This paper shares the impressions of a participant from the 1996 Fulbright-Hays Summer Seminars Abroad Program in Mexico. These impressions address several current interest topics about international relations with Mexico including: (1) immigration; (2) politics; (3) education; (4) the economy; (5) the environment; (6) the media; (7) religion; and (8) Chiapas. In putting together a user friendly summary of my experience in Mexico for use during the Intensive Summer Institute, I have to confess that I had a very difficult time getting started. I have been on overload for quite some time now, and it's been hard for me to figure out where to begin with all this information. Mexico is currently experiencing very dynamic changes at many levels: social, political, economic, religious. These changes will have, and indeed are having, certain consequences for the United States. Issues such as NAFTA, the disappearance of millions of dollars at the end of the Salinas administration, the various political assassinations, the surge of guerrilla activity in the south, and the increase of immigration into the United States will continue to have ripple effects at various levels in the United States. One refreshing consequence of all this dynamism south of the border is the increased interest by many people in the United States, especially in the Southwest, in learning more about the culture and the language (and languages) of our southern neighbors. As I traveled and listened to people, whether they were officials in government, opposition politicians, or the fruit vendor on the street, I got the feeling that the more information I got, the more confused I got. I believe that is precisely what is happening to the Mexican people as they ride on this tidal wave of change. I also got the impression that these changes will be slow in coming, and there will be several unsavory events which will take place as Mexico progresses toward a more democratic society.

Since our trip began on the Texas/Mexico border, and a big part of our activity there was discussing the issue of migration to the border and immigration to the U.S., I have decided to choose that issue as my first topic.

IMMIGRATION

This issue has been one of extreme contention for quite a few years, on both sides of the border. In recent years it has taken on an even higher level of emotion fervor with the passage of Proposition 187 in California and the current immigration legislation making its way through Congress this year (1996). In El Paso we had the opportunity to visit with the regional director of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Luis García. He gave us an overview of the INS and a brief historical perspective. He even shared that he himself was born in Mexico, was deported to Mexico along with his family as a young boy during "Operation Wetback" in the early years of the Eisenhower administration. He subsequently became a U.S. citizen while in the military. After returning from Vietnam he was hired by the Service, where he's been ever since.

He spent a considerable period of time explaining the relationship between the U.S. and Mexico regarding the issue of immigration. In the past there really wasn't much of a relationship between the two countries. Before the middle 80's Mexico was very nationalistic and resentful of the U.S. meddling in its affairs. In the last ten years, however, there has been more activity in the effort of reaching an agreement on this issue. One point which Mr. García made was that according to the Mexican Constitution, a Mexican citizen may move anywhere within the Republic and enjoy full rights as a resident. That means that if someone lives in Michoacán and moves to Ciudad Juárez or Tijuana with designs to go across the border to look for work, legally he may reside at the border for as long as he wishes. If he manages to cross the border, the legality issue is one for the U.S. and not for Mexico. A proposal originally made by the U.S. suggested that Mexico issue exit visas to those people wishing to leave. That didn't go off well with Mexico because of its sovereignty rights. Its point was that if Mexicans wished to travel abroad, they simply would apply for a Mexican passport.

Mr. García mentioned that currently the El Paso border area is being strengthened by bringing in more border patrol officers. Besides Mexicans trying to come across there are other nationalities coming in across the same borders. At the present time a new border detention center is being built in El Paso to house the increased number of people being apprehended. Negotiations are also under way to decide what to do with those individuals who are in custody who have been convicted of various felonies and who are also undocumented. He went on to elaborate on the difficulty of apprehending people who enter without inspection. There are so many people who wish to cross that the border patrol many times is overwhelmed. What INS is now trying to do is to work more closely with the Mexican government (which appears to be more willing to cooperate) in the repatriation process and in identifying the actual nationality of those being apprehended. There is also more cooperation with local law enforcement on the Mexican side regarding the criminal element operating in the area. What Mr. García did point out is that, during the negotiations for NAFTA, the issue of immigration was never raised. That notwithstanding, he acknowledged that migration is a global issue and that it needs to be addressed from that perspective.

At noon we met with Carlos Spector, an immigration attorney in the El Paso area. His perspective is that of the basic constitutional rights of those who are already in the country. The important thing to remember, he points out, is that no matter what infraction you may be accused of, every individual is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment from unnecessary abuse. He also points out that the original Immigration Reform Control Act was erroneously premised on employer sanctions, something he says hasn't worked in Europe according to a report from the GAO. He went on to elaborate how more aggressive legislation is making its way through Congress and, in one instance, has made it through Congress which directly affects immigrants' basic rights. To further elaborate, he mentioned that the term "good moral character" was redefined, and essentially done away with in the antiterrorism bill recently passed. Before this law passed, if a person who had resided over seven years in the United States and was arrested for a felony could, upon completion of restitution for this felony, appeal to an immigration judge to regularize his status based on the number of years in the United States, his historical background in the country, family ties, and otherwise "good moral character." An immigration judge had the discretion to consider these points during the deportation hearing. Since passage of the antiterrorism law, this discretion has been taken away from judges. A person may have lived here fifty years and be arrested for one felony which would expose him to immediate deportation without recourse to "basic tenets of American jurisprudence." (Spector)

Mr. Spector mentioned that at a recent conference he, along with other professionals in the field of immigration rights, suggested that the United States enact a program much like Mexico's "Kilómetro 28," where immigration would set up checkpoints about 15 to 20 miles away from the border to check for the legal status of those wishing to continue into the United States. This would allow for a free flow of commerce between El Paso and Juárez, for example, as well as more cultural exchange between the two communities on the border (the same could work throughout the border region, from Tijuana and San Diego to Matamoros and Brownsville, TX). For those who argue that people would come across to the U.S. side and take advantage of low-cost health care and free K-12 education, Spector counters that the mechanisms are already in place in order to avoid such a thing to occur, such as proof of residence to enroll kids in school and seek medical attention at the local county facility. Another proposal is that instead of spending money to beef up security on the border, the United States could use that money to look for ways to help Mexico create employment in the interior of the country, providing Mexicans with jobs at fair wages, thereby allowing people to remain in their communities and invest there. In the long run this would pay off for companies in the United States in terms of profits which can be reinvested in the country, slowly improving living conditions for the workers and their families. It is important to mention here that for at least ten years there has been some investment on the border in the way of "maquiladoras," assembly plants which ship products to the United States, Europe and Asia. Supporters feel that this has been a good first step towards industrializing the country. Detractors point out that workers at these plants currently barely earning enough to make it day by day: around $4.00 to $5.00 a day, not very much considering the high cost of living on the Mexican side of the border. Therefore, purchasing power for these workers is severely limited. Along with that, opponents point out, is the negative effect these plants have had on the local environment. The important thing which needs to be stressed here, as Spector states, is that these are binational problems which demand binational solutions by both countries, and not respond to them unilaterally only by military means and by undermining basic constitutional rights.

