors. Again, you might let students read each other's work, commenting this time only on grammatical mistakes.

Publish
Now it is time to invite students to share their work. Post the stories on the bulletin board, and set aside time for groups of students to read each other's work. After about a week, take the stories from the board and combine them into a class short-story anthology of realistic fiction.
To help organize your ideas, fill in the story map below. This map will help you to build the excitement of your story as your character moves toward a solution to his or her conflict or problem.

Climax
(Problem Comes to a Head)

Introduce Problem

Exposition
(The Story Begins)

Resolve Problem

Denouement
(The Story Ends)
More Writing Projects

Encourage students to practice their writing in the following ways.

- Think about the story you read. What do you think might happen next to the characters? Write about it in a story sequel. You might come up with a new problem for the character or suggest that someone new has moved into his or her neighborhood.

- Choose a scene from the story to relate in a comic strip. Divide a sheet of art paper into squares for each comic-strip frame. Then draw in the characters and write their words in speech balloons.

- Pretend you are an advice columnist. One of the characters in the story has written to you for help. Write a letter from the character explaining the problem and write a response as the advice columnist might.

- Write a journal entry for one of the characters explaining or discussing something that happened in the story.

Every year, one new book is selected by the American Library Association as the best in children's literature. This is a daunting task, since so many children's books are published each year. That's why Newbery winners and honor books demand special attention. They have achieved the highest recognition and students should be exposed to these excellent books. As students read, have them think about what makes the book special. Why do they think a panel of judges selected it as the best book of the year? Do they agree with the judges' decision?

- Page 26 provides summaries and suggested activities from three Newbery Medal winners.
- The bibliography on page 34 lists past Newbery winners. We've provided extra lines so you can add new winners each year.

Newbery Medal winners do not fall into any one category. They might be about history, about fantasy, or about real-life matters important to young adults. The three books below represent just a sampling of what you will find on the Newbery list.

Young Fu of the Upper Yangtze by Elizabeth Foreman Lewis (Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1932). Students will be transported not only back in time but also to faraway China, where a young boy lives in Chunking and is apprenticed to a copper-smith. Chinese beliefs and the changing of this country are vividly portrayed.

- Create a time line of Young Fu’s experiences. (critical thinking)
- Explore the history of China. (social studies)
- Read some Chinese folktales. (literature)

Gathering of Days by Joan W. Blos (Aladdin, 1982). What was life like in New England in the 1800s? As students read this journal kept by a 13-year-old girl, they discover the joys as well as the sorrows of this time.

- Research what your community was like in the 1800s. (history)
- Create get-well cards for Cassie. (art)
- Role-play being Catherine and her friends in a scene from the story. (drama)

M.C. Higgins the Great by Virginia Hamilton (Macmillan, 1974). M.C.’s family lives in danger of a stripped mountain crashing on top of their home. How can he save his family from such peril? Could the stranger with the weird box that can capture his mother’s voice be the answer? Or is it something else?

- Pretend M.C.’s mom becomes a singer. Create an album cover for her first recording. (art/writing)
- Investigate strip mining and its effects on the land. (science/ecology)
- Research who first invented the tape recorder, records, and the phonograph. (biography)

Journal Prompts

Encourage students to write in their journals about the stories they read. The following prompts will get them started. As students write, suggest that they ponder why these books were considered the best new books in children's literature the years they were published.

- How do you feel about the main character? Is he or she someone you would be friends with? Why or why not?

- Place yourself in the story. What advice would you give the main character?

- If you were to visit the setting of the story, what would you see? Describe it as if seen with your own eyes.

- Pretend you are an actor and this book is being made into a movie. You have the choice of portraying any character in the story. Which character would you choose to be? Why?

- Pretend this story is told from another character's point of view. Write one incident as he or she would see it.

- This book won the Newbery Award. If the main character could win an award, which award would it be? You can make one up or present an old one.
Think about what makes the book you read an award-winning title. Is it the author's style? Is it the subject? Examine and analyze what the Newbery author has achieved, and then try to write your own award-winning story.

Use the questions below to help analyze the author's craft.

What did the author choose to write about? ____________________________________________

Would you consider this an important topic? Why or why not? ____________________________________________

How would you describe the author's style? Is it simple? Descriptive? Did you find it easy to read? ____________________________________________

Find five sentences that you think are good examples of the writer's style.

1. ____________________________________________
2. ____________________________________________
3. ____________________________________________
4. ____________________________________________
5. ____________________________________________

Finally, do you think the author effectively conveyed the message of the story?

Explain your answer. ____________________________________________
The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Before they begin to write, have students first study the craft of the authors of their Newbery Medal titles, using the reproducible on page 30. Then have them outline their own story ideas by filling in the boxes on page 32. Encourage students to think their stories through clearly in the prewrite stage.

Draft
Now have students transfer their ideas into story format. Remind them that most Newbery books have a message or moral to teach. Suggest that students keep this message in mind as they write so that they don't lose the focus of the story. Stress that at this stage they should not worry so much about grammar and spelling—simply about getting their ideas down on paper.

Rewrite
Most likely, your rewrite period will take place a day or so after the drafting stage. Share with students that it is sometimes good practice to put what they have written aside for a while, then pick it up again. With fresh eyes, they may notice things that don't make sense in their plots and hear sentences that sound awkward. Encourage students to fix these problems as they rewrite.

Proofread
Once students are satisfied with their final versions, tell them to go through the stories more thoroughly now for spelling, grammar, and punctuation errors. Suggest that students consult the dictionary as well as student proofreaders for help with their final stories.

Publish
Invite volunteers to share their stories in an “Award-Winning Afternoon of Readers’ Theater.” You might ask them to tell which Newbery title they read and which author’s craft they studied. Afterward, combine all the stories into your own Award-Winning Anthology.
To help organize your ideas, complete the story chart below. Refer to the chart as you write your story to recall ideas.

More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to try some of the writing projects suggested below.

- Pretend that the Newbery book you read just received the award last week. Write a review of the book for your school paper, contributing your thoughts about why it should or should not have won this prestigious medal.

- Now imagine that your story has just won the Newbery Medal. How would you react? Write an acceptance speech to the American Library Association, thanking them for this great honor.

- Create a book jacket for either your Newbery title or the story you wrote. Remember that book-jacket flaps include a summary of the story as well as information about the author. Illustrate the book jacket, too.

- Write an ad for a major magazine that tells people why they should read this book. Include that it was a Newbery Medal winner and add some highlights from the plot. Refer to other magazine ads for design and language ideas.

Reading books about animals is not just for young children. There are many wonderful and exciting books with animal characters written for middle-graders. Stories with animal characters enable students to experience emotions from a new perspective as well as instill a sense of sympathy and empathy.

- Page 36 provides summaries and suggested activities from three choice selections of the genre.
- On page 44 you will find a bibliography of other Animal Tale books. Feel free to add to the list.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 37–38.
- Writing activities start on page 39.
Check Out These Titles

The following three books serve as prime examples of the genre. Select excerpts from one or all three to share with students. If time permits, try the suggested activities.

A Cricket in Times Square by George Selden (Farrar, Straus, & Giroux, 1960). This book revolves around Chester the musical cricket and his friends, Harry the cat and Tucker the mouse, at a newsstand in Times Square, in New York City.
- Create puppets to summarize the story. (oral language)
- Research how crickets and other insects communicate. (science)
- Explore Times Square and New York City. (social studies)

The Incredible Journey by Sheila Burnford (Bantam, 1990).
Students will enjoy following three loyal pets—a Labrador retriever, a bull terrier, and a Siamese cat—as they cross 250 miles of wilderness to reach Canada.
- Make a map of the incredible journey. (geography)
- Role-play an interview with one of the animals. (drama)
- Learn about the proper way to care for a pet. (science)

Bunnicula: A Rabbit Tale of Mystery by Deborah and James Howe (Avon, 1980). Bunnicula is a favorite with many middle-schoolers. Readers join in as the household pets try to figure out who’s been draining the vegetables. Could it be their new pet rabbit? Is the rabbit really a vampire?
- Write a creepy song about Bunnicula, set to a popular tune. (music)
- Research the rabbit family. (science)
- Create masks of the characters. (art)

Record what happens in your book by filling in the map.
Encourage students to write in their journals about the stories they read. The following prompts will get them started. Prompts will help students not only to further analyze the story but also to relate the genre to their own writings.

