This study guide offers a different approach, teleconferencing, to new information, ideas, and resources on the film, "To Kill a Mockingbird." Following general information on "then and now," the guide consists of sections entitled: Preparing to Teach TKM: Special Considerations (by Charles Suhor and Larry Bell); Historical Background; Looking Closely at the Film; Looking Closely at the Novel; Pre-Teleconference Activities for Students (including brainstorming and discussing, filling out an "opinionnaire," and exploring stereotypes); NCTE Readings and Resources; Guide Writers/Planners; Program Host and Special Guests; and Program Descriptions and Registration Form. The section of the guide on "Preparing to Teach TKM" notes that the guide was developed by inner city and suburban teachers, humanities scholars, and teacher educators who raised many important points about a range of issues; this section also suggests that individual teachers and English departments can select literary materials in accordance with a published selection process that clearly affirms the criteria for their choices. Web site information is also noted. (NKA)

Live Satellite Distance Learning - A Definition

Live Satellite Distance Learning by Prince William Network (PWN) is the live, interactive broadcast of high-interest educational programs to school sites and school districts regionally or nationally. Programs are accompanied by a study guide and Internet support prepared by teacher-based instructional design teams. The guide and Internet provide resources and activities that help prepare students to get the most out of each interactive learning broadcast. Proper prepping of students raises their level of anticipation, participation, and interactivity with the program guests by phone, fax, or e-mail and takes advantage of student interest in technology-based learning.

Scheduling

Live Satellite Distance Learning special events like this Lyceum seldom fit into the school-bell schedule. But teachers across the country who value the exciting learning which occurs make special arrangements for their students to participate live by scheduling "in-school field trips" on the day(s) of broadcast.

You must register to receive satellite coordinates.

Mockingbird Website and Home Page:
http://pwnetwork.pwcs.edu

For the next three years, PWN and the English Department at Woodbridge High School will maintain an interactive Mockingbird Website with Home Page. A Webmaster with student website managers will design, maintain and update links to a rich bounty of resources with links to sites nationally and internationally. The Mockingbird Website is an expanded version of this Study Guide and will provide links and resources that refresh and encourage the relevant study of TKM for our times. The Website presents links to these areas: Lyceum Descriptions, Preparation Activities for the Broadcast, Preparation Activities for the Novel, Instructional Activities, Historical Archives, Discussion Groups, and Other Online Resources.

Look for this symbol indicating that expanded information from the guide is available on the Website.

The Live Satellite "Lyceum"

In ancient Greece, the grove where Aristotle taught was called the Lyceum—a gathering place where important public discussions were held. The Live Satellite Lyceum is a distance learning format in which PWN gathers special program guests like authors, scholars, etc. around a topic and creates an interactive teleconference.

How To Receive The Live Broadcasts

Anyone with a moveable C-Band satellite dish can participate in our live broadcast programs. All you need is to arrange for the operator of the satellite receiver to reserve the time for the broadcast and a TV. (You should have a VCR to tape the live broadcast for your future use.) You may want access to a telephone for students to call in questions to the toll free number during the program.

If you do not have a satellite dish, your local cable company or public television station may be able to provide access to the programs. Please contact these organizations early. Also, check with district or regional media centers for access to the programs. Video tapes are available if you cannot receive the programs.

Partners

Prince William Network

PWN is the distance learning arm of Prince William County Public Schools in northern Virginia. PWN consistently wins national awards for its K-12 distance learning programs and is best known for its Live Satellite Field Trips, Kennedy Center Performing Arts Series, and special event programs like the Lyceum on To Kill a Mockingbird: Then and Now.

Prince William Network's Partners:

National Council of Teachers of English

The National Council of Teachers of English (NCTE) brings to this project excellent NCTE lead teachers and resources in the planning and writing of this 16-page Teacher Study Guide, which will appear in the April issue of NCTE's English Journal magazine (circulation 60,000).

American Film Institute

The American Film Institute (AFI), the nation's leading film art and culture organization, is helping reunite actors and members of the creative team from To Kill a Mockingbird. AFI's partnership encourages English teachers working through NCTE's Assembly of Media Arts to continue bringing the study of American film classics alongside literary works in the English curriculum.

National Endowment for the Humanities

Recognizing that TKM has become intertwined in the fabric of our nation's literary, social, civil and cinematic history, NEH awarded a "Technology In The Humanities" Humanities Focus Grant to Prince William Network. This made possible the planning, collaboration, research and writing for the Teacher Study Guide and the Lyceum.
SCOUT'S VISION:
The vision to reunite the cast and creative team from the TKM movie, putting them in touch with today's students who were not born when the film was made, belongs to Mary Badham (Scout). Her concern was that the telling of the story of how the film was made—the oral history of the making of TKM—would be lost to this and subsequent generations of young people: "This film not only carries a message that is crucial to get across to each new generation of young people, but I want them to know that something very special went into the making of the film for each person who was part of the creative team. The film was made with a mission. And it is important that this story be told to this generation of students so that they can pass it on as part of how the film is remembered."