POLITICS

In discussing the current political situation in Mexico, it can be said that before 1987, discussing the political landscape of the country was a relatively easy thing to do. The country basically lived under a one-party monopoly of power at federal, state and municipal levels. The Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) had held on to power continuously since 1929. The only things that had changed were two name changes and the personalities of those who were in power. By way of that control on a national level, it made it easy to control the various states and municipalities through government handouts, pressure tactics, fraud, and corruption. The facade of a democratic state worked well for Mexico on an international level. It had three branches of government, its 1917 constitution was modeled in large part on the U.S. Constitution, and elections were consistently held for president every six years. The only problem, which was overlooked by many outside the country, was that the same party always won. Before getting into what has happened since 1987, I feel it is important to understand the political makeup of the nation.

The 1917 federal constitution provides for a democratic, representative form of government at federal, state, and municipal levels. It also calls for a separation of powers at all levels of government. Currently, there are 31 states and one federal district. Elections for president are held every six years and a sitting president cannot be reelected. There is no vice president. If a president dies in office or resigns during his first two years in office, Congress chooses an interim president and designates a date for a special election to pick someone to finish out the term. If a vacancy occurs during the last four years, Congress chooses an interim president to finish out the term. Citizens become franchised at the age of 18. The term for a senator is six years, and that of a representative is three years. The makeup of the federal congress is 500 representatives (deputies) based on population, and 124 senators, four for each of the 31 states. There is an minimum age requirement for each house (21 for deputies and 30 for senators), and no member of the military or clergy may hold a seat in Congress.

As for the federal judicial system, there are some notable differences from the U.S. system. There are currently 11 judges on the Mexican Supreme Court, a change from 21 when President Carlos Salinas entered office in 1988. The term for a Supreme Court judge is 15 years, whereas in the U.S. it is for life.

The other big difference is in the Mexican Constitution. There have been three constitutions in the history of independent Mexico: 1824, 1857, and 1917. Since 1917, the Constitution has been amended at least 400 times. Whereas in the U.S. the task of amending the Constitution is a time consuming and highly political affair (the necessary number of state ratifications required), in Mexico the average time to amend is three days. This points out the hegemony the president enjoyed in maintaining control at all areas of Mexico's political life. This is also a good lead-in to discuss how the political landscape has changed since 1989.

I had earlier mentioned the date of 1987 as a pivotal year in the political evolution of the country. That was the year that the governing PRI was first presented with two major challenges to its political monopoly. The National Action Party (PAN) had nominated for presidential candidate a charismatic northerner by the name of Manuel Clouthier, also known as "Maquillo." (who in 1990 died in a mysterious car accident in Sinaloa state). He barnstormed the nation making electoral fraud the principal plank of PAN's platform. The important thing was that he was gaining much popular support, especially in the north. The PAN was always seen as the loyal opposition. It had been founded in 1939 by conservative businessmen with links to the Catholic Church. It wanted to present a viable conservative alternative to the revolutionary rhetoric of the party in power. By 1987, however, it became much more than just a "lonely voice in the desert" with Maquillo's candidacy and by PAN's threat of wresting key statehouses from the PRI.

A much bigger problem for the PRI was the defection of two of its major players. One was Cuauhtémoc Cárdenas, a former PRI governor of Michoacán state and the son of another very popular president, Lázaro Cárdenas. The other was Porfirio Muñoz Ledo, a former PRI chairperson who had also held several important cabinet posts in previous administrations. They formed a coalition of leftist groups and nominated Cuauhtémoc for president. This presented a very serious problem for the PRI. When election time rolled around in July 1988, the computer "broke down" in Mexico City, and it wasn't until a week later that the results were announced, giving Carlos Salinas de Gortari, PRI's candidate, the victory (a very weak one at about 51% of the vote).

Salinas began his administration with a big loss of credibility since many felt he had "stolen" the election from Cárdenas. He had to get immediately started in gaining support among the various sectors of the nation. He began by initiating an anticorruption campaign, jailing the head of the oil union for gun running. He also initiated a program called Solidaridad (Solidarity), whereby the federal government would provide matching funds to states and local communities for community development. He also privatized national industries such as the banks, the telephone company, and electrical power. It is important to point out that Salinas took full advantage of his presidential power to enact these changes. That is to say that he pretty much stated what he wanted to see happen, and the Mexican Congress, where the PRI held the majority of seats, for the most part did his bidding.

