This viewer's guide is designed to encourage discussion about the issues covered in the four-part public television series "Liberty & Limits: 'The Federalist' Idea 200 Years Later" that aired during 1997. The series examines whether the current U.S. political system still matches the vision of its founders. The guide offers: an essay on each program in the series, discussion questions, suggestions for further reading, relevant organizations, and web sites. The essays in the guide elaborate further on program themes and may be the subject of discussions in educational settings such as book groups, adult education seminars, and college classes. This guide includes four essays, each of which reflects on an earlier broadcast: (1) "The President vs. Congress" (Donald L. Robinson), which discusses "Constant Combatants: the President and Congress." (broadcast on April 11, 1997); (2) "Forgotten Federalism" (Joan I. Greco), which discusses "Whose Law, Whose Order?" (broadcast on April 18, 1997); (3) "New Technology, New Dilemmas" (Joan I. Greco), which discusses "Privacy and Security on the Eve of the Millennium" (broadcast on April 25, 1997); (4) "Running for Political Office in an Age of Television, PACs, and Polls" (Kathleen M. Sullivan), which discusses "The Price of Politics: Electing Our Leaders" (broadcast on May 2, 1997). (BT)

PBS Home Video
1320 Braddock Place
Alexandria, VA 22314
http://www.pbs.org
"If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself."

— James Madison, The Federalist No. 51
Dear Colleague,

Few documents are more revered and influential in American life than the Constitution. Yet two hundred years ago, when the Constitution was sent to the states for ratification, it was the subject of heated contention; ratification was far from assured. With the nation’s future in the balance, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay felt compelled to write The Federalist Papers, eighty-five “letters to the editor” to rally support for the new Constitution.

What is most striking in reading The Federalist Papers is the continuing relevance of the issues with which Hamilton, Jay, and Madison grappled: Would the President merely replace the English king as a despot? Would government tread too heavily on hard-won liberties so recently secured? Would the power of “factions” undermine the ability to govern in the interests of all the people? To gain backing for the new Constitution, these three men, under the common pseudonym Publius, discussed the benefits of a strong federal government; the relationships among the three branches of government; the need for an independent judiciary; the dangers of political factions and how to ameliorate them; and whether the federal legislature would be likely to serve the wealthy and the powerful at the expense of everyone else.

There is no question that the debate over the proper nature and limits of the federal government is as important and passionate as ever. Today, with Congress handing massive federal programs back to the states, with federal regulations under fierce attack, with private militias denying and defying the authority of the national government, with the influence of political action committees (PACs) and “soft money” undermining our confidence, the issues the Federalist authors grappled with dominate our own political scene.

Using The Fred Friendly Seminars’ unique Socratic dialogue format of hypothetical situations and role-playing, Liberty & Limits: “The Federalist” Idea 200 Years Later challenges a distinguished group of panelists to explore some of today’s most pressing political issues against the backdrop of the wisdom contained in The Federalist Papers. Starting with concrete dilemmas with which audiences can easily identify, the hypothetical situations develop increasing ethical, legal, and moral complexity until panelists are compelled to make decisions where the “right” choices are not clear. Our objective is not to change minds or support a particular point of view, but to open minds and make the agony of decision-making so intense that you can only escape by thinking. We hope you think we have succeeded.

Sincerely,

Fred Friendly
Ruth Friendly
INTRODUCTION

From the resurgence of organized militias to the sweeping changes enacted by the 104th Congress' Contract with America, it has become increasingly clear that many Americans are dissatisfied with the federal government. They feel it is too large, too intrusive, and too beholden to special-interest groups. Yet, others feel the system does not do enough.

The controversy over federal control is not new. It is as old as our government itself. From October 27, 1787 to August 16, 1788, three of America's founding fathers—Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay—raised these issues in a series of brilliant political essays first published in New York City newspapers. These writings, which came to be known as The Federalist Papers, were designed to rally support for a strong Constitution and a central authority whose powers were bound by a system of careful checks and balances.

LIBERTY & LIMITS: "THE FEDERALIST" IDEA 200 YEARS LATER is a four-part public television series that examines whether America's current political system still matches the vision of its founders. Using hypothetical situations and role-playing, LIBERTY & LIMITS features some of the most respected political and legal minds in the nation today, debating the same issues of governmental control our country faced over 200 years ago.

The first program in the series, CONSTANT COMBATANTS: THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS, looks at the balance of power between the branches of government in the conduct of foreign policy. The second, WHOSE LAW, WHOSE ORDER? examines federal versus state authority in making and enforcing laws. The third, PRIVACY AND SECURITY ON THE EVE OF THE MILLENNIUM, discusses highly charged issues concerning privacy in the digital age. The final program in the series, THE PRICE OF POLITICS: ELECTING OUR LEADERS, debates the fairness and responsiveness of our electoral system.