Mary shared these words with Prince William County Schools during a 1994 presentation. Her strong belief in the power of this film to bring people together around the issues that are so hard to face and her desire to pass on the story of the making of TKM has led to this 35th anniversary celebration of the film's release and to this Lyceum on To Kill a Mockingbird: Then and Now.

Many high schools in America teach To Kill a Mockingbird (TKM) every year, and we are going to celebrate it! One of our special guests for the lyceum is Claudia Durst Johnson, noted Harper Lee scholar and author. Johnson has written the text, Understanding To Kill a Mockingbird: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historic Documents, and she will share her ideas with us in Program 1. Johnson has maintained a personal relationship with the very private author over the years and will share her insights about Harper Lee. We begin the Study Guide with her reminder of why TKM is deserving of this forum:

"Harper Lee's novel is one of the best-selling books in the nation's history. Within a year To Kill a Mockingbird had sold 500,000 copies. By 1975 11,113,909 copies had sold, and by 1982 over 15,000,000 had sold. By 1992 18 million copies of paperback editions alone had sold. It has never been out of print in 35 years. To Kill a Mockingbird is frequently cited by readers as the book that has made the biggest difference in their lives. The novel's enduring impact goes beyond the period when integration and the struggle for equal rights were paramount. Its influence has been enduring because it allows the reader, through the lives of children, 'to walk around in the shoes' of people who are different from ourselves. The novel challenges our stereotypes—of the Southerner, the African American, the eccentric, the child, the young lady. At the same time that many people see characters and social situations in different ways after reading the novel, they also recapture some part of their own youth in the story with its characters. The novel's universal and lasting appeal comes in part from the reader's nostalgia for the time of innocence in which children live before harsh truths enter their lives."

—Claudia Durst Johnson

Read through this Study Guide. It offers a fresh approach to new information, ideas, and resources. You may photocopy any parts of the Guide that would be useful as handouts for your students in preparation for the teleconferences.

You may videotape the live broadcasts for use within your school and use the tapes as a resource for one year. Permission to continue use after one year is required by written request to Prince William Network.
Preparing to Teach To Kill a Mockingbird
by Charles Suhor, Deputy Executive Director, National Council of Teachers of English, and Larry Bell, Supervisor of Multicultural Education, Prince William County Public Schools

During a discussion among the inner city and suburban teachers, humanities scholars and teacher educators who developed this study guide, many important points were raised.

Teachers in the To Kill A Mockingbird (TKM) group reported that the novel is a powerful reading experience for their students, many of whom articulate for the first time their feelings about a wide range of issues. Class discussions about Scout's growing insight into her father's character, evil and injustice in the world, and relationships among classes and races are intensely interesting—but they are not without hazard. Teachers and, often their parents, sometimes have difficulty with the profane language, racial epithets, absence of a Black perspective, complex family and social relationships, and violence in the novel.

Of course, good literature often poses thorny moral questions and depicts unpleasant aspects of life. But the TKM group agreed that a curriculum created with the goal of avoiding all controversial materials and depicting only optimistic viewpoints and cheerful outcomes would, at best, present a distorted view of life. The group viewed TKM as an excellent opportunity to help young people deal with many of the same issues they will face in life. They further noted that certain general procedures can be instituted to encourage a positive reception of this and similar instructional materials.

To begin with, individual teachers and English departments can select literary materials in accordance with a published selection process that clearly affirms the criteria for their choices. Institutionalizing such a policy is a buffer against a challenger's claim that an excellent work such as To Kill a Mockingbird has been capriciously placed in the English program. Advance announcement of reading lists and works to be studied is another way of dealing openly with students, parents, and community constituencies—although it should be clear that students' readings are not rigidly limited by such lists. (See "Guidelines for Selection..." and "Students' Right to Read" in the NCTE Readings and Resources list.)

In many schools and districts, a student or parent who objects to a particular work is given the option of selecting a substitute work with parallel themes and of similar literary value. This policy enables the student to pursue worthwhile study while ensuring that no individual parent's or group's objection forecloses on other students' right to read. Mildred D. Taylor's Let the Circle Be Unbroken and Earnest Gaines' Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman, for example, are award-winning books that teachers have recommended as alternatives or companion pieces to TKM.

Equally important is the handling of TKM in the classroom. As with selection of works for study, the assumption here is that the teacher is a trained professional who proceeds knowledgeably and sensitively. Such a teacher will carefully choose when to teach a work that requires more prepping of students and a longer duration of study. It follows that a teacher would generally be advised not to begin the year or a block schedule with a novel like TKM that explores difficult social issues or a work that is extremely difficult to read.

The sensitive teacher will also be aware that what seems wonderful and powerful to one group of students may seem degrading to another. For example, the scene where members of the Black community relegated to the balcony stand in respect when Atticus passes may be viewed as a powerful moment to some students while for others the scene may be humiliating, and a chilling reminder of the legacy of powerlessness in America.

The TKM group strongly recommends that having students read aloud racial epithets or slurs such as "nigger" not take place in the classroom. One teacher reported that tension was generated when a student in a racially integrated class was asked to read aloud a passage from TKM in which the "N-word" appeared. The wrenching discomfort that arose in this classroom situation could have been avoided. Predictably, reading racial slurs and profanities aloud will have a different impact than seeing such words on the printed page and then talking about them in open class discussion.