- If you could be one of the animals in the story you read, which would you be? Why?

- Write a short paragraph about another adventure for the animal characters.

- Pretend a new animal moves into the story neighborhood. What animal would it be and what might happen? How would the former characters react?

- Pretend you are a movie director. You are casting a new movie based on the animal story. Which actors and actresses do you think would be best for the animal characters? Explain why.

- Come up with a new name for one of the animals. Why is this name appropriate?

- If you were writing a story with animal characters, which animals would you choose? What would your story be about?
Animals make interesting story characters. When they take on human characteristics, it is called anthropomorphism. Animals talk, think, and act just as people might.

Create a story with animal characters. Answer the questions below to help organize your ideas.

Characters: Which animals will I use?

Setting: Where will my animals live, and where will most of the action take place?

Point of View: Who will tell the story?

Plot: What will my animal characters be doing?

Purpose: Will my story inform others about an important animal issue, or will it be merely for entertainment?

Other Factors: Will people be in the story? What problem might the animals need to solve?
The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Suggest that students use their notes from page 40 and the story map on page 42 to record their ideas. Encourage them to write their ideas in pencil on their maps so they can easily make changes.

Draft
Instruct students to write a rough draft of their animal stories. Remind them not to worry about spelling or grammar rules yet. The important thing in the draft stage is to write down ideas before they escape. Encourage students to consider the personalities of the animals they wish to write about.

Rewrite
Encourage students to read their stories to see if they make sense. At this time, have students make corrections to grammar and spelling. Remind them to check that they have written in complete sentences and that they have conveyed events in chronological order.

Proofread
After students read their stories for final corrections, encourage them to exchange their stories with partners. Instruct partners to look for spelling and grammar mistakes and to inform the writers if any parts were unclear to them.

Publish
Have volunteers share their stories with the class. Then collect the stories into a class Animal Tales Book. Leave the book in your reading center or donate it to a younger class or the school library for others to enjoy.
Fill in the story map below to help organize your ideas. This will help keep events in chronological order.

What happened first?

What happened next?

What happened next?

What happened last?
More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to try some of the writing projects suggested below.

- Prepare a poster that diagrams the events in either the story you read or the story you wrote. Draw illustrations for key moments and label them with captions that explain the action taking place.

- Write a character sketch for one of the characters in the story you read or the one you wrote. Include such things as a physical description, attitudes, behaviors, and feelings.

- Design a print ad to “sell” your book. The ad will go in magazines and newspapers. Research some similar ads on which to model your own.

- Create a book jacket for this book. Draw the cover illustration and write a book summary. Also include a short biography of the author and jot down the publisher’s information.
Titles that might be selected for this genre include, but are not limited to, the following.

Agnes the Sheep by William Taylor (Scholastic, Inc., 1991).

Bunnicula: A Rabbit Tale of Mystery by Deborah and James Howe (Avon, 1980).

I Am Leaper by Annabel Johnson (Scholastic, Inc., 1992).

Justin Morgan Had a Horse by Marguerite Henry (Macmillan Books for Young Readers, 1954).

Rabbit Hill by Robert Lawson (Viking, 1944).

Shiloh by Phyllis Reynolds Naylor (Dell, 1992).

Summer of the Monkeys by Wilson Rawls (Bantam, 1992).

The Cricket in Times Square by George Selden (Dell, 1993).

The Incredible Journey by Sheila Burnford (Bantam, 1990).

The Wind in the Willows by Kenneth W. Graham, Jr. (Tor Books, 1989).

Watership Down by Richard Adams (Buccaneer Books, 1994).
INTRODUCING THE GENRE

When students think about biographies, they may envision reading about people who lived hundreds of years ago. In their minds, biographies might be synonymous with George Washington, Florence Nightingale, and Harriet Tubman. And while of course biographies of these people are excellent reading material, students should also realize that biographies can be about contemporary figures as well. In fact, if students feel more inclined to read a biography about a contemporary athlete or performer, encourage them. They just might discover that they enjoy reading biographies, which could lead them to explore others on their own.

- Page 46 provides summaries and suggested activities from three choice biographies.
- On page 54 you will find a bibliography of other biographies. Feel free to add to the list.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 47–48.
- Writing activities start on page 49.
Check Out These Titles

The following three books are excellent biographies to share with the class. Select excerpts to read from each person’s life. If time permits, let students complete the cross-curricular activities.

Baseball Legends: Joe DiMaggio by Marty Appel (Chelsea House, 1990). Joe DiMaggio is just one of over 30 baseball heroes featured in this series. Includes black-and-white photographs.
- Figure out how baseball statistics are calculated. (math)
- Research the location of home cities of other professional league baseball teams. (geography)
- Investigate the beginnings of baseball. (history)

Coretta Scott King by Diane Patrick. (Franklin Watts, 1991). Illustrated with black-and-white photographs, this biography chronicles the life of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.’s widow.
- Role-play an interview session between a reporter and Coretta Scott King. (oral language)
- Create a time line of the civil rights movement. (history)
- Design a memorial commemorating Coretta Scott King and her contributions. (art/writing)

- Explore the invention of the television. (science)
- Locate old Bill Cosby shows on videotape to review. (visual literacy)
- Role-play an evening at your house with Bill Cosby as a guest. (drama)
Who is your biography about?

When did this person live?

What was this person famous for?

Where and when was this person born?

What was his or her schooling like?

What dreams did she or he have while growing up?

What would you consider one turning point in this person's life?

Who were other people who helped this person achieve his or her goals?

Do you feel this person struggled much to reach his or her dreams?

Explain your answer.

Do you think it was a good idea to write a biography about this person?

Why or why not?

Cause and Effect in the Life of

Often in a person's life, one event causes something to happen, which in turn causes something else to happen, and so on. Record the cause-and-effect moments of this person's life in the diagram below.
Journal Prompts

Encourage students to write in their journals about the biographies they read. The following prompts will get them started. Prompts such as these not only help students further analyze the biography but also help them relate the story to their own writings.

- Is this someone you would like to have grown up with? Why or why not?
- Pretend that you are this person's brother or sister. Explain how you feel about him or her.
- Do you think this person would be someone you would like as a friend? Why or why not?
- What do you think was this person's greatest accomplishment?
- Pretend you bump into this person on the sidewalk. How would you act? What would you say?
- Which teacher in school do you think would be most proud of this person? For example, a math teacher, science teacher, or gym teacher? Choose a teacher and explain your answer.
Think about someone who interests you. It might be an important person from history or a groundbreaking scientist. It may be someone we read about in the media today. It could even be someone who is not well-known—someone who inspires you, such as a person in your family or community.

Research the person you have chosen in order to write a biography about him or her.

Name of subject

Date of subject’s birth

Place of birth/childhood

Description of childhood and schooling

Someone who influenced this person and how the influence was felt

Subject’s dreams or ambitions

How dreams or ambitions were achieved

Subject was eventually known for

I am interested in this person because
Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
As students research their subjects, encourage them to use the worksheet on page 50 to record their ideas. Also suggest that they jot down important moments in the person’s life in chronological order using the time line on page 52.

Draft
Once students feel they have obtained enough information, invite them to start writing. Encourage them to organize their information in a pleasing way that will engage their readers. As they write, remind students to speculate on motivating events that shaped their subjects’ lives. Tell students to write their ideas as they come to them.

Rewrite
Now have students reread their drafts in order to more fully shape them. Mention that students should be sure the information they present is consistent. Also have them make sure they relay the events of the persons’ lives in chronological order. Finally, ask students if they feel they have painted accurate pictures of their subjects.

Proofread
Once students are satisfied with their final biographies, instruct them to proofread for spelling and grammar mistakes. Encourage them to check words they are unsure of in dictionaries or use the spell-checking function of their word processing program. Suggest that they get advice from classmates for proper punctuation and grammar techniques.

Publish
Invite students to share their biographies with the class. Encourage students, before presenting, to explain why they chose to write about their subjects. Then have students read the biographies slowly and clearly. Collect all the biographies to keep in a biography folder in your reading or social studies center.
Fill in the dates on the time line below. Then write what happened in your subject's life on each important date.
More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to try some of the projects below.

- An autobiography is the story of someone's life told by that person. Imagine that the person you wrote about wrote his or her autobiography. Write an excerpt from it. Remember to write as if you were that person.