In The Federalist No. 51, James Madison wrote, "In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself." This series shows the continuing controversies surrounding the nature and use of federal power in public and private life, and the competing interests and ideas that shape public policy-making in our country.

HOW TO USE THIS GUIDE

This Viewer's Guide is designed to encourage discussion about the issues covered in the four-part television series LIBERTY & LIMITS: "THE FEDERALIST" IDEA 200 YEARS LATER.

The Viewer's Guide offers the following components:

- an essay on each program in the series; these essays, which elaborate further on program themes, may be the subject of discussions in educational settings such as book groups, adult education seminars, and college classes;
- thought-provoking discussion questions;
- a resources section including suggestions for further reading, relevant organizations and web sites.

We invite educators to photocopy the guide for use in educational settings.

PROGRAM SCHEDULE

Please check local listings for broadcast times and any scheduling changes.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PROGRAM</th>
<th>DATE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>CONSTANT COMBATANTS: THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS</td>
<td>April 11, 1997</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WHOSE LAW, WHOSE ORDER?</td>
<td>April 18, 1997</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PRIVACY AND SECURITY ON THE EVE OF THE MILLENNIUM</td>
<td>April 25, 1997</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THE PRICE OF POLITICS: ELECTING OUR LEADERS</td>
<td>May 2, 1997</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Constant Combatants: The President and Congress

Broadcast: April 11, 1997 (check local listings)

Moderator: Charles R. Nesson

The Federalist Papers Nos. 10, 23, 51, 52, 55-58, 59-61 and 75 are relevant to this program.

The President vs. Congress

By Donald L. Robinson

Constant Combatants: The President and Congress vividly shows how the conduct of foreign policy puts a great strain on a constitutional system.

There is no doubt, as the authors of The Federalist Papers make clear, that the framers intended to build checks and balances into the powers over foreign relations, so that only by the joint cooperation of Congress and the president could the nation enter into any large undertaking abroad. But the unguarded language Hamilton uses in The Federalist No. 23 (see sidebar), reflects the volatile emotions that surface when the nation must come to grips with a foreign danger. A president, in his anxiety for the nation's safety, is sorely tempted to act alone, and the first instinct of the people in such a situation is to support him. Gradually, however, passions cool, and the mechanisms of the Constitution begin to assert themselves.

When dealing with other nations, however, the president has far more leeway. We assume that he knows more than the rest of us because his appointees, stationed abroad, conduct day-to-day relations with foreign governments. Most of these contacts are secret, which gives the president a great advantage. In addition, as commander in chief, he has control over the nation's armed forces. Combining these powers, the president is often able to create a situation before Congress even knows that a crisis is brewing.

In CONSTANT COMBATANTS, the evolution of the crisis between Krussia and Nukraine demonstrates this dynamic. Right at the outset, the president takes the initiative. The president has a superior position in the early stages of the crisis, based on his information about developments and his immediate contact (through trusted aides) with other leaders. Some of the president's top aides mention an obligation to keep Congress informed. Others in the administration are not as enthusiastic.

Pretty soon, the question of informing Congress becomes moot. Members of Congress start hearing from journalists or from constituents, who may be aroused by ethnic ties to the affected region, or by business interests. At this point, a struggle for control breaks out between the branches. Certain that they know the national interest, the president and his aides want to be free from interference in a delicate situation such as this. Members of Congress, however, insist on being consulted, lest the administration commit American power and prestige carelessly.

CONSTANT COMBATANTS: THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS illustrates the vitality of the safeguards set in place two centuries ago.

Discussion Questions

1. What are the president's powers and responsibilities, under the Constitution, in the conduct of foreign relations and national security policy? How much leeway does he have?

2. What powers does Congress have in the conduct of foreign relations and national security policy? What factors constrain the exercise of these powers?

3. What impact do other players have in this arena, such as the news media (reporters and editorial journalists); scholars and other influential intellectuals; the courts; and the public (through polls and other means of making itself felt)?

4. How important are moral considerations in the conduct of foreign relations and national security policy? How much does it matter whether individuals in the government take their constitutional responsibilities seriously? To whom, or to what, ought public officials to be loyal?
What makes the president watchful is not some argument about constitutional obligation. It is the fact (as Madison wrote in The Federalist No. 51) that members of Congress have the "constitutional means and personal motives" to resist presidential power.

The situation in the world has changed a great deal since the founding of the United States two centuries ago. We now have far-flung treaty obligations and a sense of responsibility in distant places. In addition, the president has been provided with standing armed forces he can deploy rapidly. These developments have taken us a long way from the days when President Washington warned against "foreign entanglements." President Franklin D. Roosevelt, as recently as the late 1930s, had to persuade Congress to give up its isolationism before he could prepare the nation for war against Nazi Germany. Now presidents have troops and weapons readily available, because most of us have accepted the idea that we must be prepared for dangers that may loom quickly in Europe and Asia.