The TKM group agreed that a key to the study of controversial works is the teacher's ability to build and sustain a sense of the classroom as a safe environment. This is where prepping activities will be crucial. For example, having students discuss gender issues then and now, race relations then and now, etc. can progress to more difficult topics such as the origin and the disparaging use of the "N-word." When trust exists among the teacher and students, discussion of virtually any issue that appears in a literary context can usually be carried on productively with prepping.

Of course, student learning does not begin and end in the classroom. Students often leave the safe haven of classroom dialogue and return to school and community environments characterized by intolerance and adolescent ridicule. Addressing this, one teacher suggested ten minutes or so of debriefing at the end of classes in which students have been engaged in intensive discussion. Such debriefing has both the content-learning benefit of summing up key points discussed and the added value of providing students with a sense of closure, fortifying them with confidence in themselves as individuals capable of civility in disagreement. Teachers can then gauge the effect the discussion has had on various students and act accordingly, e.g., deal with problems individually.

Discussions about TKM during the three-day meeting were ebullient and wide-ranging, resulting in the wonderful array of new materials in this teaching guide and on the Mockingbird Website. The considerations above are advanced as prudent advice and not red flags about teaching potentially controversial works. The TKM group agreed that self-censorship rooted in fear of challenges can be a devastating form of book-banning, giving in to what Henry James once called "imagination of disaster." Using TKM, the teacher has an excellent opportunity as a curriculum-builder to engage in creative problem solving, taking time for prepping, thus providing the most edifying literary experiences possible for today's students.
Scottsboro Trials – The Novel’s Setting in the 1930s

There are many parallels between the trial of Tom Robinson in To Kill a Mockingbird and one of the most notorious series of trials in the nation’s history, the Scottsboro Trials. On March 25, 1931, a freight train was stopped in Paint Rock, a tiny community in Northern Alabama, and nine young African American men who had been riding the rails were arrested. As two white women—one underage—descended from the freight cars, they accused the men of raping them on the train. Within a month the first man was found guilty and sentenced to death. There followed a series of sensational trials condemning the other men solely on the testimony of the older woman, a known prostitute, who was attempting to avoid prosecution under the Mann Act, prohibiting taking a minor across state lines for immoral purposes, like prostitution. Although none of the accused were executed, a number remained on death row for many years. The case was not settled until 1976 with the pardon of the last of the Scottsboro defendants. (See “Historical Context: The Scottsboro Trials”; Understanding To Kill a Mockingbird: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historic Documents by Claudia Durst Johnson, pp. 15-81.) Some of the parallels between the Scottsboro trials and the trial of Tom Robinson are shown in the chart below. The Author and the Book Nelle Harper Lee, the author of To Kill a Mockingbird, had many childhood experiences which are similar to those of her narrator, Scout Finch.

Harper Lee's Childhood:
- Grew up in 1930s – rural southern Alabama town
- Father – Amasa Lee – attorney who served in state legislature in Alabama
- Older brother and young neighbor (Truman Capote) are playmates.
- Harper Lee - an avid reader
- Six years old when Scottsboro trials were meticulously covered in state and local newspapers

"Scout" (Jean Louise) Finch's Childhood:
- Grew up in 1930s – rural southern Alabama town
- Father – Atticus Finch – attorney who served in state legislature in Alabama
- Older brother and young neighbor (Dill) are playmates.
- Scout reads before she enters school; reads Mobile Register paper in first grade.
- Six years old when the trial of Tom Robinson takes place

The Civil Rights Era – Setting the Historical Context for the Novel and the Film

Lee wrote the novel during the beginning of the Civil Rights era (from about 1955 to 1958). Alabama was very much in the news at this time with the Montgomery bus boycott, Martin Luther King's rise to leadership, and Autherine Lucy's attempt to enter the University of Alabama graduate school. Harper Lee, who was well known on campus as editor of the politically satirical student newspaper, graduated from the university and entered law school, leaving one semester short of receiving a law degree. Lee's book was published in 1960—a time of tumultuous events and racial strife as the struggle in the Civil Rights movement grew violent and spread into cities across the nation, and into the American consciousness on TV screens and the nightly news. The novel shot to the top of the New York Times Best Seller list, as it began to make its remarkable impact on a divided nation. A year after its publication Lee worked as a consultant on the film adaptation of the novel and the screenplay written by Horton Foote. The film was released in 1962 and went on to receive five Academy Award nominations, winning three.
Publication/Release of To Kill a Mockingbird in the Civil Rights Era: A Chronology

1954 United States Supreme Court rules in Brown vs. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, that racial segregation in the public schools is inherently unequal and, therefore, illegal.

1955 Rosa Parks is arrested for refusing to give up her seat on a Montgomery city bus.

1955 Boycott of Montgomery County city buses begins officially.

1955 Emmett Till, a young African American man, is murdered while visiting the South.

1956 Authorine Lucy receives a letter granting permission to enroll for classes at the U. of Alabama, Tuscaloosa.

1956 Home of Martin Luther King, Jr. is bombed in Montgomery. King is a leader in the boycott and designated spokesperson.

