This paper contains three parts. Part 1 consists of a poem, "An Apology for Performative Writing." Part 2, "The Traditional Scholar's Game--An Argument," discusses the arguments regarding performative writing. It identifies several key arguments both for and against the works that cluster around such labels as performative writing, autoethnography, performative essay, ethnodrama, personal ethnography, autoperformance, and ethnographic poetics; and uses the term "performative writing" to stand in for the many ongoing efforts for alternative modes of scholarly presentation. Part 3, "Performative Writing: A Personal Anecdote," gives the authors musings on performative writing. (Contains 4 notes and 25 references.) (CR)
Performative Writing as Scholarship: An Apology, An Argument, An Anecdote

Ronald J. Pelias
Professor
Department of Speech Communication
Southern Illinois University
Carbondale, IL 62901

Presented at National Communication Association Convention, November 1998
Part 1: An Apology for Performative Writing with Apologies to Marianne Moore

I, too, dislike it: there are things that tradition just won't permit, things that must be proven, things that are important beyond all this human passion.

Reading it, however, with a perfect contempt for it, with a complete comfort in one's superiority, with a dismissive confidence that only our accepted academic positions could certify, one discovers in it after all, a place where lifeless abstractions might find human form, where the level of significance might slide off the page on a tear, where categories might crack and statistics shrink, and where reason is unruly. One discovers in it after all, a place for the genuine.

Eyes that can analyze beyond variance, ears that can hear what others say, palms that know the sweat of joining another and of opening the fist. These things are important not because a high-sounding argument can be put around them but because they are useful: they evoke what seemed impossible to evoke, they say what seemed unsayable.

When they become so derivative as to become uncommitted, the same thing may be said for all of us, that we do not admire what we cannot believe: the playing in pain for quick results, the telling of tales that point only to themselves, the sharing for sheer shock, or turning the stage into a therapeutic session or criticizing without so much as a twitch, and all that ego, ego, ego, ergo, nothing else--

nor is it valid to discriminate against standard monographs and quarterlies: all these phenomena are important. One must make a distinction however: when convention programs abound with half-hearted or just too sincere performative writers when journals feature easy confessions or calculated controversy the result is not performative writing nor till the performative writers among us can be scholars of experience--above self-absorption and triviality and can present for identification: real lives that shake the imagination connecting us to subjects that truly matter, connecting us to each other shall we have

it. In the meantime, if you demand on the one hand, the raw data of life in all its rawness and that which is on the other hand genuine, then you are interested in performative writing.

Part 2: The Traditional Scholar's Game--An Argument

This section identifies several key arguments, both for and against, the works that cluster around such labels as performative writing, autoethnography, performative essay, ethnodrama, personal ethnography, autoperformance, and ethnographic poetics. The section uses the term "performative writing" to stand in for the many ongoing efforts for alternative modes of scholarly representation. It is necessary to note, however, that the work under these labels, while sharing many commonalities, cannot be reduced into a single logic. With that precaution in mind, the goal here is to make a case for such works within the scholarly arena. In the end, the section shows what performative writing offers that more traditional forms of scholarly writing do not. Six claims are put forth for performative writing.

1. Performative writing expands the notions of what constitutes disciplinary knowledge. For some, that is just the problem. As Craig Gingrich-Philbrook points out in his discussion of masculinity, fear of losing disciplinary control over sanctioned forms and content triggers a talk of legitimacy. Those who have been designated to legislate what counts had better stay ever vigilant or the very foundation of the academic enterprise might crack, letting in all sorts of pollutants. This, it seems clear, is the sentiment behind Malcolm Parks' fearful claim, "No question is more central to our identity as scholars than the question of what counts as scholarship" (np).

1.1 Parks' fear cannot be easily dismissed but in the case of performative writing, it is misplaced. Performative writing is not the wrecking ball swinging into the master's house.

1.1.1 While most would acknowledge that scholarship is contingent upon historical, economic, ideological and disciplinary patterns, few are ready to reject the considerable body of scholarly work in the name of relativism. Every time a paper is graded, an article for a journal is reviewed, or a scholarly essay is written, scholars are reflecting and affirming what they value. To argue contingency is not to argue for the utterly arbitrary: There are some good reasons for valuing what scholars have. In this sense, one might agree with Parks.