These modern realities have greatly strengthened the president's hand in foreign relations. Even so, Congress is equipped by the Constitution to fight back, to maintain its position at the center of the affairs of government. Because its members are frequently elected, Congress holds the key to great power in a democracy: the authority to speak for the people, It can call administration officials to account in public hearings. It controls the government's expenditures. Ultimately it has the power to impeach a president who ignores the Constitution or seriously violates the laws.

In modern times, we tend to think of the Constitution as a set of written guarantees, spelling out our rights. But it is worth remembering that the United States Constitution as originally framed and ratified had no Bill of Rights. Those who wrote the Constitution thought of it primarily as a frame of government, establishing institutions and procedures for governance. Because they knew that monarchs had abused power, the framers insisted that leading officials be elected, so that government would rest ultimately on the will of the people. Because they knew that democratic majorities could be misled by passion and prejudices, they divided the authority of government among three branches and constructed its internal mechanisms to ensure that leaders could hold one another to account.

Americans greatly admire the system built by the framers, and for good reason. It has preserved our liberty through turbulent changes. But the system is not tidy, and there is no guarantee that it will last forever. Its resilience depends on tolerance and mutual respect among governing officials and on the vigilance of the people, informed by a free and vigorous press.

In making the case for a national government (The Federalist No. 23), Alexander Hamilton uses strong language. The powers needed to provide for the national defense, he writes, "ought to exist without limitation... The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite, and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed." Hamilton clearly does not mean that these "unlimited" powers should be committed solely to the president. Indeed, the Constitution distributes them, making the president commander in chief of the armed forces and chief diplomat, but giving Congress power to declare war, raise armed forces, ratify treaties and confirm the appointment of ambassadors. Hamilton cautions that the "history of human conduct" does not warrant committing the conduct of our relations with the rest of the world, so "delicate and momentous," to the "sole disposal" of an elected official (The Federalist No. 75).
The Federalist Papers Nos. 10, 17, and 44-46 are relevant to this program.

Whose Law, Whose Order?

Broadcast: April 18, 1997

Moderator: Charles J. Ogletree, Jr.

BY JOAN I. GRECO

A local sheriff refuses to conduct a federally required背景 check of a gun purchaser, claiming that his objection is not with gun control, but with the fact that the federal government directs the actions of state employees. To contemporary eyes, the sheriff's argument may seem obscure, even baffling. To the authors of The Federalist Papers, however, the sheriff's position would represent the continuation of a debate they took part in over two hundred years ago.

The authors of The Federalist Papers had a lot of explaining to do. This awesome work, which consists of 85 papers produced in frantic haste in the midst of a fierce political battle, had an entire, radically new Constitution to defend, yet it contains some of the wisest observations on government ever written. The authors discoursed on matters as diverse as the value of a bicameral Congress; the appropriateness of a four-year term for President; the role of the Senate in ratifying treaties; and the judiciary's responsibility to uphold the Constitution. But most of all, the papers were fundamentally a powerful plea for acceptance of a federate republic—one in which each of the sovereign states would cede some of its powers in order to gain the benefits of a strong national government. The papers are full of indictments of the weakness of the Articles of Confederation; briefs on the necessity of a strong federal government to obtain peace at home and respect abroad; and predictions (which may or may not have matched the authors' true hopes) that the proposed federal government should not be feared because "[i]t will always be far more easy for the State governments to encroach upon the national authorities than for the national government to encroach upon the State authorities." (No. 17, Hamilton)

Of course, the fledgling federal government that Hamilton, Madison, and Jay sought to defend has grown monumentally over the last two centuries. Federal laws and regulations touch almost every aspect of our lives. We can debate whether or not the Federalist authors could have imagined, or would have welcomed, these developments, but they would have undoubtedly been surprised at how few Americans today understand, or even care about, the basic tenet of federalism that was at the heart of their writings.

Whereas most Americans are eager to debate whether we should have more or less control of guns, more or less harsh penalties for possession of marijuana, more or less regulatory protection of the environment, or more or fewer restrictions on assisted suicide, not many people concern themselves with the question—fundamental to those who were debating the new Constitution—of whether these issues should be regulated by the federal government or by the states. For example, in the case of our local sheriff, what matters to most Americans is whether the background check takes place, not whether it has been mandated by federal or state law.

A local protest following the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms' disastrous raid on the Branch Davidian compound near Waco in 1993.