- A newspaper has decided that the person you read or wrote about is its person of the week. What would the newspaper say in a short essay about this person? Write a short piece for the newspaper.

- Write a fan letter to either the person you read about or the person you wrote about. Explain why you are writing and what intrigues you about this person.

- Now imagine that this person wants to thank all those who have written fan letters. Write a thank-you message from this person back to you.
Bibliography

Titles that might be selected for this genre include, but are not limited to, the following.

Amelia Earhart, Aviator by Nancy Shore (Chelsea House, 1987).

Christopher Columbus, Admiral of the Ocean Sea by Jim Haskins (Scholastic, Inc., 1991).

Jim Abbott, Against All Odds by Ellen Emerson White (Scholastic, Inc., 1990).

John Fitzgerald Kennedy: America’s 35th President by Barry Denenberg (Scholastic, Inc., 1988).

The Life & Words of Martin Luther King, Jr. by Ira Peck (Scholastic, Inc., 1991).

The Wright Brothers: How They Invented the Airplane by Russell Freedman (Holiday, 1991).

INTRODUCING THE GENRE

Many books for middle-grade readers are set during historic moments in time. And what better way to motivate students to learn about history then to read a fictional account of historic events? From the hardships of the Native Americans to the survivors of Vietnam, historical fiction can be enlightening and inspiring. And since most books of this genre center around or are told by a main character of your students' ages, the books become even more meaningful to them.

- Page 56 provides summaries and suggested activities from three choice selections of historical fiction.
- Check out the bibliography on page 64 for other excellent choices of historical fiction.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis begin on page 57.
- Writing activities start on page 59.
Check Out These Titles

To begin your study of historical fiction, read an exciting excerpt from one of the books below or choose one from the bibliography. Feel free to come up with your own titles as well. Do not provide an introduction to your selection. Instead, challenge students to figure out when the story takes place. You might then backtrack to read the entire book or continue reading to find out what happens. If time and interest permit, involve students in the activities that follow.

Number the Stars by Lois Lowry (Dell Publishing, 1992). It is 1943 in Denmark. Nazi soldiers are “relocating” Jewish families, including that of Annemarie Johansen’s best friend. But Annemarie is about to embark on a mission that could save her friend’s life. An insightful look at Jewish persecution in World-War-II Europe.
- Explore Denmark and Copenhagen. (social studies)
- Research World War II to learn what Germany wanted to gain and how the United States intervened. (history)
- Investigate how World War II impacted life in the United States. (history)

- Research Crazy Horse and other historical figures from the book.
- Locate the areas mentioned in the book on a map to see what the Native Americans were fighting for. (geography)
- Role-play interviewing key figures in the story to consider their points of view. (oral language)

The Witch of Blackbird Pond by Elizabeth George Speare (Houghton Mifflin, 1958). Is life in Puritan Connecticut very different from life in Barbados in 1687? Kit finds out firsthand when she is accused of being a witch.
- Explore views of different religious groups in early America, such as the Puritans and the Quakers. (social studies)
- Review the colonies’ dissatisfaction with England. (history)
- Compare sunny Barbados to wintry Connecticut. (geography)

Which events in the book are historical, and which are fiction? ____________________________________________

What problem does the main character face? ____________________________________________

How does the main character resolve the problem? ____________________________________________

What are your impressions about this period of time? Would you have liked to have lived back then? Why or why not? ____________________________________________

Do you think something like this could happen today? Why or why not? ____________________________________________
Fill in the story events on the time line below. Place a star next to the events that are true historical references.
Journal Prompts

Encourage students to speculate about the stories they read or heard by writing in their journals. Offer these prompts to get students started.

- What would you have done if you were faced with the challenges that the main character faced? How would you have reacted?

- Choose one of the human conflicts in the story and write a change in the event that could change the course of history.

- Describe in three sentences the time and setting of the book.

- Place yourself in the story as a friend of the main character. What advice would you give him or her about the circumstances of the story?

- What have you learned about history by reading this story?

- If you could travel back in time in a time machine, which historical period would you like to visit? Why would you choose it?
WRITE YOUR OWN STORY

Is there a moment in history that particularly interests you? It might be a historic time in our country, such as the pioneer days, or it might be a time in Asian or European history when kings, emperors, and tsars ruled the land. Maybe it is as recent as 20 or 30 years ago. Put yourself in that time period and write a story about it.

Answer the questions below to help organize your ideas.

Characters: Who are the main characters?

Setting: During which historic time and in which area will my story take place?

Point of View: Who will tell the story?

Plot: What is the main idea of the story?

Other Factors: How will history play a part in my story?

Which historic figures might my character meet?
The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Because of the historic nature of the genre, you will need to set aside time for students to research their time periods in the library. Suggest that students look through encyclopedias and nonfiction books to gain necessary information. Let them use the chart on page 62 to organize their information. Once they have an understanding of what the time period was like, invite them to write down ideas for their stories, using the reproducible on page 60.

Draft
Now that students have completed the groundwork for their stories, encourage them to write. Suggest that their stories be told from either the third-person narrator point of view or from the first-person, as if the main character is telling what happened. Remind students that the most important element at this stage is to get their ideas down on paper.

Rewrite
Instruct students to read over their stories. Are they happy with how they've presented their ideas? Does the story make sense to them? Do they aptly get across the historic time period as well as the personalities of their characters? Explain that in the rewrite stage, students are to make any corrections necessary to improve and enhance the overall presentations of their stories.

Proofread
Now that the general content of their stories is satisfactory to them, instruct students to go back and check for spelling and grammar errors. After students make corrections once, encourage them to exchange papers with a classmate for further proofreading.

Publish
Invite students to share their stories with the class. You may wish to have them tape the stories and challenge the class to imagine that they are listening to a radio drama. Combine all the stories into a class book of historical fiction.
To help organize your research, fill in the boxes below. Use what you learn to enhance the historical nature of your story.

Who were the key people during this time?

What were homes and schools like?

What were the major industries?

How did people dress? Draw a picture.
More Writing Projects

Encourage students to practice writing using some of the following suggestions.

- Consider a historical time period or event that you read or wrote about. Write a newspaper headline and lead paragraph for it. Be sure to include the five Ws (who, what, when, where, why/how).

- Pretend that the main character in either the story you read or the story you wrote is being interviewed by a talk-show host. What questions might the host ask and how would the character answer? Write at least ten questions and answers.

- Design and write a travel brochure about the setting and time of the story you read or wrote that would attract tourists to visit. What might visitors expect to see there?

- Write a journal entry for one of the characters explaining or expanding on something that happened in the story.

INTRODUCING THE GENRE

NONFICTION

Students should consider nonfiction their highway to learning about the world. Just about everything they could ever want to know can be found in books. Nonfiction may be considered dry and boring by some students—not nearly as exciting as reading about kids' adventures or following someone's life. They may feel that nonfiction books are only for research assignments. By sharing with students a variety of nonfiction books, you may help them discover that nonfiction reading can be just as rewarding as other types of literature.

- Page 66 provides summaries and suggested activities for three selected nonfiction books.
- On page 74 you will find a bibliography of other nonfiction books. Many can be found on your library shelves. Feel free to add to the list.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 67–68.
- Writing activities start on page 69.
Check Out These Titles

The following three books are fun examples of nonfiction literature to share with the class. Present excerpts to demonstrate the fascinating things one can discover when reading nonfiction. If time permits, let students complete the cross-curricular activities.

The Art of Sculpture, "Voyages of Discovery" series (Scholastic, 1993). This book provides a wonderful introduction to art. Sculpture is defined as the first art form.
- Mold a statue out of clay. (art)
- Research the cultures of one of the ancient civilizations mentioned. (social studies)
- Locate on a map the places where artifacts have been discovered. (geography)

The Night Sky by Dennis Mammana (Running Press, 1989). This book provides clear yet exciting explanations for the things students see in the night sky, as well as hands-on experiments they can try on their own.
- Create and name your own constellation. (creative thinking)
- Investigate the first manned missions into space. (history)
- Research famous scientists who have made important space discoveries. (biography)

Eyewitness Books: North American Indian by David Murdoch (Alfred A. Knopf, 1995). All the books in the "Eyewitness Books" series are not only stellar resources but also terrific ways to engage students in perusing nonfiction works.
- Create a diorama of a Native American village. (art)
- Try dyeing your own white squares of cloth using berries and other natural elements. (science)
- Study the music, poetry, and legends of different Native American peoples. (music/literature)

Journal Prompts

Encourage students to jot down the thoughts they had while reading their nonfiction books. Suggest the following prompts to encourage writing. As they write, have students consider a nonfiction topic they would like to explore.