1956 Motions are filed in U.S. District Court calling for an end to bus segregation.

1956 Violence erupts on the campus of the U. of Alabama and in the streets of Tuscaloosa; continuing for three days. (TV evening news and Movietone newsreels showing "Week In Review" newsclips in between feature films in movie theaters documented these events.)

1956 Authorine Lucy is forced to flee U. of Alabama campus; the university's Board of Trustees bars her from campus. (TV/Movietone)

1956 Warrants are issued for arrest of 115 leaders of the Montgomery bus boycott.

1956 Authorine Lucy ordered by the courts to be re-admitted to U. of Alabama, only to be expelled by Board of Trustees. (TV / Movietone)

1956 U.S. Supreme Court decides in favor of Montgomery bus boycotters, by ruling bus segregation illegal.

1956 African Americans first board buses in Montgomery, according to a first-come, first-served basis. (TV/Movietone)

1957 Federal troops sent to Little Rock, Arkansas, to enforce court-ordered desegregation of schools. (TV/Movietone)

1960 Publication of To Kill A Mockingbird in the Fall (Shoots to top of NY Times Best Seller list) ...In Greensboro, N.C., attempt to integrate lunch counters is thwarted (TV/Movietone).

1961 Charlayne Hunter enters the U. of Georgia through lines of jeering white protesters (TV/Movietone)

1961 Freedom Riders begin arriving in the deep South to test desegregation. Violence necessitates the deployment of federal troops. (Major TV news event/Movietone)

1961 Violence erupts at U. of Mississippi over integration (featured on TV networks, in newspapers and magazines/Movietone).

1962 To Kill A Mockingbird, is released; the screen adaptation by Horton Foote receives 5 Academy Award nominations.

1963 Dogs and power hoses are directed at peaceful demonstrators in Birmingham, Alabama; America watched on TV news.

1963 Three Civil Rights workers are found murdered in Mississippi.

1963 Massive Civil Rights March is held in Washington, D.C.

1964 The Civil Rights Act is passed.

1965 March for Voting Rights is held in Selma, Alabama.

Historical Background

Pre-Teleconference Discussion Questions

1. Compare the kinds and level and frequency of violence in the society of Maycomb in the 1930s and violence in American communities today.

2. What changes have taken place between the time of the novel and today? Consider, for example, family relationships then and now; use of language then and now; expectations of the behavior of little girls then and now; the use of guns to resolve conflict then and now; justice in the courts, then and now, (e.g., the O. J. Simpson trials).

3. Conduct research on how the book and the film were received by the public and by book reviewers. See, for example, issues of the New York Times, Time magazine, and other sources beginning around autumn of 1960. What kind of impact does it appear the book had on the public; on society? Document and share with class.
Looking Closely at the Film

Prepared by William Costanzo, Professor of English and Film, Westchester Community College

Bill Costanzo teaches English and film at Westchester Community College in Valhalla, NY.

In her introduction to Horton Foote's published screenplay of the novel, Harper Lee wrote, "If the integrity of a film adaptation is measured by the degree to which the novelist's intent is preserved, Mr. Foote's screenplay should be studied as a classic." There are many good reasons for studying the movie in an English class. First, it is very accessible: easy to get (on video tape or laser disc) and to understand (for its story, its characters, its themes). Second, it is a well-made, perennially popular film. When it appeared in 1962, the film was honored by five Oscar nominations and Academy Awards for Best Actor (to Gregory Peck), Best Adapted Screenplay, and Best Black-and-White Art Direction. It also won special humanitarian awards for its treatment of racial injustice. Finally, it is a landmark in the art of adaptation, beginning (in Harper Lee's words) "a new era of responsibility in Hollywood." As such, To Kill a Mockingbird offers a case study for "comparative literature" in an age when more and more stories are told through the medium of movies.

Elements of Fiction in Film

Since films tell stories, they involve many of the elements of fiction that novels do. After students have read the book, you might look at the way these elements are treated in the film.

CHARACTER. Movies speak to us in images and sounds, so every character is a performance, an interpretation of the script. Our conception of character depends heavily on the way a particular actor looks, acts, and speaks. Note how the main characters are introduced. Scout swings into the frame from a tree. Since most of the story is narrated from Scout's perspective, the camera usually shows us only what she would see. A good example occurs when the three children enter the courthouse to find Atticus. Scout and Jem lift up Dill so he can peer into the courtroom, and we are limited to what Dill sees and what they hear. That makes the shift in perspective all the more striking after the children leave and Atticus faces Bob Ewell as one adult to another. Where else in the film does the camera make you aware of a particular character's point of view?

SETTING. The film establishes the story's time and place with a voice-over narration, taken directly from the novel, spoken over images of rural Maycomb. If a picture is worth a thousand words, the camera can set a scene in an instant. On the other hand, while novelists can construct vast panoramas with a pen, filmmakers must labor with hammer and nails, which may explain why a director might exclude a fire or a church scene from a script. Where in the film does location seem most important? How do the filmmakers help us to believe that we are in another time and place?