In 1990 the tide of reform took an interesting turn. President Salinas proposed to Congress the suspension of those sections of Article 27 of the Constitution which deal with land distribution, parcels of which were legally known as "ejidos" (communal land). This became a more contentious situation in Congress and in the various states. This was precisely because Article 27 was almost an article of faith which was born during the Mexican Revolution, and one for which many people had died. Salinas's supporters pointed out that the issue of land distribution had become redundant since most harvestable land had already been redistributed. They also argued that those holding these ejidos (ejidatarios) could now sell their land, whereas before that was an impossibility. Those on the other side argued that it created an uneven playing field because the holders of larger ejidos would stand a better chance at cutting a good deal than those with smaller holdings. It created a especially thorny problem in the state of Chiapas, where the impact of Article 27 was never really felt.
At this point I need to mention that in 1989 the coalition of leftists which had nominated Cárdenas for president in 1988 formed a political party by the name of the Revolutionary Democratic Party (PRD). The two principal players of the 1988 presidential election, Cárdenas and Muñoz Ledo, became leading members of this new party. It has undergone its own interesting metamorphosis which would be too lengthy to elaborate here. However, its intention was to continue to be a thorn on the side of the PRI throughout the Salinas administration. It is interesting to note, as well, that Salinas gave the go-ahead to finance a small party called the Labor Party (PT). Though the idea of this new party was to present a face of multiparty participation in the political life of the nation, the real goal was to wrest votes from the PAN and the PRD. The PT carried out very visible campaigns throughout the country financed by the ruling PRI. (Oppenheimer: México en la frontera del caos, 1996)

Also, it was around this time that Salinas was looking toward initiating a semblance of political reform in order to pave the way for the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). In order to set the stage for this reform, concessions had to be made during some state elections. Though there was formidable resistance within these states because certain power bases were in jeopardy, PAN was allowed to win a few statehouses. By 1993, many times through fits and starts, the nation was poised to leap toward the brave new world of neoliberalist reforms: political pluralism, economic reform, and a sharing of power with the executive. It was at this time that Salinas was ready to move ahead and negotiate with the U.S. and Canada Mexico's inclusion in the NAFTA agreement, an effort in which he was successful. At the same time he felt it important to communicate to certain key businessmen in Mexico that if they wanted to insure that the march toward economic progress would continue, it would be important to make contributions of at least $25 million U.S. to the PRI presidential campaign in 1994.

In 1994 the lid suddenly blew off Mexico's political and economic pot. On January 1, NAFTA went into effect. At the same time, a revolutionary movement which had been gestating in the jungles of Chiapas for some time burst on the scene, taking over key municipalities in the state. This movement helped to expose fundamental divisions within the PRI. The party was divided basically into three camps: the dinosaurs, who wanted to maintain the status quo; the reformers, who wanted to continue with deeper political reforms; and the technocrats, many of whom were in Salinas's cabinet, who want to move forward toward participation in first world markets. Around the same time the PRI had "chosen" its presidential candidate for 1994, by the name of Luis Donaldo Colosio Murrieta, known to the nation simply as Colosio. Colosio happened to be of the reformist camp. He had definite ideas as to how the nation needed to move ahead on political reform and how soon it needed to do it. Unfortunately for him, he further exacerbated the political divisions with the PRI by his rhetoric and his personal style. In March he was assassinated during a political rally in the northern city of Tijuana, across the border from San Diego. Though there was a valiant effort on the part of the University of California, San Diego, Medical Center, to bring Colosio by helicopter to its hospital, it was not allowed to do so for unexplained reasons.
Colosio's death put Salinas in a very precarious position, since Colosio was Salinas's first choice, a prerogative a president enjoys as also being the head of the party. In order for him to assure that economic and political reforms which he had initiated would continue, he had to walk a political mine field in order to choose another candidate. That meant that he had to take all the tendencies within the PRI into consideration before making his choice. He finally decided on giving his acquiescence to Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de León. Zedillo was a big surprise for almost everyone. He was the darkest of dark horses, having previously occupied a cabinet post as well as other government positions. His real visibility came when he was chosen by Colosio to run his campaign. He managed to pull it all together in four and a half months, and in August 1994, he won the presidential election. In the fall of that same year the chairperson of the PRI was assassinated in downtown Mexico City under extremely confusing conditions. In December Salinas handed over presidential power to Zedillo. Two weeks later the rubber band around the peso exchange vis à vis the U.S. dollar snapped. What was once an exchange of three pesos to the dollar suddenly became $7.50 mexcy to $1.00 U.S. People saw their real wages plummet and their monthly payments double, creating almost explosive social conditions in many parts of the nation.

Beginning in 1995 things have taken on a different look throughout much of the country. Many nongovernmental agencies have sprung up to take up the fight for those who for many years have been squeezed out of the political game. In recent months a new organization has been formed by the name of "El Barzón" (Spanish for yoke) in order to prevent the bank takeover of foreclosed property. Many people are clearly seeing the holes in the dominant party and are joining movements such as the "barzonistas" as well as the ranks of opposition parties, the two major ones being the PAN and the PRD. Serious challenges are being made within the traditional trade unions, which have always been linked to the PRI and have been beneficiaries of various types of patronages. The national union has been run by one man since around 1940, and who is now 96 years old. Everyone is bracing for serious confrontations once he leaves the scene. Of particular note is the teacher union, which broke into two groups, one which still owes allegiance to the majority party and the other which is more leftist. Nothing has really been resolved between these two camps, and teachers continue to intermittently call strikes during the school year. The issue of Chiapas is continuing to play itself out, and there is now a guerrilla movement which has sprung up in the nearby state of Guerrero. There are some people who believe that this is a government-inspired movement created to instill fear in the Mexican people regarding a possible revolution, as well as to foment sympathy for the government.

In 1997 there will be elections to choose all federal deputies, half of the senate, 10 to 12 state governors and members of half of the state legislatures (which in Mexico are unicameral). There is much talk that the PRI will most likely lose control of the federal congress as well as a few more statehouses (four of which are currently under PAN
Mexico Summary

The political landscape will take an even more interesting turn, and it will also be interesting how these new players on the scene will react to issues such as NAFTA, the guerrilla movements in the south, migration from the countryside to the cities, and emigration to the U.S. One thing which is interesting to note (at least for me) is that while I was in Mexico City the PRD had an election to choose its new chairperson. Though both candidates were obviously left-leaning, one, Amalia García, was backed by those who would like to work within the system; the other, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, was supported by those who support current social movements such as the "barzonistas" and the Chiapas guerrillas. The forces of López Obrador won out, making 1997 look even more intriguing. One thing which will be an outcome of the upcoming elections is the loss of presidential will over the Mexican Congress. The members of that body will insist on having an even larger role in proposing legislation and will no longer take presidential initiatives as decrees. This will put the Mexican Supreme Court in the middle of the skirmishes and will expose any decisions it may make which tend to be favorable to the executive, thereby tainting it with being overly pressured by the president.