Unlike many contemporary Americans, the authors of The Federalist Papers and the framers of our Constitution envisioned a federal government whose powers would be substantial, whose laws would be supreme, but whose areas of concern would be limited. This basic federal structure is still embedded in our Constitution; but as a result of having lived through a Civil War, two World Wars, and numerous economic upheavals, the list of federal responsibilities expanded—for example, with the protection of civil rights—and the meaning of "interstate commerce," a federal concern, came to include every commercial transaction in the nation. More recently, as our federal officeholders have sought to address the immediate concerns of their constituents, the federal government has made federal crimes out of matters that in the past were solely under state and local control, such as drug possession, domestic violence, even carjacking.

What difference does it make whether an issue is handled at the state or federal level? Uniform national standards assure the free flow of commerce. Might they also prevent states from competing for business by lowering their environmental or worker health and safety regulations below the federal level? Can the "federalization" of an issue, such as drugs, be an effective way for the federal government to use its power and resources to battle a national problem? And isn't federal power required to protect local minorities who might not otherwise receive equal treatment under the law?

But "federalization" can have its costs. Might the imposition of one national standard prevent states from designing different solutions based on their local conditions and concerns? Does the designation of new federal crimes divert federal resources from core responsibilities such as the protection of civil rights? Moreover, federal power is, by definition, both stronger and further removed from the individual than state and local power. Could this be part of the reason why some Americans regard the federal government with fear and hostility?

As we look toward a new century, the nation struggles with the challenges of providing Americans with world-class educations, access to health care, freedom from drug abuse and violence, and a means of escape from poverty. To meet these challenges effectively, we must not only consider the results we seek, but also whether, for each aspect of the problem, the federal government or state governments are best able to attain those results. Unless we think hard about the advantages, and the costs, of handling an issue at the federal or state level, we are unlikely to reap the full benefits of the system envisioned by the Federalist authors and the framers of the Constitution.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Which of these matters, or which aspects of these matters, are best handled by the federal government? Which are best handled by state and local governments? Why?: Gun possession; drugs; education; environmental protection; civil rights; welfare; street crime; domestic violence.

2. Should the federal government be able to withhold federal funds for one matter (such as prisons) if a state refuses to follow federal policy on another matter (such as gun sales)?

3. If a state allows the "medicinal" use of marijuana, should the federal government prosecute those prescribing and using marijuana under the state law, for violating federal drug laws?

4. How should government—and individuals—deal with those who profess a fear of and hostility toward the federal government? Is a radio talk show host who speaks of the federal government as an enemy voicing his listeners' legitimate concerns, or is he fueling dangerous misunderstandings? In either case, how should the institutions that are being attacked, the individuals who disagree, respond?

Federalism and Gun Control

In efforts to reduce violence in and near schools, Congress banned firearms possession in every school area in the country with the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990. A student charged under the law challenged its constitutionality, and in 1995 the Supreme Court, by a narrow 5-4 majority, agreed. The case, U.S. v. Lopez, marked the first time since 1936 in which the Court overturned a federal law on the grounds that it exceeded the Congressional commerce authority. The majority decision asserted that such issues of law enforcement are strictly matters of state jurisdiction. The main dissenting opinion cited numerous studies that connect educational opportunities to local and national commerce; this direct relationship, argued the dissent, permits Congress to legislate school safety.

Big Government: Pro and Con

PROFESSOR ALAN BRINKLEY

"Such reforms [reducing the scope of the federal government] would move the United States toward becoming a balkanized republic, with fifty semiautonomous governments. . . . They would accentuate the regional, economic, religious, ethnic, and racial differences that already divide us. They would leave us impotent to confront unforeseen emergencies and unexpected problems." — from "The Assault on Government," New Federalist Papers

JUSTICE ANTONIN SCALIA

"A federal system will not work when the people have come to look upon the national government as the solution of first resort, and that's where I'm afraid we are. . . . What is out of kilter is that the people tend to look to Washington immediately instead of looking to their state capitals first."
New Technology, New Dilemmas

BY JOAN I. GRECO

At the time The Federalist Papers were written, most members of a community knew each other through personal judgment and long experience. Travel was onerous; relocation was a serious matter. Today, America is much larger in its geographic size and population, and Americans are incredibly mobile, but with that size and mobility comes a cost: neighbors may be strangers to each other. Technological advances have not only increased our mobility, however; they also offer us new ways to get to know our neighbors. Like the participants in PRIVACY AND SECURITY AT THE END OF THE MILLENNIUM, we can check out the new Little League coach by demanding that he or she be fingerprinted; we can hire an "information broker" to gather information from computer databases on job applicants; we can require our state to post information whenever a convicted "sexual predator" moves into town. How much of our personal privacy are we willing to give up—and how much of others' privacy are we willing to invade—for the sake of our security?