PLOT. Since a film has less time to tell its story than a novel does, the plot is often streamlined, designed for a single sitting. Notice what the film omits from Lee's meandering story: characters like Uncle Jack and Mr. Avery, details like Mrs. Dubose's morphine addiction, and the seventeen shots that kill Tom Robinson. How many of these omissions might be explained as concessions to length? Some viewers have observed that the film concentrates on the story's two main strands, Boo Radley and Tom Robinson, and weaves them into a tighter narrative. Do you and your students agree?

SYMBOL. Symbolic objects and actions are more literally defined on the screen than on the page. How does the movie represent the symbols found in the novel? Did you imagine these things differently when reading than when you saw them on the screen? Pay particular attention to the opening title sequence and the symbolic objects used in the cigar box. Why do you think the title designer chose these objects? If you have unanswered questions about the opening credit sequence, decide how you might pose them to the designer during the teleconference.

Elements of Film

Although films and novels use common elements of fiction to tell stories, filmmakers use special tools to develop character, setting, plot, point of view, symbols, and tone. Invite your students to think in cinematic terms by drawing their attention to these elements of film.

Acting: How do the actors interpret their roles? Do they look and act as you imagined them when you read the book? How believable are their performances?

Camera Work: How does the camera frame events? Notice when it moves, shifts angles, or otherwise changes the focus of attention. What does this camera work emphasize in each shot?

Lighting and Set Design: Consider the location chosen for each scene. How was the place made to look as if it belonged to the 1930s? How would you describe the overall tone or atmosphere? How does the lighting contribute to this atmosphere?

Editing: How are the separate shots within a scene combined into a continuous sequence? Notice how often the camera cuts, fades, or dissolves into a new view of events. Consider the reasons for each of these transitions.

Script: Horton Foote, the script writer, had to capture the 300+ pages of Harper Lee's story in a 129-minute film. What decisions did he make? Notice where he trimmed the story or rearranged its parts. Can you justify these changes? How successful is his adaptation on the whole?

Sound: TKM uses all four forms of sound available to filmmakers: music, sound effects, voice-over, and dialogue. Notice how Elmer Bernstein's original music helps to create and guide the story's moods. Listen for the creaking stairs, the crickets, and other effects that contribute to these moods. What does Kim Stanley's voice-over narration add above and beyond the dialogue?
Scene Analysis

A good way to see how these elements of film work together is to analyze particular scenes. Watch the same scene several times, using the remote control features of your VCR or laser disc player to scan, slow down, and freeze the image. Note how the scene moves the story forward, sets the time and place, develops characters, establishes a point of view, creates a mood, or suggests symbolic meanings. If you have access to Horton Foote’s screenplay (NY: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1962), use it to study the art of adaptation. The goal here is to understand how scenes are constructed: what artistic and technological decisions were made and why.

Sample Scenes for Analysis

Opening Credit Sequence.

The objects that appear behind the opening credits include a pocket watch, harmonica, pearl necklace, whistle, marbles, and a child’s drawing of a bird—items that gain meaning as the story unfolds. The sequence is a good introduction for the story’s symbolism and themes. It also shows (to quote Harper Lee again) how a film can have “a life of its own as a work of art.” Notice how the camera moves in, like a child’s vision, to closeups of these valued objects, tracking from left to right along the row of treasures carefully arranged. Notice how the nostalgic music and humming of a child create a mood. And notice what happens to the drawing at the end of the sequence.

Boo Radley’s Porch.

The night scene in which the children sneak up to the Radley house dramatizes their fascination with and their fear of the unknown. How do the filmmakers use lighting, music, sound effects, and camera work to heighten suspense? How suspenseful does the scene seem to viewers today?

The Mockingbird Website contains a rich set of response-based study questions for discussion of the novel, suitable for initial reading or review of To Kill a Mockingbird (TKM). The study questions focus on both student response and elements of literature. The questions on the Website presuppose that students have read the novel; but if they are viewing the teleconference as preparatory experience for studying it, you can use these materials during or after their reading or viewing To Kill a Mockingbird.

To find challenging topics with study questions like the sample below be sure to visit the Website.

Language

1. Language is a powerful tool in this novel—the language of the children, the eloquence of Atticus, and the language of the townspeople which reflects their attitudes and often their prejudices. This language reveals the power of words to establish what (and who) society values most. Language choice and style have the power to confer status and value, to elevate, and to wound. Notice the importance attributed to names and titles in the novel. How does the way the characters in the novel address or nickname the people below reveal status, entitlement, and power?

   Mr. Jem ............................................
   Mrs. Dubose ....................................
   Miss Maudie ....................................

   white child of Atticus; has title at age 6

2. What lessons does Atticus attempt to teach Scout about the use of racial slurs to refer to Tom Robinson and other African Americans in the novel?

3. Harper Lee attempts to portray several kinds of dialect in the novel—the language of the poor whites, poor Blacks, small children, genteel Southern ladies, an educated lawyer, and others. Did her renderings of these different dialects strike you as realistic? If not, which language styles seemed to be less credible?

4. What lesson about language does Calpurnia try to teach to Scout when Calpurnia says that she has one way of talking at home and another way of talking at the Finch household? Do you agree that people often communicate differently in different environments rather than having only a single language style? Why?