One thing not mentioned during this discussion but is a definite reality for many Mexicans is the influence of the various drug cartels in Mexico. It was even published in a magazine that President Zedillo had received as much as $60 million U.S. from Colombian sources toward his campaign in 1994. The drug influence is very present in many parts of Mexico as a viable alternative to an otherwise very bleak economic picture. This is present from areas where it is harvested to the transport network within and outside the country. This presents an enormously large problem in the democratization process. One has to ask: How much political reform are these powerful organizations going to allow in the various municipalities without it upsetting their power base? Will it become as violent as what has been happening in Colombia? In some parts of the country it is already beginning to become a reality. Time can only tell what this element in the Mexican reality holds in store.

EDUCATION

If we were to compare Mexican education on the surface with the educational system in California, for example, we could see that the level of education varies substantially, especially in the area of mathematics and science. The classes are streamlined in such a way that kids coming out of sixth grade in Mexico are at an educational level about ninth grade in California, at least as far as math is concerned. What hampers kids who come here from Mexico is not so much the subject matter per se, but the lack of English language skills necessary to experience success in California schools. Once we look behind that surface, however, we can see that there exist serious inadequacies in the Mexican educational system.
For many years (one can say since colonial times) Mexico's system of education has been highly centralized. All important decisions relating to the running of the schools, including curriculum development and teacher salaries, were made at the Secretaría de Educación Pública (Department of Education) in Mexico City. What is particularly interesting about this arrangement is how money for education is appropriated. The federal budget is currently broken down in the following way: 80% to the federal government, 15% to the various states, and 5% to the municipalities. Seeing the picture from this perspective, one can understand the deep inequities which exist in the system.

This system of centralism has affected teacher salaries over the years. In the best of situations, a teacher currently receives about $400 U.S. a month. In a visit to a primary school in San Francisco Uricho, Michoacán, the principal shared with us that teachers there receive $200 monthly. That translates to between $2400 to $4800 a year. Such low wages have pushed some teachers to break with the government-sanctioned union, the National Education Workers Union (SNTE) in order to form their own union, the National Education Workers Confederation (CNTE). While the government is offering a pay raise of 3%, the formal union is pushing for 4%, and the CNTE is going for anywhere from 6% to 100%. There is some dissention within the CNTE as to that issue, as well as skirmishes between the two unions, delaying an agreement with the government as to how high the pay raise will be. Teachers in states as Michoacán and Jalisco have chosen to call wildcat strikes to push the issue to the table.

Innovations in curriculum development in the lower grades have also been slow in coming and quite cumbersome. The practice has been to design such changes in the federal Secretaría in Mexico City and disseminate these changes throughout the country. Textbooks are issued from the federal capital and distributed to the states. The different schools have no say on the issue. There are no conferences at state and local levels where administrators and teachers can select from different types of texts from different publishing companies. In the push to decentralize, states are getting more involved in this issue, as well as in teacher salaries, by injecting topics of a more local nature into the primary and secondary curriculum.

Since teaching is a federal position, teachers are assigned a school by the federal government, and local school directors have no say as to who can teach at which school. That is to say that neither the school director nor a community body (board of trustees) becomes in an interview process. Such decisions are based on seniority and membership in the formal union. Teacher evaluations are spotty at best, and though a mechanism exists to evaluate teachers, it is seldom used to discipline laxness by certain teachers. To complicate matters, because of centralization, many schools lack the basics in order to carry out their mission. As the director of the school in Uricho shared with us, some children are unable to fulfill their homework assignments because they lack pencils and notebooks. He took the opportunity of meeting with us in order to make an appeal to send funds necessary to purchase these items. He also mentioned that there is a serious problem regarding absenteeism in the primary grades. He attributes this to the dire financial condition in which many families find themselves. There is really no truancy section in any of the schools to deal with this problem. Along with that is the lack of communication between the school and parents. He said it happens in only extreme circumstances.

The sad story exists in the realm of higher education. The highest average education for most Mexicans is between sixth and ninth grade. Putting it strictly in Mexican terms so not to confuse with our system, that is six years of primary school and three years maximum of secondary school. Fewer make it to finish the three years of preparatory school (comparable to the last two years of our high school and somewhat like our old junior college system). From that population about 20% make it into the university system. Though the entrance examination tends to be fairly rigid, the big impediment lies in the number of students a university can admit, leaving many unable to access the system. Cost is also a factor since the lower one is on the social strata, the less likely that person will be able to successfully finish a university career. As the government moves to further decentralize its educational system, this is an issue which will command serious attention.

ECONOMY

As was mentioned in the section POLITICS, the big talk since 1993 has been NAFTA. This agreement was enacted in 1994 among Mexico, the United States, and Canada, in order to lift certain trade barriers which had existed until then. In order to set the stage for NAFTA, President Salinas sought to abrogate certain sections of Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution which insured the peasant a parcel of land (ejido) in order to harvest his crops, which he would then sell back to the government for a fixed subsidy. This would open the doors for those "ejidatarios" to sell their land if they so desired, something which was until then against the law. Presumably this would make it easier for the foreign investor to acquire land inside the country for industrial development. The problem existed in the issue of equity. The larger ejidatarios would make out well in the deal while the small ones would feel the crunch. This would also create a climate of pressure for the ejidatario to divest himself of inherited land to pave the way for industrial development. To further exacerbate the problem was that in some remote parts of the country, land reform never really became a reality, such as in poor states as Oaxaca, Chiapas, and Guerrero.