- Before you opened this book, what did you hope to discover?

- Pretend you are a scientist or historian investigating this subject. Which new fact did you find most surprising? Why?

- You wish to present what you learned to a panel of esteemed colleagues. Write a summarizing paragraph to explain what you learned.

- Write a “blurb” that would encourage someone else to enjoy this book.

- Do you think the title of this book is appropriate? Why or why not?

- Pretend you are a book reviewer. Express your opinion of the book, your likes and dislikes, in two paragraphs. Be sure to support your opinions with examples.

- Your parents are surprised to see you reading a nonfiction book. Explain why you chose to read it in a couple of sentences.
Think about something that interests you. You can choose any subject—Russian history, music, outer space, modern dance—whatever you would like to learn about.

Research your subject in order to write a nonfiction piece about it.

The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps of the writing process.

Prewrite
Before students begin drafting their nonfiction pieces, encourage them to use the worksheets on pages 70 and 72 to organize their information. The worksheet on page 70 helps students locate references and main ideas. The worksheet on page 72 helps students shape their paragraphs.

Draft
Encourage students to use their notes to write drafts for their nonfiction pieces. As they write, remind students to keep the main idea and subject in focus. Explain that they should not worry about grammar or sentence structure. Drafting means getting ideas on paper.

Rewrite
Once students have completed drafts, have them set their writing aside for a while. With fresh eyes, they are sure to be more critical of their work. As students reread their drafts, encourage them to notice structural as well as factual errors. Have they strayed from the main subject or focus of the piece? Have they avoided expressing an opinion by only reciting facts they discovered? Encourage students to revise accordingly.

Proofread
When students feel pleased with their work, have them do a final check for spelling, grammar, and punctuation errors. Suggest that they exchange work with partners, who can read objectively for any problems the authors might have missed. Remind them to use the dictionary or the spell-checking function of their word processing program.

Publish
Set aside time for students to read their work to the class. Suggest that they preface their presentations with a brief explanation about why they chose their subjects. Prompt a brief discussion after each report to exchange any new or surprising ideas the nonfiction piece revealed. Combine students' writings into a nonfiction book for your reference center.
Many nonfiction pieces are made up of explanatory paragraphs.
An explanatory paragraph has three parts.

1. introductory sentence
2. two or three sentences that support the introductory sentence
3. final sentence summarizing the paragraph.

Outline explanatory paragraphs for your nonfiction piece below.

More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to try some of the writing projects suggested below.

- Choose a scientist or someone influential in the subject area you wrote or read about. Write a biography about that person.

- Design and write the copy for a book jacket for your nonfiction book. Remember to include a summary of the information found in the book as well as information about the author. Illustrate the cover as well.

- Entice other people to read this book by advertising it on a highway billboard. Design the billboard and then write the words to accompany it.

- Do you have any other questions about this subject? Write a letter to the author asking him or her your questions. Include how you felt about the book.

The Magic School Bus Inside the Earth by Joanna Cole (Scholastic, Inc., 1989).

Pyramid by David Macaulay (HM, 1982).
Newspapers inspire students to read and write. With the variety of information newspapers contain, students are sure to find something they enjoy reading about. From world news to advice columns, newspapers not only inform but also provide a variety of writing formats. Point out to students that writing occurs in all phases of the media. The most obvious, of course, are magazines and print ads. But ask students to think of television—how do actors in commercials know what to say? How about news broadcasters? Someone wrote their scripts and their news reports. Writing is all around us, even though we may not see the actual printed words.

- Page 76 provides examples of different types of media that students should be encouraged to explore.
- Strategies for comprehension and analysis can be found on pages 77–78.
- The bibliography on page 84 suggests books about the media to provide additional background information.
- Writing activities begin on page 79.
Check Out These Media Options

Your exploration of the media shouldn't be limited to newspapers. As a homework assignment, ask students to look for all possible forms of writing. Here are some suggestions.

Newspapers

The following pages deal specifically with newspapers. Bring in several for students to investigate. Explain that students will be creating their own class newspaper. Encourage students to think about articles they would like to write. Here are some ideas:

- editorial
- comic strip
- sports article
- book review
- feature article
- advice column
- weather report
- local news story
- editorial cartoon
- movie/TV review
- international news story
- ads for local businesses

Magazines

Bring in several magazines and point out different topics of magazines, such as news, entertainment, sports, nature, various professions, gardening, and every hobby imaginable.

Advertisements

Encourage students to notice the print ads in magazines and newspapers. Bring in junk-mail ads you've received. Point out that highway billboards have to be written by someone, too.

Food Packages

Ask students if they have ever read a cereal box at the breakfast table. Explain that someone must create the copy that appears on these packages. Bring in boxes and cans for students to read.

Television and Radio News Broadcasts

Mention that almost all aspects of news broadcasts are written ahead of time—from news stories to sports commentaries.

Television and Radio Commercials

Someone has to write informative, clever copy for these ads. Usually it is a copywriter in an advertising agency—sometimes, the copywriter works for the company that produces the product.

Your newspaper story is made up of many details that support a main idea. Most articles are written in the inverted pyramid style—facts and information are stated in order of importance, beginning with the headline. This enables people to scan the newspaper by reading a headline, subhead, or lead paragraph to get important points quickly. Readers continue if the topic is of interest.

Journal Prompts

After students have explored newspapers or other types of written media, suggest that they record their thoughts and ideas in their journals. Here are some prompts to get them started.

- How do you think the reporter/writer felt while he or she was writing this article? What makes you think that?

- Write a new headline for your article.

- If the article you read was about a person, do you think he or she will be happy with the things the reporter wrote? Why or why not?

- Pretend that you have been assigned to cover a natural disaster, such as a hurricane, snowstorm, or flood. How would you approach your interview with survivors of a disaster?

- If you could go to any country to cover the world news, which country would it be? Explain why you would like to go there.

- For which medium would you prefer to write: newspapers, magazines, print advertising, television or radio advertising, television or radio news, or catalogs? Why?
WRITE YOUR OWN NEWSPAPER STORY

Your class has the chance to publish its own newspaper. Think about a newspaper story you would like to write (or one may be assigned to you). Here are some suggestions.

- local news story
- feature article
- sports article
- comic strip
- editorial
- advice column
- weather report
- book, movie, or TV review

If you are writing a news article, jot down ideas for your article below. If you have chosen a non-news item such as a comic strip or movie review, you will use a different format.

The type of article I will write will be ____________________________

My article will be about __________________________________________

1. Who is the story about? _________________________________________
2. What is the story about? _________________________________________
3. Where did the story take place? _________________________________
4. When did the story take place? _________________________________
5. Why or how did this thing happen? _______________________________

Before writing an editorial or review, complete the following.

The topic of my editorial will be ________________________________

My opinion is _____________________________________________

Reasons for my opinion are ________________________________________
The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Writing newspaper articles should be constructive yet fun. Encourage students to use the worksheets on pages 80 and 82 to record ideas. Mention that if articles require research, now is the time to do it. Explain that once students have enough background information, they may begin their articles.

Draft
Before students begin, have them read several examples of the types of articles they plan to write to familiarize themselves with the proper approach and format. Then have students write their articles, using the information they gathered during the prewrite session.

Rewrite
Now have students read over their stories and make revisions. Point out that most news articles do not reflect the writer's own views but merely present the facts. Editorials and reviews present opinions of the authors supported by facts or examples. Instruct students to make changes that will improve their work.

Proofread
Tell students that on a newspaper staff, copy editors proofread all articles. Have pairs of students exchange articles and serve as each other's copy editors, checking for errors in spelling, punctuation, and grammar.

Publish
Arrange the class into groups according to the section they wrote for (sports, news, entertainment, and so on). You may wish to have students type their articles on word processors in a two-column format. Challenge groups to lay out their pages in a pleasing way. Suggest that students create ads for local businesses or illustrate the newspaper with "photos." Combine the pages into a class newspaper. Give it a name and distribute to other classes.