1.1.2 Parks, however, need not fear performative writing. It is at most a hairline fracture in the academic foundation, a fracture that has been noticeable for years as scholars have attempted to force the scientific paradigm to answer all their questions. Despite the fact that many have declared the logical positivist house in ruins, scholars continue to reside there. Despite the fact that many have shown how building structures with the mind only is flawed architecture, scholars continue to do so. The performative writing fracture may help all academic houses settle into greater alignment with human experience. Performative writing fixes the fracture by adding some design features; it welcomes the body into the mind’s dwellings.

1.2. It is also useful to remember that formal argument based in and upon the methods of scientific inquiry is not the mode for discovering truths; it is, like all modes of inquiry, nothing more than a rhetorical style. Scholars need not be tied to the belief or practice that their scholarship must look a particular way, particularly a paradigmatic way that has its uses but has limited power in accounting for human experience. Instead, scholars might embrace another rhetorical style, what H. L. Goodall calls "mystery," "to encourage us to see and to define situations by their unique human and spiritual poetic, the interpenetrations of self, Other, and context, by our complexity and interdependence rather than by some simpler linear or causal logic" (Living in 125).

2. Performative writing features lived experience, telling, iconic moments that call forth the complexities of human life. With lived experience, there is no separation between mind and body, objective and subjective, cognitive and affective. Human experience does not reduce to numbers, to arguments, to abstractions. As poet Stephen Dunn notes, "Oh abstractions are just abstract // until they have an ache in them" (212). Performative writing attempts to keep the complexities of human experience in tack, to place the ache back in scholars' abstractions.

2.1 This is not to argue that experience equals scholarship. Performative writing does not indiscriminately record experience; it does not simply duplicate a cinema verite experiment. Instead, performative writing is a selective camera, aimed carefully to capture the most arresting angles. Each frame is studied and felt; each shot is significant. Much is left on the editing floor. Everyday experience, then, is not scholarship, but the shaping of everyday experience into telling and moving tales can be. The performative writer functions as Bert States suggests the artist does, as "someone who says, 'This is the way people behave number of times,' and knows how to put the number into expressive form" (19).

2.2 In this manner, performative writing makes its case, a case, to borrow from Walter Fisher's familiar argument, based in narrative plausibility and narrative fidelity. It is a case that is more interested in evoking than representing, in constructing a world than in positing this is the way the world is (e.g., Tyler; Ellis). It is a case that does not just rely upon its descriptive portrayal, no matter how precise or poignant, but also depends upon its ability to create experience. Stephen Tyler's assertion about post-modern ethnography holds for performative writing as well: "It is not a record of experience at all; it is the means of experience" (138). Thus, performative writing offers both an evocation of human experience and an enabling fiction. Its power is in its ability to tell the story of human experience, a story that can be trusted and a story that can be used. It opens the doors to a place where the raw and the genuine find their articulation through form, through poetic expression, through art.

3. Performative writing rests upon the belief that the world is not given, but constructed, composed of multiple realities. All representations of human experience are partial and partisan (e.g., Goodall; Phelan). At best, scholars might achieve, to use James Clifford's phrase, a "rigorous partiality" (25) and acknowledge, like all "standpoint epistemologist"\(^2\), that all our utterances are committed, positioned.

3.1 Performative writing resists arguments that attempt to prove all other explanations inadequate or suspect. Performative writers do not believe that the world is one particular way. They do not believe that argument is an opportunity to win, to impose their logic upon others, to colonize. They do not believe that there should be only one house on the hill. They do not believe that they can speak without speaking themselves, without carrying their own vested interests, their own personal histories, their own philosophical and theoretical assumptions forward. They do not believe that they can write without loss, without mourning (Phelan, Mourning).

3.2 Performative writing, then, takes as its goal to dwell within multiple perspectives, to celebrate an interplay of voices, to privilege dialogue over monologue. It cherishes the fragmentary, the uncertain. It marks the place that poet Tess Gallagher wishes to locate, the "point of all possibilities" where "time collapses, drawing in the past, present and future" (107).