On December 20, 1994, a little over two weeks after President Zedillo's inauguration, the Mexican government suddenly devaluated the peso. What was once an exchange rate of three Mexican pesos to the U.S. dollar became $7.50 to $1.00. Workers saw their real wages cut in half and mortgage interests double. In 1995 more that one million Mexican workers were thrown out of their jobs. Currently the number of unemployed stands at from 10 to 30%. People have had to be creative in seeking employment, usually by either opening up vending stands on the street, joining strolling musician groups, or immigrating into the U.S. It is worth noting that President Zedillo has managed to bring down the inflation rate from 8% in late 1994 to about 1% currently, according to figures at the U.S. Embassy Economic Affairs Office. This has been at a terrible price given the high number of unemployed in the country and the volatile social condition reigning in the nation. As evidence of that, I noticed while I was there that it was constantly difficult to get change when I presented bills of 50 pesos or more in order to pay for things such as restaurant tabs. At first I couldn't understand why, but it didn't take long to figure out that this was deliberate to avoid being a victim of the increased number of robberies occurring in public establishments and even on the highways. In the city of Guadalajara on one particular Friday after the city pulled the police from guarding the banks, there were four robberies. Even places such as banks and post offices have gotten into the habit of having as little money around on any particular day as they can get away with so as not to be an obvious target for a desperate population.

As for NAFTA, the original plan was to put Mexico on a more level economic playing field with the United States and Canada as far as exports and imports were concerned. As mentioned previously, however, in order to set the stage for NAFTA, a key element of the Mexican Constitution had to be somewhat scaled back, ie: land reform and land distribution. This concept was one of three fundamental principals for which the Mexican Revolution of 1910, along with subsoil rights, and effective suffrage. Many Mexicans at the bottom rungs of the economic ladder see NAFTA as way for the well-to-do to become even better off, leaving them in the dust. With the loss of guarantees of getting an equitable price for what is harvested on any given ejido, many small land owners are going to feel the need to sell in order to make ends meet. This also may mean that more people in the countryside may feel even more inclined to take their chances with the increased security at the U.S.-Mexico border to look for work here.

ENVIRONMENT

To take a look at Mexico City on any given day from about October to June, one wonders whether the issue of environmental protection has even arrived to the shores of the country. However, since the beginning of the Salinas administration, there have been steps to deal with this problem. The federal government passed a law regarding this issue and created a new cabinet post, the the Attorney General for Protection of the Environment. The current administration has created the Department of the Environment, Natural Resources and Fishing (SEMARNAP), whose job it is to enforce the environmental laws on the books. According to Gerardo Bernache from the Center for University Research in Social Anthropology (CIESAS) in Guadalajara, corruption makes it difficult to enforce such laws. Usually what happens, according to Bernache, is that a company is fined for breaking an environmental regulation, the company pays the fine, and business continues as usual.
On a local level, agencies have been created in some communities to address local issues. The problem with these agencies is that they are very weak, woefully understaffed, and highly susceptible to corruption. Complicating matters, especially in Guadalajara's case, is that the opposition party is now in control and lacks political connections with the traditional power structure in the city and within the state of Jalisco. What is much in evidence are family-owned businesses which are difficult to monitor. Many of these businesses have their connections which are difficult to penetrate. If a certain business feels the pressure from the authorities to "clean up their act," it will appeal to its political connections or simply move to another location and open shop.

The big thorn on the side of the environmentalists, according to Mr. Bernache, is the national oil company, PEMEX. This company is very arbitrary in how it follows the environmental laws and is extremely well-connected at the highest levels. This company was created in 1938 when foreign oil companies were nationalized by the federal government. This company is a national institution which is almost untouchable. There are ample examples where PEMEX is in blatant violation of local and federal environmental regulations and is sufficiently insulated to avoid adverse consequences. I have provided a handout which describes how PEMEX's laxness caused the death of about 300 people in Guadalajara.

Mr. Bernache mentioned that as Guadalajara tries to grapple with the issue of the environment, it has tried to enlist the support of the surrounding communities. This has presented its own set of problems. Since these communities are governed by opposing parties, it is difficult to even get them in the same room, much less to agree with each other. As mentioned earlier local political positions are highly partisan, unlike many communities in the U.S., where mayors and members of the city council are non-partisan positions.

While in Mexico City we met with Ing. Gabriel Quadri de la Torre, who heads the National Institute on Ecology. He mentioned that his agency is only a department for research and recommendations with no enforcement muscle. Since poverty is so overwhelming in the city as well as in the country, there has been arbitrary destruction of jungles, forests and bodies of water. He mentioned that at this time there are over 50 animal species extinct in the country. He also stated that Mexico City suffers from the same problem as Guadalajara in that there are no places to put an adequate number of landfills to handle the enormous amount of waste being produced in the city. Currently, 40% of disposable waste is being recycled, and a more aggressive recycling program needs to be enacted. The big problem for Mexico City, which includes the federal district and a part of the surrounding state of Mexico, is that the current population is at about 20 million, making it the largest metropolis in the world.

As for air quality, Mexico City is in very dire straits. During the dry months, from October through May, the air in the city can be lethal. Newborn babies in hospitals have to be provided with oxygen masks in order to breathe on some days. At the present time Mexico City has a commuter program which is based on cars' license plate numbers. On each day of the week, plates ending with certain numbers are not permitted on city streets. This is a good first step to cut back the terrible air pollution problem the city now has.

MEDIA

When I was in Mexico 25 years ago, I made ample use of the corner periodical stands throughout downtown Mexico City. I was like a kid in a candy store. I could choose from so many publications: Excelsior, Siempre, Contenido, and many others. I was fairly politically naive at the time, and what I was really going for was vocabulary enrichment. I soon became frustrated with the caliber of news being put out by these publications as well as by radio and television. Mexico at that time was a closely controlled system as far as the media was concerned, and whatever the government felt was favorable for its position got the appropriate exposure. The governing PRI got all the attention, and very little was given to opposition groups. Since I was taking a few classes at the National Autonomous University, I could avail myself of their underground press, which was fairly active a scant three years after the student massacre of 1968.

This time things were much more vibrant. There is more presence of the Spanish press, an impossibility 25 years ago since there were no relations between Mexico and Franco Spain. The almost immediate liberalization of that press since the death of the dictator has made its way into Mexico. There is much more openness in the Mexican press, and it is basically open season on the excesses of the previous administration. What is even more surprising is that the current administration has gotten substantial negative press, much of it foreign inspired. In 1994 the presidential election became an international affair. Newspapers such as the New York Times and the Washington Post were running almost weekly reports of the various campaigns (as well as the latest happenings with the Zapatista guerrillas in Chiapas). The European press came over in droves. Spanish reporters were everywhere to be seen. It became the easiest for them because of their spiritual and cultural connection to Mexico as well as because of the language. Such attention forced the country to loosen its grip over the printed word; it was well evident in the types of periodicals I was finding on the street corners.