More Writing Projects

Now that students have had their taste of writing for a newspaper, invite them to write for another medium. Here are some ideas.

- Work with a group to come up with a mail-order business to sell something special, such as toys, sports equipment, and so on. Create items for your catalog and write catalog descriptions for them.

- Write a travel article about your community for a travel magazine.

- Choose an object in the class. Pretend you need to sell it in a newspaper or magazine. Write an ad for the object.

- Choose another item or product to sell and write a script to advertise it in a television commercial.

INTRODUCING THE GENRE

Messages written in secret code . . . clues leading to more clues . . . a brain-twisting puzzle that appears to have no end. Who doesn’t love a good mystery? And student-aged characters who solve mysteries are an exciting read. But mysteries also serve another purpose. They encourage students to use essential critical-thinking skills. Students will find themselves, consciously or subconsciously, trying to solve the mystery. Where do the clues lead? What is the importance of the secret code? Mysteries call on students to sort out plots, employ logistics, make predictions, and analyze characters. What more could teachers ask?

- On page 86 you will find suggestions for three mystery books that will convey the nature of the genre.
- The bibliography on page 94 suggests mystery books for students to read on their own.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 87–88.
- Writing activities begin on page 89.
Check Out These Titles

Share excerpts from the following titles to get students intrigued with mysteries—if they aren’t already. In addition to the classic titles listed below, many current series are appropriate, such as the updated Hardy Boys and Nancy Drew stories. Don’t shy away from letting your students read these books. Not only do they have the proper “who-done-it?” format, but they also get students to read.

From the Mixed-Up Files of Mrs. Basil E. Frankweiler by E. L. Konigsberg (Atheneum, 1967). Students are sure to enjoy Claudia’s novel idea to run away and live at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City.
- Create a floor plan of your school, based on the floor plan of the museum in the book. (mapping)
- Draw up a brochure for a museum in or near your area. (art/travel)
- Research a piece of art and its artist. (humanities)

The Egypt Game by Zilpha Keatley Snyder (Macmillan, 1967). When April and Melanie design their own game, they never dream that it will lead to a true criminal investigation.
- Create your own board game based on a story you read. (art)
- Research what ancient Egypt was like and turn your findings into a mobile. (history)
- Investigate what it takes to be an archaeologist and write a paragraph stating whether or not you’d like to be one. (science)

Encyclopedia Brown by Donald J. Sobol (Lodestar/Morrow, 1963). Even though Leroy “Encyclopedia” Brown’s father is the chief of police, it is usually Encyclopedia who helps solve the town of Idaville’s mysteries.
- Create a medal or award to honor Encyclopedia Brown. (art)
- Act out one of the mysteries that Encyclopedia had to solve. (drama)
- Debate whether or not Encyclopedia truly has a detective’s mind. (oral language)

Journal Prompts

Encourage students to write in their journals about the mysteries they read. The following prompts will get them started. Suggest that they keep in mind the different important aspects of a mystery in order to write their own.

- Solving this mystery is big news. Come up with three newspaper headlines that summarize what happened.

- Write about how the main character felt before, during, and after the mystery.

- You are a reporter. What would you like to ask the detective or mystery solver? Come up with five questions.

- Plans are in the works to make a TV show based on the main character and other mysteries he or she might solve. What could the show be called? Explain your answer.

- Come up with another mystery for the main character to solve.

- Would you like to have the main character as a friend? Why or why not?
WRITE YOUR OWN STORY

Mystery

Is there something mysterious that might happen in your school or community? Write a mystery story of your own. Here’s a hint to get you started—figure out what the mystery is and then work backward to cover up the mystery’s tracks.

Write ideas for your mystery below.

Main Character: Who is my detective? ____________________________

Setting: Where and when does the main action of my mystery take place? ______

Point of View: Who is telling us about the mystery? __________________________

Plot: What is the mystery that has to be solved? __________________________

Outcome: What is the solution to the mystery? __________________________

Other Factors: Who will the “villains” be? __________________________

Who will the helpers be? __________________________
The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
A great deal of planning goes into the writing of a mystery. It may help to plan the ending or solution in advance. All the details of the story need to dovetail with this ending. The worksheet on page 92 has been set up to help students plot their stories backward. This way they can outline the events that lead up to the solution in chronological order.

Draft
Once students have a firm plot line in mind, invite them to start writing. Remind them that in the draft stage, the most important thing is to get their ideas down on paper. Later they can go back and check for spelling and punctuation.

Rewrite
Ask students to read their stories. Do their mysteries make sense? Are they suspenseful? Do the events leading up to the solutions provide enough clues to solve the mysteries? Have they left a few unanswered questions so the endings are not too obvious? Are they happy with their detectives? Have students rework their stories until they are satisfied.

Proofread
Have students read their stories again, paying special attention to spelling, punctuation, and grammar. Encourage students to exchange their stories with classmates and check for errors.

Publish
Select some mysteries that you feel are well written. Dim the lights in your classroom. Ask students to close their eyes and pretend that they are listening to a radio mystery drama, as people once used to do. Then read the mysteries. Before the ending of each mystery, turn on the lights and challenge students to solve it.
Write the solution to your mystery in the top box. Then think about the clues that will lead the detective to solve the mystery. What is the final, deciding clue? What clue comes before it? What is the first clue the detective stumbles upon? Write your ideas in the boxes below.
More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to stretch their writing skills by trying the following.

- Create a "Wanted" poster for the villain of the mystery you read or the mystery you wrote.

- Write a thank-you letter from the people of the community thanking the detective for solving the mystery.

- Write a short biography about the mystery solver. Include where he or she was born, details about his or her family, the school she or he attends, and any special interests (aside from detective work).

- Write the letters of the detective's name vertically down one side of a sheet of paper. For each letter, start a sentence that describes him or her.

- Pretend your detective is a performer. What are the detective's "Greatest Hits"? Write and design an album cover featuring your detective.

Sam, the Cat Detective by Linda Stewart (Scholastic, Inc., 1993).

INTRODUCING THE GENRE

This genre is a particularly exciting one for students to explore. As they read, students are transported not only through time but also to different places and realms. These books may take place in the future or on imagined faraway planets. Or they might take place in a different place altogether—a place full of magic and mystery—perhaps even in a universe parallel to earth. The themes and morals ingeniously woven into these tales are also interesting for students to unravel and study.

- Page 96 suggests three excellent choices in the genre to share with the class, as well as activities if time permits.
- On page 104 you will find a bibliography of other Science Fiction and Fantasy books. Feel free to add to the list.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 97–98.
- Writing activities start on page 99.
Check Out These Titles

The books below are prime examples of the Science Fiction/Fantasy genre. Read excerpts to provide students with a feel for these books. If time and interest hold, involve the class in the activities that follow.

Enchantress from the Stars by Sylvia Engdahl (Peter Smith, 1991). This story takes place on a distant planet, Andrecia. When visitors from another planet land there, they feel the inhabitants are inferior and set out to take over their world. But travelers from a third planet, which include the heroine Elana, intervene.

- Study the environmental effects of current-day mining practices. (ecology)
- Research recent discoveries in space. (science)
- Debate the issues presented in the book. (critical thinking)

The Dark Is Rising by Susan Cooper (Macmillan, 1973). This book is part of an award-winning series. On his 11th birthday, Will Stanton discovers that he has a secret destiny—to protect the world from the evil forces of the Dark. All the books in the series deal with good versus evil, mythical beings, and magical elements.

- Create a radio drama of the story events. (oral language)
- Investigate how crystals form. (science)
- Explore England, where Will is from. (geography)

The Book of Three by Lloyd Alexander (Atheneum, 1964). This is the first book about the mythical land of Prydain. It follows Taran and his dreams of discovering not only who he is but also who he will become. Along the way, Taran meets many amazing beings, both friends and enemies.

- Make a map of Taran's world. (geography)
- Explore Wales, the country that inspired the author to write the story. (social studies)
- Read other tales from Wales, particularly the legend of King Arthur. (literature)

Journal Prompts

The following prompts are based on Bloom’s Taxonomy. Use them not only to encourage and enhance students’ writing but also to gain knowledge of their understanding of the literature.