At times like this, when technology promises (or threatens) to reshape our basic understandings of privacy, security, and community, it is especially important to seek out an historical perspective. At first glance, The Federalist Papers seem to have no connection to these issues. Hamilton, Madison, and Jay were arguing for a new national government. They were not concerned with matters of personal security, which they assumed would be handled locally. But their words and their actions in the creation of The Federalist Papers reveal great political thinkers' opinions on privacy, trust, and the good and bad sides of human nature—opinions that can be quite useful in helping us answer the questions our brave new world presents us.

We can have little doubt that the authors understood the value of privacy. The Federalist Papers themselves were published under the pseudonym "Publius." Perhaps the uses the Federalist authors had for anonymous communication should be kept in mind when individuals seek to communicate through encrypted electronic messages, or to protect a sphere of privacy from employers or databases.

To a degree, the Federalist authors argued for trust of one's fellow Americans. In defending the new Constitution against predictions that those in the federal government would take every opportunity to abuse their powers, the Federalist authors reminded their readers that our basic form of government—a representative republic—required a greater faith in human nature than did authoritarian governments. "Were the pictures which have been drawn by the political jealousy of some among us faithful likenesses of the human character, the inference would be that there is not sufficient virtue among men for self-government; and that nothing less than the chains of despotism can restrain them from destroying and devouring one another." (No. 57, Madison) One might point to this faith in human nature to argue that trust in one's neighbor should not be replaced by extensive data-gathering. On the other hand, one could use the same observation to argue that we should have faith that those with access to data on others will use the information prudently.

Perhaps the Federalist observations most relevant to the issues raised by this program, however, were not those that

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Would you prefer to live in a town where everyone who worked with children was fingerprinted? Would you prefer to live in a town in which everyone in the town was fingerprinted?

2. What if the principal of Unity High School learned through an "information broker" that the best-qualified applicant to be the new gym teacher had been convicted of possessing a small amount of marijuana 15 years ago? Or that an applicant for school counselor had been married and divorced four times? Or that an applicant for a position that will involve handling school funds had once defaulted on a mortgage? Should this information affect the principal's decision? Should the information be available in the first place?

3. What information about you should your neighbors or employer be able to obtain easily? What sort of information should remain private? How can we protect that privacy?

4. Should juvenile criminal records remain confidential? Should there be a limit to the amount of time a person is labeled a "sexual predator" under a notification statute, if the person commits no other offenses?
professed a faith in humanity, but rather those that recognized the need for a government structure that kept citizens' less-than-noble impulses in check. Hamilton, Madison, and Jay recognized the inevitability of faction; the necessity of government power to maintain "the security of liberty" (No. 1, Hamilton); and the dangerous temptations that government power itself would create.

The Federalist authors thus well understood a fact that is especially important for us in determining where to draw the line in protecting privacy and security. They understood that the powers that kept the darker side of human nature in check must themselves be kept in check. "If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself." (No. 51, Madison).

These observations are as applicable to our current questions as they were to the Founders. It may be foolish not to use the information and technology available to us to enhance the security of our children and ourselves. But would it not also be foolish to assume that those with the ability to invade our privacy will always use their powers prudently? Mustn't the information-gathering powers that can help control crime themselves be controlled? In order to do that wisely, we must challenge ourselves, and our elected representatives, with the questions our panelists faced in this program.

Some local laws require that offenders be identified when they are released into a community.

Privacy and Government: Two Views

LESS PRIVACY IS GOOD FOR US (AND YOU)

"If we do not significantly improve our ability to reduce violent crime, sexual abuse, and to stem epidemics, an ever-larger number of Americans will demand strong-armed authorities to restore law and order. . . . Let us allow the new capabilities of cyberspace [to] help restore civil order, which is at the foundation of ordered liberties." – Professor Amitai Etzioni, "Less Privacy Is Good For Us (and You)"

IN DEFENSE OF PRIVACY

"Subtler and more far-reaching means of invading privacy have become available to the government. Discovery and invention have made it possible for the government, by means far more effective than stretching upon the rack, to obtain disclosure in court of what is whispered in the closet. . . . [T]he right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights, and the right most valued by civilized men." – Justice Louis Brandeis, Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 at 473, 478 (1928)
The Federalist Papers No. 10, 51, 52, 55-58 and 59-61 are relevant to this program.

THE PRICE OF POLITICS: ELECTING OUR LEADERS

BROADCAST: MAY 2, 1997
(check local listings)

MODERATOR: Kathleen M. Sullivan

Running for Political Office in an Age of Television, PACs, and Polls

BY KATHLEEN M. SULLIVAN

When the Congress of the United States first met in New York City just over two centuries ago, it was composed of only 59 representatives and 20 senators. They traveled long distances by horse and carriage and communicated with their constituencies by slow-moving post. Few members expected to stay in office for many terms. The framers of the Constitution envisioned that this body, while representing its constituents' views, would have enough detachment from immediate public passions to deliberate in the public interest. As James Madison wrote in The Federalist No. 10, the citizenry would elect those "whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country and whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations."