I am not implying by this that Mexico had suddenly been transformed into a nation where there is absolute freedom of the press. As Dr. Ilya Adler, a media expert from the National Autonomous University pointed out, "...Half of the news market would disappear if it weren't in some way connected to corruption money..." He stressed that for the press to experience real freedom there needs to be complete independence between ownership and the government, something that doesn't exist now, at least with the more visible and credible news organizations. He feels that television presents a particularly sad case. Television is particularly vulnerable because of existing trust laws. Mexico has not experienced the strong antitrust feelings in the United States at the turn of the century.
which gave rise to the antitrust legislation passed before World War I. This is particularly evident in the national television organization, Televisa. Though no longer the monopoly it used to be, according to Dr. Adler, it still thinks like one. In Oppenheimer's 1996 book, México en la frontera del caos, Emilio Azcárraga, the owner of Televisa, had a virtual monopoly of 90% of Mexico's television news. In the negotiations for NAFTA, he had won a ten-year reprieve on foreign competition. In the meantime, another news organization rose on the scene during the Salinas years. Its name was Televisión Azteca, and its mission was to provide healthy competition to Azcárraga's news organization.
Unfortunately for Azteca, it is now the target of an investigation accusing it of receiving money from the brother of former President Salinas (Raúl Salinas), money which was obtained by very questionable circumstances, and something for which Raúl is currently in federal custody. Azcárraga's organization is making the most of this latest scandal, and almost daily, salvos are being fired from each of the networks for everyone to witness. All in all, however, I feel this is the price Mexico will have to pay if it wishes to move toward a more open society.

RELIGION

For many years Mexico was seen as a country where basically one religion was practiced: that which was brought over by Christopher Columbus and Hernán Cortés when they arrived on its shores. Along with gold hungry adventurers, they had brought with them a sizeable number of "spiritual" adventurers: Franciscan and Dominican friars, who were bent on extending the spiritual domain of the Catholic monarchs, much as the soldiers were intent on extending their sovereigns' temporal domain. What was once a thriving activity in Spain, the Inquisition, took on renewed fervor in places such as Mexico and Peru. In fact, the Inquisition lasted a little longer in Mexico than it did in Spain thanks to Napoleon's invasion of that country and the suppression of that activity throughout the Spanish kingdom.

The history of the Catholic Church throughout Mexico's independence has been one of "off and on" vis-à-vis the government. In Mexico's first constitution, 1824, the government took an anticlerical stance. About ten years later, with the rise of the dictator Santa Anna (who managed to lose Texas, California, and New Mexico to the United States), the Catholic Church was awarded the privileges of a state religion.
President Benito Juárez put an end to this favoritism in the 1857 Constitution. During the dictatorship of General Porfirio Díaz, the Church acquired new privileges, though the anticlerical laws of 1857 were not abrogated. The 1917 Constitution reinforced those laws, doing such things as nationalizing church holdings. In 1926, in an effort to put muscle to those laws, church activities were suspended for about three years, and a civil war broke out between church sympathizers and the government (there is disagreement as to who started the skirmish). In the 1930's it was agreed that the government and the Church would coexist as long as the Church would keep its nose out of government policy. That was a wise thing to do, since it was common knowledge that most of the top people in government were practicing Catholics. In a first, Pope John Paul II visited Mexico in 1979 (where he even blessed a chapel at the Mexican White House, Los Pinos, at the behest of the mother of the Mexican president). He has made two subsequent visits, both of which were attended by millions. By then the facade was completely torn, and during the Salinas presidency, a concordat was signed with the Vatican, ending 140 years of non-recognition between the two nations.

In a recent poll shared by Dr. Carlos Garma, a religion expert at the National Autonomous University, the country is broken down in religious preference the following way:

- Catholics (at least by name): 89.7%
- Protestants (evangelicos): 4.9%
- Jewish (judaica): 0.1%
- Other: 1.4%
- None: 3.2%
- Not determined: 0.7%

The Catholic Church appears to be strongest in the center of the country, in states such as Guanajuato, Jalisco, and Aguascalientes. Though there is a Jewish presence in Mexico City, still 92.7% say they are at least marginally Catholic. Interestingly enough, fundamentalist Protestant churches are having their biggest impact where there is currently antigovernment activity, in states such as Chiapas, Guerrero, and Oaxaca. The reason for this, it is felt, is because to those at the bottom of the economic ladder, the Catholic Church is seen as allied with the system of repression, which is the government. The Catholic Church's influence is also eroding in the states closest to the Caribbean (Yucatán and Quintana Roo), where for years there was a strong desire to separate from the central government. This alienation has increased under the conservative policies of John Paul II, making it difficult to take up pressing social causes.

Currently, the government has in place a section where religious groups may register for recognition by the government (Registro Nacional de Asociaciones Religiosas). The idea behind creating this agency was to give equal treatment to all religious groups. However, one group which is out of favor with the government are the Jehovah’s Witnesses. They do not accept the government's requirement that all citizens regardless of religious persuasion must swear allegiance to the flag and nation, and all males must serve in the armed forces. Since their beliefs preclude them from doing this, this group has chosen not to register with the Registro Nacional. This has even more sinister consequences for their children. Since pledging allegiance to the flag in school is a weekly affair, these kids may not attended government-subsidized schools, and school authorities must report children who refuse to swear to the flag. Some feel that shoots holes in the government's idea of giving equal treatment to all faiths.
I feel it important to mention here that I was particularly concerned with the presence of the Opus Dei among the ruling class in Mexico. The Opus Dei was founded in the 1940's in Spain by a Spanish priest named José María Escrivá de Balaguer in an effort to fight liberal tendencies within the Catholic Church, such as what was happening in France with the rise of the "worker priest" movement. In the 1950's the conservative Catholic movement crossed the Atlantic and took root in Mexico, some feel with even better results. Many in the top rungs of the Mexican government became members and were able to live within the perimeters of Mexico's official policy toward the Church and still be practicing Catholics. Dr. Garma believes that, though the Opus Dei is present within government, the free masons have a stronger influence, thereby guaranteeing that not too many concessions are made to the Church.