Pre-Teleconference Activities for Students

Prepared by NCTE Team Members: Gwendolyn Alexander, Judith Kelly, Dr. Charles Suhor, and Dr. William Costanzo; Prince William County Lead Teachers: Penny Lake, Phyllis Peterson, and Sandra Munnell

Whether or not your students have studied the novel or the film version of To Kill a Mockingbird, the activities below will help prepare them for consideration of many of the themes likely to be discussed on the live, interactive teleconferences. Like prereading and prewriting exercises, these sample activities engage students productively in initial reflection and interaction. As students explore their own experiences, ideas, and feelings about themes and issues in TKM, they develop personal frames of reference for the presentations—and the interactive discussions—that will take place on the teleconferences.

Activity 1—Brainstorming and Discussing: Heroes

Place the words “heroes” and “heroism” on the chalkboard. Ask students to state words, phrases, and names that come to mind as they consider heroes and heroism. Jot down their responses as they brainstorm. As the responses wane, consider whether it would be useful to ask for further or more varied reactions. For example, if students have given only names, ask for common nouns—perhaps synonyms or near-synonyms such as “courage”; or ask for places or objects that they associate with heroes and heroism. If the heroes named are mostly in a particular category such as sports or TV stars, ask whether any figures from the past are heroes to them; or whether fictional figures are heroes; or people who are not necessarily famous; or people who are highly regarded by their parents, or by people in other times and cultures.

The final student list should provide excellent raw material for follow-up discussion on points such as the following:

- Choose two or more heroes on the list and tell what they have in common. Choose two or more and tell how their heroic qualities differ.
- Do people from different cultures and different generations seem to have different kinds of heroes? If so, how do they differ?
- Which heroes, if any, are people who did not necessarily show physical bravery but showed courageous moral character?
- Is the list dominated by particular categories of heroes—e.g., celebrities, males, whites, people of color, younger people, older people, Americans, living people, dead people, etc.? If so, what might be the reasons for these emphases?

Consider whether these and other points of discussion can be related to the characters in TKM, helping your students explore and assess Harper Lee’s ideas about heroes and heroism as expressed in her characters.

Activity 2—Our Words, Others’ Words

Ask your students to think of words and phrases they commonly use that older generations don’t use. Write the words they cite on the chalkboard. For each word, ask them to identify a parallel word or phrase that older generations used. List the words or phrase pairs side by side on a chart. (You can be a resource if students have difficulty coming up with a "generational" word or phrase by giving the word or phrase used when you were a teenager.)

Many of the words will be slang. The students might state a slang usage such as “digs” for “house,” and a different slang usage such as “pad” can be identified for their parents’ generation. Further, an obsolete word such as “domicile” might be associated with even earlier generations. Common objects often undergo slang evolutions—consider, for example, generational slang words for car, money, or clothing.

Members are another interesting and often amusing source of language differences among generations. Students might seek different expressions over time for interjections such as gee whiz, right on, fiddlesticks, yuk, hip, oh my goodness, etc.

Next ask your students to work in small groups to develop five or six sentences of dialogue that make use of words peculiar to their own generation, and another five or six sentences of dialogue—preferably but not necessarily on the same subject—as spoken by people from another generation. Stress that the critical point is to keep the language of each dialogue appropriate to the speakers in their own time period.

After the groups read aloud and discuss their original dialogues, introduce the concept of realistic dialogue. Point out that skilled authors attempt to portray speech patterns and vocabulary that reflect the language of the times and the environments in which the characters live. To ascribe words or language styles that are historically or culturally inaccurate for the characters in a work would be a literary flaw.

The writer’s concern with realistic language may result in words and passages that some readers find offensive. In TKM, Harper Lee uses the racial epithet “nigger” and words such as “damn” and “rutting” (for sexual intercourse). Realism is also evident in negative events in the novel, such as a rape and a murder. Point out that such language and events are only part of the larger theme and moral vision of the author. Also point out that some writers go beyond the need for realism in depicting language and events, using inflammatory words and phrases and horrid events sensationalistically or for shock value. Note that distinguishing between dialogue handled skillfully and dialogue that is exaggerated, used sensationalistically, or otherwise off target is an important critical thinking skill for readers and viewers. In this manner your students can be prepared to discuss Harper Lee’s use of words/dialogue in TKM during the first teleconference.

Activity 3 – Opinionnaire

Ask your students to give their initial, gut reactions to the 12 statements in preparation for a discussion of the statements. Assure them that their responses can be simply first impressions—starting points for further discussion about degrees of agreement or disagreement with the ideas in the statements. Ask them to write "1" beside the statement if they strongly agree, "2" if they agree somewhat; "3" if they disagree somewhat; and "4" if they strongly disagree. They might jot down comments about a statement that aroused mixed feelings or about the wording of or the premise underlying a particular statement.

1. All men are created equal.
2. Girls should act like girls.
3. It's okay to be different.
4. Nobody is all bad or all good.
5. Some words are so offensive that they should never be stated or written.
6. Under our justice system, all citizens are treated fairly in our courts of law.
7. The old adage, "Sticks and stones may break your bones, but words will never hurt you," is true.
8. Speaking standard grammar proves that a person is smart.
9. A hero is born, not made.
10. No one is above the law.
11. Education is the great equalizer.
12. When the law does not succeed in punishing criminals, citizens should do so.