What resemblance does today's Congress bear to the Congress the framers envisioned? Much has changed in two centuries. Today the Senate has grown to 100 members and the House to 435. Because the population has grown much faster, the size of each members' constituency has grown exponentially. Members of Congress today travel by jet and communicate instantly by telephone, television, internet, and fax. They can measure every ripple of public feeling by electronic polls. Continuous television coverage conveys their speeches and votes back to their constituents in turn. Members remain in office far longer: while the turnover rate in the House was above 40 percent for most of the nineteenth century, it has dropped to less than 20 percent for most of the late twentieth century. The power of incumbency has grown: 90 percent or more of House members have won reelection in elections since 1946, and since 1960 more than 70 percent of senators seeking reelection have typically succeeded. The costs of campaigning have escalated dramatically. Today it costs an average of $2 million to run a Senate campaign and $600,000 to run for a seat in the House. A great deal of this money is spent on the expensive television advertising needed to reach today's much larger constituencies. Those who contribute campaign money often expect considerable access and influence on legislation in return. Under such modern conditions, is the deliberative democracy the framers envisioned still possible?

Contemporary critics charge that our electoral system today has departed from the framers' vision in three key ways. First, the critics say that today's representatives are reactive, not deliberative. They live by the polls, not by their conscience about what is right for the country. They have become mere delegates of the people rather than wise trustees of the public good. Second, critics say that tenure in Congress has ceased to be a public service and instead has become a career for professional politicians. Such repeat incumbents, rooted in Washington, lose touch with their own constituencies and with the concerns of ordinary people outside the Beltway. And third, say critics, government is too responsive to "special interests." Madison thought that "factions" could have little effect on the national government, because they would be so numerous and varied that they would tend to cancel one another out. But today, advances in communication and transportation have made interest groups' access to the nation's capital quite cheap, and they enjoy an influence on policy that is disproportionate to their numbers.

THE PRICE OF POLITICS: ELECTING OUR LEADERS explores these criticisms and proposed cures. It asks, first, what a hypothetical congresswoman should do when her conscience conflicts with the preferences of her constituents. Some argue that her first duty is to those who sent her to Congress. Others respond that, if members of Congress vote only according to their polls, we might as well dismantle Congress and run the country by electronic plebiscite instead. A related conflict arises when her conscience or her constituents' views clash with the views of groups that contributed financially to her campaign.

The program considers, second, whether members of Congress should be subject to term limits, as are the president and the members of many state legislatures. The framers considered but rejected "rotation" requirements for members of Congress. Today's term-limits advocates, however, say that replenishing Congress continually with new legislators would decrease its responsiveness to special interests and make it more broadly representative. Opponents disagree, arguing that legislative expertise takes time to acquire, and that term limits would "dumb down" Congress, transferring effective power to lobbyists and professional staffs. The Supreme Court held in 1995 that states may not impose term limits on members of Congress because the qualifications set forth in the Constitution—age, citizenship and residency—were exclusive. Thus, congressional term limits today could be imposed only by constitutional amendment.

Third, THE PRICE OF POLITICS explores possibilities for campaign finance reform. The Supreme Court held in 1976 that spending money in political campaigns amounts to "speech" protected by the First Amendment. Under this ruling, contributions to candidates may be limited but political expenditures themselves may not. Thus, candidates, parties, and political action committees may spend virtually unlimited sums. Expenditures may be limited only as a condition of public funding, which under current law applies to presidential but not congressional campaigns. Advocates of campaign finance reform say that candidates spend too much time and energy raising money and that they are too beholden to those who spend money on their behalf. Others are skeptical about spending limits, arguing that much-criticized "special interests" in fact represent real people and that spending limits would only entrench the power of incumbents by making it more difficult for newcomers to mount a challenge.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Can't politics itself correct political problems? If the electorate doesn't like money in politics, why can't it vote for the candidate who declining to take it? Which is more valuable to the candidate—taking the money or the bragging rights to say she didn't?

2. What alternatives would you suggest to the current system of private funding of political campaigns? Public funding with strings such as spending limits attached? Free air time for candidates on broadcasting networks? Bans on political action committees? Would any of these solutions raise troubling concerns about freedom of speech?

3. Would term limits violate the principle that the people are the best judges of who should represent them? If so, should the nation be free to elect a popular president to a third term?

4. Do polls and political consultants help make candidates too responsive to public opinion, at the price of leadership?
The following organizations either serve the entire nation or act as umbrella organizations for local affiliates.