- How would you describe the setting? Is it a place you would like to visit? Describe the setting and explain how you feel about it. (comprehension)

- Summarize the plot in six sentences. Make sure you write your sentences in chronological order. (application)

- Which elements make this story a tale of fantasy or science fiction? Could this story really happen? Why or why not? (analysis)

- Add another character to the story. What kind of creature is it? Is it magical? Is it a normal child? What part will it play in the story? (synthesis)

- How do you feel about this story? Did you like reading about something that takes place in an imaginary world? Why or why not? Write your opinions on reading fantasy or science fiction. (evaluation)
If you could make up a world—any world at all—what would it be like? This is the kind of thing fantasy and science-fiction writers think about all the time. Would your world have magical elements? Would it be in a distant galaxy? Have a different time structure than ours? Try writing a science fiction or fantasy story. Use the questions below to get you started.

Setting: Will my story take place on a distant planet or in a magical world?

What will this world be like?

Main Character: Who will my main character be?

Will my character have any special powers?

Other Characters: Who will the other characters be?

What special abilities will these characters have, if any?

Plot: What will the characters strive to do?

Other Factors: Forces of Good

Forces of Evil
Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Before they begin to write, instruct students to plan their stories by answering the questions found on page 100 and by filling in the diagram found on page 102. Tell students that this is the stage to brainstorm all possible ideas. They may hang onto those they find most interesting and toss aside those they find less compelling.

Draft
Using their thoughts from the worksheet and diagram, encourage students to write their stories, using descriptive language that conveys what their fantasy worlds and characters are like. As they write their drafts, encourage students to keep in mind the goals their characters are striving to achieve.

Rewrite
Now that students have gotten their ideas down on paper, ask them to go over their drafts, looking for sentences that sound awkward, dialogue that sounds strained, and moments in the plot that lag or just don't make sense. Explain that in the rewrite stage, students are to fix their stories so they sound right to their own ears.

Proofread
Once students are pleased with their revisions, instruct them to proofread the story for punctuation, spelling, and grammar errors. You might allow students to exchange papers with partners and check each other's work.

Publish
Invite students to share their stories with the class. To save time, you might divide the class into small groups and encourage group members to read their stories to each other. Afterward, combine all the stories into your own science fiction/fantasy class magazine to keep in your reading center.
To help organize your ideas, fill in the story web below.
Describe your new world in the center circle. In the surrounding circles, describe the characters and any other important elements of the setting.
More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to try some of the writing projects suggested below.

- Prepare a poster depicting the climax of the story. Make sure you include the book title and author as well as a paragraph explaining the events.

- Create a travel brochure for this imaginary place. List places of interest for visitors to see as you describe the setting. Illustrate the brochure.

- Pretend the main character or another character from the story has been chosen Personality of the Month by a national magazine. Write a biographical sketch of the character, including his or her background and accomplishments.

- Is there another adventure that might happen in this magical, faraway place? Write a new story that takes place here. Perhaps the new story involves you as a main character.

INTRODUCING THE GENRE

Although some students may flinch at the idea of poetry, it is an ideal literary form for student study. Poetry pushes students to search for comprehension and work at the craft of writing. Many poems are loaded with literary techniques that can be applied to other types of writing. Poetry also comes in many different forms—even shapes. In fact, you might make the argument that poetry allows students to be their most creative—to freely express their thoughts in flowing lines that can rhyme, but don’t have to, that can follow a pattern, but don’t have to. Students’ poems can be whatever they want. The key is to make every word count.

- Page 106 provides examples of different types of poetry for students to explore.
- The bibliography on page 114 suggests poetry anthologies by premier poets as well as various collections.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and poetry analysis can be found on pages 107–108.
- Writing activities begin on page 109.
Check Out These Poetic Styles

Before reading poetry, it may be wise to review with students some different poetic styles. Poems come in many forms. The forms your students choose to try can be suggested by you or left up to them. Here are some guidelines.

- Rhyming Couplet: simple verse in which the last words rhyme.

  I think it's great,
  That you can skate.

- Quatrain: a poem with four lines. The lines may all rhyme or rhyming lines may be offset.

  I think it's great,
  I think it's nice,
  That we can skate,
  Upon the ice.

- Limerick: silly five-line poems with a distinct pattern.

  I once knew a woman named Kate,
  Who decided she wanted to skate.
  She took off 'cross the ice,
  And she fell once, then twice,
  But we think that Katy skates great.

- Cinquain: five-line poems that are great for building vocabulary.

  Snow (subject, noun)
  Silent, silvery (two adjectives)
  Falling, whirling, floating (three verbs)
  Covering the street so white. (descriptive phrase)
  Winter (noun)

- Haiku: Japanese poetry style consisting of three lines with 5 syllables in the first line, 7 syllables in the second, and 5 in the third. Most haiku are about nature.

  Autumn leaves fall down,
  Billowy piles at my feet,
  I tumble in them.

- Shape Poem: format takes on the shape of its subject.

- Free-form: poems that don't necessarily rhyme or follow a strict pattern.

Journal Prompts

Encourage students to write in their journals about the poems they read. The following prompts will get them started. Point out to students that poetry can take on different styles. What kinds of poems might they like to write?

- Would you choose to write about the same subject as the poet? Why or why not?

- Think about what inspired the poet to write a poem on this subject. Explain the poet's choice from the poet's point of view.

- If you could add a line or two to the poem, what would you write? Write your new lines in your journal.

- Pretend that this poem is a song. Which contemporary singer would sing this poem? Explain your answer.

- Judging the poet by the style of the poem, what do you think the poet might be like? Write a personality sketch of the poet.

- Write a new title for the poem. Explain why you think it is appropriate.
Consider a subject you would like to write a poem about. Remember, poetry doesn’t have to be serious! Your poem can be about something funny, about something everyday, about a color, a feeling, a season, a friend, an animal—anything! It’s up to you.

Write your ideas below.

When people read my poem, I would like them to feel

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
Poetry writing shouldn’t be intimidating to students. Give them ample time to consider formats and ideas, perhaps setting up a free-flow thought period. Encourage students to plan their poems using the worksheet on page 110. For students who wish to come up with rhyming words, pass out the rhyming web on page 112. Students may also map out their poems using the Poetry Detail Chart on page 108.

Draft
Encourage students to combine their thoughts and ideas into poems. Remind students that their poems do not have to rhyme. As students write, suggest that they keep in mind the mood they wish their poems to evoke. How do they want readers to feel as they read this poem?

Rewrite
Have students set their poems aside to read later with fresh eyes. How do they like their poems the second time around? Are there words or phrases they would like to change? Are there new ideas they would like to add? Do they enjoy the flow and rhythm of their poems? Encourage students to make the changes they feel are needed.

Proofread
Have students read their poems one final time to make sure they have spelled all the words correctly and punctuated the lines properly. Allow students to exchange their poems with classmates to check for basic errors.

Publish
Arrange the class in a cozy circle so students can share their poems. Since poems are usually short, encourage the entire class to participate. If students feel awkward reading their own work, they may exchange poems with partners and read their partners’ poems. Then create a class poetry anthology to keep in your reading center.
Write the word you would like to rhyme in the center circle. Then, as you think up rhyming words, write them in the surrounding circles. Keep your rhyming-word webs in your writing folder.
More Writing Projects

Remind students that poetry has many forms. Encourage your students to stretch their poetry skills by trying the following.

- Think about a favorite sport or activity. Come up with a silly character who tries to master it. Write a limerick describing what happens.

- What is your favorite color? Write a cinquain to describe it.

- Take a walk outside. Write a haiku about your experience.

- Pretend your best friend has just been awarded a special prize. You wish to honor your friend with a poem. Write a poem, in any style, about your friend.

- Think about the things that happen at your house. Write a shape poem, in the shape of your home, to tell about them.

Teacher Notes/Other
Many excellent poetry anthologies are available in your local bookstore and library. Even those for younger children can provide your students with fine models. Here are a few to check out:

Brats by X. J. Kennedy (Macmillan Books for Young Readers, 1986).

Going Over to Your Place, selected by Paul B. Janeczko (Bradbury Press, 1987).

Hailstones and Halibut Bones by Mary O’Neill (Doubleday, 1990).

Never Say Boo to a Ghost by John Foster (Scholastic, Inc., 1991).

Sing a Song of Popcorn, selected by Beatrice Schenk de Regniers, et al (Scholastic, Inc., 1988).