Discuss the statements, perhaps inviting students to begin with those that struck a strong chord of response in them. Encourage different viewpoints, but ask students to talk through their ideas beyond their first impressions—e.g., by considering the fuller implications of their positions and giving concrete examples to support their views.

The items in the Questionnaire all relate to themes and issues—e.g., equal justice, heroism, vigilante action, language differences—in To Kill a Mockingbird. The discussion sets the scene, then, for the teleconference or for study or review of the novel or the film.

'Girls should act like girls.'
Activity 4—Exploring Stereotypes

If your students have not worked with the concept of stereotypes, explain that a stereotype is a way of "labeling" categories of people in rigid ways—usually, unfavorable ways. Ask whether the labels below carry connotations that are stereotypical. If so, what are the qualities that are attached to the stereotype? Are some labels themselves clearly negative words that are substitutes for favorable, or at least neutral, terms?

jock  preppie  bookworm
dude  lawyer  motorcyclist grunge  towine  cheerleader babe  tomboy  televangelist hunk  redneck  computer geek

Ask students to suggest and discuss stereotypes that are not on the list. Use these activities to prepare students for a discussion of stereotypes held by some of the characters in TKM, an issue likely to be among those raised for discussion during the teleconference. (Note: If some of the stereotypes are not known to your students, you can be a resource, giving your impressions of the stereotypical qualities.)

Planning/Writing Team

The following team of teachers, teacher educators, and humanities scholars prepared this guide with support from the National Endowment for the Humanities

NCTE Team:

Gwendolyn Alexander, Lead Teacher
English Content Specialist for the District of Columbia Public Schools (DCPS) A former high school English teacher, she is responsible for the Arts and Humanities Teachers’ Collaborative and the DCPS English Language Arts Curriculum Framework.

Dr. William Costanzo
Teaches English and film at Westchester Community College in Valhalla, New York. A former chair on NCTE’s Committee on Film Study and director of the Media Commission, Bill speaks and writes regularly on the connections between English and media education. His book, Reading the Movies, is available through NCTE.

Judith Kelly
Teacher in the District of Columbia Public Schools (DCPS) for over 20 years and currently directs the D.C. Area Writing Project. She is also on the Advisory Board for the DCPS English Language Arts and History Curriculum Framework Project.

Dr. Charles Suhor
Deputy Executive Director for the National Council of Teachers of English. A former high school English teacher and K-12 English Supervisor in New Orleans Public Schools, he has written widely about interdisciplinary studies and the teaching of English language arts.

Guest Scholar Team:

Dr. Joanne Gabbin
Ph.D. in English Language and Literature, University of Chicago, concentration in American literature with special emphasis on Black literature. Presently, Director of the Honors Program and Professor of English at James Madison University, Harrisonburg, Virginia. She teaches courses in Black literature and Honors.

Claudia Durst Johnson
Harper Lee scholar, author, former chair of the English Department at University of Alabama-Tuscaloosa, currently resides in Berkeley, California.

Prince William County Public Schools Team:

Larry Bell
Supervisor of Multicultural Education

Mark Kozlowski
High School English Teacher, Brentsville H.S.

Penny Lake
High School English teacher, Potomac H.S.

Sandra Munnell
Mockingbird Website Webmaster and High School English Teacher, Woodbridge H.S.

Phyllis Peterson
High School English Teacher, Osbourn Park H.S.

Project Director:

Stan Woodward
Coordinator of Distance Learning Producer, To Kill A Mockingbird: Then and Now
Charlayne will use news footage and her first-hand experience of the irrationality of adult racism. She is known to millions of Americans as a national correspondent for the PBS NewsHour. She is known for her history as the first African American woman to attend the University of Georgia, breaking the "color line" and passing through a crowd who jeered her on a January morning in 1961, experiencing first-hand the irrationality of adult racism. Charlayne will use news footage and her personal experience to comment on the time when Harper Lee wrote and published her novel and the film was released. After setting the social and historical context for the novel and the film, Charlayne will lead our panelists and audience in a discussion of the novel and film and how it has a continuing impact into our day and time.

Panelists

Gwendolyn M. Alexander

Lead Teacher for NCTE Review Team and Guide contributor/advisor

Gwen is an English Content Specialist for the District of Columbia Public Schools (DCPS), a former high school English teacher, and is responsible for the Arts and Humanities Teachers' Collaborative and the DCPS English Language Arts Curriculum Framework. Gwen was recommended by NCTE to serve as lead teacher for the Review Team in preparation of the Teacher Study Guide. She will be a guest panelist on the Program 1 broadcast.

Guest scholar, member of NCTE Review Team and Guide contributor/advisor

Bill serves the project as our specialist in media education. He teaches English and film at Westchester Community College in Valhalla, N.Y. and is former chair of NCTE's Committee on Film Study and director of the NCTE Media Commission. Bill teaches TKM annually, and will lead discussion in the second broadcast—the two-hour Lyceum featuring a dialogue about the making of and the impact of the film. Bill is well acquainted with interactive technologies and their use in the education of students and served as a member of the writing and NCTE Review Team planning committee for the guide.