4. Performative writing often evokes identification and empathic responses. It creates a space where others might see themselves. While often written in the first person, it presents what Trinh Minh-ha calls a "plural I," an "I" that has the potential to stand in for many "I's." It is an "I" that resonates, that resounds, that is familiar. Performative writing also often beckons empathy, allowing others to not only see what the writer might see but also to feel what writer might feel. It is an invitation to take another's perspective.

4.1. Through identification and empathy, then, readers become implicated and human experience concretized.
Readers may see more clearly how they and others constitute and are constituted by the world. They come to feel that they and others are written, given voice, a voice that they did not have prior to the reading. In this sense, the "I" of performative writing might best be seen as a geographical marker, a "here" rather than a "self."
In short, the self becomes a positional possibility.3

4.2 When performative writing does not point beyond the writer, it may appear self-indulgent, narcissistic, self-serving or, to put it perhaps more kindly, therapeutic.
This was one of the many attacks upon the Text and Performance Quarterly special issue on performative writing.4 The argument was simply: If an article had such qualities, surely it isn't of any value. No one, however, seemed to question why one might object to the self being indulged, reflexive, served, or cured within scholarly work. On occasion, some noted the history of legitimating practices as if that were proof enough (i.e., it hasn't been allowed, therefore, it shouldn't be allowed) (e.g., Wendt).

4.2.1 Yet, notions of self-indulgence, narcissism, self-serving, and therapeutic do seem to disturb, to rub against what scholars hope their research might achieve. For such scholarship is not just about the self, although the self can never be left behind. Such scholarship, even when based upon the self, points outward. Its aim is to tell about human experience. It is for this reason that identification, that space of recognition and resonance, is often an essential aspect of performative writing.

4.2.2. Moreover, the self can be a place where tensions are felt and uncovered, a place of discovery, a place of power, of political action and resistance. One often knows what matters by recognizing what the body feels. This is in part the lesson phenomenologists have been trying to teach for years (e.g., Leder; Sheets-Johnson).

5. Performative writing turns the personal into the political and the political in the personal. It starts with the recognition that individual bodies provide a potent data base for understanding the political and that hegemonic systems write upon individual bodies. This is, of course, only to articulate what feminists have understood for years: the personal is political. It is to realize the potential in Walter Benjamin's insight, "To live in a glass house is a revolutionary virtue par excellence. It is also an intoxication, a moral exhibitionism, that we badly need" (228). Yet, too often research, even feminist and Marxist, does not call into play its own insights; it does not call upon individual experience to make its case. It does not work behind closed doors. It does not show how politics matter to individual lives or how individual lives are evidence that social justice is absent. Performative writing insists upon making such connections.

6. Performative writing participates in relational and scholarly contexts. No writing occurs without context. In traditional work, the burden is to demonstrate how a particular argument advances current knowledge, a movement toward some all-encompassing explanation. The relationship between the writer and the reader is a distanced one, a relational positioning that demands that neither person become connected to the other. Performative writing, on the other hand, assumes that at given times certain questions are of interest, not because their answers might be another step toward some final explanation, but because of how they connect people within a scholarly community and locate them as individuals.

6.1. Some questions are productive to embrace because they participate in the ongoing concerns of a scholarly community. Performative writing, when done well, understands its place within disciplinary history. As it participates in that tradition, sometimes explicitly and sometimes implicitly, it hopes to provide "thick descriptions" (Geertz), "experiential particularity" (Baumeister and Newman), "deconstructive verisimilitude" (Denzin), "theatrical narrativity" (Crpanzano). Any piece of performative writing is a story among many but a story about issues that matter or can be made to matter to the community.

6.2 Some questions are productive to embrace because they connect individuals, not just as scholars, but as people who are willing place themselves at personal risk. By confessing, by exposing, and by witnessing, performative writers pursue their scholarly interests. In doing so, what might have remained hidden is made public, what might have stayed buried is put under examination, what might have been kept as personal commitment becomes public testimony. Such efforts often ask readers to respond, not just at the level of idea, but as one person who has become connected to another. Performative writers offer readers an interpersonal contract that they can elect to engage.