Something BIG Has Been Here by Jack Prelutsky (Greenwillow Books, 1990).

Spin a Soft Black Song by Nikki Giovanni (Farrar, Straus, & Giroux, 1985).

INTRODUCING THE GENRE

Let's put on a show! Writing and performing plays is a wonderful way not only to involve the whole class but also to get students to work cooperatively. Reading plays may be a new experience for your students. As they read plays you or they select, encourage them to notice the format. Dialogue is, of course, the most important component of a play. Everything we know about the characters and plot we must learn through the dialogue. Challenge students to notice other aspects as well. How is the setting described? How can we tell what the characters are feeling? Once students get the feel for the play format, they can begin to write and perform plays of their own.

- Page 116 provides summaries and a partial listing of plays from three play collections.
- On page 124 you will find a bibliography of play anthologies as well as other resources for putting on a show.
- Strategies for reading comprehension and story analysis can be found on pages 117-118.
- Writing activities start on page 119.
Check Out These Titles

The following three books contain plays that are fun to read with your students. You might choose one play and assign roles so the class may enjoy the play together. Or have students read the plays in small groups.

Plays Children Love edited by Coleman A. Jennings and Aurand Harris (Doubleday, 1981). This book is loaded with plays, many of which are based on popular children's stories.

- Ming Lee and the Magic Tree by Aurand Harris.
- Tom Sawyer by Sara Spencer.

Plays of Black Americans edited by Sylvia E. Kamerman (Plays, Inc., 1987). For a historical turn, try these plays written about moments and people in African American history.

- Harriet Tubman—the Second Moses by Aileen Fisher.
- Crispus Attucks by Aileen Fisher.
- George Washington Carver by Mildred Hark and Noel McQueen.

Contemporary Children's Theater edited by Betty Jean Liften (Equinox Books/Avon, 1974). These plays are fun and exciting and deal with contemporary issues.

- The Riddle Machine by Beth Lambert.
- Starman Jones by Douglas L. Lieberman.
- The Comical Tragedy or Tragical Comedy of Punch and Judy by Aurand Harris.

Playwright:

Who are the main characters?

Where and when does the play take place? (Setting)

What is the play about? (Plot)

What is the mood of the play? (For example, funny, serious, informational, spooky.)

How many acts does the play have?

How many scenes?

List the supporting characters.

Choose a main character.

Describe what he or she is like.

What happens at the climax of the play?
Just like other stories in other genres, the action in a play builds to a climax. Complete the diagram below to chart the play’s exposition, rising action, climax, falling action, and conclusion.

Journal Prompts

Invite students to record in their journals any thoughts, comments, and ideas they have about the plays they read. Encourage students to think about plays they might like to write.

- List the characters in your play and note the different personalities of each.

- If you were an actor, which role would you like to play? Choose a character and explain why you would like to play him or her.

- Write a new character for the play—a character that you would like to perform yourself. What would the character be like? Write a few lines for the character to say.

- Pretend this play was set in a different setting or time period. Do you think the characters would act the same way? Create a new setting and rewrite one scene in the new setting.

- Suppose that this play was produced on Broadway. Do you think you would have enjoyed it? Write a review of the play.

- Imagine that this play is a musical. What songs would you write for it? Give the titles of at least three songs you would add. Which character would sing them? Try writing the lyrics for one.
Think about an incident that would make a good play. It can be something that really happened, something you read in a book, or something you create.

Write a scene for a play based on your incident.

The Writing Process

Guide students as they follow these steps in the writing process.

Prewrite
It is important to outline the action of a play. Suggest that students record their ideas on the worksheet on page 120. Then ask them to consider the action, mapping it on the worksheet on page 118. Have students write ideas for dialogue on the worksheet on page 122. Another fun way for students to prepare for playwriting is to collect overheard dialogue. Encourage students to keep a pocket notebook and write down interesting conversations they overhear at home, at the mall, or at school. Portions of these real conversations may be used in their plays.

Draft
Students may wish to refer to published plays for style and format. Suggest that students put themselves into the action of the play as they write their first draft. This may help the dialogue and ideas flow more freely and naturally. Tell students not to worry about stage directions yet but to concentrate on the overall flow of the play and conversations of the characters.

Rewrite
As students reread their plays, tell them to think about how their characters move. Will they cross the stage? Shake someone’s hand? Sit down? Run off? Will their faces convey certain emotions? Have students add stage directions that explain the actors’ movements. Encourage partners to read their plays aloud to each other.

Proofread
Ask students to read for spelling, grammar, and punctuation. Encourage students to check dictionaries and grammar books and make the appropriate corrections.

Publish
Divide the class into groups and encourage groups to assign roles and read each other’s plays. Then ask groups to choose one play to perform or read through for the class. Performances need not be elaborate.
As you ponder your play, lines of dialogue may occur to you. You don’t want to forget them! Fill in dialogue that you could use in your play in the speech bubbles below.

More Writing Projects

Remind students that writing takes many forms. Encourage your students to try some of the writing projects suggested below.

- Your play has just opened on Broadway. Write a newspaper review about it. Be objective! Which parts were excellent? Which parts needed work? (You might also review the published play you read.)

- The lead actor in your play has won an award for a stellar performance. Write an acceptance speech for your actor to deliver at an awards ceremony.

- A CD of the musical score of your play has just been released. Write the copy that would go on the album cover.

- Design a poster to advertise your play. Make sure it captures the mood of your play and lists the actors. You may wish to include excerpts from your review.

Write a word in the middle circle. Fill in the outer circles with words that have similar meanings.
Select six adverbs or adjectives the author uses to set the action of the story. Carefully print one word on each square above. Cut out the cube. Fold along the solid lines to form the cube and spread glue on the shaded tabs. Slip the tabs inside the cube and attach firmly. Let dry.

When you meet in your discussion groups, use the cubes to trade words and moods. Toss your cube to another student. Challenge him or her to pronounce the word, tell whether it is an adverb or adjective, and give an example of a noun or verb it might modify or describe. The student may then toss his or her own cube to another player to continue the game.

Extra: Make a vocabulary cube of new nouns from your story.
Bloom's Taxonomy

Bloom's Taxonomy delineates six progressively more advanced levels of critical thinking. The levels are listed below, along with verbs and phrases that suggest appropriate activities for each level. For example, a science task at the application level might ask a student to illustrate the water cycle. When questioning students or creating assignments at the middle-school level, be sure to go beyond the knowledge and comprehension levels in order to stretch and challenge students' critical thinking abilities.

Knowledge
- tell, list, name, repeat, remember, recall, match, locate

Comprehension
- explain, find, define, illustrate, diagram, summarize, restate, describe

Application
- solve, use, demonstrate, illustrate, show, report, classify, put in order, apply, report

Analysis
- examine, survey, compare, contrast, alike/different, separate, chart, advertise, distinguish

Synthesis
- create, invent, imagine, compose, pretend, predict, plan, improve, what if, modify

Evaluation
- judge, select, choose, decide, debate, write a letter, hold a court trial, what is the best way, what could have been different, evaluate, verify, argue

Using these critical-thinking principles not only helps students enhance their comprehension but also provides a useful guide for evaluation. The following list suggests alternative questions one might use to develop new study guides or modify old ones.
Reading Questions for Study Guides

Knowledge

- Tell the who, what, when, where and why of the story.
- List the main characters in your play and explain their role in the play.
- List five major events in the story in chronological order.
- List the main characters in your book.
- List five significant events from the person’s life you read about. List them in the order in which they occurred.
- Who is telling this story? (point of view)
- Identify the main characters in a crossword puzzle.
- Match statements with the character who said them.
- List the main characteristics of the main characters in “Wanted” posters.
- Arrange scrambled story sentences in sequential order.
- Recall details about the setting by creating a picture of where the story took place.
- Which historical character or what historical event is the focus of this book?

Comprehension

- Write a short (one page) summary of the plot.
- Who was your favorite character in the play? Write a paragraph describing him or her and list the pages where you found that information.
- Find five adjectives in the story that helped create the mood.
- Write a short summary of the person’s life and explain the specific reasons this person is remembered.
- Write a short (one page) summary of the plot of your book.
- Explain selected ideas or parts from the story in your own words.
- Draw a picture showing what happened before and after a passage or illustration found in the book.
- Write a sentence explaining what happened before and after a passage or illustration found in the book.
• Predict what could happen next in the story before the reading of the entire book is completed.
• Construct a pictorial time line that summarizes what happens in the story.
• Explain how the main character felt at the beginning, middle, and/or end of the story.
• Describe the time and setting of this story.