CHIAPAS

I thought I would make special mention of this southern-most state because what has happened here has had an important impact throughout the country, and indeed throughout the world. Before crossing the border into Mexico, we were visited by Dr. Duncan Earle, a cultural anthropologist who lived among the various indigenous groups in Chiapas for three years, and who is currently teaching at the University of Texas, El Paso. He gave us a brief summary of the cultural/linguistic makeup of this border state with Guatemala, which was indeed at one time a part of Guatemala. There are at least six different linguistic groups within the state: Tzotzil, Tzeltal, Tojolabal, Chol, Zoque, and Maya. These are very old cultures which have been able to basically conserve their political and religious structure (as well as preserve their language) despite invasion by Spanish and mestizo colonizers. Their concept of democracy differs greatly from traditional western ideas of how democracy should work. The important element in resolving differences within groups is reaching a consensus. This has made it difficult for the government to introduce democratic reform in the region. These communities don't accept the basic tenet of democracy that everyone is equal. They feel that each person is unique, and what is more important is that everyone come to a basic agreement over an issue. They also see democracy as a group of winners and a group of losers, contrary to their own belief system. They are societies that don't take particularly well to outside intrusion. We were warned that while there we should refrain from taking pictures of people in their regional dress. They believe that the camera steals their souls. They also see language as a powerful tool for either good or bad. The color of one's skin is not of importance; what counts is one's proficiency in language, especially their own.

Politically, Chiapas did not actively take part in the Mexican Revolution of 1910. Therefore, when such things as political and land reform swept most of the country, Chiapas was left out of the reform loop. What in fact happened was that antirevolutionary forces came into the state and pretty much continued to do business the way it was done during the dictatorship of Porfirio Díaz. During the Salinas regime, it was decided that... land distribution was no longer the big issue it had been for years. Salinas proceeded, therefore, to set the stage for the suspension of legislation dealing with the splitting up of large land holdings. This in fact was accomplished in 1991 and became law in 1992. This put the Tzotziles and Tzeltales in a very strange situation. By that time, many of them had been pushed out of their ancestral lands and had moved into the Lacandonan Jungle near Guatemala. They had been hoping that Article 27 of the Mexican Constitution, which deals with land reform, would finally make it to them. Instead, they were left out of the loop completely. By this time, the different indigenous nations had been pushed to the limit, creating a large vacuum because they felt powerless since they lacked the language and political sophistication to deal with the central government in an effort to seek redress for their problems.

Appearing on the scene to fill the vacuum was Marcos. He was a very charismatic character who had been involved in the Chiapas scene for quite some time. He was a mestizo of the leftist class which confronted the government in the late 60's and early 70's and refused to be coopted by the government of President Echeverría (1970-1976). He was well versed and well informed in terms of what Mexico was doing to enter the world of neoliberalist reforms. He learned the languages of the various indigenous groups in Chiapas and became further politicized as to the dire conditions reigning in the area. He earned the respect of the indigenous communities because of his eloquence in Spanish, which they felt would be useful in dealing with the outside world, particularly with Mexico City. When they decided to act, he was chosen as their "subcomandante" (deputy leader). That meant that the leader (comandante) of the movement would be the collective group of Tzotziles, Tzeltales, and other indigenous groups. They came to the conclusion that they had to act to show the world the fallacy of economic reform promised by the enactment of NAFTA. They named their movement the Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN), named after Emiliano Zapata, the revolutionary guerrilla general who fought for land reform during the Mexican Revolution of 1910.

On January 1, 1994, the same day that NAFTA went into effect, the municipal capital of San Cristóbal de Las Casas was taken by the EZLN. This brought international attention to the problem of Chiapas. The government's traditional response to this uprising no longer worked. This was due primarily because of the EZLN's clever use of the internet. As more exposure to what was happening in Chiapas, as well as Mexico as a whole, came out through the internet, Europeans began to arrive in Chiapas to basically see for themselves. It is felt that Marcos and the EZLN put a damper on Salinas's plan to bring more money into the country by way of foreign investments and to retire from the presidency a very rich man. If he could show that there was genuine political reform, pluralism, multiparty participation, land availability for industrial development, and economic stability for emerging markets, foreign capital would be more willing to look favorably in Mexico's direction. What in fact did happen was that Mexico was put under a microscope by the foreign press, and in the August 1994 election which chose Zedillo, the PRI managed to garner only 48% of the vote, the lowest in its history.
Currently, what is going on in Chiapas as far as the government is concerned is basically what happened in Oaxaca ten years earlier. Lots of money is being poured into the state for economic development. The army is ever present, providing social assistance for different projects. What can be seen on national television are commercials pushing tourism to the state, where as little as twenty years ago many Mexicans didn't even know where Chiapas was. What surprised me about being in San Cristóbal de Las Casas after a 24-year absence was the sizeable number of Europeans present. The city is much larger, due in part to the national and international attention it has drawn as well as because of the "anillos de miseria" (rings of misery) which have sprung up because of community displacement. When I was in San Cristóbal 24 years ago it appeared pretty much as a quaint provincial town where the indigenous languages were extensively heard, and it was incumbent for a store owner to be proficient in those languages if he wanted to do business in the town. This time I didn't see many people from the outlying communities coming into town for commerce. I suspect it is because of land displacement, the migration to the "Lacandona," and the attention the Zapatista movement has gained in the international community. In June of this year (1996) negotiations began between the government and the Zapatistas in order to reach agreement on the demands of those in rebellion against the state and federal governments, especially in the area of the neoliberalist reforms. In July the Zapatistas decided to join up with the PRD and use that party as a voice in its discourse with the central government. This is a story where it is definitely appropriate to utter that familiar phrase: "Stay tuned; there's more to come."
Afirmam científicos de la Secretaría de Salubridad y Asistencia

La Corrupción es un problema genético

Ante la noticia se suspenden todos los juicios por enriquecimiento inexplicable

Alberto Labarta - En un acto sin precedentes en la historia de la Nación y de la medicina la Secretaría de Salubridad y Asistencia dio a conocer el resultado de un estudio científico que comprueba una vez más que la corrupción es parte de la naturaleza humana y "no puede justificarse". El estudio está basado en el análisis sanguíneo de 450 diputados y 200 policías judiciales.