Special Guests

Mary Badham (Scout)

Special guest, Program 2

Mary Badham, with no prior screen acting experience, and in competition with 2,000 other applicants, won the role of Atticus' tomboy daughter, Scout, in the film adaptation of TKM. She won a best supporting actress Oscar nomination for her performance. Mary appeared in two other films, This Property Is Condemned and Let's Kill Uncle (both 1966), and on TV episodes of Dr. Kildare and Twilight Zone before retiring from the screen. She lives with her husband and children on a farm in Virginia, and is active each year in visiting schools and lecturing to audiences nationally about the film classic.

Phillip Alford (Jem)

Special Guest; Program 2

Phillip lives in Alabama with his wife and children and is in the construction business. He will be reunited with Mary Badham, Brock Peters and (hopefully) Gregory Peck on stage for the first time.

Dr. Joanne V. Gabbin

Guest scholar and Guide contributor/advisor;

Dr. Gabbin brings her creativity and interests crossing over several disciplines and activities to the project. Director of the Honors Program and Professor of English at James Madison University, with a Ph.D. in English Language and Literature from the University of Chicago (concentration in American Literature with an emphasis on Black Literature), Joanne directs the Honors Program at J.M.U. She has a special interest in African American literature, poetry, art and culture. Dr. Gabbin was recommended to the project by the Virginia Foundation for the Humanities.

Claudia Durst Johnson

Lead Harper Lee scholar, program consultant and Guide contributor/advisor

Claudia has enjoyed a personal acquaintance with Harper Lee. Both she and Harper Lee were associated with the University of Alabama, where Johnson served as Chair of the English Department. In 1996, Claudia left a 23-year career as English professor and administrator at the university to write and edit full-time in California. She has written ten books including three on 19th-century American theatre, two on Nathaniel Hawthorne, and two on Harper Lee: Understanding To Kill A Mockingbird: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historic Documents and Threatening Boundaries.

SPECIAL GUESTS

Gregory Peck (Atticus)

Special Guest (tentative); Program 2

Gregory Peck, while a student in pre-med at Berkeley, traveled to New York where he saw I Married An Angel with Vera Zorina. His priorities suddenly changed and he withdrew from pre-med, joining a small theater group on campus. In 1939, Peck returned to New York City, won a scholarship to the prestigious Neighborhood Playhouse School of Dramatics, and went on to a remarkable career as one of America's most honored and treasured actors. It has been said by many that Mr. Peck's zenith as a film actor was To Kill a Mockingbird, for which he won an Oscar—the Academy Award for Best Actor—for his portrayal of Atticus Finch. Mr. Peck has been invited to reunite with his two Mockingbird children and with Brock Peters so that the story of the making of TKM can be passed on to this generation of students nationwide.

Mary Badham, Brock Peters and (hopefully) Gregory Peck on stage for the first time.

Members of the Writing and Planning Team for the Teacher Study Guide and the Lyceum

Team members from NCTE and Prince William County Schools (see page 14) will also be available to respond to student questions during the live broadcasts.
Program Descriptions

Teacher Workshop
Teleconference/Orientation
April 10 (One Hour)

This workshop for teachers planning to participate in the live teleconferences will feature Harper Lee scholar Claudia Durst Johnson, Supervisor of Multicultural Education Larry Bell, Mockingbird Website coordinator Sandra Munnell, and lead teachers who served on the writing team for the Teacher Study Guide. By viewing this program teachers will be familiarized with the Teacher Study Guide, the Mockingbird Website, and how to prepare students for interactivity with the live broadcasts, including how to submit questions to panelists and guests. Teachers must register for the free workshop to receive the satellite coordinates. See below for the registration form and phone and fax numbers.

Program 1
The Novel: Then and Now
April 24 (One Hour)

Host Charlayne-Hunter Gault, sharing her own experiences, will connect students of this generation to the social and historical context for the novel—the period of the Civil Rights Movement when the novel was written and published by Harper Lee. After viewing news footage from the late '50s and early '60s, Ms. Hunter-Gault will then join noted Harper Lee scholar Claudia Durst Johnson, Dr. Joanne Gabbin, and other panelists to lead students in a discussion of the novel’s impact "then and now." A special feature of the program will be Johnson sharing with students her insights into Harper Lee, with whom she has a personal acquaintance, as well as fresh information and new insights into the novel, including a discussion of the gothic in TKM.

Program 2
The Film: Then and Now
April 25 (Two Hours)

Host Charlayne Hunter-Gault will introduce NCTE English and film teacher Bill Costanzo, and special guests, including representatives of AFI and members of the cast of TKM: Mary Badham (Scout), Brock Peters (Tom Robinson), Phillip Alford (Jem), and, tentatively, Gregory Peck (Atticus). Costanzo will move us through the cast's story and recollections of the making of TKM, then to an analysis of scenes with comments by the cast, creative team and panelists. Our host will present to our guests pre-selected questions sent in advance by students via fax while students calling the toll-free number will present questions and talk directly to the panelists and guests during the live broadcast. Students should fax questions to 703-791-7378 prior to April 18.