American Library Association
50 E. Huron Street
Chicago, IL 60611
(312) 944-6780

Represents public, school, academic, state, and special libraries. Its mission is to advocate for the American people's right to a free and open information society and the highest quality library and information services.

Great Books Foundation
35 East Wacker Drive, Suite 2300
Chicago, IL 60601-2298
1-800-222-5870
Contact: Gary Schoepfel, Adult Program Director

Great Books discussions provide an opportunity for reflection on important ideas, and provide a public forum for exchanging views. The Foundation, nine Great Books Councils, and some of the 2,000 Great Books groups across the country will be conducting discussions of The Federalist Papers following the PBS airing of LIBERTY & LIMITS. Federalist Paper No. 10 is being made available by the Foundation.

League of Women Voters of the United States
1730 M Street, NW
Washington, DC 20036
(202) 429-1965

A nonpartisan, voluntary organization of citizens (men and women) that promotes political responsibility through informed and active participation in government; acts on selected government issues.

---

PUBLICATIONS

---

* The essays in New Federalist Papers, like the original Federalist Papers, are a defense of representative democracy; they see danger in current efforts to diminish and relocate federal power. Their aim is also to advocate reforms that address modern concerns.

---

WEB SITES

Look for more information about LIBERTY & LIMITS:
"THE FEDERALIST" IDEA 200 YEARS LATER on the World Wide Web at these web sites:

* wNetStation: http://www.wnet.org

* http://www.pbs.org

---

PARTICIPANTS

MODERATORS

* Arthur Miller, Harvard Law School
* Charles Nesson, Harvard Law School
* Charles Ogletree, Harvard Law School
* Kathleen Sullivan, Stanford Law School

PANELISTS

* Ernie Allen, President, National Center for Missing & Exploited Children
* Zoe Baird, VP and General Counsel, Aetna Inc.
* Bob Barr, U.S. Representative (R-CA)
* Barbara Boxer, U.S. Senator (D-CA)
* William Bratton, Former Police Commissioner, New York City
* Stephen Breyer, Justice, U.S. Supreme Court
* Alan Brinkley, Professor of American History, Columbia University
* Reverend Calvin Butts, Ill, Abyssinian Baptist Church, Harlem, New York
* Joseph Califano, Former Secretary HEW
* Stephen Carter, President, American Civil Liberties Union
* James Fallows, Editor, The Atlantic Monthly
* Jeff Greenfield, Correspondent, ABC News
* Alexander Haig, Former Secretary of State
* Richard Holbrooke, Former Assistant Secretary of State
* Michael Kelly, Editor, The New Republic
* Patrick Leahy, U.S. Senator (D-VT)
* Michael Leavitt, Governor, State of Utah (R-UT)
* Kati Marton, Chairman, Committee to Protect Journalists
* Bill McCollum, U.S. Representative (R-FL)
* Cleta Mitchell, President, Americans Back in Charge
* Jerry Nachman, Former VP, News, WCBS-TV, Former Editor, New York Post
* Jeanine Pirro, District Attorney, Westchester County, NY
* Nelson W. Polsby, The Institute of Governmental Studies, UC Berkeley
* Oliver "Buck" Revell, Former Associate Deputy Director, Investigations, FBI
* Richard Roberts, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice
* Warren Rudman, Former U.S. Senator (R-NH)
* Michael Sandle, Professor, Harvard University
* Antonin Scalia, Justice, U.S. Supreme Court
* Charles Schumer, U.S. Representative (D-NY)
* Robert Ellis Smith, Publisher, Privacy Journal
* Douglas Sosnik, Director of Political Affairs, The White House
* Robert Squier, President, Squier Knapp Ochs Communications
* Nadine Strossen, President, American Civil Liberties Union
* Fred Thompson, U.S. Senator (R-TN)
* William Webster, Former Director, CIA and FBI

---

James Gleick, Author and Columnist

James Gorelick, Deputy Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice

William Gray, President, United Negro College Fund, Former U.S. Representative (D-PA)

Jeff Greenfield, Correspondent, ABC News

Alexander Haig, Former Secretary of State

Richard Holbrooke, Former Assistant Secretary of State

Michael Kelly, Editor, The New Republic

Patrick Leahy, U.S. Senator (D-VT)

Michael Leavitt, Governor, State of Utah (R-UT)

Kati Marton, Chairman, Committee to Protect Journalists

Bill McCollum, U.S. Representative (R-FL)

Cleta Mitchell, President, Americans Back in Charge

Jerry Nachman, Former VP, News, WCBS-TV, Former Editor, New York Post

Jeanine Pirro, District Attorney, Westchester County, NY

Nelson W. Polsby, The Institute of Governmental Studies, UC Berkeley

Oliver "Buck" Revell, Former Associate Deputy Director, Investigations, FBI

Richard Roberts, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice

Warren Rudman, Former U.S. Senator (R-NH)