"Se los dije: estás en nuestra sangre, somos inocentes" - declaró jubilosamente el Arq. Pedro. Isabelle Tardán, de su jet privado, lleno de júbilo, el exsecretario de Gobernación declaró ante la prensa que la corrupción es "el motor moral que ha hecho posibles los avances de nuestra civilización". Agregó que "sólo los mediocres juzgan como un pecado los actos de corrupción que en realidad son rasgos hereditarios de carácter". El arq. Pedro obtuvo su libertad incondicional y una indemnización de $250,000 dólares.

Hermenegildo Vasconcelos - El Director de la Facultad de Filosofía y Letras de la UNAM, anunció ayer por la tarde que la máxima casa de estudios ha decidido eliminar la materia de ética de sus planes educativos ante los descubrimientos científicos anunciados por la Secretaría de Salubridad y Asistencia. "Hace años que lo sospechaba, pero nadie me hacía caso" declaró mientras quemaba un ejemplar de la Constitución en la explanada de la Torre de Recto.

Sucursales bancarias se convertirán en reclusorios

Carcel a deudores a la Banca: aprueba la Suprema Corte.

Se acondiciona el Estadio Azteca para recluir a los deudores. La final de futbol se jugará en el Zócalo.

Ante la indignación de miles de fanáticos, la Suprema Corte decidió aprobar la ley que permitirá hasta con 247 años de carcel a deudores morosos. Algunas sucursales bancarias han empezado a colocar barros en las fachadas ante el inminente encarcelamiento de sus cuentahabientes.

La medida será temporal: sólo se aplicará hasta que paguen" - declaró el presidente de la Suprema Corte. Aquellos que estén al corriente en sus pagos serán premiados en un acto privado en un pequeño salón en el Club de Banqueros. La condecoración "Al mérito" será recibida por 3 directores bancarios que ya han presentado su constancia de no adeudo.

El público solicita amparo para ir a ver la obra.

■ El Secretario de Seguridad Pública:

"La culpa no es del delincuente sino del que lo hace culpable"

■ "Fueron suicidios": coinciden gobernadores en Sinaloa; en Oaxaca, familia de seis acrribillados

■ Aclara la Secretaría de Ecología:

"El Popocatépetl no ha sido autorizado a hacer erupción"

■ La corrupción tiene sus lados positivos:

La leche radiactiva no perjudica a la salud porque nunca llegó el embarque comprado por Conasupo.

■ Sabina Berman

"Los sucesos son reales, la historia es ficticia"

La autora y directora de la polémica obra KRISIS, declaró: "Los sucesos son reales, la secuencia de sucesos (la historia) es ficticia. Los personajes son ficticios, sus actitudes son reales". Desmintiendo los rumores de que había sido obligada por extra-terrestres a escribir la obra, Sabina aclaró: "Hago de cuenta que el país se tomó a dormir y soñó esto. Creo que es un sueño colectivo posible. De cualquier manera, la "realidad" es otro sueño colectivo. Recordando la frase de James Joyce, agregó: "La historia es un sueño pesado... y ya quiero despertar!"
Lake Tahoe Community College

Intensive Spanish

August 12-16, 1996

High Advanced Spanish: SP 131F2

Instructor: Kathy Leonard Welcome! ¡Bienvenidos!

Lake Tahoe Community College extends a warm welcome as you join us for the 1996 Intensive Spanish Summer Institute. We are delighted that you have chosen to attend!

Map of the LTCC Campus

In order to accommodate our participants, we are offering break out sessions at several different classroom locations. A map of the campus is attached for your convenience.

Break Out Sessions

To help plan which break out sessions to attend, we have included "Break Out Sessions at a Glance," as well as your "Personal Institute Planner," in this packet. Any changes to the break out sessions will be posted daily at the Information Table in the Commons.

Information Table

The Information Table will be open in the Commons Monday through Friday from 8:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. to help answer any questions you may have. Check the Information Table bulletin board daily for possible changes (especially Break Out Sessions) that may occur.

Meals

The college bookstore will be open Monday through Friday from 7:45 a.m. through 3:30 p.m. Coffee, drinks, snack items, etc., will be available for purchase. Vending machines are also present near the Commons. Several restaurants surround LTCC's main campus. The Information Table can assist with additional information.

Smoking

LTCC has a no-smoking policy indoors. Smoking is permitted outside, away from the building.

Evaluation

Your Institute experience is important to us. Please find an evaluation form at the end of this packet. Your response can assist us in our continual attempts to improve the Institute. Additional evaluation forms are located at the Information Table.
Monday, August 12, 1996: Daily Schedule (High Advanced - SP 131F-2)

7:30 am - 7:45 am  Welcome...Coffee and Donuts - College Theater
7:45 am - 8:15 am  Orientation with Diane Rosner and Sue O'Connor - College Theater

8:15 am - 9:00 am  Small Group Conversation: Spend an hour practicing your oral language skills with native speakers. Small group conversational practice is the way to go! Your group will be assigned a native speaker "tutor" and away you go to a "quiet corner" of the college to chat. Meet in the Commons.

9:00 am - 10:00 am  Break Out Session #1...Choose ONE of the following:
Cuban Cooking and Cuban Foods - Presenter: Tere Tibbetts. Learn about & sample authentic Cuban foods and recipes. Bon Appetit! Oops....."¡Buen provecho!" Room #D102
Cultural Highlights of Spain - Presenter: César García. Enjoy the cultural diversity of the Iberian Peninsula presented by a real Spaniard. "Basque" (pun intended) in the glorious traditions of Spain. Room #E106