Part 2 finds its fitting end with the words of poet Philip Booth: "I strongly feel that every poem, every work of art, everything that is well done, well made, well said, genuinely given, adds to our chances of survival by making the world and our lives more habitable" (37). Performative writing participates in this spirit, in the hope that current research might become a place where all are welcome to reside and where all might come to recognize themselves in all their human complexity.

Part 3: Performative Writing: A Personal Anecdote

Having reached the end, this is a story of beginnings. It tells of places to go; it tells of reasons for going.
A colleague, saying she thought he would find it of interest, gave him copy of H. L. Goodall's Casing a Promised Land. He looked at it thinking that organizational communication isn't his area but was intrigued by the subtitle, The Autobiography of an Organizational Detective as Cultural Ethnographer. He read a few pages and it struck him: Scholarship could create the world it wants to examine, not as a list of abstractions or logical proofs, but as a vibrant presence. With his proverbial hand slapped against his face, he slowly moved toward this form, a form that did not for him at that time have a name but a form that held promise for the central question he was struggling with: How can we write about performance in our reviews and essays that evokes the spirit of performance? He knew that to call for an exact representation was a fool's folly but he wanted more than a record of what happened when. He wanted to be reminded of why we go see performances in the first place, that is, he wanted to encounter genuine rendering of human experience. What he is now most comfortable calling performative writing offered such a potential.

Since that time he has been writing essay after essay that tries to weave mythos with logos, to evoke rather than duplicate experience, to elicit feelings along with thought. He has had some success—a book and several articles published and numerous convention presentations—as he worked. But that is not why he continues, why he believes in what he is doing. He continues, he believes because this work garners response unlike any of his other work ever received.
With his more traditional work, he might have a colleague congratulate him on his latest publication, might hear that a piece he had written led to a good class discussion or might notice that his work was cited in someone else’s essay. For the most part, though, his work seemed to disappear without comment, without any real impact that he could see. But with his performative writing, reactions seem quite different.

He remembers what happens when he takes his own and others performative writing to his graduate classes. He does so with some fear that to encourage new scholars to embrace performative writing is to place those scholars in some disciplinary jeopardy. Even so, after all the cautions he gives, after all the fears he tries to instill in those who might be drawn to the form, student after student wants to do performative writing. When he asks them why they are so attracted to such writing, they simply note that it allows them to say with more eloquence, feeling, and insight what they want to say about a given topic. They claim that they can enter the disciplinary conversation without the fear that they might not get it right by which they mean that speaking within the discipline does not have to come at the expense of someone else. He believes they are right.

He remembers conversations about his performative writing, conversations that suggested his pieces mattered. He thinks about the number of unsolicited comments from strangers who report being moved by what he had written or tell of how a piece made a difference in their life. He considers the classrooms where he heard his work is being used because "it seems to speak to students." He recalls those moments following convention presentations when audience members felt the most appropriate response was a hug. He returns to those intimate exchanges with others that never would have happened had he not written what he did. He notes the many times listeners claim that he has spoken for them, that he has put into words what they could not articulate. He thinks of those listeners he has seen cry and those he has seen become angry. He knows that his performative writing places him in genuine dialogue with others, a personal and political dialogue that matters to him, to others, to the discipline and perhaps even to the world. He knows that his other work did not.

And so, this ending is a beginning, an invitation, a place to go.
Notes

2. For an excellent discussion of "standpoint epistemologies" see Norman Denzin, Interpretive Ethnography. In the chapter entitled "standpoint epistemologies," he examines the assumptions of standpoint texts by focusing on the work of Patrica Hill Collins, Trinh T. Minh-ha, and Gloria Anzaldua.

3. Frederick Garber offers an informative discussion of how the self gets positioned in contemporary poetry, photography and performance art. His discussion of Steve McCaffery and McCaffery's own cited remarks are most in keeping with the argument identified here.

4. The infamous TPQ special issue (January 1997) produced a fury of CRTNET NEWS postings, convention programs and fodder, and several published responses.