Application

• Pretend one of the animals in the story is lost. Write a descriptive lost and found item for a newspaper.
• Put the plot into six sequential sentences.
• Write an advertisement to entice someone else to read the book.
• Pretend you are the person you read about. Write a diary entry during a special time in “your” life.
• Using adding machine tape (get from the teacher) create a time line for this story. Make sure events appear in the correct sequence. Illustrate as appropriate.
• Classify the characters as human, animal, or inanimate.
• Transfer a main character to a new setting.
• Select a meal that one of the main characters would enjoy eating, plan a menu, and a method for serving.
• Think of a situation that occurred to a character in the story and write about how you would have handled the situation differently.
• Give examples of people you know who have the same problems as the characters in the story.
• Using the information from the book, write five headlines that could be used in a history book.
• Draw a time line showing the main events in the story in the order in which they happened. Relate these events to the actual world events. Use the encyclopedia to verify accurate dates of the real events.

Analysis

• Would you want the animal in this story for a pet? Explain why or why not.
Would you want the person in this story for a friend? Explain why or why not.
Why was the character you picked in # 2 important to the play?
Would the main character make a good friend? Tell why or why not.
Analyze the author's style. Tell what techniques she or he used to capture and hold your attention.
Identify general characteristics (stated and/or implied) of the main characters.
Distinguish what could happen from what could not have happened in the story in real life.
Select parts of the story that were funniest, saddest, happiest, and most unbelievable.
Differentiate fact from opinion.
Compare and/or contrast two of the main characters.
Select an action of a main character that was exactly the same as something you would have done.
Describe the impact or role this character and/or event has had on society.

Synthesis

Pretend another animal is going to be added to the story. Tell the kind of animal to be added and what role it is to play in the story.
Create a new character and tell how that character would fit into the story.
Write at least three questions you would ask the character you created if she or he were a real person.
Write a new ending for the story.
Prepare a list of five or more questions you would like to ask the person you have been reading about if you could have a chance to sit down and talk with him or her.
Create a story from just the title before reading the story.
Write three new titles for the story that would give a good idea of what it was about.
Create a new product related to the story.
Restructure the roles of the main characters to create new outcomes in the story.
• Compose and perform a dialogue or monologue that will communicate the thoughts of the main character at a given point in the story.

• Imagine that you are one of the main characters. Write a diary account of your daily thoughts and activities.

• Write the lyrics and music for a song that one of the main characters would sing if she or he became a rock star. Perform it.

• Choose one of the human conflicts in the story and write a change in the event that would alter the course of history.

Evaluation

• List three reasons you do or do not enjoy reading animal stories. Explain.

• Did you like or dislike this play? Explain your answer in two or three complete sentences.

• Did you like or dislike this story? Explain your answer.

• Do you think a biography/autobiography should have been written about this person? Explain in detail why you do or do not. You may want to cite specific happenings in the book by page number.

• What is your criteria for judging a good book? Using your criteria, how would you evaluate this book?

• Decide which character in the story you would most like to spend a day with. Why?

• Judge whether or not a character should have acted in a particular way and explain why.

• Decide if the story really could have happened and give reasons for your decision.

• Consider how this story can help you in your own life.

• Appraise the value of the story.

• Compare the story with another one you have read.

• Write a recommendation as to why the book should or should not be read.

• Write a newspaper or television review of the book stating your opinions regarding the overall quality of the story.
Reading Conference Questions

Questions such as the ones below may be used as you confer with individual children, a small group of students, or as the basis for student discussions in sharing groups. Boldface topics indicate areas that are explored by each group of questions.

Author

Why do you suppose the author chose this title?
What is the main thing the author is saying to you?
If you had a chance to talk with this author, what would you talk about?
What other books by this author have you read? How are the other books like this one?
What do you know about the author? How can you tell?
What is the author trying to tell you in your book?
What did the author have to know to write this book?
What sorts of things does the author like or dislike?
If the author asked you what could be improved in this story, what would you say?

Characters

Would you like to be one of the people in this story? Who? Why?
Did any of the characters remind you of people you know? Explain.
Which character interested you the most? Is he or she the most important person in the story? Discuss.
Which character(s) didn’t you like? Why?
Who are the main characters in your story? Do you like or dislike them? Why?
Choose one character. Why is this character important in the story?
Do any of the characters change? In what way?
Do any of the characters do things that you think are good? Wrong?

Choosing Books

I see you’re reading ______. What do you think of it?
What makes this a good book for you?
How did you decide to read this?
Is there anybody else in our class you think would enjoy reading this? Why?
What is the best book you read this quarter? What makes it the best?

Comprehension
Do you have any confusion about what you've read?
What have you been wondering about as you read this?
What kind of “think-alouds” have you done as you read this book?

Goals
What would you like to do to become a better reader?
What do you have to do in order to be a good reader?
What do you want to do as a reader in the next nine weeks?

Illustrations
Who is the illustrator?
Do you like the illustrations? Why? Why not?
What (if anything) did the illustrations add to the text?
If the illustrations were not there, would there need to be more words? Why?
What do you think the illustrator needed to know in order to illustrate this story?

Journal
Why did you write _________ in your reading journal? Explain it to me.

Mood
How did you feel while reading the book? Why did you feel that way?
What was the funniest part? Saddest?
What was the most exciting or strangest thing that happened?
What do you remember most about the story?

Plot
Does this remind you of other books you have read?
Are there parts of this story that you have especially liked or disliked?
Tell me the main things that happened in your story.
Were you able to guess what was going to happen at the end?
Can you think of another way your story might have happened or ended?

Point of View
Did you feel as if everything was happening to you, as if you were one of the characters in the book? Or did you feel as if you were an observer, watching what was happening but not part of the action?
If you were an observer, where were you watching from?
Was it from different places—sometimes from beside the characters, sometimes from above them as if in a helicopter?
Can you tell me places in the book where you felt like that?

Read Aloud
What part of this book is special to you in some way? Read it to me.
Where did you leave off? Read to me from that place.

Setting
Where does the story take place? Tell me what the place was like.
Have you ever been to a place like this?
Did it matter where the story happened or could it have happened anywhere? Do you remember thinking about the place as you were reading?
Did the story take place a long time ago/in the future/now?

Style
What special words does the author use to help you “hear” or “see” in the story?
Tell me about any pictures the author has left in your mind.
What do you like about the way the author has written the story?

Theme
Why do you think the author wrote this book?
Do you think there is a message in this story? What is it?
What is the embedded theme?

Vocabulary
What strategy helps you most when you come to a word you don’t know?

Book Titles

Respond to the following questions in complete sentences and paragraphs. Use another paper if there is not enough room on this page. The letters are supplied as hints to use Bloom's Taxonomy.

1. (K) Who is telling the story in each book? (point of view)

2. (C) Do you find a common purpose your author had in writing each of these books? Give examples (including page numbers) that support your answer.

3. (AN) Analyze the author's style in these books. How are both books similar? Tell what techniques she or he used to capture and hold your attention.

4. (E) Begin a letter to the author on the lines below. Tell the author what you like about his or her work. Also express any questions you had or confusion you felt. Use the back of the paper.

Genres of Literature provides an exciting approach to reading, writing, and language arts in the middle school. Aimed at helping students read and enjoy more varieties of literature as well as prompting more writing, the book provides reproducible and hands-on activity ideas plus bibliographies for the genres of realistic fiction, Newbery Award winners, animal tales, biography, historical fiction, nonfiction, news reporting/media, mystery, science fiction and fantasy, poetry, and plays. Stimulate your readers and writers to explore more Genres of Literature! For grades 5-8.

About the Author

Janice J. Withington, a sixth grade teacher in Jefferson County, Colorado, has 36 years of experience in education, both as a teacher and a curriculum specialist. Genres of Literature was born of her own need (and that of her students) for a stimulating literature-based reading and writing program. Janice earned her bachelor's degree at Kansas State Teachers College and her master's degree at Sam Houston State University. She has given numerous presentations at regional, state, and national workshops and conferences, and was recognized in Who's Who in American Education 1999-1990.