Michael Sandle, Professor, Harvard University

Antonin Scalia, Justice, U.S. Supreme Court

Charles Schumer, U.S. Representative (D-NY)

Robert Ellis Smith, Publisher, Privacy Journal

Douglas Sosnik, Director of Political Affairs, The White House

Robert Squier, President, Squier Knapp Ochs Communications

Nadine Strossen, President, American Civil Liberties Union

Fred Thompson, U.S. Senator (R-TN)

William Webster, Former Director, CIA and FBI
Title: Liberty & Limits: The Federalist Idea 200 Years Later - Teaching Packet

Author(s): Jean L. Graco, Donald L. Robinson, Kathleen M. Sullivan

Corporate Source: Thirteen/WNET and Seminars, Inc.

Publication Date: 1999

II. REPRODUCTION RELEASE:

In order to disseminate as widely as possible timely and significant materials of interest to the educational community, documents announced in the monthly abstract journal of the ERIC system, Resources in Education (RIE), are usually made available to users in microfiche, reproduced paper copy, and electronic media, and sold through the ERIC Document Reproduction Service (EDRS). Credit is given to the source of each document, and, if reproduction release is granted, one of the following notices is affixed to the document.

If permission is granted to reproduce and disseminate the identified document, please CHECK ONE of the following three options and sign at the bottom of the page.

The sample sticker shown below will be affixed to all Level 1 documents.

PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE AND DISSEMINATE THIS MATERIAL HAS BEEN GRANTED BY

__________________________

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)

1 Level 1

Check here for Level 1 release, permitting reproduction and dissemination in microfiche or other ERIC archival media (e.g., electronic) and paper copy.

The sample sticker shown below will be affixed to all Level 2A documents.

PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE AND DISSEMINATE THIS MATERIAL IN MICROFICHE, AND IN ELECTRONIC MEDIA FOR ERIC COLLECTION SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, HAS BEEN GRANTED BY

__________________________

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)

2A Level 2A

Check here for Level 2A release, permitting reproduction and dissemination in microfiche and electronic media for ERIC archival collection subscribers only.

The sample sticker shown below will be affixed to all Level 2B documents.

PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE AND DISSEMINATE THIS MATERIAL IN MICROFICHE ONLY HAS BEEN GRANTED BY

__________________________

TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)

2B Level 2B

Check here for Level 2B release, permitting reproduction and dissemination in microfiche only.

Documents will be processed as indicated provided reproduction quality permits. In permission to reproduce is granted, but no box is checked, documents will be processed at Level 1.

I hereby grant to the Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC) nonexclusive permission to reproduce and disseminate this document as indicated above. Reproduction from the ERIC microfiche or electronic media by persons other than ERIC employees and its system contractors requires permission from the copyright holder. Exception is made for non-profit reproduction by libraries and other service agencies to satisfy information needs of educators in response to discrete inquiries.

__________________________

Barbara Margolis, Exec. Dir

Barbara Margolis, Exec. Dir

FRED FRIENDLY SEMINARS

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

JOURNALISM SCHOOL

2960 BROADWAY NEW YORK NY 10027

Please see attached release from Educational Broadcasting Corporation (Thirteen/WNET)
III. DOCUMENT AVAILABILITY INFORMATION (FROM NON-ERIC SOURCE):
If permission to reproduce is not granted to ERIC, or, if you wish ERIC to cite the availability of the document from another source, please provide the following information regarding the availability of the document. (ERIC will not announce a document unless it is publicly available, and a dependable source can be specified. Contributors should also be aware that ERIC selection criteria are significantly more stringent for documents that cannot be made available through EDRS.)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Publisher/Distributor:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Address:</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Price:</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

IV. REFERRAL OF ERIC TO COPYRIGHT/REPRODUCTION RIGHTS HOLDER:
If the right to grant this reproduction release is held by someone other than the addressee, please provide the appropriate name and address:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Address:</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

V. WHERE TO SEND THIS FORM:
Send this form to the following ERIC Clearinghouse:
ERIC/CHESS
2805 E. Tenth Street, #120
Bloomington, IN 47408

However, if solicited by the ERIC Facility, or if making an unsolicited contribution to ERIC, return this form (and the document being contributed) to:
ERIC Processing and Reference Facility
1100 West Street, 2nd Floor
Laurel, Maryland 20707-3598
Telephone: 301-497-4080
Toll Free: 800-799-3742
FAX: 301-953-3263
e-mail: ericfac@inet.ed.gov
WWW: http://ericfac.piccard.csc.com

EFF-088 (Rev. 9/97)
PREVIOUS VERSIONS OF THIS FORM ARE OBSOLETE.