Trends and issues related to arts and humanities in adult and continuing education can be categorized in three ways: ways of knowing, informal sites of learning, and cultural pluralism. The arts and humanities are vehicles for critical reflection, and they present paths to the individual construction of knowledge that are intuitive, relational, kinesthetic, visual, and aural alternatives to analytic and scientific methods. However, their potential is moderated by the motivation of adult learners. Much adult education in the arts and humanities takes place at informal sites and is increasingly focused on nontraditional audiences. Arts and humanities help homeless and incarcerated women find their voice and acquire critical literacy; humanities can help criminals alter their mental maps of the world and transform behavior. The democratizing of culture is reflected in another trend. The increasing cultural pluralism of society is expanding the notion of what is considered "legitimate" art, who creates art, and what are "acceptable" responses to it. Adult education in the arts and humanities has the following benefits for both individuals and society: development of perceptual ability, ability to exploit a particular medium of expression, ability to engage in the creative process, awareness of the nature of artistic activity, and critique of cultural value systems. Arts and Humanities in Adult and Continuing Education

"Participation in the arts and the humanities unlocks the human potential for creativity and lifts us beyond our isolated individualism to shared understanding." (President's Committee on the Arts and the Humanities 1997, p. 1). In the current "learning for earning" climate, however, the arts and humanities are often neglected, despite their intrinsic value and their contribution to learning. Although the PCHA report stresses the importance of cultural education, its recommendation focuses entirely on educating youth for the future and does not mention adult education. This Alert looks at trends and issues related to arts and humanities in adult and continuing education in three areas: ways of knowing, informal sites of learning, and cultural pluralism. It concludes with an annotated list of resources.

The arts and humanities are vehicles for critical reflection, and they present paths to the individual construction of knowledge that are intuitive, relational, kinesthetic, visual, and aural alternatives to analytic and scientific methods. Museum visitors (Dufresne-Tassé 1992), performing arts audiences (Sgroi 1992), and readers of literature (Morgenstaller 1990) are often actively engaged in constructing meaning. Carr (1992) describes cultural institutions as sites for cognitive apprenticeship, as places in which information exchanged in the presence of stimulating experience can lend adults to verify or revise existing knowledge and recognize alternative perspectives. Milton (in Elias et al. 1995) describes the arts as languages of communication of ideas. However, this potential is moderated by the motivation of adult learners: students in painting, writing, dance classes etc. interested only in acquiring technical skills or in liberating their own creativity and transforming themselves (ibid.).

Much adult education in the arts and humanities takes place at informal sites and is increasingly focused on nontraditional audiences. Mircari (1992) and Baird (1995) highlight the value of arts and humanities programs in helping homeless and incarcerated women find their voice and acquire critical literacy. Minihan (1990) suggests that humanities can help criminal alter their mental maps of the world and transform behavior. Edelson (1994) asserts that adults circumvent institutional indifference by creating alternative networks to teach themselves art. New technologies such as the World Wide Web and CD-ROMs are injecting new life by making full texts of literary works, contents of art galleries, and music and audio clips accessible to much wider audiences (Gartner 1996, Lyon 1996).

This democratising of culture is reflected in another trend. The arts and humanities have been tainted with a reputation for elitism, exclusion, and inaccessibility. However, the increasing cultural pluralism of society is expanding the notion of what is considered "legitimate" art, who creates art, and what are "acceptable" responses to it (Greene in Elias et al. 1995). Artistic value judgments typically reflect the values of the dominant culture, but Jones (1992) urges educators not to measure learners' art products against culturally determined value systems, but to assess what learning takes place and how learners have developed their own creativity.

Arts and humanities education reflects the tension in adult education over whether it changes the individual or society. Jones (in Elias et al. 1995) suggests the need to place cultural values in a broader context. He cites the following contributions of adult education in the arts and humanities for both individuals and society: development of perceptual ability, ability to exploit a particular medium of expression, ability to engage in the creative process, awareness of the nature of artistic activity, and critique of cultural value systems.

The Humanities Enrichment Program improves the quality of adult literacy curriculum by exploring subjects of historical, cultural, and social interest through architecture, literature, local history and other topics led by humanities scholars.

An extension of a humanities learning model for homeless women taught to demystify literature for female inmates, helping them find their voice.

Barrett, D.B. "Art Programming for Older Adults." Studies in Art Education 34, no. 3 (Spring 1993): 131-140. (ED 473 703)

Describes programs that emphasize either the crafts or the fine arts approach. Recommends programs that promote creative thinking and self-expression.

