ABSTRACT

Based on a World Wide Web site, this paper presents links to Internet resources related to communication, particularly intercultural communication. After an introductory section that discusses the organization of the web site and the effective use of the web site, the paper presents 97 links divided into sections on organizations, conferences, links to useful information, communication programs, journals and newsletters, areas in communication, mailing lists, and publishers and bookstores. (RS)
Using "Internet Resources Related to Communication" on WWW

Introduction

The field of communication is often misunderstood. It is a very broad field that includes the study of language and culture, which overlaps with linguistics. However, there are a number of other areas of study in communication, such as mass communication, tele-communication, organizational communication, interpersonal communication, small group communication, etc., which do not have much overlap with linguistics. We included communication because we are interested in interpersonal and intercultural communication as well as language. Thus, although this section is not closely related to other web pages, we made this page for people like us who are interested in the field of communication. Since there are some areas of communication that we are not familiar with, such as telecommunication, journalism, health communication, political communication, and so on, we have not included much information about them. We have included information about general communication, especially intercultural communication. Since communication research has developed as a branch of social science, a great deal of information about research in communication may be useful to people interested in linguistics and language teaching.

Organization of "Internet Resources Related to Communication"

This web page has nine sections: organizations, conferences, links to useful information, communication programs, journals and newsletters, areas in communication, mailing lists, publishers and bookstores, and others. "Organizations" mainly includes international, American, and other countries' associations concerned with general communication. We put the lists of links to various organizations at the top, and then individual organizations; first, international and American ones, and then other countries' organizations. "Links to useful information" includes various types of useful information, which is related any part of the fields of communication. "Communication programs" includes departments of communication in universities. Many of them are departments in the American universities, but some are in other countries. "Journals and newsletters" has links to journals published by the associations. "Areas of communication" includes areas such as intercultural communication and interpersonal communication. We have listed only the areas we are interested in. We have listed the mailing lists which we found. We are not particularly familiar with any of those lists. We have listed one link related to publishers and bookstores. "Others" includes anything that does not fit into any other category. We do not have a section on research methods, but we are planning to add more information on research, since it is a very important area. Communication is such a broad area that it is difficult to decide how much to include. We have included links directly related to communication studies. Highly specialized or tangential fields may not be included.

Using "Internet Resources Related to Communication" Effectively

Since August 1996, when we constructed and updated this web resource at Lancaster University in England, much more information is available. In particular, many more organizations have put much more information. You can find more useful information on communication now. "Organizations" and "Links to Useful Information" have very useful information. The American Communication Association and Southern States Communication Association (SSCA) home pages have particularly useful resources. We strongly suggest that you investigate those sites thoroughly. If you are living in Japan and interested in intercultural communication, SIETAR-Japan seems to be very active.

We also suggest that you skim other web pages of the above two sections. There may be many resources of interest to you.

CIOS (Communication Institute for Online Scholarship) provides many resources, but many of them are only for members. If you want to use some of their resources frequently, you might consider becoming a member.

Conferences are not thoroughly collected. If you cannot find the one here and know which association is hosting it, try that association's site. We listed lists of communication programs in the United States. They are useful if you are considering working for a higher degree or doing research. Now there is also information about communication programs in Canada, UK, and other countries.

We listed some journals in communication, but unfortunately, two major journals, Communication Monographs and Human Communication Research are not included. For the most part, the only information you can obtain about journals is information about submitting papers and subscription announcements. You can read some newsletters on the line.

We listed resources for some divisions of communication. If you are interested in any of those areas, you might find something useful.

As for mailing lists, COMSERVE has some mailing lists. If you want to use many of their mailing lists, you need to become a member. In addition, XCUL is a very active mailing list related to cross-cultural communication. We have not tried the others yet. Now some organizations have mailing lists, and you can subscribe them even if you are not a member.

There are some useful publishers' home pages. We are planning to gather more information on research in the "Others" section in the near future.

Conclusion

We hope these resources will be useful for your studies and research. Some of the resources related to research and writing might be useful even for people outside of the field of communication.

CIOS (Communication Institute for Online Scholarship)

Whitepages now provides information on 4,000 communication scholars/students; hot links allow you to auto-send email to listed individuals; other hot links allow auto search for background information on individuals (publications, e-conference contributions, etc.). Try it:

http://www.cios.org/www/wp2.htm

CIOS WWW System Supports New Whitepages Directory
The inauguration of the new world wide web interface to CIOS/Comserve services made it possible to significantly enhance the whitepages service -- the online directory of communication scholars and students. It is now considerably more interactive and provides access to a very large database of communication scholars.

The new CIOS whitepages database contains information on more than 4,000 scholars and students. You can search the database for any text string: names, professional interests, email addresses, etc. The search system supports wildcard searching, proximity searching, and full Boolean search logic.

The best feature however is that the displayed search results are interactive. If a located entry contains an email address, it will be displayed by your browser as a selectable hot link. Simply click on it and your browser will allow you to send mail to that address.

All last names in entries are also displayed as selectable hot links. Click on a last name and you'll be able to search other CIOS databases to obtain background information on that individual including their record of publications and hotline conference messages that contain the person's name, perhaps from a discussion in which he/she participated or a discussion in which people mentioned his/her work.

The new system can function as an interactive directory to the field and as a front end to other CIOS databases. Preparing to visit a communication department to give a talk or interview for a job? Selecting a Masters or Ph.D. program? Search by geographic location (e.g., "Salt Lake City") and you can locate most of the communication scholars who live there. Click on a scholar's last name and quickly pull up his/her publication record.

With the new whitepages system, the CIOS is withdrawing support for the long-standing email based system provided within the Comserve email interface since 1986. The new whitepages system is available now and will remain available to the general public until the start of the 1996-1997 academic year when it will become restricted to CIOS members and those from CIOS affiliate institutions.