Works Cited

U.S. Department of Education
Office of Educational Research and Improvement (OERI)
National Library of Education (NLE)
Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC)

REPRODUCTION RELEASE
(Specific Document)

I. DOCUMENT IDENTIFICATION:

Title: Paper presented at the 1998 NCA Convention (New York City)

Author(s): Ronald J. Pelias

Corporate Source: Southern Illinois University

Publication Date: November 20-24, 1998

II. REPRODUCTION RELEASE:

In order to disseminate as widely as possible timely and significant materials of interest to the educational community, documents announced in the monthly abstract journal of the ERIC system, Resources in Education (RIE), are usually made available to users in microfiche, reproduced paper copy, and electronic media, and sold through the ERIC Document Reproduction Service (EDRS). Credit is given to the source of each document, and, if reproduction release is granted, one of the following notices is affixed to the document.

If permission is granted to reproduce and disseminate the identified document, please CHECK ONE of the following three options and sign at the bottom of the page.

The sample sticker shown below will be affixed to all Level 1 documents

PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE AND DISSEMINATE THIS MATERIAL HAS BEEN GRANTED BY

Sample

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)

Level 1

The sample sticker shown below will be affixed to all Level 2A documents

PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE AND DISSEMINATE THIS MATERIAL IN MICROCIPHE, AND IN ELECTRONIC MEDIA FOR ERIC COLLECTION SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, HAS BEEN GRANTED BY

Sample

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)

Level 2A

The sample sticker shown below will be affixed to all Level 2B documents

PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE AND DISSEMINATE THIS MATERIAL IN MICROFICHE ONLY HAS BEEN GRANTED BY

Sample

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)

Level 2B

Check here for Level 1 release, permitting reproduction and dissemination in microfiche or other ERIC archival media (e.g., electronic) and paper copy.

Check here for Level 2A release, permitting reproduction and dissemination in microfiche and in electronic media for ERIC archival collection subscribers only.

Check here for Level 2B release, permitting reproduction and dissemination in microfiche only.

Documents will be processed as indicated provided reproduction quality permits.

If permission to reproduce is granted, but no box is checked, documents will be processed at Level 1.

I hereby grant to the Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC) nonexclusive permission to reproduce and disseminate this document as indicated above. Reproduction from the ERIC microfiche or electronic media by persons other than ERIC employees and its system contractors requires permission from the copyright holder. Exception is made for non-profit reproduction by libraries and other service agencies to satisfy information needs of educators in response to discrete inquiries.

Signature: Ronald J. Pelias

Printed Name/Position/Title: Professor

Organization/Address: Dept. of Speech Communication / SIU

Carbondale, IL 62901

Telephone: 618-453-2091

FAX: E-Mail Address: Pelias@siu.edu

Date: 2/18/99

(over)
III. DOCUMENT AVAILABILITY INFORMATION (FROM NON-ERIC SOURCE):

If permission to reproduce is not granted to ERIC, or if you wish ERIC to cite the availability of the document from another source, please provide the following information regarding the availability of the document. (ERIC will not announce a document unless it is publicly available, and a dependable source can be specified. Contributors should also be aware that ERIC selection criteria are significantly more stringent for documents that cannot be made available through EDRS.)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Publisher/Distributor:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Address:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Price:</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

IV. REFERRAL OF ERIC TO COPYRIGHT/REPRODUCTION RIGHTS HOLDER:

If the right to grant this reproduction release is held by someone other than the addressee, please provide the appropriate name and address:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name:</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Address:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

V. WHERE TO SEND THIS FORM:

Send this form to the following ERIC Clearinghouse:

ERIC/REC
2805 E. Tenth Street
Smith Research Center, 150
Indiana University
Bloomington, IN 47408

However, if solicited by the ERIC Facility, or if making an unsolicited contribution to ERIC, return this form (and the document being contributed) to:

ERIC Processing and Reference Facility
1100 West Street, 2nd Floor
Laurel, Maryland 20707-3590

- Telephone: 301-497-4080
- Toll-Free: 800-799-3742
- PAX: 301-853-0269
- e-mail: ericfac@inet.ed.gov
- WWW: http://ericfac.piccard.csc.com

---

8 (Rev. 9/97)
From previous versions of this form are obsolete.