Beamer, B. "Widespread Neglect in the Fourth Education Sector in Australia." Australian Journal of Adult and Community Education 34, no. 2 (July 1994): 96-103. (ED 492 527)

Adult and community education neglects museums and art galleries as venues, and museum staff neglect adult learners as learners in developing educational programming. Both groups should work more closely together.

Cultural institutions are essential agencies for stimulating and enhancing reflection and for constructing and expressing knowledge. They are sites for cognitive apprenticeship.

Includes "Creativity and Life Review in the Visual Arts" (M.M. Rugh); "Making Your Own Mark: Creating a Community-Based Arts Program with Older Adults" (A.L. Belser, M.M. Rugh); and "Fine Arts for Elders" (J. Richardson).

Visitors to museums actively construct knowledge and experience complex cognitive functioning. Exhibits that do not support active learning block cognitive and emotional engagement.

Observation and interviews with the instructor and seven learners in a retirement center painting class revealed a classroom climate characterized by practices for facilitating learning: mutual respect, collaboration, critical thinking, and self-direction.

Several trends present opportunities for educators to reach larger numbers of potential students: the aging population, the growing availability of places where adults can study art, and a heightened art awareness.

A proposed model for adult art education focuses on helping adults learn and practice art throughout their lives. Educators can encourage adults to embrace a more flexible and personal approach to their own art education that is based less on mastering aspects of a "discipline" or "disciplines" and more on achieving meaning and satisfaction from their endeavors.

Selected papers from the first three international conferences on adult education and the arts include "Values in the Arts and Education" (Jones); "The Arts, Aesthetics and Values in Education" (Greenhalgh); and "Arts for All: The Arts and Social Education" (Millon).

Describes good starting points for exploring humanities resources on the Internet

Explores activities and motivates for older adults' involvement in visual arts, music, theatre, dance, and creative writing and suggests ways to integrate artistic creativity into geriatrics and therapy.

A teacher educator explains how the adults re-think "whole thinkers" by expanding their ability to use visual expression as a way of understanding and making meaning.

Hughes, V. "Whose Literature Is It Anyway?" Adults Learning, 3, no. 7 (March 1993): 181-183. (ED 444 012)

Adult education may be an effective means of dispersing "cultural fear," an obstacle to democratic access to literature, ensuring common ownership of a cultural heritage.

Describes the integration of expressive arts with outdoor experiential education as an attempt to encourage balance between the technical and interpersonal skill development of leadership among experiential educators.

Teachers of art to adults should not measure learners' products against a culturally determined value system, but should measure what learning takes place, a better method of assessment in a multicultural classroom.

Describes how to use theatre techniques such as relaxation and breathing, movement and body language, vocal projection, language rhythm, memorization, and improvisation skills to increase the self-confidence of students of English as a second language.

Chadwick-Beatty's forthcoming Literature Online service, full-text literature databases, might revolutionize information provision in the arts and humanities.

Arts that humanities programming is worth doing is a pluralistic society because it emphasizes human experience and values. Notes that continuing education programs have developed humanities offerings.

A project for homeless women and children uses storytelling to build the social foundations of literacy and acting to develop expression in narrative forms. It combines study of children's literature and development with folklore and adult literature from the women's cultural heritage.

It is false to assume that morality can be taught and that increased moral sophistication will reduce recidivism in a causer sense. Humanities are probably helpful in dealing with recidivism because they improve the way inmates "map" the world and their place in it.

Norgengasser, S. "Using Poetry to Teach Humanities in the Adult Literacy Classroom." Paper presented at the annual meeting of the American Association for Adult and Continuing Education, Salt Lake City, UT, 1990. (ED 326 666)

The humanities help literacy learners develop critical thinking and communication skills; they promote expression of beliefs, self-understanding, valuation abilities, and cross-cultural awareness.

A creative writing program in Chicopee, Massachusetts, empowers disadvantaged women to make changes in their lives. It addresses the self-images imposed by social conditioning and the dominant culture.

Asserts the importance of the public-private interdependent system of support for culture. Recommends measures to renew philanthropy, protect the nation's cultural legacy, invest in cultural leadership, and strengthen education in the arts and humanities.

Engaging in an act form enables adults to affirm their existence, express their uniqueness, control their own learning, and understand life.

Sgroi, A. "Let's Face the Music and Dance." New Directions for Adult and Continuing Education no. 53 (Spring 1992): 61-71. (ED 446 777)

Uses the learning in modern dance as a model for learning in the arts that is process rather than product oriented and relies on intuitive rather than scientific methods for obtaining knowledge.
